reign one year) he discovered so much of his worst conditions, as made the people both weary of his idleness; and the Souldiers of his vanity. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomy had with great honour, entertained and dismissed his Mother and Children. This afforded him the better leisure of making War in Greece: where he vanquished the Thebans, and won their City twice in short space, but used his Victory with mercy. Against Lysimachus he would fain have done somewhat (the peace between them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this Journey purchased nothing but enmity. Another expedition he took in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse event. Pyrrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon, which he had indeed as honestly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdom; he had also made excursions into Thessaly. But there needed not any handsome pretence of quarrel, seeing Demetrius thought himself strong enough to over-run his enemies Country, with two great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have known raw Novices in that faculty, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinary. Pyrrhus was a Captain, whom latter Ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the rank of Generals, than either Demetrius or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Army, which Demetrius led, and fell upon the other half: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, shewed in single combate against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this young Prince to fight hand to hand, and was utterly beaten. The loss of this Battel did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant behaviour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best quality. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (said they) none, save Pyrrhus, is like him in deed, in performing the office of a Captain.

These Rumours were not more nourished by the verrue of the Epirot, than by dislike of their own King; whom they began to disesteem, not so much in regard of his unprofitable Journey into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrey, and brought home his Army in good case) as of his Insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparel seemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not only too sumptuous and new-fangled, but very unmanly; and serving chiefly to be a daily witness, how much he contemned them and their good opinions. Of his Souldiers lives he was retchless: and suffered unwisely this unprincely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. He made a mockery of Justice; and (as it were, to publish unto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularity invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poor Suters after him in great hope, till coming to a Bridge, he threw all their Writings into a River; pleasing himself, in that he could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacity, and invading Macedon, had almost won it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sick in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great odds of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to forsake his winnings and be gone.

At length he began to have some feeling of the general hate; which to redress, he did not (for he could not) alter his own conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on work in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appear; that is, in a great War. His intent was to invade Asia with a Royal Army: wherein the fortune of one Battel might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, he first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so he might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Army, of almost a hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Horses, with a Navy of five hundred sail, wherein were many ships, far exceeding the greatness of any that had been seen before; yet so swift and useful withall, that the greatness was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomy suspect their own forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyn against this ambitious Son of Antigonus, that was like to prove more dangerous to them all, than ever was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once prevailed in Asia, there could be no ſecurity for his friends in Europe, what league ſoever were of old concluded. Therefore they reſolved to begin with him betimes, and each to invade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his own Kingdom. Lyſimachus came firſt, and againſt him went Demetrius with a great part of his Army: but whileſt he was yet on the way, news were brought into his Camp, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhæa. The matter was not over-great: were it not that minds prepared with long diſcontent, are ready to lay hold upon ſmall occaſions of diſlike. All the Camp was in uproar: ſome wept, others raged, few or none did forbear to utter ſeditious words, and many deſired leave of Demetrius, to go to their own houſes, meaning indeed to have gone to Lyſimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Army, he thought it the wiſeſt way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lyſimachus their own Country-man, againſt Pyrrhus that was a ſtranger: hoping by victory againſt the Epirot, to recover the love of his followers, in ſuch ſort that he might afterwards at leiſure deal with the other. But herein his wiſdom beguiled him. For the ſouldiers were as haſty as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing to ſee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some ſpake of his valour; ſome enquired, others anſwered, of his perſon, his armour, and other tokens whereby he might be known; as particularly, by a pair of Goats-horns, that he wore on his creſt. It was not likely, that theſe men ſhould hurt him. Divers of them ſtole away, and ran over into Pyrrhus his Camp: where the news that they brought, were better welcome than their perſons. For they ſaid, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get ſight of Pyrrhus, they would all ſalute him King. To try this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and preſented himſelf bare-headed in view of the Camp, whither ſome were ſent before to prepare his welcome. The news of his arrival found a general applauſe, and every one began to look out, with deſire to ſet eye on him. His face was not ſo well known as his Helmet; therefore he was admoniſhed to put it on: which done, all came about him, and proffered their ſervice; neither were there any, that ſpake for Demetrius; only ſome (and they the moſt moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes, and ſhift for himſelf. So Demetrius threw aſide his Maſkers habit, and attyring himſelf poorly, did fearfully ſteal away out of his own Camp, deſerving well this calamity: whether it were ſo, that he would not hearken to the good counſel of his friends; or whether his behaviour deprived him of ſuch friends, as would dare to let him hear the unpleaſant ſound of neceſſary truth.

Whileſt Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entry into the Kingdom of Macedon; Lyſimachus came upon him very unſeaſonably, and would needs have half: ſaying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the War; and therefore had reaſon to challenge his part of the gain. The bargain was quickly made, and the diviſion agreed upon: each of them being rather deſirous to take his part quietly, than to fight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to work his fellow quite out of all, upon better opportunity.

§. VIII.

How Demetrius gathering Forces, enterpriſed many things with ill ſucceſs, in Greece and Aſia. How he was driven upon Seleucus, and compelled to yield himſelf. His impriſonment and death.

THE Athenians were as unthankfull to Demetrius in this his adverſity, as they had been in former times. For they preſently forſook his friendſhip, and called Pyrrhus out of Macedon to be their Patron. Demetrius, when he went againſt Lyſimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, under his Son Antigonus. Therefore it is like, that he had ſoon gotten an Army, though Phila his Wife (who is highly commended for a wiſe and vertuous Lady) did poyſon her ſelf, upon deſperate grief for his misfortune. The firſt, upon whom he attempted to ſhew his anger, were the Athenians that had well deſerved it. He began to lay ſiege to their Town: but was pacified by Crates the Philoſopher, whom they had made their ſpokes-man; and taking fair words inſtead of ſatisfaction, paſſed over into Aſia, with eleven thouſand Souldiers, meaning to try his fortune againſt Lyſimachus, for the Provinces of Lydia and Caria.

At his firſt coming into thoſe parts, fortune ſeemed to ſmile upon him. For many good Towns, willingly, or by compulſion, yielded to his obedience. There were alſo ſome Captains that fell from Lyſimachus to him, with their companies and treaſures. But it was not long ere Agathocles the Son of Lyſimachus, came upon him with an Army ſo ſtrong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his laſt ſtock againſt it.

Wherefore he resolved to pass through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to find a Kingdom somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsel was grievously impeached by Agathocles: who pursued him close, and cut off all his provisions, driving him to take which wayes he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemy: nevertheless, he could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poor titulary King, with extream famine. At length, in passing the river Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were lost, that the rest could no longer make resistance: but were driven to travel with such speed as might well be called a plain flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of war, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest with their Captain, escaped into Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claim to the Country; but with vehement and humble Letters he besought his Son-in-law to call to mind their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These Letters at the first wrought well with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Demetrius had carried himself, when he recovered strength after the battel at Ipsus, he changed his purpose, and went against him with an Army.

Many treaties were held between them; of which none took effect, through the jealousie of Seleucus. Therefore meer desperation enforced Demetrius to fight like a mad man, and his furies got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sickness took and held him forty days, in which time, a great number of his few men ran to the enemy. This notwithstanding he still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his coming been discovered by Fugitives, that gave alarm. Finally, when all his Army had forsaken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himself, he was compelled by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few forsook him) to yield unto Seleucus.

Seleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad, and sent him very comfortable messages. But the approbation of his own humanity by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he used him with as much favour, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept under sure guard in a demy-Island, wherein were goodly Walks, Orchards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked royally, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his liberty was reserved unto the coming of young Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countreys. In this sort he spent three years, now merrily all the while (as one that living enjoyed the happiness, which with so much travel and blood-shed, he had sought in vain) and then dyed, leaving to his Son Antigonus, the same which his Father had left unto himself; that is, friends and hope. His ashes were honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his House will shew it self hereafter, in times and places convenient.

The death of Ptolomy, of Lysimachus, and of Seleucus, that was the last of Alexanders Captains: with other occurrences.

ABout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomy King of Egypt, a vertuous Prince, war-like, gentle, bountifull, and (which in those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. He had, by many Wives and Concubines, many Children, out of whom he selected Ptolomy Philadelphus, and caused him to reign together with himself, two or three years before he died, that so he might confirm him in the Inheritance of the Kingdom. At this, Ptolomy Ceraunus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomy) was grievously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gave him loving entertainment. There were now only two of Alexanders Captains left, Seleucus and Lysimachus. These two needs would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Company. The true ground of their quarrel, was their neer equality or strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysimachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poysoning Agathocles his eldest Son: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus for aid.

The Macedons, after seven moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, began to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their natural Countrey-man, that they forsook Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than because becauſe he was an Alien. This they had known well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, that they lightly gave him. Lyſimachus had reigned about five years alone, when the City of Lyſimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared by events, to have foreſhewed the fall of his houſe. His own jealouſie, and the inſtigation of a mother-in-law, cauſed him to poyſon his ſon Agathocles; which drew upon him that War, wherein (after the loſs of all his fifteen Children that were taken away by divers accidents) he periſhed himſelf.

Seleucus was encountred by Lyſimachus on Aſia ſide, where one battell concluded the war, with Lyſimachus his death. It pleaſed Seleucus more than the victory, that he was the laſt of all the great Heroes that followed Alexander. For now he ſeemed to himſelf as Lord and Heir of all the conquered World. So he paſſed over into Macedon, to take poſſeſſion of Europe, where there was none to withſtand him. But here he ended his days, and within ſeven moneths followed Lyſimachus, and others of his fellows, by a bloody death, being treacherouſly ſlain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, whoſe friend and Patron he had been. Seventy and ſeven year old he was, when he fought with Lyſimachus, and Lyſimachus was ſeventy and four. With them ended the generation of old Captains, that had ſeen the dayes as it were of another World under the Perſian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of War: even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we ſpake before; that is now ready to enter into war with the Romans, a more warlike people than Alexander himſelf did ever encounter. Of which war, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a ſtory more important, than any likely to enſue in Greece, or in the great Kingdoms that were held by Alexanders Succeſſors, with leſs (and ſtill decreaſing) vertue, than was that, by which they were firſt purchaſed.

CHAP. VII.

The growth of Rome, and ſettling of the Eaſtern Kingdoms.

§. I.

How the Romans enlarged their Dominions in Italy, from the death of Tullus Hoſtilius, unto ſuch time as they were aſſailed by Pyrrhus.

HOw Rome was founded by Romulus; ſettled in good order by Numa Pompilius; and by many (though ſmall) Victories, gathered ſtrength, unto ſuch time as it became the Head of Latium, by the conqueſt of Alba, in the Reign of Tullus Hoſtilius: it hath been already noted in due order of time. But whereas now the Roman greatneſs beginneth to encounter the power of Greece; and extending it ſelf out of Italy, to overwhelm the Dominions of other States and Princes: I hold it convenient (as in like caſes I have done) briefly to ſet down the growth of this mighty City, in a compendious relation of thoſe many actions, which could not have been delivered in the ages, wherein they were ſeverally performed, without much interruption of the Hiſtory, that was then occupied in matter more important.

After the death of Tullus Hoſtilius (who when he had reigned two and thirty years, was burnt together with his houſe by lightning) Ancus Martius, Grand-childe to Numa Pompilius by his Daughter, and not much unlike him in diſpoſition, ſucceeded in the Kingdom of Rome. He walled the City about; enlarged it with the Hill Aventine, which he encloſed; built a bridge over Tybris, and the City of Oſtia upon the Sea, ſixteen miles diſtant from Rome. Finally, having reigned 24 years, he dyed, and by his laſt Will he left his Children in charge with one Lucumon, the ſon of Damaratus, a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypſelus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquinii, by the name of which Town he was afterward called Tarquinius. From that City in Hetruria coming to Rome, and encouraged by ſome ominous occurrents, together with his wife Tanaquils propheſie, pheſie, he grew a favourite of Ancus Martius; by his Grecian wit humouring the factions of the Roman Court, inſomuch, that after his deceaſe he became not only Protector to the children, but Governour to the City. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centurions of Horſemen: neither was he leſs eminent in war, than in peace: for he prevailed often againſt the Tuſcans, and from his victories, the chiefeſt ornaments of triumph took their original. When this Lucius Tarquinius had reigned 38. years, he was ſlain by the Sons of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tanaquil his wife, perceiving what was done, informed the people, from out of an high Turret, that her Husband was wounded, and ſick, but not dangerouſly. And withall ſignified unto them, that in the interim of his ſickneſs, one Servius Tullius, whom from his birth ſhe alwayes propheſied to be born to great hopes (the ſon of P. Corniculanus, and Ocriſia a well deſcended, but captive woman) brought up in her houſe, and husband unto her daughter, ſhould ſupply her husbands place, in governing the State, untill his recovery: which government, being thus at firſt obtained by cunning, he afterwards uſurped as his right. He firſt ordained Ratements, Subſidies and Valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourſcore thouſand were muſtered, of which number conſiſted their whole Corporation; and by diſtinction of Dignities, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the Kingdom in as good ſort, as if it had been a private houſhold. At length, haveing two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding alſo that the two ſons of Tarquinius Priſcus, Sextus and Aruns, which had been committed unto his tuition, were of different diſpoſitions, proportionably anſwering to his daughters; he (willing to add water, not oyl, to fire) gave the mild daughter to Sextus the hot-headed ſon, and the violent, to Aruns the gentle in marriage. But whether by intended courſes, or by accident, it hapned; the two mild ones being made away, the furious natures were readily joyned in marriage: who ſoon concurring, and calling the Senate together, began to lay claim to the Kingdom. Upon this tumult, Servius Tullius haſtening to the Senate, (where he thought by Authority to have bridled Inſolency) was thrown down the ſtairs, and going home ſore bruiſed, was ſlain by the way, when he had reigned 44 years. Then Tullia his daughter, firſt proclaiming her Husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home enforced her Coachman to drive his Chariot over her fathers corps: whereupon the ſtreet had the denomination of Wicked-ſtreet. This Tarquine, exerciſing cruelty without juſtice, and tyranny without mercy, upon the people and Senators; having tired himſelf and them at home, uſed the ſame rage of treachery upon his borders. He took Oriculum, Sueſſa, Pometia, and the Gabii. The iſſue of beſieging Ardea, a Town eighteen mile diſtant from Rome, was of bad ſucceſs. In the heat of which War, his Son Sextus Tarquinius violently raviſhed that chaſte Lady Lucretia, his kinſman Collatines wife: who in way of expiation for ſo unchaſte a deed, thought good to waſh out thoſe ſpots of infamy with her own blood; ſo (having firſt bequeathed the revenge unto her father Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, her husband Collatine and Junius Brutus) ſhe kill'd her ſelf: whereupon (chiefly by Junius Brutus his reſolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoſed and baniſhed; and fled to Porſenna King of Hetruria for ſuccour, in the five and twentieth year of his reign, and the two hundred forty and fourth from the building of their City: in which ſpace Rome had ſcarce gotten poſſeſſion of fifteen miles round about her.

Junius Brutus by the help of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Country from that heavy yoke of bondage, inforced the people by ſolemn oath, never to admit any government by Kings amongſt them: whereupon they ranſacked their Kings goods, conſecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the government of the State upon Brutus and Collatine. But becauſe the name of King was odious in their ears, they changed the manner of their government, from perpetual to annual, and from a ſingle Government to a double; leſt perpetual or ſole dominion might be ſome motive to uſurpation; and inſtead of Kings they called them Conſuls, ſignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwayes mindfull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it ſo hard ſetling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, ſcarce daring to aſſure themſelves of their own ſecurity, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to reſign up his authority, fearing that tyranny would be hereditary, and ſuppoſing that the very name and affinity with the houſe of Tarquine, ſavoured already of their condition. In his room was ſubſtitute Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name importeth) be gracious in the peoples eyes, gave liberty, in matters of controverſie to appeal from the Conſuls to the people, and that he might as well in goods as in perſon, avoid occaſion of ſuſpition, cauſed his own houſe to be pulled down, becauſe it was built in a place defenſible, as if it had been a Cittadel. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples ſafety, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that ſome greener wits, and in the firſt rank his own ſons, were itching after innovations, hoping to reſtore the baniſhed Kings; he cauſed them, publickly in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all unpartially to the block.

Hitherto the Romans, having by the unblemiſhed integrity of Brutus, well appeaſed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereafter imployed their military deſignments againſt Forraigners: firſt, for their liberty; ſecondly, for inlarging of their poſſeſſions; and laſtly, for defending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, ſituated as it were in the mid-way between Latium and the Tuſcans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minority, could not but give occaſion of offence to her neighbours; untill by main oppoſition, having prevailed againſt her borderers, ſhe uſed them as inſtruments, whereby to obtain the reſt.

Their firſt war, in the firſt year of Conſuls, was againſt Porſenna King of Hetruria: who being over-perſwaded by Tarquins lamentation, came to Rome, together with the baniſhed King, and with great forces, to ſeat him again in his Kingdom.

In the firſt conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time born the main brunt of his enemies on the Bridge over Tibris, at length, feeling himſelf too faint to ſtand againſt ſo many, cauſed the bridge behinde him to be broken down, and with his armour leaping into the River, like a hunted Stagg, refreſhed his hot ſpirits, and returned ſafe to his fellows, with the like reſolution to ſuſtain a new charge. Porſenna, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Janiculus, which is the very entrance into the City, and found the Victory, in a manner, aſſuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the conſtant reſolution of Mutius Scævola (who having by errour ſlain Porſenna his Secretary, in ſtead of the King himſelf, did in ſcorn of torments threatned, burn off his own hand) he thought it not any whit prejudicial either to his ſafety, or credit, to enter league with them at the worſt hand. And yet the edge of Tarquinius his ſpleen was not quite abated, though Arans his Son, and Brutus, his enemy, in ſingle combat, had ſlain each other. And here the Romans, although they loſt, Brutus got the field; and their Ladies, whoſe Champion he was, for their chaſtity, not for beauty, mourned the loſs of him one whole year. Into this place, for the reſidue of his year, was ſubrogated Sp. Lucretius Tricipitinus, father to Lucretia: and in his room (deceaſing naturally before the year expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquin, upon his overthrow, feeling the fates diſaſtrous, thought it no boot to ſtrive againſt the ſtream, but ſpent the reſidue of his time, which was about fourteen years, privately at Tuſculum. Yet his Son-in-law Mamilius Tuſculanus, ſtomaching a-freſh at thoſe old repulſes, becauſe Porſenna had made peace with the Romans, and denyed further ſuccour unto the Tarquines, muſtered up his Latins, and gave battel to the Romans, at the Lake Regillum; where the conflict was fierce, and the iſſue uncertain, untill Aulus Poſthumus, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magiſtracy greater than Conſuls, purpoſely for this war, when firſt it was expected) to exaſperate his Souldiers courage, threw their own Enſigns amidſt the Enemies; and Coſſus, or Spurius Caſſius, (Maſter of the Horſe-men, an aſſiſtant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might run with free violence, to recover again their Enſigns. This fight was ſo well performed, that a report went of Caſtor and Pollux, two gods, who came on milk-white Steeds, to be eye-witneſſes of their valour, and fellow-helpers of their Victory; for the General conſecrated a Temple to them, as a ſtipend for their pains. After this the Romans fierce ſpirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themſelves at home; and the ſixteenth year after the Kings expulſion, upon inſtigation of ſome deſperate banckrours, thinking themſelves wrongfully oppreſſed by the Senate and Conſuls, they made an uproar in the holy Mount; untill by Menenius Agrippa, his diſcreet alluſion, of the inconvenience in the Head and Belly's diſcord, to that preſent occaſion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have ſome new Magiſtrates created, to whom they might appeal in caſes of variance, and make them Solicitors in all their controverſies, the Conſuls authority notwithſtanding. This was enacted, and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among themſelves, themſelves, they had continual War with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. Among theſe, the Volſci and Æqui held them longeſt; who made War of themſelves upon the Romans: whereby they loſt the beſt City in their whole juriſdiction, Corioli.

In this conqueſt, T. Martius got the ſurname of Coriolanus: a name honourable then, as drawn from a great Victory; although, by reaſon of the poverty of the Town, a Roman General, in after times, would have been aſhamed of that title. But yet theſe graces had been no occaſion of diſparagement, had he not afterwards in a great time of dearth, adviſed to ſell corn, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people, whereupon Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalf, accuſed him, and after judgement baniſhed him. Coriolanus flying to the Volſci, whom lately before he had vanquiſhed, incenſed them to renew their forces again; which being committed unto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, ſo far forth, that he was come within four or five miles of the City. Incamping there, he made ſo ſharp war, and was at ſuch defiance with his Country, that he would not relent by any ſupplication of Embaſſadours, untill his mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pitifull tune of deprecation, ſhewing themſelves better Subjects to their Country than friends to their Son and Husband, were more available to Rome than was any force of Arms. Hereupon Coriolanus diſmiſſing his Army, was after put to death among the Volſci, as a Traitor, for neglecting ſuch opportunity: or (as others ſurmiſe) living with them untill old age, he died naturally.

Not long after this the Veii in Hetruria, provoked the Romans; againſt whom the Fabii, three hundred and ſix in number, all of one Family, intreated and obtained, that they only might be employed, as it had been in a private quarrel. Theſe Fabii, after ſome good ſervices, lying incamped at Cremera, were circumvented, and all ſlain: one only of that whole houſe had been left, by reaſon of infancy, at home; from whom afterward ſprang Fabius Maximus, who vanquiſhed Hannibal.

In proceſs of time, the Romans were alſo troubled with the Volſci, at the hill of Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minutius their Conſul, with his whole Army, had been diſcomfited, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus choſen Dictator, and taken from the plough to the higheſt honour in Rome, with ſucceſs anſwerable to his expedition, diſperſed his enemies, and freed his Country in the ſpace of ſixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volſcian war, it was that Appius Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two years before choſen Governours of the State, and Inactors of Solons Laws amongſt them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the mean while the Conſuls, and all other Magiſtrates) would have raviſhed Virginia, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a company, and lying then in a Camp at Algidum. Hereupon the people in an uproar took the Hill Aventine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men to reſign up their authority again to new Conſuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or deſire to revenge old loſſes, drew the Romans into a new war againſt the Veientes and their adherents, upon whom, having tried their forces with diverſity of Captains, and variety of event, they vanquiſhed the Faliſci, and the Fidenates, and utterly ſubdued the Veientes. In conquering the Faliſci, Furius Camillus ſhewed no leſs integrity than fortitude. For when a Schoolmaſter, by training forth into the Roman camp, many children of the principal Citizens, thought to betray the Town, yielding them all up as hoſtages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound unto his Souldiers, willing them to whip him back into the City; which forthwith yielded unto him in reverence of his juſtice. The ſiege of Veii was ten years, and ſo troubleſome, that the Romans were there firſt inforced to winter abroad under beaſts ſkins (to which they were the more eaſily induced, becauſe then firſt they received pay) and to make vows never to return without Victory.

At length winning the City by a Mine, they got ſo large ſpoils, that they conſecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythius: and the whole people in general were called to the ranſacking of the City. But yet they were no leſs unthankfull to Camillus for his ſervice, than before they had been to Coriolanus; for they baniſhed him the City, upon ſome occaſion of inequality in dividing the ſpoils: yet he requited their unkindneſs with a new piece of ſervice againſt the fury of the Gauls; who being a populous Countrey, and very healthfull, the fathers (as ſometimes now) lived ſo long, that the ſons deſtitute of means, were enforced to roave abroad, ſeeking ſome place where to ſet up their reſt: and withall being a Nation vaſte in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rovers over many Countries. Some of them lig' ting on Italy, set upon Clusium a Town in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information (and being careful of her Confederate Towns) sent Embassadours, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, upon some injury offered by the Roman Embassadours, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow unto the Romans, by the River Allia, upon the sixteenth day before the Calends of August (which day was after branded for unlucky, and called Allienſis in the Roman Kalendar) they hastned towards the City. Then was Rome the true map of misery and desolation. For some leaving the City; some creeping into holes; Priests hiding their reliques; and, every one shifting for himself ere the enemy came, Rome was abandoned as indefensible. The Vestal Virgins, in this tumult, were safely conveyed away; the Ancients of the City, gathering boldness out of desperate fear, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave of the world, did set themselves in Thrones, in their several houses, hourly expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to dye, as they had lived, in State. The younger sort, with M. Manlius their Captain, took upon them to make good the Capitol.

By this the Gauls were entred the City, who seeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoil, committing all to the fire and sword. As for the old Senators, they sate in their Majesty with a grave resolution; having first reverenced them as gods, anon they tryed whether they would dye like men. When the City was throughly rifled, they attempted the Capitol: which held them work for the space of seven months. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being descried by the gaggling of Geese, M. Manlius did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gauls being weary, and the Romans hungry. The bargain was, that the Gauls should take a thousand pound weight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in weighing, the Gauls, with open insolency, made their weights too heavy: Brennus their Captain, casting his sword into the ballance, and with a proud exprobration, saying, that the vanquished must be patient perforce. But in the midst of this cavilling came Furius Camillus with an Army from Ardæa, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell upon the Gauls with such violence, that he dispersed their troops, quenched the fire of the City with their blood, forcing them to restore the spoils with advantage, and forbear the gold, in accepting which they had lately been so nice. Further, having rid the City of them, he so hotly pursued them thorow a great part of Italy, that the remainder of their Army which escaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gauls, which followed this first, had the like ill success. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Corvinus (each of which in single fight slew a several Champion of the Gauls) abated their presumption, and restored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable service, was afterwards accounted a second Romulus.

The people, after this destruction of their City, were earnestly bent to go to the Veii to inhabit; but Camillus dissuaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veii they changed their government from Consuls to military Tribunes. The government of these also, after some years, was by civil dissention interrupted: so that one while Consuls ruled, another while there was an Anarchy. Then the Tribunes were restored and ruled again, till, after many years expired, the Consular authority was established, it being enacted, that one of the Consuls should alwayes be a Plebeian. This was after the building of the City 365 years. And now Rome, by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her Minority, dares set forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirty miles off: situated between Campania and Apulia. These did so strongly invade the Campanians their neighbours, that they forced them to yield themselves subjects to Rome, and undergo any conditions of Tribute, or whatsoever else to obtain protection: which the Romans, although both Countries had been their confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should devour the less, easily allowed of; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the abundance of Corn and Wine, pleasant Cities and Towns, but especially Capua it self, the fairest City then in all Italy.

The families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most imployed in the managing of this War, which endured the space of fifty years. And in this season were the Romans often times dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius and Sp. Posthumius were Consuls, and discomfited by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominy: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men. But for those losses, many great Victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrel. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but less warlike Nation) began to stir. So the one and the other of these two Countries, became at length, tributary to Rome. In the continuance of this long war it was, (though in time of truce between the Romans and Samnites) that the Latins began to challenge equal freedom in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing office, so that they required to have one of the Consuls yearly chosen out of them.

This demand of the Latins was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latin Colony; besides all which, they made offer to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud to admit any such capitulation. So a great battel was fought between them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Consuls.

Manlius Torquatus and the elder Decius were then Consuls, whom the Soothsayers advertised, that the side should be victorious which lost the General in fight. Hereupon Decius the Consul exposed his life to the enemy, and purchased victory (as was believed) by his death. In which kind of devoting himself for his Army, the son of this Decius being after Consul, did imitate his father in the Hetrurian war. But (as Tully well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decii, that purchased victory, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherein their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of such a Religion, as required the lives of so worthy Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Country. The discipline of Manlius was no less resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbade any one to forsake his place, and fight single with an enemy. For breach of which order he caused his own son to be put to death, who had slain a Captain of the Latins, being challenged in single fight.

When the Latins, the Æqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, with some other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vain labour for any people of Italy to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to try their fortune, and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Consul, wasting all their Country with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians that made trial of the Roman arms, were the Tarentines and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as mediatours between the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptory denunciation of War, unto that party which should dare to refuse peace by them tendred. These threats which discovered their bad affection unto Rome, ended in words; but when the Samnites were utterly subdued, matter enough of quarrel was found to examine their ability of performance.

The Romans complained that certain ships of theirs were robbed, and sent Embassadours unto Tarentum, to require amends. Upon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that War, wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Apulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome to rebell and take their part. But some experience of the Roman strength, taught all these people to know their own weakness. Wherefore they agreed to send for Pyrrhus, by whose aid (being a Grecian, as the Tarentines also were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should be confined unto more narrow bounds than all Italy, which already in a manner it did over-spread.

§. II.

How Pyrrhus warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battels.

Pyrrhus, forsaken by the Macedonians, and unable to deal with Lysimachus, was compelled a while to live in rest: which he abhorred no less than a wiser Prince would have desired. He had a strong Army, and a good Fleet, which in that unsettled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdom: but the fall of Demetrius had so increased the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisdom to make an offensive war upon him, without far greater forces: Antigonus, the son of Demetrius, held Corinth at the same time, and some other Towns, with the remainder of his Fathers Army and treasures, left in his hand. Upon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have won; but it was better to let him alone, that he might serve to give some hindrance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imployment, and covetous desire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with brave offers, as needing no other aid aid than his good conduct, which to obtain, they would caſt themſelves under his protection. They had in their company ſome of the Samnites, Lucanians, Meſſapians, and others; which promiſed, in behalf of their ſeveral Nations, as much as could be deſired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conqueſts; that he might enlarge his Empire to the Weſt, as far as Alexander had gotten Eaſtward; and ſtill by one victory open the gate unto another. To which effect it is ſaid, that once he anſwered Cyneas his chief Counſellour, aſking what he meant to do after every of the victories which he hoped to get: that having won Rome, he would ſoon be Maſter of all Italy; that, after Italy he would quickly get the Iſle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil, he would paſs over into Affrick, and win Carthage, with all the reſt of the Countrey; and being ſtrengthened with the force of all theſe Provinces, he would be too hard for any of thoſe that were now ſo proud and troubleſome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they ſhould do, when they were Lords of all. Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) anſwered pleaſantly, that they would live merrily; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they preſently might do, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his own.

Nevertheleſs, this Italian Expedition ſeemed unto Pyrrhus a matter of ſuch conſequence, as was not to be omitted, in regard of any ſcholaſtical diſputation. Wherefore he prepared his Army, of almoſt thirty thouſand men, well ſorted, and well trained ſouldiers: part of which he ſent over before him under Cyneas, with the reſt he followed in perſon. At his coming, he found the Tarentines, very prompt of tongue, but in matter of execution, utterly careleſs to provide for the war. Wherefore he was fain to ſhut up their Theatre, and other places of pleaſure and reſort, enforcing them to take arms, and making ſuch a ſtrict muſter, as was to them very unpleaſing, though greatly behooving to their eſtate.

Whilſt he was occupied with theſe cares, Lævinus the Roman Conſul drew near, and began to waſte Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this War.

The Lucanians were not ready to defend their own Countrey; the Samnites were careleſs of the harm, that fell not (as yet) upon themſelves; the Tarentines were better prepared than they would have been, but their valour was little: all of theſe had been accuſtomed to ſhrink for fear of the Roman fortitude: and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more upon his own forces: than the iſſue of their vaunting promiſes. He was now driven either to ſet forward with thoſe that himſelf had brought into Italy, and the aſſiſtance of the Tarentines, wherein little was to be repoſed; or elſe to weaken the reputation of his own ſufficiency, which by all means he was careful to uphold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had been ſcattered by foul weather at Sea, were ſafely come to him: with which he reſolved to aſſay the valour of the Romans, againſt whom he proudly marched.

Lævinus the Conſul was not affrighted with the terrible name of a great King; but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battel ere all his adherents ſhould be ready to joyn with him. This boldneſs of the Roman, and the ſlackneſs of the Meſſapians, Lucanians, Samnites, and others, whom the danger moſt concerned, cauſed Pyrrhus, to offer a treaty of peace: requiring to have the quarrel between the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to win time, that the Samnites and their fellows might arrive at his Camp; or whether, conſidering better at near diſtance, the weight of the buſineſs which he had taken in hand, he were deſirous to quit it with his honour; the ſhort anſwer that was returned to his propoſition, gave him no means of either the one or the other: for the Romans ſent him this word, that they had neither choſen him their Judge, nor feared him their enemy.

Hereupon both Armies haſtned their march unto the River of Siris: Lævinus intending to fight before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from paſſing that River, until his own Army were full. Upon the firſt view of the Roman Camp, it was readily conceived by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to do with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a brave diſcipline of War: which cauſed him to ſet a ſtrong Corps de garde upon the paſſage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, until he ſaw his beſt advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemy was not only skilful in the Art of War, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Army entred the Foord, in face of his Corpſe de garde; and their horſe, at the ſame time began to paſs the River in ſundry places: which cauſed the Greeks to forſake the defence of their bank, and ſpeedily retire unto their Camp.

them, ere the whole Army had recovered firm footing, and were in order. So directing his Captains how to marshal his battels; himself with the horse charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the duty of a careful General; nor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personal valour. It behooved him indeed to do his best; for he never met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slain under him: afterwards, he changed armour with a friend; but that friend paid his life for the use of his Kings armour, which was torn from his back. This accident had almost lost him the battel; but he perceiving it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and took from the Romans their vain joy. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater loss (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only spear and sword were used. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose unusual form and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (unaccustomed to the like) were not able to sustain; then was the victory quickly gotten. For the Roman battels, perceiving their horse put to the rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselves both charged in flank, and over-born, by the force and huge bulk of those strange beasts; gave way to necessity, and saved themselves, as well as they could, by hasty flight: in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their discipline, that they tarried not to defend their Camp, but ran quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victory was soon spread over Italy; and the reputation was no less than the fame. For it was a matter very rare to be heard, that a Roman Consul, with a select Army, should lose in plain battel, not only the Field, but the Camp it self, being so notably fortified as they alwayes were. And this honour was the more bravely won by Pyrrhus, for that he had with him none of his Italian friends, save the unwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well dissemble his content that he took, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his own, at such time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for coming (as we say) a day after the Fair. Nevertheless he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such, as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victories. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose he sent unto them Cyneas his Embassadour, demanding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himself accepted as their especial friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberal gifts labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their desire of recovering their captives, or their danger, by the rising of many States in Italy against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blind Senator, did stir them up to make good their honour by war. So they returned answer, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italy, they would come to no agreement with him.

Such was the report that Cyneas made at his return, of the Roman puissance and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus a great desire of confederacy with that gallant City. Hereupon many kind Offices passed between them: but still when he urged his motion of peace, the answer was; He must first depart out of Italy, and then treat of peace.

In the mean season, each part made provision for war; the Romans levying a more mighty Army than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthened with access unto his forces of all the East parts of Italy. So they came to the trial of a second battel, wherein (though after long and cruel fight) the boisterous violence of the Elephants gave to Pyrrhus a second victory. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had been: rather it gave him cause to say, that such another victory would be his utter undoing. For he had lost the flower of his Army in this battel: and though he drave the Romans into their Camp, yet he could not force them out of it, nor saw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieved with daily supplies, whilest he should be driven to spend upon his old stock. Neither could he expect that his Elephants should alwayes stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight would soon teach the Romans, that were apt Scholars in such learning, how to make them unserviceable. Wherefore he desired nothing more, than how to carry his honour safe out of Italy: which to do (seeing the Romans would not help him, by offering or accepting any fair conditions of peace, or of truce) he took a slight occasion, preſented by fortune, that followeth to be related.

§. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicil. How Pyrrhus, being invited into Sicil, forſook Italy; won the moſt of the Iſle; and loſt it in ſhort ſpace. Pyrrhus returns into Italy, where he is beaten by the Romans, and ſo goes back to his own Kingdom.

WHen Ptolomy Ceraunus had traiterouſly murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he preſently ſeized upon all the Dominions of Lyſimachus in Europe, as if they had been the due reward unto him, that had ſlain the Conquerour. The houſes of Caſſander and Lyſimachus were then fallen to the ground: neither was there in Macedon any man of ſtrength and reputation enough to advance himſelf againſt Ceraunus. The friends of Lyſimachus were rather pleaſed to have him their King, that had (as he profeſſed) revenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiouſneſs of his fact, by which they were freed from ſubjection, to one, againſt whom they had ſtood in oppoſition. Many there were, that upon remembrance of his fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perſwading themſelves that his reign might prove good, though his entrance had been wicked. Theſe affections of the Macedonians did ſerve to defeat Antigonus the ſon of Demetrius, that made an attempt upon the Kingdom. As for Antigonus the ſon of Seleucus, he was far off, and might be queſtioned about ſome part of Aſia, ere he ſhould be able to bring an Army neer unto Europe. Yet he made great ſhew of meaning to revenge his Fathers death: but being ſtronger in money than in arms, he was content, after a while, to take fair words, and make peace with the murtherer. While theſe three ſtrove about the Kingdom, Pyrrhus, who thought his claim as good as any of theirs, made uſe of their diſſention: threatning war, or promiſing his aſſiſtance to every one of them. By theſe means he ſtrengthened himſelf, and greatly advantaged his Italian voyage, which he had then in hand: requeſting money of Antiochus, ſhips of Antigonus, and ſouldiers of Ptolomy, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a ſtrong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (covenanting to have them reſtored at two years end) more for fear than for love: that ſo he might free himſelf from trouble, and quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomy grew mighty on the ſudden; and the power that by wicked means he had gotten, by means as wicked he encreaſed.

All Macedon and Thrace being his, the ſtrong City of Caſſandria was held by Arſinoe his ſiſter, the widow of Lyſimachus, who lay therein with her young children. Her he circumvented by making love to her, and (according to the faſhion of thoſe times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of conſanguinity) taking her to wife, with promiſe to adopt her children: a promiſe that he meant not to perform; for it was not long, ere he ſlew them, and drave her into exile.

In the pride of this good ſucceſs, which his villany found, vengeance came upon him from a far, by the fury of a Nation that he never heard of. Belgius a Captain of the Gauls, having forced his paſſage through many Countreys, unto the confines of Macedon, ſent a proud meſſage to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with money, or otherwiſe, to look for all the miſeries of war. Theſe Gauls were the race of thoſe, that iſſued out of their Countrey, to ſeek new ſeats in that great expedition, wherein Brennus took and burnt the City of Rome. They had divided themſelves, at their ſetting forth, into two companies; of which the one fell upon Italy; the other, paſſing through the Countreys that lye on the Northern ſide of the Adriatick Sea, made long abode in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redeem peace with tribute, as now they would have compelled Ceraunus to do: unto whoſe borders they came about an hundred and eight years after ſuch time as their fellows had taken Rome.

When their Embaſſadours came to Ptolomy, aſking what he would give: his anſwer was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it muſt be with condition, that they ſhould put into his hands their Princes as hoſtages, and yield up their arms; otherwiſe he would neither pardon their boldneſs, nor give any credit to their words. At this anſwer, when it was returned, the Gauls did laugh; ſaying, That they would ſoon confute with deeds, the vanity of ſuch proud words. It may ſeem ſtrange, that he, who had given away part of his Army unto Pyrrhus, for very fear; ſhould be ſo confident in undertaking more mighty enemies. The King of the Dardanians offered to lend him twenty thouſand men againſt the Gauls: but he ſcorned the offer; ſaying, That he had the children of thoſe, which under der the conduct of Alexander had subdued all the East. Thus he issued forth against all the barbarous people with his famous Macedonians, as if the Victory must needs have followed the reputation of a great Name. But he soon found his great errour when it was too late. For the Enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and fierceness of courage, but so far superiour to the Macedonians in number, that few or none escaped their fury. Ptolomy himself grievously wounded, fell into their hands, whilest the battel continued; and they presently strook off his head, which they shewed to his men on the top of a Lance, to their utter astonishment.

The report of this great overthrow filled all Macedon with such desperation, that the people fled into walled Towns, and abandoned the whole Country as lost. Only Sosthenes, a valiant Captain, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Army, with which he many times got the upper-hand, and hindred Belgius from using the Victory at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King; which title he refused, and was contented with the name of a General. But (as mischiefs do seldom come alone) the good success of Belgius drew into Macedon, Brennus, another Captain of the Gauls, with an hundred and fifty thousand foot, and fifteen thousand horse; against which mighty Army, when Sosthenes with his weak troops made opposition, he was easily beaten, and the Macedonians again compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Countrey to the spoil of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and trodden down by a Nation that they had not heard of, in less than fifty years after the death of Alexander, who sought to discover and subdue unknown Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had been too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these news been carried to Pyrrhus in Italy, who sought a fair pretext of relinquishing his War with the Romans; had not other tydings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursuit of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathocles, who reigned over the whole Island, the Carthaginians sent an Army to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This Army did so fast prevail, that the Silicians had no other hope to avoid slavery, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, than to live under the well-known heavy yoak of Carthage. To him therefore the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principal Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadours, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieved Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so unluckily, both at one time. Yet whether he thought the business of Sicil more important, or more full of likelihood; or whether perhaps he believed (as came after to pass) that his advantage upon Macedon would not so hastily pass away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it at better leisure; over into Sicil he transported his Army, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Garrison in their Town to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italy was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature advice; so were his actions following, untill his return into Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, than well-ordered, or noteworthy. The Army which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirty thousand foot, and two thousand five hundred horse: with which, soon after his descent into Sicil, he forc't the Carthaginians out of all, in effect, that they had therein. He also won the strong City of Eryx; and having beaten the Mamertines in battel, he began to change condition, and turn Tyrant. For he drave Sostratus (to whom this cruelty was suspected) out of the Island, and put Thenon of Siracuse to death, being jealous of his greatness; which two persons had faithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich City of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so fast, as he served himself, and salved the dis-reputation of his leaving Sicil, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Sammites, imploring his present help against the Romans, who since his leaving Italy, had well-neer dispossest them of all that they had.

Taking this fair occasion, he imbarked for Italy; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italy it self, by eighteen hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Country. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, he fought a third battel with the Romans, led by M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italy into his own Epirus.

A Prince he was far more valiant than constant; and had he been but a General of an Army for some other great King or State, and had had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdom, it is to be thought, that he would have purchaſed no leſs honour than any man of War, either preceding or ſucceding him; for a greater Captain, or a valianter man, hath been no where found. But he never ſtayed upon any enterpriſe; which was, indeed, the diſeaſe he had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

§. IV.

How Antigonus, the Son of Demetrius, delivered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhus won the Kingdom of Macedon from Antigonus.

THE vertue of Soſthenes being too weak to defend the Kingdom of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him againſt Belgius, failing him in his attempts againſt Brennus: the Macedonians were no leſs glad to ſubmit themſelves unto the government of Antigonus, than they had been formerly deſirous to free themſelves from the impotent rule of his Father Demetrius. His coming into the Country with an Army, Navy, and Treaſure beſeeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to uſe againſt the Barbarians, only thoſe forces which he brought with him, having none other than good wiſhes of the Macedons to take his part. Brennus with the main ſtrength of his Army, was gone to ſpoil the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behinde him, than he thought neceſſary to guard the borders of Macedon and Pannonia; which were about fifteen thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe. Theſe could not be idle, but thought to get ſomewhat for themſelves, in the abſence of their fellows: and therefore ſent unto Antigonus, offering to ſell him peace, if he would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, he had learnt (as they thought) not to refuſe. Antigonus was unwilling to weaken his reputation by condeſcending to their proud demands: yet he judged it unfit to exaſperate their furious choler, by uncourteous words or uſage, as Ceraunus had over-fondly done. Wherefore he entertained their Embaſſadours in very loving and ſumptuous manner, with a royal feaſt: wherein he expoſed to their view ſuch abundance of maſſie gold and ſilver, that they were not ſo much delighted with the meat, as with ſight of the veſſels, wherein it was ſerved. He thought hereby to make them underſtand how great a Prince he was, and how able if need required, to wage a mighty Army.

To which end, he likewiſe did ſhew unto them his Camp and Navy, but eſpecially his Elephants. But all this bravery ſerved only to kindle their greedy appetites; who ſeeing his ſhips heavy loaden, his Camp full of wealth, and ill fortified, himſelf (as it ſeemed) ſecure, and his men, both in ſtrength and courage, inferiour unto the Gauls, thought all time loſt wherein they ſuffered the preſent poſſeſſors to ſpend the riches which they accounted aſſuredly their own. They returned therefore to their companions with none other news in their mouths, than of ſpoil and purchaſe: which tale carried the Gauls head-long to Antigonus his Camp, where they expected a greater booty, than the victory over Ceraunus had given to Belgius. Their coming was terrible and ſudden; yet not ſo ſudden, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who diſtruſting the courage of his own men, diſlodged ſomewhat before their arrival, and conveyed himſelf, with his whole Army and Carriage, into certain woods adjoyning, where he lay cloſe.

The Gauls, finding his Camp forſaken, were not haſty to purſue him, but fell to ranſacking the empty Cabbins of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was either loſt or hidden. At length, when they had ſearched every place in vain, angry at their loſt labour, they marched with all ſpeed towards the Sea-ſide; that they might fall upon him, whilſt he was buſie in getting his Men and Carriages a ſhip-board. But the ſucceſs was no way anſwerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought upon Antigonus, they were ſo careleſs of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the ſpoil of what they found on the ſhore, and in ſuch ſhips as lay on ground.

Part of the Army had left Antigonus, where he lay in covert; and had ſaved it ſelf by getting aboard the Fleet: in which number were ſome well-experienced men of War: who diſcovering the much advantage offered unto them, by the deſperate preſumption of their enemies, took courage, and encouraged others to lay manly hold upon the opportunity. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great reſolution, gave ſo brave a charge upon the diſordered Gauls, that their contemptuous boldneſs was thereby changed into ſudden fear, and they, after a great ſlaughter, driven to caſt themſelves into the ſervice of Antigonus.

The fame of this Victory cauſed all the barbarous barbarous Nations in those quarters to re-entertain their ancient belief of the Macedonian valour: by which the terrible and resistless oppressors of so many Countries were overthrown.

To speak more of the Gauls in this place, and to shew how, about these times, three Tribes of them passed over into Asia the less, with their wars and conquests there; I hold it needless: the victorious Armies of the Romans taming them hereafter in the Countries which now they wan, shall give better occasion to rehearse these matters briefly.

Howsoever the good success of Antigonus got him reputation among the barbarous people; yet his own Souldiers, that without his leading had won this Victory, could not thereupon be perswaded to think him a good man of war: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better than creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appear) was greatly helpfull unto Pyrrhus: though as yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affairs in Italy stood upon hard terms, had sent unto Antigonus for help: not without threats, in case it were denyed. So was he sure to get either a supply, wherewith to continue his War against the Romans; or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italy, under colour of making his word good, in seeking revenge. The threats which he had used in bravery, meer necessity forced him at his return into Epirus, to put in practice.

He brought home with him eight thousand foot, and five hundred horse: an Army too little to be employed, by his restless nature, in any action of importance; yet greater than he had means to keep in pay. Therefore he fell upon Macedon; intending to take what spoil he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this business, two thousand of Antigonus his souldiers revolted unto Pyrrhus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such fair beginnings easily perswaded the courage of this daring Prince to set upon Antigonus himself, and to hazard his fortune, in trial of a Battel, for the whole Kingdom of Macedon.

It appears, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to weary him out of the Country. For Pyrrhus overtook him in a streight passage, and charged him in the rear; wherein were the Gauls and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his strength; a manifest proof that he was in retrait. The Gauls very bravely sustained Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slain) after a sharp fight: wherein it seems that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the streight, and not advancing to their succour, took away their courage, by deceiving their expectation. The Captains of the Elephants were taken soon after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had consumed so many of the Gauls, yielded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort; which emboldened Pyrrhus to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was matter of extreme difficulty (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seen so much, that they had no desire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discovered so well their affections, that he adventured to draw near in person, and exhort them to yield. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader refused to become his follower. All forsook Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and mony enough to entertain a greater power, had he known where to levy it. But whilst he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gauls into his service; whereby he might repair his loss: Ptolomy, the Son of Pyrrhus, came upon him, and easily defeating his weak forces, drave him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Towns afar off in Peloponnesus, in which he had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himself a King.

This good success revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all sorrow of his late mis-fortunes in the Roman War: so that he sent for his Son Helenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come over into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians shift for themselves.

§. V.

How Pyrrhus assailed Sparta without success. His enterprise upon Argos, and his death.

PYrrhus had now conceived a great hope that nothing should be able to withstand him; seeing that in open fight he had vanquished the Gauls, and beaten Antigonus, and and won the Kingdom of Macedon. There was not in all Greece, nor, indeed, in all the Lands that Alexander had won, any Leader of ſuch name and worth, as deſerved to be ſet up againſt him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what he pleaſed. He raiſed therefore an Army, conſiſting of five and twenty thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and four and twenty Elephants; pretending War againſt Antigonus, and the giving liberty to thoſe Towns in Peloponneſus, which the ſame Antigonus held in ſubjection; though it was eaſily diſcovered, that ſuch great preparations were made, for accompliſhment of ſome deſign more important than War againſt a Prince already vanquiſhed, and almoſt utterly dejected. Eſpecially the Lacedæmonians feared this expedition, as made againſt their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being exp[illegible] out of his Country, had betaken hi[illegible] to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promiſed to reſtore him to his Kingdom. This promiſe was made in ſecret; neither would Pyrrhus make ſhew of any diſpleaſure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwiſe profeſſed, that it was his intent, to have two of his own younger Sons trained up in that City, as in a place of noble diſcipline. With ſuch colours he deluded men, even till he entred upon Laconia; where preſently he demeaned himſelf as an open enemy; excuſing himſelf and his former diſſembling words with a jeſt; That he followed herein the Lacedæmonian cuſtom, of concealing what was truly purpoſed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedæmonians, to deal in like ſort with others, whom, in the time of their greatneſs, they ſought to oppreſs: but now they complained of that, as falſhood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwayes practiſed in wiſdom, till it made them diſtruſted, forſaken, and almoſt contemptible. Nevertheleſs, they were not wanting to themſelves in this dangerous extremity. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Town; cauſing ſuch as could bear arms to reſerve themſelves freſh againſt the aſſault: which Pyrrhus had unwiſely deferred, upon aſſurance of prevailing.

Sparta was never fortified, before this time, otherwiſe than with armed Citizens: ſoon after this (it being built upon uneven ground, and, for the moſt part, hard to approach) the lower and more acceſſible places, were fenced with walls, at the preſent only trenches were caſt, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance ſeemed moſt eaſie. Three days together it was aſſailed by Pyrrhus exceeding fiercely; and no leſs ſtoutly defended. The deſperate courage of the Citizens preſerved the Town the firſt day; whereinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the ſecond day, but that his wounded horſe threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindful of ſaving the perſon of their King, than of breaking into the City, though already they had torn in ſunder the Barricadoes. Preſently after this, one of Antigonus his Captains got into Sparta, with a good ſtrength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in War) with two thouſand men, little knowing the danger, in which his own Country ſtood, until he was almoſt at home. Theſe ſuccours did not more animate the Spartans, than kindle in Pyrrhus a deſire to prevail againſt all impediments. But the third dayes work ſhewed how great his errour had been, in forbearing to aſſault the Town at his firſt coming. For he was ſo manfully repelled, that he ſaw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwiſe than by a long ſiege: in which tedious courſe he had no deſire to ſpend his time.

Antigonus had now raiſed an Army, though not ſtrong enough to meet the Enemy in plain field, yet able to hinder all his purpoſes. This made Pyrrhus doubtful what way to take; being diverſly affected, by the difficulty of his enterpriſe in hand, and the ſhame of taking a repulſe in his firſt attempt. Whilſt he was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inviting him thither; with promiſe to deliver that City into his hands.

Civil Diſſention raging then hotly in Argos, cauſed the heads of ſeveral factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comeing of theſe two Princes taught the Citizens wit, and made them deſirous to rid their hands of ſuch powerful aſſiſtants, as each of the two Kings pretended himſelf to be. Antigonus told the Argives, that he came to ſave them from the tyranny of Pyrrhus: and that he would be gone, if they need not his help. On the other ſide, Pyrrhus would needs perſwade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them ſafe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart, if they ſo deſired.

The Argives took ſmall pleaſure in hearing the Fox and Kite at ſtrife, which of them ſhould keep the Chickens from his enemy: and therefore prayed them both to divert their powers ſome other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condeſcended, and gave hoſtages to aſſure his word: for he was the weaker, and ſtood in need of good will. But Pyrrhus thought it enough to promiſe: Hoſtages he would give none to his inferiours, eſpecially meaning deceit. This made them ſuſpect his purpoſe to be ſuch, as indeed it was. Yet he leſs regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthy of aſſurance, by giving ſuch a bond, as he intended to break ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the City ſhould be opened by night unto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Army without any tumult entred the City: till the Elephants, with Towers on their back, cloyed the way, being too high to paſs the Gate. The taking off, and ſetting on again of thoſe Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarm to the City, and ſome leiſure to take order for defence, before ſo many were entred, as could fully maſter it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vantguard) being ignorant of the wayes in the dark night. The Citizens, on the other ſide, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-paſſage: and ſetting upon the enemies on all ſides, did put them to great loſs and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore underſtanding by the confuſed noiſe, and unequal ſhoutings of his own men, that they were in diſtreſs, entred the City in perſon, to take order for their relief, and aſſurance of the place. But the darkneſs, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, until break of day. Then began he to make his paſſage by force, and ſo far prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is ſaid, that ſeeing in that place the Image of a Wolf and a Bull, in ſuch poſiture as if they had been combatant, he called to mind an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he ſhould behold a Bull fighting with a Wolf: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeed, the coming of Antigonus to the reſcue, the diſorder and confuſion of his own men, with divers ill accidents, gave him reaſonable cauſe to have retired out of the City, though the Wolf and Bull had been away. The tumult was ſuch, that no directions could be heard; but as ſome gave back, ſo did others thruſt forward, and the Argives preſſing hard upon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait with his own ſword. The tops of the houſes were covered with Women, that ſtood looking on the fight. Among theſe was one, that ſaw her own Son in dangerous caſe, fighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore ſhe took a tile-ſtone, or ſlate, and threw it ſo violently down on the head of Pyrrhus, that he fell to the ground aſtoniſhed with the blow; and lying in that caſe, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the reſtleſs ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdom of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith poſſeſſed the Army, the body, and the children of his Enemy. The body of Pyrrhus had honourable burial, and was given by Antigonus unto Helenus his Son; which young Prince he graciouſly ſent home into his Fathers Kingdom of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdom of Macedon; the poſterity of Seleucus reigned over Aſia and Syria; and the houſe of Ptolomy had quiet poſſeſſion of Egypt: untill ſuch time as the City of Rome, ſwallowing all up, digeſted theſe, among other Countreys, into the body of her own Empire.

THE FIRST PART OF THE HISTORY OF THE WORLD.

Intreating of the Times from the ſettled Rule of Alexanders Succeſſors in the Eaſt, untill the Romans, prevailing over all, made Conqueſt of Aſia and Macedon.

THE FIFTH BOOK.

CHAP. I.

Of the firſt Punick War.

§. I.

A Diſcuſſion of that Probleme of Livie; Whether the Romans could have reſiſted the Great Alexander. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equal valour to the Engliſh.

THAT Queſtion handled by Livie, Whether the Great Alexander could have prevailed againſt the Romans, if after his Eaſtern Conqueſt, he had bent all his Forces againſt them, hath been, and is the ſubject of much diſpute; which (as it ſeems to me) the argu-ments on both ſides do not ſo well explain, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hath given of the Roman power in his dayes. For if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferiour to Alexander, though to none elſe, could with a ſmall ſtrength of men, and little ſtore of mony, or of other needful helps in War, vanquiſh them in two Battels, and endanger their Eſtate, when it was well ſettled and held the beſt part of Italy, under a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was abundantly provided of all which is needful to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of employment, coming upon them before their Dominion was half ſo well ſetled? It is eaſie to ſay, that Alexander had no more than thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe (as indeed, at his firſt paſſage into Aſia, he carried over not many more) and that the reſt of his followers were no better than baſe effenate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomy, Antigonus and Lysimachus, with the actions by them performed, every one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power, shall easily find, that such a reckoning is far short of the truth.

It were needless to speak of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of Battery, and the like: of all which the Macedonian had abundance; the Roman having nought, save men and arms. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what sort the Romans, in their first Punick War, were trained in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shoar, and beating the sand with poles, to practise the stroke of the Oar, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive how far too weak they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in War; I do not see why all Greece and Macedon, being absolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance against those parts of Italy, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit that the Eastern World, more wealthy, indeed, than valiant, could have afforded unto the Macedonian: let us only conjecture, how the States of Sicil and Carthage, neareſt neighbours to such a quarrel (had it happened) would have stood affected. The Sicilians were for the most part Grecians; neither is it to be doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves unto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what terms they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shall appear anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders coming into those parts, would have brought excessive joy to them that were fain to get the help of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians, if Agathocles the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his own besieged City, could by adventuring to sail into Africk, put their Dominion, yea, and Carthage it self, in extream hazard; shall we think that they would have been able to withstand Alexander? But why do I question their ability, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as far as Babylon, ere the War drew near them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some other few Italian friends (of which yet there were none that forsook them not, at some time, both before and after this) have opposed their valour and good military discipline, against the power of all Countreys to them known, if they would have made resistance. How they could have sped well, in undertaking such a match; it is uneasie to find in discourse of humane reason. It is true, that vertue and fortune work wonders; but it is against cowardly fools, and the unfortunate: for whosoever contends with one too mighty for him, either must excell in these, as much as his enemy goes beyond him in power; or else must look both to be overcome, and to be cast down so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman or the Macedonian were in those dayes the better Souldier, I will not take upon me to determine: though I might without partiality, deliver mine own opinion, and preferr that Army, which followed not only Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes after him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of War, before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did send forth. Concerning fortune, who can give a rule that shall alwayes hold? Alexander was victorious in every Battel that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of every War. But forasmuch as Livie hath judged this a matter worthy of consideration; I think it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italy: where in three years after his death, the two Roman Consuls, together with all the powers of that State, were surprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yield up their arms. We may therefore permit Livie to admire his own Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captains of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanity.

Now in deciding such a Controversie, me-thinks it were not amiss, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Romans once did (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardeates and Aricini, that strove about a piece of Land; saying, that it belonged unto neither of them, but unto the Romans themselves.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman were the best Warriour? I will answer, The Englishman.

man. For it will ſoon appear to any that ſhall examine the noble acts of our Nation in war, that they were performed by no advantage of weapon; againſt no ſavage or unmanly people; the enemy being far ſuperiour unto us in number, and all needful proviſions, yea, as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exerciſe of War.

In what ſort Philip wan his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perſians and Indians were, whom Alexander vanquiſhed; as likewiſe of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, againſt ſuch arms as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken pains to read the foregoing ſtory of them, doth ſufficiently underſtand. Yet was this Phalanx never, or very ſeldom, able to ſtand againſt the Roman Armies; which were embattelled in ſo excellent a form, as I know not whether any Nation beſides them have uſed, either before or ſince. The Roman weapons likewiſe, both offenſive and defenſive, were of greater uſe than thoſe with which any other Nation hath ſerved, before the fiery inſtruments of Gun-powder were known. As for the enemies with which Rome had to do, we find, that they which did over-match him in numbers, were as far over-matched by her in weapons; and that they, of whom ſhe had little advantage in arms, had as little advantage of her in multitude. This alſo (as Plutarch well obſerveth) was a part of her happineſs; that ſhe was never over-laid with two great Wars at once.

Hereby it came to paſs, that having at firſt increaſed her ſtrength by acceſſion of the Sabines; having won the State of Alba, againſt which ſhe adventured her own ſelf, as it were in wager, upon the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her ſelf Princeſs of Latium, ſhe did afterwards by long war, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italy. The Carthaginians had well-near oppreſſed her: but her Souldiers were Mercenary; ſo that for want of proper ſtrength, they were eaſily beaten at their own doors. The Ætolians, and, with them, all, or the moſt of Greece, aſſiſted her againſt Philip the Macedonian: he being beaten, did lend her his help to beat the ſame Ætolians. The wars againſt Antiochus, and other Aſiatiques, were ſuch as gave to Rome ſmall cauſe of boaſt, though much of joy: for thoſe oppoſites were as baſe of courage, as the lands which they held were abundant of riches. Sicil, Spain, and all Greece, fell into her hands, by uſing her aid to protect them againſt the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I ſhall not need to ſpeak of her other conqueſts: it was eaſie to get more when ſhe had gotten all this. It is not my purpoſe to diſgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemiſh the reputation of ſo many famous victories: I am not ſo idle. This I ſay; That among all their wars, I find not any, wherein their valour hath appeared comparable to the Engliſh. If my judgement ſeem over-partial, our wars in France may help to make it good.

Firſt therefore it is well known, that Rome (or perhaps all the world beſides) had never any ſo brave a Commander in war as Julius Cæſar: and that no Roman Army was comparable unto that which ſerved under the ſame Cæſar. Likewiſe, it is apparent, that this gallant Army, which had given fair proof of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Helvetian war, when it firſt entred into Gaule; was nevertheleſs utterly diſheartned, when Cæſar led it againſt the Germans. So that we may juſtly impute all that was extraordinary in the valour of Cæſars men, to their long exerciſe, under ſo good a Leader, in ſo great a War. Now let us in general compare with the deeds done by theſe beſt of Roman Souldiers, in their principal ſervice; the things performed in the ſame Country, by our common Engliſh Souldiers, levied in haſte, from following the Cart, or ſitting on the ſhop-ſtall: ſo ſhall we ſee the difference. Herein will we deal fairly, and believe Cæſar in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Hiſtorians to witneſs, what actions were performed by the Engliſh. In Cæſars time France was inhabited by the Gaules, a ſtout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were ſubdued; even when the Romans gave them aſſiſtance. The Country of Gaule was rent in ſunder (as Cæſar witneſſeth) into many Lordſhips: ſome of which were governed by petty Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in ſuch ſort as might make it appliable to the neareſt Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in general through the whole Country, but between the petty States, yea in every City, and almoſt in every houſe. What greater advantage could a Conquerour deſire? Yet there was a greater. Arioviſtus, with his Germans, had over-run the Country, and held much part of it in ſubjection, little different from meer ſlavery: yea, ſo often had the Germans prevailed in war upon the Gaules, that the Gaules, (who had ſometimes been the better Souldiers) did hold themſelves no way

equal to those daily Invaders. Had France been so prepared unto our English Kings, Rome it self by this time, and long ere this time, would have been ours. But when King Edward the third began his war upon France, he found the whole Country setled in obedience to one mighty King; a King whose reputation abroad, was no less than his puissance at home; under whose ensign, the King of Bohemia did serve in person; at whose call the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were ready to take arms; finally, a King unto whom one (a) Prince gave away his Dominion, for love; (b) another sold away a goodly City and Territory for mony. The Country lying so open to the Romans and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who prevailed most therein (for it were meer vanity to match the English purchases with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gave the greater proof of military vertue. Cæsar himself doth witness, that the Gaules complained of their own ignorance in the Art of war, and that their own hardiness was overmastered by the skill of their enemies. Poor men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of battery, raised and planted against their walls, as more than humane works. What greater wonder is it, that such a people was beaten by the Romans; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the sky, are commonly put to the worse by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard of the great difficulty that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants: as also the much more difficulty of holding them long together. For hereby it came to pass, that they were never able to make use of opportunity: but sometimes compelled to stay for their fellows; and sometimes driven to give or take battel upon extream disadvantages, for fear lest their companies should fall asunder: as indeed, upon any little disaster, they were ready to break, and return every one to the defence of his own. All this, and (which was little less than all this) great odds in weapon gave to the Romans the honour of many gallant Victories. What such help? or what other worldly help, than the golden mettle of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of War? Yea, did they not think themselves therein our superiours? Were they not in arms, in horse, and in all provisions, exceedingly beyond us?

(a) The Dolphin of Viennois. (b) The King of Majorca

Let us hear what a French writer saith of the inequality that was between the French and English, when their King John was ready to give the on-set upon the Black Prince, at the battel of Poitiers. John had all advantages over Edward, both of number, force, shew, Country, and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration of no small importance in worldly affairs;) and withall, the choice of all his horsemen (esteemed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wisest Captains of his whole Realm. And what could he more?

I think it would trouble a Roman Antiquary to find the like example in their Histories; the example I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an army of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with forty thousand, better appointed, and no less expert Warriours. This I am sure of, that neither Syphax the Numidian, followed by a rabble of half Scullions, as Livie rightly terms them, nor their cowardly Kings, Perseus and Gentius, are worthy patterns. All that have read of Cressi and Agincourt, will bear me witness, that I do not alledge the battel of Poitiers, for lack of other, as good examples of the English Vertue: the proof whereof hath left many a hundred better marks in all quarters of France, than ever did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these Victories of ours to the long bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Cross-bow: my answer is ready; That in all these respects, it is also (being drawn with a strong arm) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more use. The Gun and the Cross-bow are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakness or sickness, or a sore finger makes the long Bow unserviceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the costem of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blank: and so shall he perceive, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battel. This takes away all objection: for when two Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrows, or two at the most, can be delivered before they close. Neither is it in general true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Cross-bow: but this is the rare effect of an extraordinary arm; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall ask, How then came it to pass, that the English wan so many great battels, having no advantage to help him? I may, with best commendation of modesty, refer him to the French Hiſtorian; who relating the victory of our men at Crevant; where they paſſed a Bridge in face of the enemy, uſeth theſe words: The Engliſh comes with a conquering bravery, as he that was accuſtomed to gain every-where without any ſtay: he forceth our guard placed upon the Bridge to keep the paſſage. Or I may cite another place of the ſame Author, where he tells, how the Britons, being invaded by Charls the eighth, King of France, thought it good policy to apparel a thouſand and five hundred of their own men in Engliſh Caſſocks; hoping that the very ſight of the Engliſh Red Croſs, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not ſtand to borrow of the French Hiſtorians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Æmilius, report wonders of our Nation:) the propoſition which firſt I undertook to maintain; That the military vertue of the Engliſh, prevailing againſt all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of the Romans, which was aſſiſted with all advantages that could be deſired. If it be demanded, Why then did not our Kings finiſh the Conqueſt, as Cæſar had done? my anſwer may be (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the Race of Æacidæ, of whom the old Poet Ennius gave this note; Bellipotentes ſunt magis quàm ſapientipotentes: They were more war-like than politick. Whoſo notes their proceedings, may find, that none of them went to work like a Conquerour, ſave only King Henry the fifth; the courſe of whoſe victories it pleaſed God to interrupt by his death. But this queſtion is the more eaſily anſwered, if another be firſt made. Why did not the Romans attempt the Conqueſt of Gaul before the time of Cæſar? Why not after the Macedonian War? Why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all theſe times they had good leiſure: and then eſpecially had they both leiſure and fit opportunity, when under the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquiſhed the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Country of Gaul had been pitiouſly waſted. Surely, the words of Tully were true; That with other Nations the Romans fought for Dominion, with the Gauls for preſervation of their own ſafety.

Therefore they attempted not the Conqueſt of Gaule, until they were Lords of all other Countreys, to them known. We on the other ſide, held only the one half of our own Iſland; the other half being inhabited by a Nation (unleſs perhaps in wealth and numbers of men ſomewhat inferiour) every way equal to our ſelves; a Nation anciently and ſtrongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard enemy to us. So that our danger lay both before and behind us: and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwayes we feared, a ſtronger Invaſion by Land, than we could make upon France, tranſporting our Forces over Sea.

It is uſual with men, that have pleaſed themſelves in admiring the matters which they find in ancient Hiſtories: to hold it a great injury done to their judgement, if any take upon him, by way of compariſon, to extoll the things of latter ages. But I am well perſwaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iſland, hath given more noble proof of it ſelf, than under ſo worthy a Leader, that Roman Army could do, which afterwards could win Rome, and all her Empire, making Cæſar a Monarch; ſo hereafter, by Gods bleſſing, who hath converted our greateſt hinderance, into our greateſt help, the enemy that ſhall dare to try our forces, will find cauſe to wiſh, that avoiding us, he had rather encountred as great a puiſſance as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying aſide compariſons, we return to the rehearſal of deeds done; wherein we ſhall find, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italy, to ſtrive with Carthage for Dominion, in the firſt Punick War.

§. II.

The eſtate of Carthage before it entred into War with Rome.

THE City of Carthage had ſtood above ſix hundred years, when firſt it began to contend with Rome for the maſtery of Sicil. It fore-went Rome one hundred, and fifty years in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchievements, it excelled far beyond this advantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa it ſelf, from the Weſt of Cyrene, to the ſtreights of Hercules, about one thouſand and five hundred miles in length, wherein ſtood three hundred Cities. It had ſubjected all Spain, even to the Pyrenæan Mountains, together with all the Iſlands in the Mediterranean Sea, to the Weſt of Sicil; and of Sicil the better part. It flouriſhed about ſeven hundred and thirty years, before the deſtruction thereof by Scipio: who, beſides other ſpoils, and all that the Souldiers reſerved, carried thence four hundred and ſeventy thouſand weight of ſilver, which make of our mony (if our pounds differ not) fourteen hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious City ran the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and since. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world fore-shews the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred years after such time as it was cast down, the Senate of Rome caused it to be re-built: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was again and again abandoned and re-peopled, taken and re-taken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Belliſarius under Juſtinian, by the Perſians, by the Egyptians, and by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The ſeat thereof was exceeding ſtrong: and while the Carthaginians commanded the Sea, invincible. For the Sea compaſſed it about, ſaving that it was tyed to the Main by a neck of Land; which paſſage had two miles and more of breadth (Appian ſaith, three miles and one furlong) by which we may be induced to believe the common report, that the City it ſelf was above twenty miles in compaſs; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have been twice as great.

It had three Walls without the Wall of the City; and between each of thoſe, three or four Streets, with Vaults under ground, of thirty foot deep, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: over theſe they had ſtables for four thouſand horſe, and Granaries for their provender. They had alſo lodgings in the Streets, between theſe out-walls, for four thouſand horſe-men, and twenty thouſand foot-men, which (according to the diſcipline uſed now by thoſe of China) never peſtered the City. It had towards the South part, the Caſtle of Byrſa; to which Servius gives two and twenty furlongs in compaſs, that make two miles and a half. This was the ſame piece of ground which Dido obtained of the Lybians, when ſhe got leave to buy only ſo much Land of them, as ſhe could compaſs with an Ox hide. On the Weſt-ſide it had alſo the Salt-Sea, but in the nature of a ſtanding pool; for a certain arm of Land, faſtened to the ground, on which the City ſtood, ſtretched it ſelf towards the Weſt-continent, and left but ſeventy foot open for the Sea to enter. Over this ſtanding-Sea was built a moſt ſumptuous Arſenall, having their Ships and Gallies riding under it.

The form of their Common-weal reſembled that of Sparta; for they had titulary Kings, and the Ariſtocratical Power of Senators. But (as Regius well obſerveth) the people in latter times uſurped too great authority in their Councils. This confuſion in Government, together with the truſt that they repoſed in hired Souldiers, were helping cauſes of their deſtruction in the end. Two other more forcible cauſes of their ruine, were their avarice and their cruelty. (a) Their avarice was ſhewed both in exacting from their Vaſſals (beſides ordinary tributes) the one (b) half of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great offices, not upon gentle and merciful perſons, but upon thoſe who would beſt tyranize over the people, to augment their treaſures. Their cruelty appeared, in putting them to death without mercy, that had offended through ignorance: the one of theſe rendred them odious to their Vaſſals, whom it made ready upon all occaſions, to revolt from them: the other did break the ſpirits of their Generals, by preſenting to the heat of their actions abroad, the fear of a cruel death at home. Hereby it came to paſs, that many good Commanders of the Carthaginian Forces, after ſome great loſs received, have deſperately caſt themſelves, with all that remained under their charge, into the throat of deſtruction; holding it neceſſary, either to repair their loſſes quickly, or to ruine all together: and few of them have dared to manage their own beſt projects, after that good form, wherein they firſt conceived them, for fear leſt the manner of their proceeding ſhould be miſ-interpreted: It being the Carthaginian Rule, to crucifie, not only the unhappy Captain, but even him, whoſe bad counſel had proſperous event. The faults, wherewith, in general, they of Carthage are taxed, by Roman Hiſtorians, I find to be theſe; luſt, cruelty, avarice, craft, unfaithfulneſs, and perjury. Whether the Romans themſelves were free from the ſame crimes, let the tryal be referred unto their actions. The firſt league between Carthage and Rome, was very ancient: having been made the year following the expulſion of Tarquin. In that league the Carthaginians had the ſuperiority, as impoſing upon the Romans the more ſtrict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans ſhould not ſo much as have (a) Liv. Dec. 3. lib. 1. c. 9.

(b) Tributes are this day, do alſo take the one half of the fruits of the earth: yea they take both of the bodies and ſouls of the Chriſtians their Vaſſals, by bereaving them of their children, and bringing them up in the Mahometan Religion. The Iriſh take the fourth ſheaf: and were wont to eat up with their horſ-men, foot-men, and dogs, what they pleaſed, of the other three parts remaining. The Husbandman and the Yeoman of England are the freeſt of all the World: And reaſon good for of them have the bodies of our victorious Armies been compounded. And it is the free-man, and not the ſlave, that hath courage and the ſenſe of ſhame deſerved by cowardiſe. How free the Engliſh Yeomen have been in times, not long ſince paſt, Fortescue hath ſhewed in his praiſe of our Countreyes Laws. But I may ſay, that they are more free now than ever: and our Nobility and Gentry more ſervile. For ſince the exceſſive bravery and vain expence of our Gentry hath taught them to raiſe their Rents, ſince by Incloſures, and diſmembring of Mannors, the Court Baron, and the Court Leet, the Principalities of the Gentry of England, have been diſſolved, the Tenants having payed unto their Lords their rack Rent, owe them now no ſervice at all, and (perchance) as little love.

trade in some part of Africk, nor suffer any ship of theirs to pass beyond the headland, or cape, then called the fair Promontory, unless it were by force of tempest: whereas on the other side, no Haven in Italy was forbidden to the Carthaginians. A second league was made long after, which (howsoever it hath pleased Livy to say, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreaty) was more strict than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, or in the Island of Sardinia.

Lib. Dec. 1. l. 7.

By these two treaties it may appear, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge of the state of Africk; but to countenance and uphold them, in their troubling all Italy, whereby they themselves might have the better means to occupy all Sicil, whilest that Island should be destitute of Italian succours. Hereupon we find good cause of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crown of gold, weighing twenty and five pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were overthrown. But the little state of Rome pervailed faster in Italy, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicil. For that mighty army of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicil, wan only two Cities therein: many great fleets were devoured by tempests; and howsoever the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their own valour, or by the assistance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repair their own losses, and take revenge upon those Invaders. But never were the people of Carthage in better hope of getting all Sicil, than when the death of Agathocles the Tyrant, had left the whole Island in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie in making their advantage of this good opportunity; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines and their fellows, came into Italy, where he made sharp war upon the Romans. These news were unpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily fore-saw, that the same busie disposition which had brought this Prince out of Greece into Italy, would as easily transport him over into Sicil, as soon as he could finish his Roman war. To prevent this danger, they sent Mago Embassadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were sorry to hear what misadventure had befallen the Romans their good friends in this war with Pyrrhus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to assist the state of Rome, by sending an Army into Italy; if their help were thought needful, against the Epirots.

It was indeed the main desire of the Carthaginans, to hold Pyrrhus so hardly to his work in Italy, that they might at good leisure, pursue their business in Sicil: which caused them to make so goodly an offer. But the Romans were two high-minded: and refused to accept any such aid of their friend, lest it should blemish their reputation, and make them seem unable to stand by their own strength. Yet the message was taken lovingly, as it ought; and the former league between Rome and Carthage renewed; with covenants added, concerning the present business; That if either of the two Cities made peace with Pyrrhus, it should be with reservation of liberty, to assist the other, in case that Pyrrhus should invade either of their Dominions. All this notwithstanding, and notwithstanding that the same Mago went and treated with Pyrrhus, using all means to sound his intentions (a matter very difficult, where one upon every new occasion, changeth his own purposes) yet Pyrrhus found leisure to make a step into Sicil: whether though in fine he was neither getter nor saver, yet he clean defeated the purposes of Carthage, leaving them, at his departure from thence, as far from any end, as when they first began.

So many disasters in an enterprise, that from the first undertaking had been so strongly pursued, through the length of many generations, might well have induced the Carthaginians to believe, that an higher providence resisted their intendment. But their desire of winning that fruitful Island, was so inveterate, that with unwearied patience, they still continued in hope of so much the greater an harvest, by how much their cost and pain therein buried had been the more. Wherefore they re-continued their former courses; and by force or practice, recovered in few years all their old possessions: making peace with Syracuse, the chief City of the Island, that so they might the better enable themselves to deal with the rest.

Somewhat before this time, a troop of Campanian Souldiers, that had served under Agathocles, being entertained within Messana as friends, and finding themselves too strong for the Citizens, took advantage of the power that they had to do wrong; and with perfidious cruelty, slew those that had trusted them; which done, they occupied the City, Lands, Goods, and Wives of those whom they had murdered. These Mercenaries called themselves Mamertines. Good Souldiers they were: and like enough it is, that meer desperation of finding any that would approve their barbarous treachery, added rage unto their stoutness. Having therefore not any other colour of their proceedings, than the law of the stronger, they over-ran all the Country round about them.

In this course, at first, they sped so well, that they did not only defend Messana against the Cities of Sicil Confederate, to wit, against the Syracusians, and others, but they rather wan upon them; yea, and upon the Carthaginians, exacting tribute from many Neighbour places. But it was not long, ere fortune turned her back to these Mamertines, the Syracusians wan fast upon them; and finally, confining them within the walls of Messana, they also with a powerful army besieged the City. It hapned ill, that about the same time a contention began between the Syracusian Souldiers, then lying at Magara, and the Citizens of Syracuse, and Governours of the Common wealth; which proceeded so far, that the Army elected two Governours among themselves, to wit, Artemidorus and Hieron, that was afterward King. Hieron, being for his years excellently adorned with many vertues, although it was contrary to the policy of that State, to approve any election made by the Souldiers; yet for the great clemency used at his first entrance, he was by general consent established and made Governour. This office he rather used as a Scale, thereby to climb to some higher degree, than rested content with his present preferment.

In brief, there was somewhat wanting, whereby to strengthen himself within the City; and somewhat without it, that gave impediment to his obtaining, and safe keeping of the place he sought, to wit, a powerful party within the Town, and certain mutinous troops of Souldiers without, often and easily moved to sedition and tumult. For the first, whereby to strengthen himself, he took to Wife the daughter of Leptines, a man of the greatest estimation and authority among the Syracusians. For the second, leading out the Army to besiege Messana, he quartered all those companies, which he held suspected, on the one side of the City, and leading the rest of his Horse and Foot unto the other side, as if he would have assaulted it in two several parts, he marched away under the covert of the Town walls, and left the Mutiners to be cut in pieces by the assieged: So returning home, and levying an Army of his own Citizens, well trained and obedient, he hasted again towards Messana, and was by the Mamertines (grown proud by their former victory over the Mutiners) incountred in the plains of Mylæum, where he obtained a most signal victory; and leading with him their Commander captive into Syracuse, himself by common consent was elected and saluted King. Hereupon the Mamertines, finding themselves utterly enfeebled, some of them resolved to give themselves to the Carthaginians, others to crave assistance of the Romans: to each of whom the several faction dispatched Embassadors for the very same purpose.

The Carthaginians were soon ready to lay hold upon the good offer: so that a Captain of theirs got into the Castle of Messana, whereof they that had sent for him gave him possession. But within a little while, they that were more inclinable to the Romans, had brought their Companions to so good agreement, that this Captain, either by force, or by cunning, was turned out of doors, and the Town reserved for other Masters.

These news did much offend the people of Carthage; who crucified their Captain, as both a Traitor and Coward; and sent a Fleet and Army to besiege Messana, as a Town that rebelled, having once been theirs. Hieron the new-made King of Syracuse (to gratifie his people incensed with the smart of injuries lately received) added his forces to the Carthaginians, with whom he entred into a league, for exterminating the Mamertines out of Sicil. So the Mamertines on all sides were closed up within Messana: the Carthaginians lying with a Navy at Sea, and with an Army on the one side of the Town, whilest Hieron with his Syracusians lay before it on the other side.

In this their great danger came Appius Claudius the Roman Consul, with an Army to the streights of Sicil: which passing by night with notable audacity, he put himself into the Town, and sending Messengers to the Carthaginians, and to Hieron, required them to depart; signifying unto them that the Mamertines were now become confederate with the people of Rome, and that therefore he was come to give them protection, even by force of War, if reason would not prevail.

This message was utterly neglected; And so began the War between Rome and Carthage; wherein it will then be time to shew on which part was the Justice of the quarrel, rell, when ſome actions of the Romans lately foregoing this, have been firſt conſidered.

§. III.

The beginning of the firſt Punick war. That it was unjuſtly undertaken by the Romans.

WHen Pyrrhus began his war in Italy, the City of Rhegium, being well affected to Rome, and not only fearing to be taken by the Epirot, but much more diſtruſting the Carthaginians, as likely to ſeize upon it in that buſie time, ſought aid from the Romans, and obtained from them a Legion, conſiſting of four thouſand ſouldiers, under the conduct of Decius Campanus, a Roman Prefect; by whom they were defended and aſſured for the preſent. But after a while, this Roman Garriſon, conſidering at good leiſure, the fact of the Mamertines, committed in Meſſana (a City in Sicil, ſituate almoſt oppoſite to Rhegium, and no otherwiſe divided than by a narrow Sea, which ſevereth it from Italy) and rather weighing the greatneſs of the booty, than the odiouſneſs of the villany, by which it was gotten; reſolved finally, to make the like purchaſe, by taking the like wicked courſe. Confederating therefore themſelves with the Mamertines, they entertained their Hoſts of Rhegium, after the ſame manner; dividing the ſpoil, and all which that State had, among themſelves.

When complaint was made to the Senate and people of Rome, of this outrage; they finding their honour thereby greatly ſtained (for no Nation in the world made a more ſevere profeſſion of juſtice, than they did during all the time of their growing greatneſs,) reſolved, after a while, to take revenge upon the offenders. And this they performed ſhortly after, when they had quenched the fires, kindled in Italy by Pyrrhus. For, notwithſtanding that thoſe Romans in Rhegium (as men for the foulneſs of their fact, hopeleſs of pardon) defended themſelves with an obſtinate reſolution: yet in the end, the aſſailants forced them; and thoſe which eſcaped the preſent fury, were brought bound to Rome, where, after the uſual torments by whipping inflicted, according to the cuſtome of the country, they had their heads ſtricken from their ſhoulders, and the people of Rhegium were again reſtored to their former liberty and eſtates.

This execution of Juſtice being newly performed, and the fame thereof ſounding honourably through all quarters of Italy: meſſengers came to Rome from Meſſana, deſiring help againſt the Carthaginians, and Syracuſians, that were in a readineſs to inflict the like puniſhment upon the Mamertines, for the like offence. A very impudent requeſt it was, which they made: who having both given example of that villany to the Roman Souldiers, and holpen them with joynt forces to make it good, do intreat the Judges to give them that aſſiſtance, which they were wont to receive from their fellow-thieves.

The Romans could not ſuddenly reſolve, whether the way of honeſty or of profit were to be followed; they evermore pretended the one, but they many times walked in the other. They conſidered, how contrary the courſe of ſuccouring the Mamertines was to their former counſels and actions: ſeeing for the ſame offences they had lately put to torment, and to the ſword, their own Souldiers, and reſtored the oppreſſed to their liberty. Yet when they beheld the deſcription of the Carthaginian Dominion, and that they were already Lords of the beſt part of Africa, of the Metliterran Iſlands, of a great part of Spain, and ſome part of Sicil it ſelf; whileſt alſo they feared, that Syracuſe therein ſeated (a City in beauty and riches, little at that time inferiour to Carthage, and far ſuperiour to Rome it ſelf) might become theirs; the ſafety of their own eſtate ſpake for theſe Mamertines: who, if they (driven to deſpair by the Romans) ſhould deliver up Meſſana, with thoſe other holds that they had, into the hands of the Carthaginians, then would nothing ſtand between Carthage, and the Lordſhip of Sicil: for Syracuſe it ſelf could not, for want of ſuccor, any long time ſubſiſt, if once the Carthaginians that were Maſters of the Sea, did faſten upon that paſſage from the main Land. It was further conſidered; that the opportunity of Meſſana was ſuch, as would not only debarr all ſuccours out of the continent, from arrival in Sicil; but would ſerve as a bridge, whereby the Carthaginians might have entrance into Italy, at their own pleaſure.

Theſe conſiderations of profit at hand, and of preventing danger, that threatned from a-far, did ſo prevail above all regard of honeſty, that the Mamertines were admitted into Confederacy with the Romans, and Ap. Claudus the Conſul, preſently diſpatcht away for Meſſana: into which he entred, and undertook the protection of it, as is ſhewed before. The beſiegers were little troubled with his arrival; and leſs moved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiff mettal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surpise his trenches) arranged his men in order of battel, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazzarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which loss, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Had Messana been taken by the Carthaginians, Syracuse it self must have sought help from Rome, against those friends which it now so diligently assisted. Hieron had (in respect of those two mighty Cities) but a small stock, which it behooveth him to govern well: such another loss would have made him almost bankrupt. Therefore he quietly brake up his Camp: and retired home: intending to let them stand to their adventures, that had hope to be gainers by the bargain. The next day, Claudius perceiving the Sicilian Army gone, did with great courage, and with much alacrity of his Souldiers, give charge upon the Carthaginians: wherein he sped so well, that the enemy forsook both field and camp, leaving all the Country open to the Romans; who having spoiled all round, without resistance, intended to lay siege unto the great City of Syracuse.

These prosperous beginnings, howsoever they animated the Romans, and filled them with hopes of attaining to greater matters, than at the first they had expected: Yet did they not imprint any form of terrour in the City of Carthage, that had well enough repaired greater losses than this; in which no more was lost than what had been prepared against the Mamertines alone, without any suspicion of War from Rome.

Now in this place I hold it seasonable, to consider of those grounds, whereupon the Romans entred into this war; not how profitable they were, nor how agreeable to rules of honesty (for questionless the enterprise was much to their benefit, though as much to their shame) but how allowable in strict terms of lawfulness; whereupon they built all their allegations in maintenance thereof. That the Mamertines did yield themselves, and all that they had, into the Romans hands (as the Campanes, distressed by the Samnites, had done) I cannot find: neither can I find how the messengers of those folk, whereof one part had already admitted the Carthaginians, could be enabled to make any such surrendry in the publick name of all.

If therefore the Mamertines, by no lawfull surrendry of themselves and their possessions, were become subject unto Rome, by what better title could the Romans assist the Mamertines, against their most ancient friends the Carthaginians, than they might have aided the Campanes against the Samnites, without the same condition? which was (as they themselves confessed) by none at all. But let it be supposed, that some point serving to clear this doubt, is lost in all Histories. Doubtless it is, that no company of Pyrates, Thieves, Out-laws, Murderers, or such other Malefactors, can by any good success of their villany, obtain the priviledge of civil societies, to make league or truce; yea, or to require fair war: but are by all means, as most pernicious vermine, to be rooted out of the world. I will not take upon me to maintain that opinion of some Civilians, that a Prince is not bound to hold his faith with one of these; it were a Position of ill consequence: This I hold; that no one Prince or State can give protection to such as these, as long as any other is using the sword of vengeance against them, without becoming necessary to their crimes. Wherefore we may esteem this action of the

ved, with his requiring them to desist from their attempt. For they did far exceed him in number of men; the whole Island was ready to relieve them in their wants; and they were strong enough at Sea, to hinder any supply from getting into the Town. All this Appius himself well understood: and against all this he thought the stiff mettal of his Roman Souldiers a sufficient remedy. Therefore he resolved to issue out into the field, and to let the enemies know, that his coming was to send them away from the Town; not to be besieged by them within it.

In executing this determination, it was very beneficial to him, that the enemy lay encamped in such sort, as one quarter was not well able to relieve another in distress. Hieron was now exposed to the same danger, whereinto he had wilfully cast his own mutinous followers not long before: only he was strong enough (or thought so) to make good his own quarter, without help of others. Against him Ap. Claudius issued forth, and (not attempting, by unexpected sally, to surpise his trenches) arranged his men in order of battel, wherewith he presented him. The Syracusian wanted not courage to fight; but surely he wanted good advice: else would he not have hazzarded all his power against an enemy of whom he had made no trial; when it had been easie, and as much as was requisite, to defend his own Camp. It may be, that he thought to get honour, wherewith to adorn the beginning of his reign. But he was well beaten, and driven to save himself within his trenches: by which loss, he learned a point of wisdom, that stood him and his Kingdom in good stead all the days of his life. It was a foolish desire of revenge, that had made the Syracusians so busie, in helping those of Carthage, against the Mamertines.

Romans ſo far from being juſtifiable, by any pretence of confederacy made with them; as that contrariwiſe, by admitting this neſt of Murderers and Thieves into their protection, they juſtly deſerved to be warred upon themſelves, by the people of Sicil; yea, although Meſſana had been taken, and the Mamertines all ſlain, e're any news of the Confederacy had been brought unto the beſiegers. The great Alexander was ſo far perſwaded herein; that he did put to ſword all the Branchiadæ (a people in Sogdiana) and razed their City, notwithſtanding that they joyfully entertained him as their Lord and King; becauſe they were deſcended from a company of Mileſians, who to gratifie King Xerxes, had robbed a Temple, and were by him rewarded with the Town and Country, which theſe of their poſterity enjoyed. Nevertheleſs in courſe of humane juſtice, long and peaceable poſſeſſion gives jus acquiſitum, a kind of right by preſcription unto that which was firſt obtained by wicked means: and doth free the deſcendants from the crime of their Anceſtors, whoſe villanies they do not exerciſe. But that the ſame generation of Thieves, which by a deteſtable fact hath purchaſed a rich Town, ſhould be acknowledged a lawfull company of Citizens, there is no ſhew of right. For even the Conquerer that by open War obtaineth a Kingdom, doth not confirm his title, by thoſe victories which gave him firſt poſſeſſion: but length of time is requiſite to eſtabliſh him, unleſs by ſome alliance with the ancient inheritors, he can better the violence of his claim, as did our King Henry the firſt, by his marriage with Maude, that was daughter of Malcolme, King of the Scots, by Margaret, the Neece of Edmund Ironſide. Wherefore I conclude, that the Romans had no better ground (if they had ſo good) of juſtice, in this quarrel, than had the Gothes, Hunnes, Vandols, and other Nations, of the Wars that they made upon the Roman Empire, wherein Rome her ſelf, in the time of her viſitation, was burnt to the ground.

§. IV.

Of the Iſland of Sicil.

†. I.

The qualitie of the Iſland: and the firſt inhabitants thereof.

THe defence of the Mamertines, or the poſſeſſion of Meſſana, being now no longer ſince the firſt victories of Appius Claudius, the objects of the Roman hopes; but the Dominion of all Sicil being the prize, for which Rome and Carthage are about to contend: it will be agreeable unto the order, which in the like caſes we have obſerved, to make a brief collection of things concerning that noble Iſland, which have been the ſtage of many great acts, performed as well before and after, as in this preſent War.

That Sicil was ſometimes a Peninſula, or Demie-Iſle, adjoyning to Italy, as a part of Brutium in Calabria, near unto Rhegium, and afterward by violence of tempeſt ſevered from the ſame: it is a general opinion of all antiquity. But at what certain time this diviſion happened, there is no memorial remaining in any ancient writer. Strabo, Pliny, and Dioniſius affirm, that it was cauſed by an earth-quake; Silius and Caſſiodorus do think it to have been done by the rage and violence of the tide, and ſurges of the Sea. Either of theſe opinions may be true; for ſo was Eubœa ſevered from Bœotia; Atalante and Marcis from Eubœa; Sillie here in England, from the cape of Cornwall; and Brittain it ſelf (as may ſeem by Verſtigans arguments) from the oppoſite continent of Gaule. But for Sicil, they which lend their ears to fables, do attribute the cauſe of it to Neptune (as Euſtathius witneſſeth) who with his three-forked Mace, in favour of Jocaſtus, the ſon of Æolus, divided it from the main land, and ſo made it an Iſland, which before was but a Demie-Iſle; that by that means he might the more ſafely inhabit, and poſſeſs the ſame. Diodorus Siculus, moved by the authority of Heſiodus, aſcribeth the labour of ſundring it from Italy, to Orion: who that he might be compared to Hercules (cutting through the rocks and mountains) firſt opened the Sicilian ſtreights, as Hercules did thoſe of Gibralter.

Orion. l. 4. c. 14. Diod. l. 6. Ovid de Faſt. 4.

They which value the Iſlands of the mid-land Sea, according to their quantity and content, do make this the greateſt, as Euſtathius and Strabo, who affirm this, not only to excell the reſt for bigneſs, but alſo for goodneſs of ſoil. As concerning the form of this Iſland, Pomponius Mela ſaith, it is like that Capital letter of the Greek, which they call Delta, namely, that it hath the figure of a triangle; which is generally known to be true. That the whole Iſland was conſecrated to Ceres and Proſerpina, all old writers with one conſent affirm. To Ceres it was dedicated, becauſe it firſt taught the rules of ſetting and ſowing of Corn: to Proſerpina, not ſo much for that ſhe was from hence violently violently taken by Pluto, as becauſe (which Plutarch and Diodorus do report for truth) that Pluto, as ſoon as ſhe, uncovering her ſelf, firſt ſhewed her ſelf to be ſeen of him, gave her the Dominion thereof.

Of the fertility and riches of this Country, there is a famous teſtimony witten by Cicero, in the ſecond Oration againſt Verres, where he ſaith, that Marcus Cato did call it the Granary and Store-houſe of the Commonwealth, and the Nurſe of the vulgar ſort. The ſame Cicero doth add in that place; that it was not only the Store-houſe of the people of Rome: but alſo that it was a well-furniſhed treaſure. For without any coſt or charge of ours (ſaith he) it hath uſually clothed, maintained, and furniſhed our greateſt Armies with leather, apparrel and corn. Strabo reporteth almoſt the ſame thing of it. Whatſoever Sicilie doth yield (ſaith Solinus) whether by the ſun, and temperature of the air, or by the induſtry and labour of man, it is accounted next unto thoſe things that are of beſt eſtimation: were it not that ſuch things as the earth firſt putteth forth, are extreamly over-grown with ſaffron. Diodorus Siculus ſaith, that in the fields near unto Leontium, and in divers other places of this Iſland, wheat doth grow of it ſelf without any labour or looking to of the huſbandman. Martianus ſheweth, that there were in it ſix Colonies, and ſixty Cities: there are that reckon more, whereof the names are found ſcatteringly in many good Authors.

Now beſides many famous acts, done by the people of this Iſland, as well in peace as War, there be many other things which have made it very renowned, as the birth of Ceres; the raviſhing of Proſerpina; the Giant Enceladus; the mount Ætna; Scylla and Charybdis, with other antiquities and rarities; beſides thoſe learned men, the noble Mathematician, Archimedes; the famous Geomatrician, Euclides; the painful Hiſtorian Diodorus; and Empedocles, the deep Philoſopher.

That Sicil was at firſt poſſeſſed and inhabited by Giants, Læſtrigones, and Cyclopes, barbarous people, and uncivil; all hiſtories and fables do jointly with one conſent averr. Yet Thucydides ſaith, that theſe ſavage people dwelt only in one part of the Iſland. Afterward the Sicani, a people of Spain, poſſeſſed it. That theſe Sicani were not bred in the Iſle (although ſome ſo think) Thucydides and Diodorus do very conſtantly avouch.

Of theſe it was named Sicania. Theſe Sicani were invaded by the Siculi; who, inhabiting that part of Latium, whereon Rome was afterward built, were driven by the Pelaſgi from their own ſeats, and finding no place upon the Continent, which they were able to maſter and inhabit, paſſed over into this Iſland, three hundred years before the Greeks ſent any Colonies thither: and (ſaith Philiſtus) eighty years before the fall of Troy. Theſe Siculi gave the name of Sicilia, to the Iſland; and making war upon the Sicani, drave them from the Eaſt and Northern part thereof, into the Weſt and South. At their landing; they firſt built the City Zancle, afterward called Meſſana; and after that, Catana, Leontine, and Syracuſe it ſelf, beating from thence the Ætolians, who long before had ſet up a Town in that place. As for the name of Syracuſe it was not known, till ſuch time as Archias of Corinth (long after) won that part of the Iſland from the Siculi; Neither did the Siculi at their firſt arrival diſpoſſeſs the Ætolians thereof, but ſome hundred years after their deſcent, and after ſuch time as they had founded the Cities before named with Neæ, Hybla, Trinacria, and divers others.

After theſe Siculi came another Nation out of Italy, called Morgetes; who were thence driven by the Oenotrians. Theſe ſat down in that part of Sicil, where they afterward raiſed the Cities of Morgantum, and Leontium. For at this time the Siculi were divided, and by a civil war greatly infeebled. Among theſe ancient ſtories, we find the laſt voyage, and the death of Minos, King of Crete. Thucydides, an hiſtorian of unqueſtionable ſincerity, reports of Minos, that he made conqueſt of many Iſlands: and ſome ſuch buſineſs, perhaps, drew him into Sicil. But the common report is, that he came thither in purſuit of Dædalus. The tale goes thus: Dædalus fleeing the revenge of Minos, came into Sicil, to Cocalus, King of the Sicani, and, during his abode there, he built a place of great ſtrength, near unto Megara, for Cocalus to lay up his treaſure in; together with many notable works, for which he was greatly admired and honoured.

Among the reſt, he caſt a Ram in gold, that was ſet up in the Temple of Venus Erycina; which he did with ſo great Art, as thoſe that beheld it thought it rather to be living, than counterfeit.

Now Minos, hearing that Cocalus had entertained Dædalus, prepares to invade the Territory of Cocalus; but when he was arrived, Cocalus doubting his own ſterngth, promiſeth to deliver Dædalus. This he performs not, but in the mean while, kills Minos by treaſon, and perſwades the Cretans,

Minos

Minos his followers, to inhabit a part of Sicil; the better (as it ſeems) to ſtrengthen himſelf againſt the Siculi. Hereupon the Cretans (their King being dead) gave their conſent, and builded for themſelves the City of Minoa after the name of the King Minos. After, they likewiſe built the Town of Engium, now called Gange: and theſe were the firſt Cities, built by the Greeks in Sicil, about two ages before the war of Troy; for the grand-children of Minos ſerved with the Greeks at the ſiege thereof.

But after ſuch time as the Cretans underſtood, that their King had by treaſon been made away; they gathered together a great Army, to invade Cocalus: and landing near unto Camicus, they beſieged the ſame five years, but in vain. In the end (being forced to return, without any revenge taken) they were rackt on the coaſt of Italy, and having no means to repair their ſhips, nor the honour they had loſt, they made good the place whereon they fell, and built Hyria, or Hyrium, between the two famous Ports of Brunduſium and Tarentum. Of theſe Cretans came thoſe Nations, afterward called Iapyges and Meſſapii.

After the taking of Troy, Egeſtus and Elymus, brought with them certain troops into Sicil, and ſeated themſelves among the Sicani; where they built the Cities of Egeſta and Elyma.

It is ſaid, that Æneas viſited theſe places in his paſſage into Italy: and that ſome of the Trojans, his followers, were left behind him in theſe Towns of Sicil: whereof there want not good Authors, that make Æneas himſelf the founder.

About the ſame time, the Phœnicians ſeized upon the Promontories of Pachinus, and Lilybeum, and upon certain ſmall Iſles adjoyning to the main Iſland: which they fortified, to ſecure the trades that they had with the Silicians; like as the Portugals have done in the Eaſt-India, at Goa, Ormus, Moſambique, and other places. But the Phœnicians ſtayed not there; for after they had once aſſured their deſcents, they built the goodly City of Panormus, now called Palerma.

Theſe we find, were the Nations that inhabited the Iſle of Sicil, before the war of Troy, and ere the Greeks in any numbers began to ſtraggle in thoſe parts.

It may perchance ſeem ſtrange to the Reader, that in all ancient ſtories, he finds one and the ſame beginning of Nations, after the flood; and that the firſt planters in all parts of the World were ſaid to be mighty and Giant-like men; and that, as Phœnicia, Ægypt, Lybia and Greece, had Hercules, Oreſtes, Antæus, Typhon, and the like; as Denmark had Starchaterus, remembred by Saxo Grammaticus; as Scythia, Britanie, and other Regions had Giants for their firſt inhabitants: ſo this Iſle of Sicil had her Leſtrigones and Cyclopes. This diſcourſe I could alſo reject for fained and fabulous, did not Moſes make us know, that the Zamzummims, Emims, Anakims, and Og of Baſan, with others, which ſometime inhabited the Mountains and Deſarts of Moab, Ammon, and Mount Seir, were men of exceeding ſtrength and ſtature, and of the races of Giants: and were it not, that Tertullian, St. Auguſtine, Nicephorus, Procopius, Iſidore, Pliny, Diodore, Herodotus, Solinus, Plutarch, and many other Authors, have confirmed the opinion: Yea, Veſputius, in his ſecond Navigation into America, had reported that himſelf had ſeen the like men in thoſe parts. Again, whereas the ſelf-ſame is written of all Nations, that is written of any one; as touching their ſimplicity of life, their mean fare, their feeding on Acorns and roots, their poor cottages, the covering of their bodies with the ſkins of beaſts, their hunting, their arms, and weapons, and their warfare, their firſt paſſages over great Rivers and Arms of the Sea, upon raſts of trees tied together; and afterwards their making boats firſt of twigs and leather, then of wood; firſt with Oars, and then with Sails; that they eſteemed as gods, the firſt finders out of Arts; as of Huſbandry, of Laws, and of Policy: it is a matter, that makes me neither to wonder at, nor to doubt of it. For they all lived in the ſame newneſs of time, which we call Old time, and had all the ſame want of his inſtruction, which (after the Creator of all things) hath by degrees taught all Mankind. For other teaching had they none, that were removed far off from the Hebrews, (who inherited the knowledge of the firſt Patriarchs) than that from variable effects they began, by time and degrees, to find out the cauſes: from whence came Philoſophy Natural; as the Moral did from diſorder and confuſion; and the Law from cruelty and oppreſſion.

Saxo G. in præfat. Hiſt.

Tertul. de Reſurr. Auguſt. de Civit. Dei lib. 15. Et queſt. in Gen. Nicep. lib. 2. c. 37. Procop. l. 2. de Bello Goth. Pan. lib 7. cap 2.

But it is certain, that the Age of Time hath brought forth ſtranger and more incredible things, than the Infancy. For we have now greater Giants for vice and injuſtice, than the World had in thoſe dayes, for bodily ſtrength; for cottages, and houſes of clay and timber, we have raiſed Palaces of ſtones; we carve them, we paint them, and adorn them with gold, inſomuch as men are rather known by their houſes, than their houſes by them; we are fallen from two diſhes to two hundred; from water, to wine and drunkenneſs:

kenneſs from the covering of our bodies with the ſkins of beaſts, not only to ſilk and gold, but to the very ſkins of men. But to conclude this digreſſion, Time will alſo take revenge of the exceſs, which it hath brought forth; Quam longa dies peperit, longiorque auxit, longiſſima ſubruet: Long time brought forth, longer time increaſed it, and a time, longer than the reſt, ſhall overthrow it.

§. II.

The Plantation of the Greeks in Sicil.

WHen the firſt Inhabitants had contended long enough about the Dominion of all Sicil: it happened, that one Theocles, a Greek, being driven upon that Coaſt by an Eaſternly wind, and finding true the commendations thereof, which had been thought fabulous, being delivered only by Poets, gave information to the Athenians of this his diſcovery, and propoſed unto them the benefit of this eaſie Conqueſt offering to become their guide. But Theocles was as little regarded by the Athenians, as Columbus, in our Grand-fathers times, was by the Engliſh. Wherefore he took the ſame courſe that Columbus afterwards did. He over-laboured not himſelf in perſwading the Noble Athenians (who thought themſelves to be well enough already) to their own profit; but went to the Chalcidians, that were needy and induſtrious, by whom his project was gladly entertained. By theſe was built the City of Naxus, and a Colony planted of Eubœans.

But the reſt of the Greeks were wiſer than our Weſtern Princes of Europe: For they had no Pope, that ſhould forbid them to occupy the void places of the World. Archias of Corinth followed the Eubœans, and landed in Sicil, near unto that City, called afterward * Syracuſe: of which, that part only was then compaſſed with a wall, which the Ætolians called Homothermon; the Grecks, Naſos; the Latines, Inſula. He with his Corinthians having overcome the Siculi, drave them up into the Country; and after a few years, their multitude increaſing, they added unto the City of the Iſland, that of Acradina, Tyca, and Neapolis. So as well by the commodity of the double Port, capable of as many ſhips, as any Haven of that part of Europe, as by the fertility of the ſoil, Syracuſe grew up in great haſt, to be one of the goodlieſt Towns of the world. In ſhort time the Greeks did poſſeſs the better part of all the Sea-coaſt; forcing the Sicilians to withdraw themſelves into the faſts and mountanous parts of the Iſland, makeing their Royal reſidence in Trinacria.

Some ſeven years after the arrival of Archias, the Chalcidians, encouraged by the ſucceſs of the Corinthians, did aſſail, and obtain the City of Leontium, built and poſſeſt by the Siculi. In brief, the Greeks win from the Siculi, and their Aſſociates, the Cities of Catana and Hybla, which in honour of the Megarians that forc't it, they called Megara.

About five and forty years after Archias had taken Syracuſe; Antiphemus, and Entimus, the one from Rhodes, the other from Crete, brought an Army into Sicil, and built Gela, whoſe Citizens, one hundred and eight years after, did erect that magnificent and renowned City of Agrigentum, governed according to the Laws of the Dorians.

The Syracuſians alſo, in the ſeventieth year after their Plantation, did ſet up the City of Acra, in the Mountains; and in the ninetieth year Caſmena, in the Plains adjoyning; and again in the hundred and thirtieth year of their dwelling in Syracuſe, they built Camerina: and ſoon after that, Enna, in the very Centre of the Iſland. So did the Cumani about the ſame time, recover from the Siculi the City of Zancle, which they had founded in the ſtraight between Sicil and Italy. They of Zancle, had been the founders of Himera.

Not long after this, Doriæus the Lacedæmonian built Hereclia; which the Phœnicians, and Carthaginians, fearing the neighbourhood of the Spartans, ſoon after invaded and ruined, though the ſame were again ere long re-edified.

Selinus alſo was built by a Colony of Megara: and Zancle was taken by the Meſſenians; who having loſt their own Country, gave the name thereof unto this their new purchaſe. Such were the beginnings of the greateſt Cities in this Iſland.

* Syracuſe, as Cicero declares, was the greateſt, and moſt goodly City of all that the Greeks poſſeſt; For the ſituation is both ſtrong, and of an excellent proſpect from every entrance, by Land, or Sea. The Port (was for the moſt part) environed with beautiful buildings: and that part which was without the City, was on both ſides bankt up, and ſuſtained with beautiful wal's of Marble. The City of it ſelf was one of the greateſt of the World: for it had in compaſs (as Strabo reporteth) without the treble wall thereof, a hundred and eighty furlongs, which make of our miles about eighteen. It was compounded of four Cities (Strabo ſaith of five) to wit, Inſula, Acradina, Tycha, and Neapolis: of which greatneſs the ruines and foundations of the walls do yet witneſs. After ſuch times as the Dores of Peloponneſus had driven out the Sicilians, this goodly City for a long time became the ſeat of Tyrants. The firſt whereof was Gelo: The ſecond, Hiero the elder: The third, Thraſybulus: The fourth and fifth, Dionyſius the elder, and younger: The ſixth, Dion: The ſeventh, Agathocles: The eighth, Pyrrhus: The ninth, Hiero the younger: The tenth and laſt, Hieronymus; who being ſlain at Leontium, at length the Romans conquered it under the conduct o Marcellus.

§. III.

§. III.

Of the Government and Affairs of Sicil before Dionyſius his Tyranny.

THE moſt part of the Cities in Sicil, were governed by the rule of the people, till ſuch time as Phalaris began to uſurp the ſtate of Agrigentum, and to exerciſe all manner of Tyranny therein.

This was that Phalaris, to whom Perillus, the cunning Artificer of a deteſtable Engine, gave an hollow Bull of Braſs, wherein to incloſe men, and ſcorch them to death: praiſing the device with this commendation; That the noiſe of one tormented therein, ſhould be like unto the bellowing of a Bull. The Tyrant gave a due reward to the Inventer; by cauſing the firſt tryal to be made upon himſelf. He reigned one and thirty years, ſaith Euſebius; others give him but ſixteen: Howſoever it were, one Telemachus in the end, fell upon him with the whole multitude of Agrigentum, and ſtoned him to death; being thereto animated by Zeno, even whilſt the Tyrant was tormenting the ſame Zeno, to make him confeſs ſome matter of conſpiracy.

After the death of Phalaris, the Citizens recovered their liberty, and enjoyed it long, till Thero uſurped the Government of the Common-weal: at which time alſo Panætius made himſelf Lord of Leontium; and Cleander of Gela: but Cleander having ruled ſeven years, was ſlain by one of the Citizens. Cleander being dead, his Brother Hippocrates ſucceeded in his room, and greatly afflicted the people of Naxos, of Zancle, of Meſſena, and of Leontium; whom with divers others of the ancient Inhabitants, he forced to acknowledge him their Lord. He alſo made war with the Syracuſians, and, in the end, got from them by compoſition, the City of Camerina. But when he had reigned ſeven years, he was ſlain in a Battel againſt the Siculi, before Hybla.

At this time did the Syracuſians change their form of Government, from Popular to Ariſtocratical; a preparation towards a Principality, whereinto it was ſoon after changed. After the death of Hyppocrates, Gelon (deſcended from the Rhodians, which together with the Cretans, had long before, among other of the Greeks, ſeated themſelves in Sicil) that had commanded the forces of Hippocrates, in the former War, with notable ſucceſs, became Lord of Gela. He, after his Maſters death, breaking the truſt committed unto him by Hippocrates over his children, and being in poſſeſſion of Gela, took the occaſion and advantage of a contention in Syracuſe, between the Magiſtrates and the People. For coming with a ſtrong Army to the ſuccour of the Governours, driven out by the multitude, they elected him their Prince, being the firſt, (and indeed) the moſt famous, that ever governed the Syracuſians. This change happened in the ſecond year of the threeſcore and twelfth Olympiad; wherein the better to eſtabliſh himſelf, he took to wife the Daughter of Thero, who had alſo uſurped the ſtate of Agrigentum. Pauſ. l. 6.

Now this Gelon, the Son of Dinomenes, had three Brethren; Hiero, Polyzelus, and Thraſybulus: to the firſt of which he gave up the City of Gela, when he had obtained the Principality of Syracuſe. For, after that time, all his thoughts travelled in the ſtrengthening, beautifying, and amplifying of Syracuſe. He defaced Camerina, that a little before was fallen from the obedience of the Syracuſians who built it, and brought the Citizens to Syracuſe. The Megarians that had moved a War againſt him, he overcame; the richer ſort he brought unto Syracuſe; and the people he ſold for ſlaves. In like manner dealt he with other places upon the like occaſion. Not long after this, Thero, a Prince of the Agrigentines, having diſpoſſeſt Terillus of his City Himera; the Carthaginians were drawn into the quarrel by Anaxilus, Lord of Meſſena, Father-in-law to Terillus: and Gelon was alſo ſolicited by his Father-in-law, Thero. Gelon was content, and in fine, after divers conflicts, the Carthaginians and other Africans, led by Amilcar, were overthrown by Gelon: and an hundred and fifty thouſand of them left their bodies in Sicil. Herod. & Diod.

This Gelon it was, to whom the Athenians and Lacedæmonians ſent for ſuccour, when Xerxes with his huge Army paſt the Helleſpont. He, for their relief having armed thirty thouſand Souldiers, and two hundred ſhips, refuſed nevertheleſs to ſend them into Greece, becauſe they refuſed him the command of one of their Armies, either by Sea, or Land. So he uſed to their Embaſſadours only this Saying, That their Spring was withered; accounting the Army, by him prepared, to be the very flower of the Greek Nation.

The Carthaginians, after this great loſs received, fearing the invaſion of their own Country, ſent to Gelon by their Embaſſadours, to deſire peace, who grants it them on theſe conditions: That from thenceforth they ſhould not ſacrifice their children to Saturn; That they ſhould pay him two thousand talents of silver, and present him with two armed ships, in sign of amity. These conditions the Carthaginians, not only willingly accepted, but with the two thousand talents, and the ships for war, they sent unto Demarata, Gelons Wife, a Crown, valued at an hundred talents of gold, with other presents. Whereby we see, that some Nations, and some Natures, are much the better for being well beaten. The wars ended, and Sicil in peace, Gelon beautified the Temples of the gods, and erected others in honour of them. So being exceedingly beloved and honoured of his Subjects, he left the world, and left for his successor his Brother Hiero. Philistus and Pliny report, That when his boby was burnt, according to the custom of that Age, a Dog of his, which alwayes waited on him, ran into the fire, and suffered himself to be burnt with him.

To Gelor, Hiero his Brother succeeded; a man rude, cruel, covetous, and so suspicious of his Brethren Polyzelus, and Thrasybulus, as he sought by all means to destroy them. Notwithstanding all this, by the conversation which he had with Simonides, he became of better condition, and greatly delighted with the study of good Arts. Divers quarrels he had, as well with Theron of Agrigentum, as with other Cities: all which he shortly after compounded, and gave a notable overthrow to the Carthaginians, whom Xerxes had incited to invade Sicil, fearing the succours which Gelon had prepared, to aid the Grecians against him. He also overthrew in battel Thrasydæus, the Son of Theron, and thereby restored the Agrigentines to their former liberty. But in the end, he lost the love of the Syracusians; and after he had reigned eleven years, he left the Kingdom to his Brother Thrasybulus, who became a most unjust and bloody Tyrant. Thrasybulus injoyed his Principality no longer than ten months. For, notwithstanding the force of mercenary Souldiers; which he entertained for his guards, he was beaten out of Syracuse by the Citizens; to whom, being besieged in Acradina, he restored the Government, and was banished the Island. From whence he sailed into Greece, where he died a private man, among the Locrians.

And now had the Syracusians recovered again their former liberty, as all the rest of the Cities did; after which they had never sought, had the Successors of Gelon inherited his vertue, as they did the Principality of Syracuse. For in all changes of Estates, the preservation ought to answer the acquisition. When a liberal, valiant, and advised Prince, hath obtained any new Signiory, and added it to that of his own, or exalted himself from being a private man to the dignity of a Prince, it behooveth the Successour to maintain it by the same way and art, by which it was gotten.

To conclude, Syracuse (though not without blows, ere that she could cleanse her self of the creatures and lovers of Gelon) was now again become Mistress of her self, and held her self free, well-near threescore years, to the time of Dionysius, though she were in the mean while greatly endangered by a Citizen of her own, called Tindario.

Now, to prevent the greatness of any one among them, for the future, they devised a kind of banishment of such among them, as were suspected; taking pattern from the Athenian Ostracisme. They called this their new devised judgement of exile, Petalismus, wherein every one wrote upon an Olive-leaf (as at Athens they wrote upon shells) the name of him, whom he would have expelled the City. He that had most suffrages against him, was banished for five years. Hereby in a short time, it came to pass that those of judgement, and best able to govern the Common-weal, were, by the worst able, either suppresst, or thrust out of the City. Yea, such as feared this Law, though they had not yet felt it, withdrew themselves as secretly as they could, seeking some place of more security, wherein to maintain themselves. And good reason they had so to do; seeing that there is nothing so terrible in any State, as a powerful and authorized ignorance. But this Law lasted not very long. For their necessity taught them to abolish it, and restore again the wiser sort unto the Government; from which, the Nobility having practised to banish one another, the State became altogether Popular. But after a while, being invaded by Ducetius, King of the Sicilians, that inhabited the inner part of the Island (who had already taken Enna, and some other of the Grecian Cities, and overthrown the Army of the Agragentines) the Syracusians sent forces against him, commanded by an unworthy Citizen of theirs, called Bolcon. This their Captain made nothing so much haste to find out Ducetius, against whom he was imployed, as he did to flee from the Army he led, as soon as Ducetius presented him battel. So for want of conduct, the greatest number of the Syracusians perished.

But making better choice among those whom they had banished, they levy other troops: by whom, in conclusion, Ducetius being being beaten, ſubmitteth himſelf, and is conſtrained to leave the Iſland for a time. Yet it was not long ere he returned again, and built the City Collatina on the Sea-ſide.

Ducetius being dead; all the Greek Cities did in a ſort acknowledge Syracuſe, Trinacria excepted; which alſo by force of Arms, in the fourſcore and fifth Olympiad, they brought to reaſon.

But they do not long enjoy this their Superintendency. For the Citizens of Leontium, being oppreſt by them, ſeek aid from the Athenians, about the ſixth year of the Peloponneſian War. In this ſuit they prevailed by the eloquence of Gorgias their Orator; and got an hundred Athenian Gallies to ſuccour them, under the leading of Laches, and Charœodes. To this Fleet, the Leontines, and their Partners, added one hundred more; with which forces, and with ſome ſupplies brought by Sophocles, Pythodorus, Eurymedon, and other Athenian Captains, they invaded the Territories of the Syracuſians, and their Partiſans; wan and loſt divers places; took Meſſana; and, in the ſeventh year of the Peloponneſian War, loſt it again. They alſo at the ſame time attempted Hymera, but in vain. The fire of this quarrel took hold upon many Cities, which did invade each others Territory with great violence. But when they had wearied themſelves on all hands, and yet could ſee none iſſue of the War, the Leontines, without the advice of the Athenians, came to an accord with the Syracuſians, and were admitted into their ſociety, with equal freedom. So the Athenians, who hoped to have greatned themſelves in Sicil, by the diviſion and civil War, were diſappointed of their expectation, by the good agreement of the Sicilians, and fain to be gone with the broken remainder of their Fleet. This they knew not how to amend; but (according to the cuſtom of popular Eſtates) by taking revenge upon their own Commanders. So they baniſhed Pythodorus, and Sophocles, and laid an heavy fine upon Eurymedon. Shortly after this, followed the moſt memorable War, that ever was made by the Greeks in Sicil: which was that of the Athenians, againſt the Selinuntines and Syracuſians, in favour of the Cities of Egeſta, Leontium, and Catana. They of Selinus had oppreſt the Egeſtans; and they of Syracuſe the Leontines, and the Catanians: which was the ground of the War. For the Athenians undertook the protection of their old friends: and, in hatred of the Athenians, aid from Lacedæmon was ſent to the Syracuſians. The Lacedæmonians dealt plainly, having none other end, than that which they pretended, namely, to help a people of their own Tribe, that craved their ſuccour, being in diſtreſs. The Athenians ſcarce knew what to pretend: for their preparations were ſo great, as diſcovered their intent to be none other, than the Conqueſt of the whole Iſland. Yet they which had called them in, were ſo blinded with their own paſſions, that they would not believe their own eyes; which preſented unto them a Fleet and Army, far greater, than the terrible report of fame had made it.

In this expedition, the City of Athens had engaged all her power; as regarding not only the greatneſs of the enterpriſe, but the neceſſity of finiſhing it in a ſhort ſpace of time. For the Lacedæmonians (as hath already been ſhewed in due place) ſtood at that time in ſuch broken terms of peace with Athens, as differed not much from open War. Wherefore it was thought neceſſary, either to ſpare coſt in this great Expedition, or altogether to forbear it: which was likely to be hindred by Wars at home, if their proceedings were ſlack abroad. And ſurely, had not the deſire of the Athenians been over-paſſionate, the arguments of Nicias had cauſed them to abſtain from ſo chargeable a buſineſs, and to reſerve their forces for a more needful uſe. But young counſels prevailed againſt the authority of ancient men, that were more regardful of ſafety than of honour.

Of this buſineſs, mention hath been already made, in that which we have written of the Peloponneſian War. But what was there delivered in general terms, as not concerning the affairs of Greece, otherwiſe than by conſequence, doth in this place require a more perfect relation, as a matter, wherein the whole State of Sicil was like to have felt a great converſion.

Though Alcibiades had prevailed againſt Nicias, in exhorting the people to this great voyage; yet Nicias, together with Alcibiades and Lamachus, was appointed to be one of the chief Commanders therein.

Theſe had commiſſion and direction, as well to ſuccour the Segeſtans, and to reeſtabliſh the Leontines, caſt out of their places by the Syracuſians; as alſo by force of Arms, to ſubject the Syracuſians, and all their adherents in Sicil, and compel them by tribute, to acknowledge the Athenians for their ſupream Lords. To effect which, the forenamed Captains were ſent off, with an hundred and thirty Gallies, and five thouſand one hundred Souldiers, beſides the thirty ſhips of burden, which tranſported their victuals, engines, and other munitions for the War: and these were Athenians, Mantinæans, Rhodians, and Candians: there were, besides these, six thousand Megarians light-armed, with thirty horsemen.

Thucyd. l. 6. c. 9. With these troops and fleets they arrive at Rhegium, where the Rhegians refuse to give them entry; but sell them victuals for their mony. From thence they sent to the Egestans, to know what treasure they would contribute towards the war, seeing for their sakes they had entred thereinto. But they found by their answers, that these Egestans were poor, and that they had abused the Athenian Embassadours with false shews of gold, having in all but 30. talents. The Athenians further were discouraged, when they found that the Rhegians, their ancient friends, and allied unto the Leontines, refused to trust them within their Walls. Hereupon Nicias adviseth to depart towards the Selinuntines, and to force them, or perswade them to an agreement with the Egestans; as likewise to see what disbursements the Egestans could make; and so return again into Greece, and not to waste Athens in a needless war. Alcibiades, on the other side, would solicite the Cities of Sicil to confederacy against the Syracusians and Selinuntines, whereby to force them unto restitution of all that they had taken from the Leontines. Lamachus he perswades them to assail Syracuse it self, before it were prepared against them. But in the end (being excluded out of divers Cities) they surprise Catana: and there they take new counsel how to proceed. Thence they imployed Nicias to those of Egesta, who received from them thirty talents towards his charges; and one hundred and twenty talents more there were of the spoils they had gotten in the Island. Thus the Summer being spent in idle consultations, and vain attempts, the Athenians prepare to assail Syracuse. But Alcibiades having been accused at home, in his absence, was sent for back by the Athenians to make his answer: and the Army was left to the conduct of Nicias and Lamachus. These Commanders obtain a landing place very near unto Syracuse, by this device.

They imploy to Syracuse an inhabitant of Catana, whom they trust; and instruct him, to promise unto the Syracusians, that he would deliver into their hands all the Athenians within Catana. Hereupon the Syracusians draw thitherward with their best forces. But in the mean while, the Athenians, setting sail from Catana, arrive at Syracuse, where they land at fair ease, and fortifie themselves against the Town. Shortly after this, they fight, and the Syracusians had the loss: but the Athenians, wanting horse, could not pursue their victory to any great effect. They then retire themselves, with a resolution to refresh their Army at Catana, for the winter-season. From thence they made an attempt upon Messana, hoping to have taken it by an intelligence, but in vain. For Alcibiades had discovered such as were Traitors within the City to the Messenians. This he now did, in despight of his own Citizens, the Athenians; because they had recalled him from his command, with a purpose either to have put him to death, or to have banished him: whereof being assured by his friends, he took his way towards the Lacedæmonians, and to them he gave mischievous counsel against his Country. While this winter yet lasted, the Syracusians send Embassadors to Lacedæmon, and Corinth, for aid: as likewise the Athenian Captains in Sicil, send to Athens for supplies. Which both the one and the other obtained.

In the Spring following (which was the beginning of the eighteenth year of the Peloponnesian war) the Athenians in Sicil sail from the Port of Catana to Megara, forsaken of the Inhabitants; from whence, forraging the Country, they obtain some small victories over the straggling Syracusians: and at their return to Catana, they receive a supply of two hundred men at arms, but without horse, which they hoped to furnish in the Island from the Segestans, and other their adherents: they were also strengthned with a company of Archers, and with three hundred talents in mony.

Hereupon they take courage, and incamp near Syracuse, upon the banks of the great Port, repelling the Syracusians, that sallyed to impeach their intrenchments. They also received from their Confederates four hundred horse-men, with two hundred other horse, to mount their men at arms. Syracuse was now in effect blockt up, so as hardly any succours could enter, but such as were able to force their passage: yet the Athenians receive divers losses; among which it was not the least, that Lamachus, one of their best Commanders, was slain.

In the mean while, Gylippus and Python, with the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian forces, arrive, and take land at Hymera. The Citizens of Hymera, and of Gela, together with the Selinuntines, joyn with them; so that with these and his own troops, Gylippus adventured to march over-land toward Syracuse. The Syracusians send a part of their forces to meet him and conduct him. The Athenians prepare to encounter them, expecting his arrival arrival near unto the City upon a place of advantage. At the firſt encounter they had the better of their enemies, by reaſon that the Syracuſian horſe-men could not come to fight in thoſe ſtraights: but ſoon after, Gylippus charging them again, brake them, and conſtrained Nicias to fortifie himſelf within his Camp. Whereupon Nicias made the ſtate of his affairs known, by his letters to the Athenians; ſhewing, that without great ſupplies by Sea and Land, the enterpriſe would be loſt, together with the ſmall Army remaining. Theſe letters received, the Athenians appoint two other Generals, Eurymedon and Demoſthenes, to joyn with Nicias: the one they diſpatch preſently with ſome ſupplies; the other they ſend after him in the Spring following.

In the mean while, Gylippus at Syracuſe, fights with the Athenians both by Sea and Land, ſometimes with ill, and at other times with good ſucceſs: but in concluſion, he took from their Fort, near unto Syracuſe, the Promontory called Plymmyrium; wherein the Athenians loſt their treaſure, and a great part of all their proviſions. Notwithſtanding which loſs, and that the Athenians themſelves, in Greece, were (in effect) beſieged within Athens, by the Lacedæmonians; yet were they moſt obſtinate in proſecuting the War in Sicil, and diſpatched away Demoſthenes with new ſuccours. Demoſthenes, in his way towards Sicil, encountred with Polyanthes the Corinthian, with his fleet: both the Captains being bound for Sicil, the one to ſuccour Nicias, the other Gylippus. The loſs between them was in effect equal; and neither ſo broken, but that each of them proſecuted the enterpriſe they had in hand. But before the ſuccours arrived to either, Gylippus and Ariſton had aſſailed the Athenians in the great Port of Syracuſe, and in a Sea fight put them to the worſt, to the great diſcouragement of the Athenians. On the neck of this, Demoſthenes arrived with threeſcore and thirteen Gallies, charged with footmeen; and (blaming the ſloath of Nicias) he invaded the Syracuſians the ſame day that he arrived. But he made more haſte than he had good ſpeed, being ſhamefully beaten, and repulſed with great loſs. Hereupon Demoſthenes and Eurymedon determine to riſe up from before Syracuſe, and return to the ſuccour of Athens: but Nicias diſputed to the contrary, pretending that he had good intelligence within Syracuſe, whereby he learned, that the Town could not long hold out.

Whatſoever Nicias his intelligence was; upon the arrival of a new ſupply into the Town, the Athenians had all conſented to depart, and to lodge at Catana: had not an Eclipſe of the Moon, boding (as was thought) ill ſucceſs cauſed them to deferr their departure. But this ſuperſtition coſt them dear. For the Syracuſians, Lacedæmonians, and Corinthians, with threeſcore and ſeventeen ſail of Gallies, entred the great Port of Syracuſe, wherein the Athenians kept their fleet, and whereon they had fortified themſelves. The Athenians in the ſame Port encountred them with fourſcore and ſix Gallies, commanded by Eurymedon: in which the Athenian fleet was beaten, by the leſſer number, and Eurymedon ſlain. Now, though it were ſo, that the Syracuſians received the more loſs by land (for the fight was general) yet when the Athenians were beaten by ſea, in which kind they thought themſelves invincible, they were wonderfully caſt down. For it was well ſaid of Gylippus, to the Syracuſians; When any people do find themſelves vanquiſhed in that manner of fight, and with thoſe weapons, in which they perſwade themſelves that they exceed all others, they not only loſe their reputation, but their courage. The Athenians, beſides the Gallies ſunk and wrackt, had ſeventeen taken, and poſſeſt by the enemy: and with great labour and loſs they defended the reſt from being fired, having drawn them within a Paliſado, in one corner of the port, unadviſedly: for it is as contrary to a Sea-war, to thruſt ſhips into a ſtraight room and corner, as it is to ſcatter foot in a plain field againſt horſe; the one ſubſiſting by being at large, the other by cloſe imbattailing.

The Syracuſians, having now weakned the Athenian fleet, reſolve to impriſon them within the Port. And to that purpoſe they range all their Gallies in the mouth of the Haven, being about a mile over, and there they came to Anchor; filling the out-let with all manner of Veſſels; which they man moſt ſtrongly, becauſe the Athenians, being now made deſperate, ſhould not with double ranks of Gallies break through the Syracuſian fleet; which lay but ſingle, becauſe they were forc't to range themſelves over all the Out-let of the Port. They therefore not only mored themſelves ſtrongly by their Anchors, but chained the ſides of their Gallies together, and lay behind them again certain ſhips, which ſerved in the former war for victuallers: to the end, that if any of their Gallies were ſunk; or the chain, which joyned them to their fellows, broken; the Athenians might yet find themſelves a ſecond time, intangled and arreſted. To diſorder alſo thoſe Athenian Gallies, which came on in form of a wedge, to break through, and force a paſſage, the Syracuſians had left within theſe Gallies and Ships, inchained together, a certain number of looſe ones, to ſtop their courſe and fury. For where the way of any veſſel, uſing oar or ſails, is broken, and their ſpeed foreſtowed, they cannot force with any weight and violence, the reſiſtance oppoſing.

On the other ſide, the Athenians knew that they were utterly loſt, except with an invincible reſolution they could make their way, and break down this great bridge of boats; or (at leaſt) force a paſſage through them in ſome part or other: which they reſolve to hazard, with all their ſhipping (to the number of one hundred and ten of all ſorts) and with all the ſtrength of their Land-army, in them imbarqued. But the Gallies, which were within the bridge of boats, did ſo diſorder the Athenian fleet, ere they came to force the bridge, as albeit ſome few of them had broken through the chains, yet being ſtopt with the ſhips without, and aſſailed by other looſe Gallies of the Syracuſians, which were purpoſely left at large in the ſea, they were either taken or ſunk. Three great diſadvantages the Athenians had: the firſt, that fighting within a Haven, and (as it were) in a ſtraight, they had no room to turn themſelves, nor to free themſelves one from another, being intangled; the ſecond, that having overpeſtered their Gallies with Souldiers, who uſed offenſive arms of darts and ſlings, they had not place upon the decks to ſtretch their arms; the third was, the diſcomfortable end for which they fought, namely, to force a paſſage, by which they might ſave themſelvs by running away. To be ſhort, the fight was no leſs terrible than the confuſion: the ſlaughter great on all ſides; and the noiſe, and the cryes, ſo lowd and lamentable, as that no direction could be heard. But in the end, the Athenians, as many as ſurvived, were beaten back to the Land, with loſs of threeſcore of their Gallies, broken, ſunk, or abandoned. The Syracuſians did alſo loſe twenty of theirs, with Pythen, Commander of the Corinthians. The reſt of the Athenian Gallies, running themſelves into the bottom of the Port, ſaved themſelves by the help and countenance of the Land-army there fortified. In this deſperate eſtate, the Athenian Commanders go to counſel. Demoſthenes perſwades them to furniſh with freſh Souldiers thoſe few Gallies which remained; and while the Syracuſians were triumphing, and made ſecure by their preſent victory, to ſet upon them, and forcing their way out of the Port, to return to Athens. This was no ill counſel. For, as we have heard of many great Captains (yea, the greateſt number of all that have been victorious) that have neglected the ſpeedy proſecution of a beaten enemy; ſo might we produce many examples of thoſe, who having ſlept ſecurely in the boſome of good ſucceſs, have been ſuddenly awaked, by the re-allied Companies of a broken Army, and have thereby loſt again all the honour and advantage formerly gotten. But Nicias oppoſeth the advice of Demoſthenes: Others ſay, that the Seamen were againſt it. Whereupon abandoning their Gallies, they all reſolve to march over land to the Cities of their Confederates, till ſome more favourable fortune ſhould call them thence. On the other ſide, Gylippus, and other the Lacedæmonian and Corinthian Captains, with Hermocrates, exhort the Syracuſians to put themſelves preſently into the field, and to ſtop all the paſſages, leading to thoſe Cities of their enemies, to which the Athenians might make retrait. But many were weary, and many were wounded, and many of them thought that they had done enough for the preſent. Which humour in ſome of our Commanders at Cadez, loſt us both the Indian fleet, and the ſpoils of many other neighbour places. Hermocrates, the Syracuſian, finding it a loſt labour, to perſwade his Countrymen to any haſty proſecution, deviſed this good ſtratagem, whereby to gain time; not doubting, but that after a day or two, he ſhould draw them willingly out. He ſent two or three horſe-men out of Syracuſe by night, willing them to find Nicias, and (after they had aſſured him, that they were of the Athenians faction) to give him advice not to march away over-haſtily from the place, wherein he was fortified; alledging that the Syracuſians had lodged their Army, which could not long ſtay there, upon the paſſages and places of advantage, leading towards the Cities of their Allies. Theſe tidings Nicias eaſily believed, and put off his journey to the third day. For men newly beaten, are (for the moſt part) more fearful than wiſe; and to them, every thiſtle in the field appears, by night, a man at arms.

The third day (leaving all their Gallies, and all their baggage) they remove; being pierced and purſued with the lamentable out-cryes of thoſe that were ſick and hurt: whom they abandon to the cure of their enemies ſwords. The reſt march away, to the number of forty thouſand; and make their firſt paſſage by force, over the River of Anapus, notwithſtanding the oppoſition of their enemies, mies. But being every day charged in their marches, and by the Syracusian horse-men, beaten in from forraging and provision of food, they grow weak and heartless. The Syracusians also possess the Mountain Lepas, by which they were to pass towards Camerina, and thereby force them to fall back again towards the Sea-coast, and to take what way they could: being unable to proceed in their journey intended. Many hard shifts they made, in difficult passages, and blind marches by night; which they were fain to endure, as having none other means to escape from the enemy that pursued them, and held them waking with continual skirmishing. To keep all in order, Nicias undertook the leading of the Vaunt-guard; and Demosthenes conducted the Rear. At the River Erineus, Nicias takes the start of a whole nights march; leaving Demosthenes to make the retreat: who being incompassed, and overprest with numbers, in the end renders himself. The conditions he obtained, were far better than he could have hoped for; and the faith of his enemies far worse than he suspected. For he was afterward, with Nicias murdered in prison. The Army of Demosthenes being dissolved, they pursued Nicias with the greater courage: who being utterly broken upon the passage of the River Assinarus, rendred himself to Gylippus, upon honest conditions. Gylippus sought to preserve him, and to have had the honour to have brought these two to Sparta; Nicias, as a noble Enemy to the Lacedæmonians, and who, at the overthrow which they received at Pylus by the Athenians, had saved the lives of the vanquished; Demosthenes, as one that had done to Lacedæmon the greatest hurt. Hermocrates also, the Commander of the Syracusian Army disswaded the rest, by all the art he had, from using any barbarous violence, after so noble a victory. But the cruel and cowardly sort, (cowardise and cruelty being inseparable passions) prevailed, and caused these brave Captains to be miserably murdered; one part of their Souldiers to be starved in loathsome prisons; and the rest, sold for slaves. This was the success of the Sicilian war: which took end at the River Assinarus, the four and twentieth day of May, in the fourscore and eleventh Olympiad.

The Athenians being beaten out of Sicil; the Egestans (for whose defence against the Selinuntines, this late war had been taken in hand) fearing the victorious Syracusians, sought help from the Carthaginians; to whom they offered themselves, and their City, as their vassals. The Carthaginians, though ambitious enough of enlarging their Dominion in Sicil, yet considering the prosperity of the Syracusians, and their late victories over the Athenians, they stayed a while to dispute of the matter, whether they should refuse or accept the offer made unto them: for the Selinuntines were straightly allied to the Syracusians, as may appear by what is past. In the end the Senators of Carthage resolve upon the enterprise; and (by a trick of their Punick wit) to separate the Syracusians from the Selinuntines, they send Embassadors to Syracuse: praying that City, as in the behalf of the Egestans, to compell the Selinuntines to take reason, and to rest content with so much of the lands in question, as they of Syracuse should think meet to allow them. The Syracusians approved the motion; for it tended to their own honor. But the Selinuntines would make no such appointment: rather they took it ill, that the Syracusians, with whom they had run one course of fortune, in the Athenian war, should offer to trouble them, by interposing as Arbitrators, in a business that themselves could end by force. This was right as the Carthaginians would have it. For now could they of Selinus with an ill grace crave aid of Syracuse; and the Syracusians as ill grant it unto those, that had refused to stand to the Arbitrament, which the Carthaginians would have put into their hands. Hereupon, an Army of three hundred thousand men is set out from Carthage, under the conduct of Hannibal, Nephew to that Amilcar, who (as you have heard before) was overthrown with the great Carthaginian Army at Himera by Gelon. Hannibal was exceeding greedy of this imployment, that he might take revenge as well of his Uncles, as of his Fathers death; the one of them having been slain by the Himerans, the other by those of Selinus. Both the Cities, Hannibal, in this war, won by force of arms, sackt them, and burnt them; and having taken three thousand of the Himerans prisoners, he caused them to be led unto the place, where Amilcar was slain, and buried them there.

After this followed some trouble at Syracuse, occasioned by the banishment of Hermocrates, who had lately been General of the Syracusian forces, against the Athenians. The malice of his enemies had so far prevailed with the ingrateful multitude, that he was condemned to exile for his meer vertue, at such a time as he was aiding the Lacedæmonians, in their war against Athens: wherein he did great service. All the honester sort within Syracuse were sorry for their injury injury done unto him, and ſought to have him repealed. Hermocrates himſelf, returning into Sicil, gathered an Army of ſix thouſand; with which he began to repair Selinus; and by many noble actions laboured to win the love of his Citizens. But the faction that oppoſed him was the ſtronger. Wherefore he was adviſed to ſeize upon a Gate of Syracuſe, with ſome ſtrength of men; whereby his friends within the Town, might have the better means to riſe againſt the adverſe party. This he did: but preſently the multitude fell to arms, and ſet upon him; in which conflict he was ſlain. But his Son-in-law, Dionyſius, ſhall make them wiſh Hermocrates alive again.

§. IV.

Of Dionyſius the Tyrant: and others, following him, in Syracuſe.

THe Syracuſians had enjoyed their liberty about threeſcore years, from the death of Thraſybulus, to the death of Hermocrates: at which time Dionyſius was raiſed up by God, to take revenge, as well of their cruelty toward ſtrangers, as of their ingratitude towards their own beſt Citizens. For before the time of Dionyſius, they had made it their paſtime, to reward the vertue of their worthieſt Commanders with death, or diſgrace: which cuſtom they muſt now be taught to amend.

Dionyſius obtained the principality of Syracuſe, by the ſame degrees, that many others, before him, had made themſelves maſters of other Cities, and of Syracuſe it ſelf. For, being made Prætor, and commanding their Armies againſt the Carthaginians, and other their enemies, he behaved himſelf ſo well, that he got a general love among the people, and men of war. Then began he to follow the example of Piſiſtratus, that made himſelf Lord of Athens; obtaining a band of ſix hundred men, to defend his perſon: under pretence, that his private enemies, being traiterouſly affected to the State of Syracuſe, had laid plots how to murder him, becauſe of his good ſervices. He doubled the pay of his Souldiers; alledging, that it would incourage them to fight manfully: but intending thereby to aſſure them to himſelf. He perſwaded the Citizens, to call home, out of exile, thoſe that had been baniſhed, which were the beſt men of Syracuſe; and theſe were afterwards at his devotion, as obliged unto him by ſo great a benefit. His firſt favour, among the Syracuſians, grew from his accuſation of the principal men. It is the delight of baſe people to reign over their betters: wherefore, gladly did he help them to break down, as fetters impriſoning their liberty, the bars that held it under ſafe cuſtody. Long it was not, ere the chief Citizens had found whereat he aimed. But what they ſaw, the people would not ſee: and ſome that were needy, and knew not how to get Offices without his help, were willing to help him, though they knew his purpoſes to be ſuch, as would make all the City to ſmart. He began early to hunt after the tyranny; being but five and twenty years of age when he obtained it: belike it was his deſire to reign long. His firſt work, of making himſelf abſolute Lord in Syracuſe, was, the poſſeſſion of the Citadel, wherein was much good proviſion, and under it the Gallies were mored. This he obtained by allowance of the people, and having obtained this, he cared for no more, but declared himſelf without all ſhame or fear. The Army the chief Citizens reſtored by him from baniſhment; all the needy ſort within Syracuſe, that could not thrive by honeſt courſes; and ſome neighbour-towns, bound unto him, either for his help in war, or for eſtabliſhing the faction, reigning at that preſent; were wholly affected to his aſſiſtance. Having therefore gotten the Citadel into his hands, he needed no more, ſave to aſſure what he had already. He ſtrengthened himſelf by divers marriages; taking firſt to wife the daughter of Hermocrates; and after her, two at once; the one a Locrian, Doris, by whom he had Dionyſius, his Succeſſor; the other, Ariſtomache, the daughter of Hipparinus, and ſiſter to Dion, honourable men in Syracuſe; which bare unto him many children, that ſerved to fortifie him with new alliances.

Yet it was not long, ere ſome of the Syracuſians (envying his proſperity) incited the multitude, and took arms againſt him, even in the novelty of his Rule. But their enterpriſe was more paſſionately, than wiſely governed. He had ſhamefully been beaten by the Carthaginians at Gela: which, as it vexed the Sicilian men at arms, making them ſuſpect that it was his purpoſe to let the Carthaginians waſte all that he might afterwards take poſſeſſion of the deſolate places; ſo it inflamed them with a deſire to free themſelves from his tyranny. They departed therefore from him, and marched haſtily to Syracuſe, where they found friends to help them: there they forced his Palace, ranſacked his treaſures, and ſo ſhamefully abuſed his wife, that for the grief thereof ſhe

poiſoned her ſelf. But he followed their heels apace; and firing a Gate of the City by night, entred ſoon enough to take revenge, by making a ſpeedy riddance of them. For he ſpared none of his known, no nor of his ſuſpected enemies. After that, he grew ſo doubtful of his life, as he never durſt truſt Barber to trim him, nor any perſon, no not ſo much as his brother, to enter into his chamber, unſtript and ſearched. He was the greateſt Robber of the people that ever reigned in any State, and withall the moſt unreſpectively cruell.

After this, he ſeparated with fortification that part of the City, called the Iſland, from the reſt; like as the Spaniard did the Citadel of Antwerp: therein he lodged his Treaſures, and his Guards.

He then began to make war upon the free Cities of Sicil: but while he lay before Herbeſſe, an in-land Town, the Syracuſians rebelled againſt him; ſo, as with great difficulty he recovered his Citadel: from whence, having allured the old Souldiers of the Companions, who forced their paſſage through the City, with one thouſand and two hundred horſe, he again recovered the maſtery over the Syracuſians. And when a multitude of them were buſied in gathering in their harveſt, he diſarmed all the Townsmen remaining, and new ſtrengthened the Fort of the Iſland, with a double wall. He incloſed that part alſo, called Epipoles; which, with threeſcore thouſand labourers, he finiſhed within three weeks, being two leagues in compaſs. He then built two hundred new Gallies; and repaired one hundred and ten of the old; forged one hundred and forty thouſand Targets, with as many ſwords, and head-pieces, with fourteen thouſand corſlets, and all other ſutable arms. Which done, he ſent word to the Cathaginians (greatly infeebled by the plague) That except they would abandon the Greek Towns, which they held in Sicil, he would make war upon them: and, not ſtaying for anſwer, he took the ſpoil of all the Phœnician ſhips, and merchandize, within his Ports; as King Philip the ſecond did of our Engliſh, before the war in our late Queens time. He then goes to the field with fourſcore thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, and ſends his brother Leptines to ſea, with two hundred Gallies, and five hundred ſhips of burden. Moſt of the Towns which held for Carthage yielded unto him; ſaving Panormus, Segeſta or Egeſta, Ancyra, Motya, and Eutella. Of theſe, he firſt wan Motya by aſſault, and put all therein to the ſword; but before Egeſta he loſt a great part of his Army, by a ſally of the Citizens. In the mean while Himilco arrives; but, ere he took land, he loſt in a fight at Sea, with Leptines, fifty ſhips of war, and five thouſand Souldiers, beſides many ſhips of burden. This notwithſtanding, he recovered again Motya upon his firſt deſcent. From thence marching towards Meſſana, he took Lypara, and (ſoon after) Meſſana, and razed it to the ground. Now began Dionyſius greatly to doubt his eſtate. He therefore fortified all the places he could, in the Territory of the Leontines, by which he ſuppoſed that Himilco would paſs toward Syracuſe; and he himſelf took the field again, with four and thirty thouſand foot; and one thouſand horſe. Now, hearing that Himilco had divided his Army into two parts, marching with the one half over-land, and ſending Mago with the other by Sea: he ſent Leptines, his brother to encounter Mago. But Leptines was utterly beaten by the Carthaginians; twenty thouſand of his men were ſlain, and an hundred of his Gallies loſt. It is very ſtrange, and hardly credible, which yet good Authors tell us; That one City ſhould be able to furniſh five hundred ſail of ſhips, and two hundred Gallies: (for, ſo many did Syracuſe arm in this war) and more ſtrange it is, that in a battail at Sea, without any great Artillery, or Muſket-ſhot, twenty thouſand ſhould be ſlain in one fight. In all our fights againſt the Turks, of which that at Lepanto was the moſt notable, we hear of no ſuch number loſt; nor in any other fight by Sea, that ever happened in our age, nor before us. When Charls the fifth went to beſiege Algier, he had in all his fleet, tranſporters and others, but two hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips, and threeſcore and five Gallies: for the furniſhing of which fleet, he ſought help from all the Cities and ports of Spain, Naples, and the reſt of Italy. But in old times it was the manner to carry into the field, upon extremity, as many as were needfull, of all that could bear arms, giving them little wages, or other allowance: in our dayes it is not ſo; neither indeed, is it often requiſite. Upon this overthrow, Dionyſius poſts away to Syracuſe, to ſtrengthen it: Hamilco follows him, and beſiegeth the Town by Land and Sea. But the Tyrant, having received aid from the Lacedæmonians, under the conduct of Pharacidas, puts himſelf to Sea, to make proviſion for his Citizens, who, in his abſence, take twenty of the Carthaginian Gallies, and ſink four. Hereupon, finding their own ſucceſs proſperous, ſperous, and that of the Tyrant exceeding ill, having alſo at the preſent weapons in their hands, they conſult how to recover their liberty. And this they had done, had not Pharicidas the Lacedæmonian reſiſted them. It alſo fell out to his exceeding advantage, that the plague was ſo increaſed, and ſo violent among the Carthaginians, as it is ſaid, that above an hundred thouſand of them died thereof. He therefore, with the power that he could gather together, ſets upon them both by Sea and Land; and having ſlain great numbers of them, forceth Himilco to deſire peace. This peace Dionyſius ſold him for ſo great ſumm of money; on condition, that he ſhould ſteal away with his Carthaginians only: which he baſely accepted, betraying the reſt of the Africans and Spaniards. Yet no faith was kept with him: for he was purſued, and left many of his Carthaginians behind him. The reſt of the Africans fell under the ſwords of their enemies; only the Spaniards, after they had a while bravely defended themſelves, were (after their ſubmiſſion) entertained, and ſerved the Conquerour.

May ſuch examples of perfidious dealing I have noted in other places, and can hardly forbear to deliver unto memory the like practices, when they meet with their matches: That which hapned unto Monſieur de Piles, was very ſutable to this treachery, wherewith Dionyſius purſued Himilco, I was preſent when De Piles related the injury done unto him. He had rendred S. John d' Angelie to the French King Charles IX. who beſieged him therein. He rendred it, upon promiſe made by the faith of a King, that he ſhould be ſuffered to depart in ſafety, with all his followers. Yet in preſence of the King himſelf, of the Duke of Anjou his Brother, General of his Army, of the Queen Mother, and of divers Dukes and Marſhals of France, he was ſet upon and broken in his March; ſpoiled of all that he had, and forced to ſave his life by flight; leaving the moſt of his Souldiers dead upon the place; the Kings hand and faith warranting him to march away with enſigns diſplaid and withall his goods and proviſions, no whit availing him. It needs not therefore ſeem ſtrange, that an Heathen Tyrant ſhould thus break his faith, ſince Kings, profeſſing Chriſtianity, are bold to do the like, or command their Captains to do it for them.

Dionyſius after this great victory, took care to re-edifie Meſſena. Mago who ſtayed in Sicil, to hold up the Carthaginians therein, is again beaten by Dionyſius; who is alſo beaten by the Tauromenians. A new ſupply of fourſcore thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to Mago, but theſe take eggs for their money, and make peace with Dionyſius, leaving the Sicilians in Tauromenium, to ſhift for themſelves: whom Dionyſius, after a long ſiege, overcame, and gave their City to the mercenary Souldiers.

He then paſt into Italy, obtained divers victories there, brought the Rhegians on their knees, forced them to pay him one hundred and fourſcore thouſand crowns, to furniſh him with threeſcore Gallies, and put in an hundred pledges, for aſſurance of their future obſervance of covenants. This he did, not with any purpoſe to perform unto them the peace that they had ſo dearly bought; but that having taken from them their Galleys, he might beſiege them, and ruine them utterly, with the more eaſe. Now to the end he might not, without ſome colour, falſifie the faith that he had given to them; he pretended to want victual for his Army, at ſuch time as he ſeemed ready to depart out of Italy, and ſent to them to furniſh him therewith, promiſing to return them the like quantity at his coming home to Syracuſe.

His reſolution was, that if they refuſed to furniſh him, he would then make their refuſal the cauſe of his quarrel: if they yielded to aid him with the proportion which he deſired, that then they ſhould not be able, for want of food, to endure a ſiege any long time againſt him. For, to ruine them he had fully determined, at what price ſoever. And great reaſon he had to take revenge of them, if he had done it fairly, and without breach of faith. For when in the beginning of his reign, he deſired them to beſtow a daughter of ſome of their Nobility upon him for a wife; they anſwered, that they had not any one fit for him, ſave the Hangmans daughter. Princes do rather pardon ill deeds, than villanous words. Alexander the great forgave many ſharp ſwords, but never any ſharp tongues; no, though they told him but truly of his errors. And certainly, it belongs to thoſe that have warrant from God, to reprehend Princes; and to none elſe, eſpecially in publick.

It is ſaid, that Henry the fourth of France, had his heart more inflamed againſt the Duke of Biron, for his over-bold and biting taunts, that he uſed againſt him before Amiens, than for his conſpiracy with the Spaniard or Savoyan: for he had pardoned 10000. of ſuch as had gone farther, & drawn their ſwords againſt him. The contemptuous tuous words that Sir John Parret uſed of our late Queen Elizabeth, were his ruine; and not the counterfeit letter of the Romiſh Prieſt produced againſt him. So fared it with ſome other, greater than he, that thereby ran the ſame, and a worſe fortune, ſoon after.

To be ſhort, he made them know new bread from old. He aſſaulted their Town on all ſides, which he continued to do eleven moneths, till he won it by force. He uſed his victory without mercy, ſpecially againſt Phyton, who had commanded within it.

Some other wars he made with the Carthaginians, after the taking and razing of this City; and thoſe with variable ſucceſs. For, as in one encounter he ſlue Mago, with ten thouſand Africans: ſo the ſon of Mago beat him, and ſlew his brother Leptines, with fourteen thouſand of his Souldiers. After which he bought his peace of the Carthaginians, as they had formerly done of him; following therein the advice of Proſperity and Adverſity, as all Kings and States do.

When he had reigned eight and thirty years, he died: ſome ſay in his bed, peaceably, which is the moſt likely, though others report it otherwiſe. A cruel man he was, and a faithleſs; a great Poet, but a fooliſh one. He entertained Plato a while, but afterward, for ſpeaking againſt his tyranny, he gave order to have him ſlain, or ſold for a ſlave. For he could endure no man that flattered him not beyond meaſure. His Paraſites therefore ſtiled his cruelty, The hate of evil men; and his lawleſs ſlaughters, The ornaments and effects of his juſtice. True it is, that flatterers are a kind of vermine, which poiſon all the Princes of the World; and yet they proſper better than the worthieſt and valianteſt men do: and I wonder not at it, for it is a world: and as our Saviour Chriſt hath told us, The World will love her own.

To this Dionyſius his ſon of the ſame name ſucceeded, and inherited both his Kingdom and his Vices. To win the love of the People, he pardoned, and releaſed out of priſon, a great number of perſons, by his Father lockt up and condemned. Withall, he remitted unto his Citizens divers payments, by his Father impoſed upon them. Which done, and thereby hoping that he had faſtned unto himſelf the peoples affections; he caſt off the ſheeps skin, and put on that of the wolf. For being jealous of his own Brethren, as men of more vertue than himſelf, he cauſed them all to be ſlain; and all the kindred that they had by their Mothers ſide. For Dionyſius his Father (as hath been ſaid) had two Wives; Doris of Locris, and Ariſtomache a Syracuſian, the ſiſter of Dion, which Brother-in-law of his he greatly enriched.

By Doris he had this Dionyſius, who ſucceeded unto him: and by Ariſtomache he had two ſons and two Daughters of which the elder, called Sophroſyne, he gave in marriage to his eldeſt ſon, and her half-brother Dionyſius; the younger, called Areta, he beſtowed on his Brother Theorides: after whoſe death Dion took her to wife, being his Neece.

This Dion a juſt and valiant man, finding that Dionyſius had abandoned all exerciſe of vertue, and that he was wholly given over to ſenſuality, prevailed ſo much with Plato, whoſe Diſciple he had been, as he drew him into Sicil, to inſtruct the young King. And having perſwaded the King to entertain him, he wrought ſo well with him, as Dionyſius began to change condition; to change Tyranny into Monarchy: and to hold the Principality that he had, rather by the love of his people, and his National Laws, than by the violence of his Guards and Gariſons, But this goodneſs of his laſted not long. For Philiſtus the Hiſtorian, and other his Paraſites, that hated Dions ſeverity, wrought him out of the Tyrants favour, and cauſed him ſoon after to be baniſhed out of Sicil, to the great grief of the whole Nation. For whereas Dion had made offer to the King, either to compound the quarrels between him and the Carthaginians, of whom Dionyſius ſtood in great fear; or (at leaſt) if they refuſed it, to furniſh him with fifty Gallies at his own charge, during the war againſt them: his enemies found means, by ſiniſter interpretation, to convert his good will into matter of Treaſon. They told Dionyſius, that all the great commendations, given of Plato, had tended to none other end, than to ſoften his mind, and to make him neglect his own affairs, by the ſtudy of Philoſophy; whileſt Dion in the mean time having furniſhed fifty Gallies under colour of the Kings ſervice, had it in his own power either to deliver to the Syracuſians their former liberty, or to make himſelf Lord and Soveraign of their State.

It is likely, that the honeſt and liberal offer which he made, to ſerve the King with ſo great a preparation, at his own charge, begot him many enemies. For they that had ſerved the King for none other end than to raiſe and enrich themſelves, and had already been raiſed & enriched, thought themſelves bound to make the ſame offer that Dion had made, if the King had had the grace to conceive it aright. But the covetous and ignorant cowards, that had neither the knowledge, nor the daring that Dion had, were bold to stile his Love and Liberality, Pride and Presumption; and heartned the young King in his oppressing, and eating up his own people, of whose spoils they themselves shared no small portion. I have heard it, That when Charls the fifth had the repulse at Algier, in Africa, Ferdinando Cortese, one of the bravest men that ever Spain brought forth, offered unto the Emperour, to continue the siege at his own charge. But he had never good day after it. For they that envied his victories, and his conquest of Mexico in the West-Indies, perswaded the Emperour, that Cortese sought to value himself above him; and to have it said, that what the Emperour could not, Cortese had effected, and was therefore more worthy of the Empire, than he that had it.

When Dion was newly banished, the Tyrant was contented at first to send him the revenues of his Lands, and permit him to dispose of his moveables at his own pleasure: not without giving hope to recall him in short time. Had he continued in this good mood, like enough it is, that Dion would have been well pleased to live well, as he did, at Athens. But after some time, Dionysius made Port-sale of this Noble-mans goods, and thereby urged him to take another course, even to seek the restitution of his Country to liberty. The vertues of Dion, especially his great Liberality, had purchased much Love in Greece. This Love made him suspected and hated of the Tyrant: but it stood him in good stead, when he sought to raise men, with whose help he might return into Sicil. Yet he got not above eight hundred (for he carried the matter closely) to follow him in his adventure. But many of them were men of quality, and fit to be Leaders. Neither did he doubt of finding in Syracuse, as many as should be needfull, that would readily assist him. Therefore he landed boldly in Sicil, marched to Syracuse, entred the City without resistance, armed the multitude, and won all, save the Citadel.

Dionysius was then absent in Italy but he quickly had advertisement of his dangerous accident. Wherefore he returned hastily to Syracuse: whence, after many vain treaties of Peace, and some forcible attempts to recover the Town, he was fain to depart; leaving yet a Castle to the Custody of Apollocrates his eldest Son. Yet ere he went, his Minion Philistus, coming with a strength of men to assist him, was beaten, taken, and put to death by torment. But Dion, for the recovery of his Countries liberty, had the same reward that all worthy men have had from popular Estates. He was disgraced, assaulted, and forced to abandon the City. He retired himself to the Leontines, who received him with great joy. Soon after his departure from Syracuse, new troops enter the Castle: they sally out, assail, spoil, and burn a great part of the City. Dion is sent for, with humble request: yet, ere he could arrive, Dionysius his Souldiers were retired; and the Towns-men thinking themselves secure, shut the gates against Dion. But the next night they of the Castle sally out again, with greater fury than ever; they kill Man, Woman, and Child, and set fire in all parts of the Town. In this their extremity Dion comes the second time to their succour; the love of his Country surmounting all the injuries that he had received. He sets upon the Garrison of the Castle, with the one part of his Army; and quencheth the fire every where kindled, with the other part. In conclusion, after he had conquered both the fire and the sword, that had well near burnt to ashes, and depopulated Syracuse, he recovered the Castle, with the munition and furniture thereof, and sent Apollocrates after Dionysius his Father into Italy. But their malice, of whom he had best deserved, and whom he had loved most, gave an untimely end to his dayes. For he was soon after his victory, murdered by Gylippus; who after he had with ill success, awhile governed Syracuse, was slain with the same Dagger, with which he had murdered Dion.

Ten years after the death of Dion, Dionysius, with the assistance of his friends in Italy, recovers his estate; and returns to Syracuse, driving Nysæus thence, whom he found Governour therein. The better sort of the Citizens, fearing more than ever, his cruelty, flee to Icetes, a Syracusian born, and then ruling the Leontines. Icetes enters into confederacy with the Carthaginians, hoping by their assistance, not only to prevail against Dionysius; but by the hatred of the Syracusians towards Dionysius, to make him also Lord of their City. The Syracusians, being deservedly afflicted on all sides, send to the Corinthians for succour. Icetes also sends thither, and disswades the Corinthians, as well as he can, from intermedling in the business. He tells them, by his Messengers, That he had entred into league with the Carthaginians, who were so strong by Sea, that it was not in the power of Corinth, to land an Army in Sicil. But the Corinthians, being by this treason of Icetes, more inraged than than diſſwaded, ſent Timoleon with nineteen Gallies, to deliver Syracuſe from tyranny. In the mean while, Icetes had entred Syracuſe, and with the help of the Carthaginians, driven Dionyſius into the Caſtle, where he beſieged him.

Icetes, being himſelf a Tyrant in Leontium, rather ſought how to enlarge his power, than how to deliver his Country. Therefore, hearing that Timoleon was arrived at Rhegium, he ſent to perſwade him, to return his Fleet; for that all things were (in effect) eſtabliſhed in Sicil. The Carthaginian Gallies were alſo in the ſame Port of Rhegium, whoſe Captains adviſed Timoleon to get him gone in peace. They had far more Gallies there than he had, and were like to compel him, if he would not be perſwaded. Timoleon, finding himſelf over-maſtered, makes requeſt to the Carthaginian Captains, that they would be pleaſed to enter into Rhegium, and there, in an open aſſembly of the people, to deliver unto him thoſe arguments for his return, which they had uſed to him in private; that he might, by publick teſtimony, diſcharge himſelf to the Senate of Corinth.

The Carthaginians, perſwading themſelves, that a victory obtained by a few fair words, was without loſs, and far more eaſie, than that of many blows, and wounds, yielded to Timoleons deſire. But while the Orations were delivering, Timoleon, favoured by the Rhegians, ſtole out of the preaſe; and having ſet ſail, before the Gates were opened to the Carthaginians, he recovered the Port of Tauromenium, where he was joyfully received by Andromachus the Governour. From thence he marched toward Adranum, where ſurpriſing Icetes his Army, he ſlew a part thereof, and put the reſt to run. It is the nature of victory to beget friends. The Adranitans joyned with him, and ſo did Mamercus, the Tyrant of Catana. Dionyſius alſo ſent to Timoleon, offering to ſurrender the Caſtle of Syracuſe into his hands, as thinking it better to yield up himſelf, and the places which he could not defend, unto the Corinthians, than either to Icetes, whom he diſdained, or to the Carthaginians, whom he hated. Now Timoleon, who, within fifty dayes after his arrival, had recovered the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and ſent Dionyſius to Corinth, to live there a private man, was ſtill invaded by the Armies, and moleſted by the practices of Icetes. For he beſieged the Corinthians within the Caſtle of Syracuſe, and attempted (but in vain) the murder of Timoleon.

The Corinthians ſend unto Timoleon a ſupply of two thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, which are ſtayed in Italy by foul weather. Icetes is ſtrengthened with threeſcore thouſand Africans, brought unto him by Mago (all which he lodgeth within Syracuſe) and with an hundred and fifty Gallies, to keep the Port. This was the firſt time that ever the Carthaginians had dominion within the walls of that City. With this great Army Icetes aſſaileth the Caſtle Timoleon ſends them victuals, and ſuccour, in ſmall boats, by night, from Catana. Mago and Icetes do therefore reſolve to beſiege Catana; but they were no ſooner on their way towards it, with part of their forces, than Leon, Captain of the Corinthians, ſallied out of the Caſtle, and took that part of Syracuſe, called Acradina, which he fortified.

In the mean while, the two thouſand Corinthians arrive: with whom, and two thouſand other Souldiers, Timoleon marched toward Syracuſe. Mago abandoneth Icetes being frighted out of Sicil (which he might eaſily have conquered) with an idle rumour of treaſon. This made him return to Carthage; where the general exclamation againſt his cowardize, did ſo much affright him, that for fear of further puniſhment he hanged himſelf. Timoleon enters the City, and beats down the Caſtle (which he called The Neſt of Tyrants) to the ground. But he found the City, when the ſtrangers were fled, in effect deſolate; ſo as their horſes did feed on the graſs growing in the Market-place. Therefore he writes to Corinth for people to reinhabit it. Ten thouſand are ſent out of Greece, many come from Italy; others from other parts of the Iſland.

But a new ſtorm ariſeth. Aſdrubal and Amilcar, Carthaginians, arrive about Lilibæum, with threeſcore and ten thouſand Souldiers, tranſported (with all their proviſions) in a thouſand ſhips of burden, and two hundred Gallies. Timoleon marcheth thither, and chargeth this great Army upon the paſſage of a River.

A tempeſt of rain, hail, and lightning, with boyſterous winds, beating upon the faces of the Carthaginians, they are utterly broken, ten thouſand ſlain, five thouſand taken, with all their carriages and proviſions: among which there were found a thouſand Corſlets guilt and graven. After this, Timoleon gave an overthrow to Icetes, and following his victory, took him, with his Son Eupolemus, and the General of his horſe, priſoners; whom he cauſed all to be ſlain: and afterwards (which was imputed to him for great cruelty) he ſuffered Icetes his wives and daughters to be put to death. But this was the revenge of God upon Icetes, who (after the murder of Dion) had caused Arete, Dions wife, and a young child of his, with Arisiomache his Sister, to be cast into the Sea.

He again prevailed against Mamercus Tyrant of Catana, and won Catana it self. Mamercus fled to Hippon Tyrant of Messena: but Timoleon, pursued him, won the Town; delivering Hippon to his Citizens, who tormented him to death. The same end had Mamercus, and all other the Tyrants in Sicil.

Finally, he made peace with the Carthaginians, on condition that they should not pass the River of Lycus. After this, he lived in great honour among the Syracusians, till his death; and was solemnly buried by them in the Market-place of their City: the day of his Funerals being for ever ordained to be kept holy among them.

After such time as Timoleon had delivered Syracuse from the tyranny of Dionysius, and brought peace to the whole Island; the Inhabitants injoyed their liberty in peace, about twenty years. The Cities and temples were repaired; the Trade renewed; the Merchant sailed in safty; and the Labouring man injoyed the fruits of the earth in quiet. But it was impossible that a Nation which neither knew how to govern, nor how to obey; which could neither endure Kings, nor men worthy to be Kings, to govern them; should any long time subsist.

Twenty years after the death of Timoleon, there started up one Agathocles among them, a man of base birth, and of baser condition: who from a Begger, to a common Souldier; from a Souldier to a Captain; and so from degree to degree, rising to be a Prætor: finally, became Lord and Soveraign of the Syracusians. Many fortunes he ran, and under-went as many dangers, ere he obtained the principality. For he had more than once attempted it, and was therein both beaten and banisht. A passing valiant man he was, and did notable service, as well for those by whom he was imployed, as also for the Syracusians, and against them. For in their Wars against those of Enna, and the Campanes, he did them memorable service: and on the contrary, as memorable service for the Murgantines against the Syracusians. For being entertained by the people of Murgantia, and made General of their forces, he sackt Leontium; and besieged Syracuse so straightly, that the Citizens were driven to crave aid, even from their antient and natural enemies, the Carthaginians. Amilcar was sent by the Carthaginians to relieve Syracuse. With him Agathocles wrought so well, that he got him to make peace between himself and the Syracusians; binding himself by promise and oath to remain a friend and servant to the State of Carthage, for ever after. Amilcar entertained the business, and compounded the quarrels between Agathocles and the Syracusians. Agathocles is chosen Prætor; he entertains five thousand Africans, and divers old Souldiers of the Murgantines, under colour of a purpose to besiege Herbita. With these, and with the assistance of the poor and discontented Syracusians (the City also being divided into many factions) he assails the Senators, kills all his enemies and opposites; divides the spoil of the rich among the poor; and gives liberty to his Souldiers, to rob, to ravish, and to murder, for two whole daies and nights, without controlement: the third day, when they had blunted their barbarous appetites, and strewed the streets with ten thousand dead carkasses, besides those that had broken their necks over the walls; their fury had no further subject to work on.

Agathocles, in an assembly of the people (being an eloquent knave) perswaded them, that, for the violent sickness, by which the Common-wealth was utterly consumed, he found no better than the violent remedies which he had administred: and that he affected no other thing than the reducing of the state from an Oligarchy, or the rule of a few tyrannous Magistrates, to the ancient and indifferent Democraty, by which it had been governed, from the first institution, with so great glory and posterity. This he did, to have the Crown clapt on his head (as it were) perforce. For, as he knew that he had left none living, within the City, fit or able to exercise the office of a Magistrate: so knew he right well, that all they which had assisted in the murder and spoil of their fellow-Citizens, had no other hope of defence, than the support of a lawless Lord, who had been partaker with them in their villanies and cruelties committed. So as this rable, his Oration ended, proclaimed him King: again and again saluting and adoring him, by that name, as if he had been given to him by some lawfull election. Hence had our King Richard the third a piece of his pattern; but the one was of base, the other of Kingly Parents; the one took liberty from a Common-weal, the other sought only to succeed in a Monarchy; the one continued his cruelty to the end, the other, after he had obtained he Crown, sought, by making good Laws tto recover the love of his people.

The life of this Tyrant is briefly written by

by Juſtine; more largely and particularly by Diodorus Siculus: the ſumm whereof is this. The ſame Amilcar that had brought him into Syracuſe, and that had lent him five thouſand men to help in the Maſſacre of the Citizens, was alſo content to wink at many wrongs that he did unto the confederates of the Carthaginians. It was the purpoſe of Amilcar, to ſettle Agathocles in his tyranny, and to let him vex and waſte the whole Iſland; becauſe it was thereby like to come to paſs, that he ſhould reduce all Sicil into ſuch terms as would make it become an eaſie prey to Carthage. But when the Cities, confederate with the Carthaginians, ſent their Embaſſadours, with complaint of this ill dealing, to Carthage; the Punick faith (ſo much taunted by the Romans, as no better than meer falſhood) ſhewed it ſelf very honourable in taking order for the redreſs. Embaſſadours were ſent to comfort the Sicilians, and to put Agathocles in mind of his Covenants; Amilcar was recalled home into Africk, and a new Captain appointed to ſucceed in his charge, with ſuch forces, as might compel Agathocles to reaſon, if otherwiſe he would not hearken to it. All this tended to ſave their Confederates, from ſuffering ſuch injuries in the future. For that which was paſt (ſince it could not be recalled) they took order to have it ſeverely puniſhed. Amilcar was accuſed ſecretly, and by way of ſcrutiny: the ſuffrages being given, but not calculated; and ſo reſerved until he ſhould return. This was not ſo cloſely handled, but that Amilcar had ſoon notice of it. In managing his buſineſs with Agathocles, it is likely that he had an eye to his own profit, as well as to the publick benefit of his Country. For he had made ſuch a compoſition with the Syracuſian, as gave him not only means to weaken others, but to ſtrengthen himſelf, both in power and authority, even againſt the Carthaginians. Such is commonly the cuſtom of thoſe, that hope to work their own ends by cunning practices, thinking to deal ſubtlely and finely, they ſpin their threads ſo ſmall, that they are broken with the very wind. Amilcar ſaw, that his Carthaginians had a purpoſe to deal ſubſtantially; and that therefore it would be hard for him, to make them follow his crooked devices: which if he could not do, it was to be expected, that their anger would break out into ſo much the greater extremity, by how much the more they had concealed it. Therefore he followed the example, which ſome of his fore-goers had taught him; and, for fear of ſuch a death as the Judges might award him, he ended his own life in what ſort he thought beſt. This deſperation of Amilcar ſerved to inform Agathocles of the Carthaginians intent. He ſaw they would not be deluded with words, and therefore reſolved to get the ſtart of them in action. He diſſembled no longer; but, inſtead of ſpoil and robbery, made open War upon all their Adherents. He had made the better part of Sicil his own, ere the Carthaginian Forces arrived: which thinking to have incountred an ill-eſtabliſhed Tyrant, found him ready, as a King, to defend his own, and give them ſharp entertainment. They were beaten by him; and their Navy was ſo Tempeſt-beaten, that they could neither do good by Land, nor Sea, but were glad to leave their buſineſs undone, and return into Africk.

The Carthaginians prepare a new Fleet: which being very gallantly manned and furniſhed was broken, by foul weather, and the beſt part of it caſt away, even whilſt it was yet within kenning of their City. But Amilcar, the Son of Giſco, gathering together the remainders of his ſhipwrack, was bold to paſs over into Sicil, and landed not far from Gela; where Agathocles was ſoon ready to examine the cauſe of their coming. Many ſkirmiſhes paſſed between them, in which (commonly) the Syracuſian had the better. But his good ſucceſs begat preſumption; whereby he loſt a battel more important than all the other fights. One adverſe chance is enough to overthrow the ſtate of a Tyrant, if it be not upheld by great circumſpection. The War was ſoon transferred to the walls of Syracuſe; within which Agathocles was cloſed up, and driven to make his laſt defence by their help, who may be judged to have loved him not very greatly. But the Inhabitants of Syracuſe, after that great Maſſacre of the principal men, made in the beginning of this new Tyranny, were (for the moſt part) ſuch, as had been either mercenary Souldiers, infranchiſed ſlaves, or baſe and needy people; helpers in eſtabliſhing the preſent Government, and Executioners of the murders, and ſpoil committed in that change. If there were any other (as ſome there were) they were ſo well obſerved, and (withall) ſo fearful, that they durſt not ſtir. But it was enough that they all agreed in the common defence of themſelves and their City; Famine was likely to grow upon them, and inforce them to change their reſolution. In this neceſſity Agathocles adventured upon a ſtrange courſe, which the event commended as wiſe. He imbarqued as many as he thought meet, in thoſe veſſe' that rode in the Haven; and committing the Government of the City to his Brother Antander, willed the people to be of good courage, for that (as he told them) he had bethought himself of a mean, both to raise the siege, and to repair all other losses. A Carthaginian Fleet lay in the mouth of the Haven, both to hinder the entrance of victuallers, and to keep the besieged from issuing forth.

Now, at such time as Agathocles was ready to depart, advertisment came, that many ships of burden, laden with Corn, and other provisions, were drawing near unto Syracuse. To intercept these the Carthaginians hoise sail, and lanch forth into the deep. They were not far gone, when they might behold Agathocles issuing forth of the Port, with purpose (as they thought) to give convoy unto his victuallers. Hereupon they wheel about, and make amain toward him, as thinking him the better booty. He neither abode their coming, nor fled back into the City, but made all speed towards Africk; and was pursued by the Carthaginians, as long as the day would give them light. In the mean season the victuallers were gotten to Syracuse; which was the more plentifully relieved by their coming, for that Agathocles had unburdened the place of no small number. When the Carthaginian Admiral perceived, first, that by pursuing two Fleets at once, he had missed of them both: and secondly, that Agathocles returned not again, but was gone to seek his fortune elsewhere, he thought it good to pursue those that were fled, and to attend so well upon them, that they should not have leisure to do mischief in some other part.

The Carthaginian Navy followed Agathocles (whether by chance, or by relation of such as had met with him at Sea) directly towards Africk, and overtook him after six dayes. He had (at the first) a great start of them; so that (belike) they rowed hard, and wearied themselves in seeking their own misfortune: for he fought with them, and beat them; and, having sunk or taken many, drave the rest to flye which way they could, laden with such strange tydings of his voyage.

When Agathocles had landed his men in Africk, then did he discover unto them his project, letting them understand, that there was no better way to divert the Carthaginians, not only from Syracuse, but from all the Isle of Sicil, than by bringing the war to their own doors. For here (said he) they have many that hate them, and that will readily take Arms against them, as soon as they perceive that there is an Army on foot, which dares to look upon their walls. Their Towns are ill fortified, their people untrained, and experienced in dangers; the mercenary forces that they levy in these parts, will rather follow us than them, if we offer greater wages than they can give: which we may better promise and make good, by letting them have some share with us in all the wealth of the Carthaginians, than our enemies can do, by making some addition to their stipends. Thus he talked, as one already Master of all the riches in Africk; and with many brave words encouraged his men so well, that they were contented to set fire on all their ships (reserving one or two to use as Messengers) to the end that no hope should remain, save only in victory. In this heat of resolution, they win by force two Cities; which after they had throughly sacked, they burnt to the ground: as a mark of terrour to all that should make resistance. The Carthaginians hearing this, are amazed; thinking that Amilcar is broken, and his whole Army destroyed in Sicil. This impression so dismayes them, that when they know the truth of all, by such as had scaped in the late Sea-fight, yet still they fear, and know not what. They suspect Amilcars faith, who had suffered Agathocles to land in Africk: they suspected their principal Citizens at home, of a meaning to betray Carthage unto the enemy; they raise a great Army, and know not to whose charge they may safely commit it.

There were at that time two famous Captains in the City, Hanno and Bomilcar, great enemies. And therefore the more unlikely to conspire against the Common-wealth. These are made Generals of the Army levied, which far exceeded the forces of Agathocles. But it seldom happens, that dissention between Commanders produceth any fortunate event. Necessity drave Agathocles to fight: and the courage of his men, resolved to deal with the whole multitude of the Carthaginians, made easie the victory against the one half of them. For Bomilcar would not stir, but suffered Hanno to be cut in pieces.

The reputation of this great victory, brought over a King of the Africans, from the Carthaginian society, to take part with Agathocles: who pursuing his victory, winneth many Towns, and sends word to Syracuse of his good success. The Carthaginians also send unto Sicil, willing Amilcar, their General, to succour the State of Africk, which was in danger to be lost, whilst he was travelling in the Conquest of Sicil. Amilcar sends them five thousand men: all his forces he thought it not needful to tranſport; as hoping rather to draw Agathocles back into Sicil, than to be drawn home by one, that could ſcarce retain his own Kingdom. But theſe good hopes had a bad iſſue. He ſpent ſome time in winning a few Towns that adhered unto the Syracuſians: and having brought his matters to ſome good order, he conceived a ſudden hope of taking Syracuſe by ſurpriſe. It was a pretty (though tragical) Accident, if it were true, as Tully relates it. Amilcar had a dream which told him that he ſhould ſup the next day within Syracuſe. His fancy begot this dream, and he verily believed it. He made more haſt than good ſpeed toward the City: and coming upon it on the ſudden, had good hope to carry it. But his enemies were prepared for him, and had laid an ambuſh to entrap him, whereinto he fell. So he was carried priſoner into the City; in which it was likely that he had no great chear to his ſupper: for they ſtruck of his head, and ſent it into Africk (a welcome preſent) to Agathocles.

This good ſucceſs of things at home, did put ſuch courage into the Sicilian Army, that Agathocles was bold to wear a Crown, and ſtile himſelf King of Africk. He had allured Ophellas, King of the Cyrenians, to take his part, by promiſes to deliver the Country into his hands: for that (as is ſaid) it was ſufficient unto himſelf to have diverted the Carthaginians from Sicil, wherein (after this war ended) he might reign quietly. Ophellas came with a great Army, and was friendly entertained. But the traiterous Silician, taking an advantage, did murther this his aſſiſtant; and afterwards by good words, and great promiſes, drew all the Cyrenean Army to follow him in his Wars. Thus his villany found good ſucceſs; and he ſo prevailed in Africk, that he got leiſure to make a ſtep into Sicil. Many Towns in Sicil had embraced a deſire of recovering their liberty; thinking it high time to fight at length for their own freedom, after that they had ſo long been expoſed, (as a reward of victory) either unto Aliens, or to Tyrants of their own Country. Theſe had prevailed far, and gotten many to take their parts, as in a common cauſe: when the coming of Agathocles abated their high ſpirits, and his good ſucceſs in many fights, compelled them to Obedience. Out of Sicil he returned into Africk, where his affairs ſtood in very bad terms. Archagathus, his ſon had loſt a battel; and (which was worſe) had ill means to help himſelf: his Army being in mutiny for lack of pay. But Agathocles pacified the tumult, by the accuſtomed promiſes of great booty and ſpoil. It had now been time for him to offer peace to the Carthaginians: which to obtain, they would (queſtionleſs) have given to him both mony enough to pay his Army, and all that they then held in Sicil. For their City had been diſtreſſed, not only by this his war, but by the treaſon of Bomilcar, who failed not much of making himſelf Tyrant over them. But ambition is blind. Agathocles had all his thoughts fixed upon the conqueſt of Carthage it ſelf: out of which dream he was awakened, by the loſs of a battel, not ſo memorable in regard of any accident therein, as of the ſtrange events following it. The Carthaginians, after their great misfortunes in this war, had renewed their old ſacrifices of children to Saturn: from which they had abſtained ever ſince they made peace with Gelon. And now they made choice of ſome, the goodlieſt of their priſoners taken in the battel, to offer unto the ſaid Idol, in way of thankfulneſs to their victory. The fire, with which theſe unhappy men were conſumed, caught hold upon the lodgings neareſt unto the Altar, and ſpreading it ſelf farther through the Camp, with the deſtruction of many men, cauſed ſuch a tumult as is uſual in the like caſes. At the ſame time, the like accident of fire burnt up the Pavilion of Agathocles. Hereupon both the Armies fled away, each of them believing, that the noiſe in the adverſe Camp, was a ſign of the enemies coming to invade it. But the Carthaginians had a ſafe retrait: Agathocles, by a ſecond error, fell into a new calamity. In the beginning of this his flight in the dark, he met with his own African Souldiers; and thinking them to be enemies, (as indeed the one half of them had revolted from him, to the Carthaginians, in the laſt battel) he began to aſſail them, and was ſo ſtoutly reſiſted, that he loſt in this blind fight above four thouſand of his men. This did ſo diſcourage his proud heart, that, being fallen from the near hope of taking the City of Carthage, unto ſome diſtruſt of his own ſafety, he knew no more how to moderate his preſent weak fears, than lately he had known how to govern his ambition. Therefore he took the way that came next into his head; which was to ſteal cloſely aboard his ſhips, with his younger ſon (the elder he ſuſpected of Inceſt, and of Ambition) and ſo to flye into Sicil; thinking it the beſt courſe to ſhift for himſelf, as wanting veſſels wherein to tranſport his Army. His elder ſon Archagathus, perceiving his drift, arreſted him and put him under cuſtody:

but by means of a ſudden tumult, he was let looſe, eſcaped,, and fled alone, leaving both his ſons behind him. His flight being noyſed through the Army, all was in an uproar; and extremity of rage cauſed not only the common Souldier, but even ſuch as had been friends to the Tyrant, to lay hold upon his two ſons, and kill them. That this flight of Agathocles was extreemly baſe, I need not uſe words to prove: That his fear was truly, as all fear is ſaid to be, a paſſion, depriving him of the ſuccours which reaſon offered, the ſequel doth manifeſt. His forſaken Souldiers, being now a headleſs company, and no longer an Army to be feared, obtained nevertheleſs a reaſonable compoſition from the Carthaginians: to whom they ſold thoſe places, whereof they had poſſeſſion, for nineteen talents. Likewiſe, Agathocles himſelf, having loſt his Army, did nevertheleſs, by the reputation of this late war, make peace with Carthage upon equal terms.

After this, the Tyrant being delivered from forain enemies, diſcovered his bloody nature, in moſt abominable cruelties, among the Sicilians. His wants and his fears, urged him ſo violently, that he was not ſatisfied with the ſpols of the rich, or the death of thoſe whom he held ſuſpected: but in a beaſtly rage depopulated whole Cities. He deviſed new engines of torment; wherein ſtriving to exceed the Bull of Phalaris, he made a frame of braſs, that ſhould ſerve to ſcorch mens bodies, and withall give him leave to behold them in their miſery. So deviliſh is the nature of man, when reaſon, that ſhould be his guide, is become a ſlave to his bruitiſh affections. In theſe miſchiefs he was ſo outragious, that he neither ſpared Sex, nor Age; eſpecially, when he was informed of the ſlaughter of his children in Aſrick. But this was not the way to preſerve his eſtate: it threw him into new dangers. They whom he had chaſed out of their Country took arms againſt him, and drave him into ſuch fears, that he was fain to ſeek that love at Carthage, which by ruling well he might have had in Sicil. He freely delivered into the Carthaginians hands, all thoſe Towns of the Phœnicians in Sicil, belonging unto them, which were in his poſſeſſion. They requited him honourably, with great ſtore of corn, and with four hundred talents of gold and ſilver. So (though not without much trouble and hazard) he prevailed againſt the Rebels, and ſetled his eſtate. Having no further buſineſs left in Sicil, he made a voyage into Italy. There he ſubdued the Brutians, rather by terrour of his name than by any force, for they yeilded at his firſt coming. This done, he went to the Iſle of Lipara, and made the Inhabitants buy peace with one hundred talents of gold. But when he had gotten this great ſumm, he would needs exact a greater; and finding plainly that they had no more left, he was bold to ſpoil the Temples of their gods. Herein (methinks) he did well enough. For how could he believe thoſe to be gods, that had continually given deaf ears to his horrible perjuries? Then he returned richly home, with eleven ſhips loaden with gold: all which, and all the reſt of the fleet, were caſt away by foul weather at Sea; one Gally excepted, in which he himſelf eſcaped, to ſuffer a more miſerable end. A grievous ſickneſs fell upon him, that rotted his whole body, ſpreading it ſelf through all his veins and ſinews. Whilſt he lay in this caſe, all deſiring his end, ſave only Theogenia (a wife that he had taken out of Egypt) and her ſmall children: his Nephew, the ſon of Archagathus, before mentioned, and a younger ſon of his own, began to contend about the Kingdom. Neither did they ſeek to end the controverſie by the old Tyrants deciſion; they regarded him not ſo much. But each of them laid wait for the others life: wherein the Nephew ſped ſo well, that he ſlew his Uncle, and got his Grandfathers Kingdom, without aſking any leave. Theſe tydings wounded the heart of Agathocles with fear and ſorrow. He ſaw himſelf without help, like to become a prey to his ungracious Nephew, from whom he knew that no favour was to be expected, either by himſelf, or by thoſe, whom only he now held dear, which were Theogenia and her children. Therefore he adviſed her and them to fly before they were ſurpiſed: for that otherwiſe they could by no means avoid, either death, or ſomewhat that would be worſe. He gave them all his treaſures and goods, wherewith he even compelled them (weeping to leave him deſolate in ſo wretched a caſe) to imbark themſelves haſtily, and make ſpeed into Egypt. After their departure, whether he threw himſelf into the fire, or whether his diſeaſe conſumed him, there was none left that cared to attend him, but he ended his life as baſely, as obſcury, and in as much want as he firſt began it.

After the death of Agathocles it was, that the Mamertines, his Souldiers, traiterouſly occupied Meſſana, and infeſted a great part of the Iſland. Then alſo did the Carthaginians begin to renew their attempts of conquering all Sicil. What the Nephew of Agathocles thocles did, I cannot find. Likely it is that he quickly periſhed. For the Sicilians were driven to ſend for Pyrrhus to help them, who had marryed with a daughter of Agathocles. But Pyrrhus was ſoon weary of the Country (as hath been ſhewed before) and therefore left it; prophecying that it would become a goodly champion field, wherein Rome and Carthage ſhould fight for ſuperiority. In which buſineſs, how theſe two great Cities did ſpeed, the order of our ſtory will declare.

§. V.

A recontinuation of the Roman War in Sicil. How Hieron, King of Syracuſe, forſook the Carthaginians, and made his peace with Rome.

WHen Appius Claudius, following the advantage of his victory gotten at Meſſana, brought the War unto the Gates of Syracuſe, and beſieged that great City; Hieron found it high time for him to ſeek peace: knowing that the Carthaginians had neither any reaſon to be offended with him, for helping himſelf by what means he could, when they were not in caſe to give him aſſiſtance; and foreſeeing withall, that when once he had purchaſed his quiet from the Romans, it would be free for him to ſit ſtill, without fear of moleſtation, whilſt Rome and Carthage were fighting for the maſtery. In this good mood the new Roman Conſuls, M. Valerius, and C. Octacilius found him, and readily embraced the offer of his friendſhip. Yet they made uſe of their preſent advantage, and ſold him peace for an hundred (ſome ſay two hundred) Talents.

Theſe Conſuls had brought a great Army into Sicil; yet did they nothing elſe in effect, than bring over Hiero to their ſide. If the Syracuſian held them buſied (which I find not, otherwiſe than by circumſtances, as, by the ſum of mony impoſed upon him, and by their performing none other piece of ſervice) all the whole time of their abode in the Iſland; then was his departure from the friendſhip of Carthage, no leſs to his honour than it was to his commodity. For by no reaſon could they require, that he ſhould ſuffer his own Kingdom to run into manifeſt peril of ſubverſion, for their ſakes that ſhould have received all the profit of the victory: ſeeing they did expoſe him to the whole danger without ſtraining themſelves to give him relief. But the Carthaginians had lately made good proof of the ſtrength of Syracuſe, in the dayes of Agathocles: and therefore knew, that it was able to bear a very ſtrong ſiege. And hereupon it is like that they were the more ſlack, in ſending help: if (perhaps) it were not ſome part of their deſire, that both Rome and Syracuſe ſhould weaken one the other, whereby their own work might be the eaſier againſt them both. Yet indeed, the caſe of the beſieged City was not the ſame, when the Romans lay before it, as it had been when the Carthaginians attempted it. For there was great reaſon to try the uttermoſt hazard of war againſt the Carthaginians, who ſought no other thing than to bring it into ſlavery: not ſo againſt the Romans, who thought it ſufficient if they could withdraw it from the party of their enemies. Beſides, it was not all one to be governed by Agathocles, or by Hiero. The former of theſe cared not what the Citizens endured, ſo long as he might preſerve his own tyranny: the latter, as a juſt and good Prince, had no greater deſire than to win the love of his people by ſeeking their commodity; but including his own felicity within the publick, laboured to uphold both, by honeſt and faithfull dealing. Hereby it came to paſs that he enjoyed a long and happy reign, living dear to his own Subjects, beloved of the Romans, and not greatly moleſted by the Carthaginians; whom, either the conſideration, That they had left him to himſelf, ere he left their ſociety, made unwilling to ſeek his ruine; or their more earneſt buſineſs with the Romans, made unable to compaſs it.

§. VI.

How the Romans beſiege and win Agrigentum. Their beginning to maintain a fleet. Their firſt loſs, and firſt victory by ſea. Of ſea-fight in general.

HIeron, having ſided himſelf with the Romans, aideth them with victuals and other neceſſaries: ſo that they, preſuming upon his aſſiſtance, recall ſome part of their forces. The Carthaginians find it high time to beſtir them; they ſend to the Ligurians, and to the troups they had in Spain, to come to their aid; who being arrived, they made the City of Agrigentum the ſeat of the War, againſt the Romans, filling it with all manner of munition.

The Roman Conſuls, having made peace with Hieron, return into Italy; and, in their places, Lucius Poſthumus and Quintus Mamilius arrive. They go on towards

* Agrigentum was a goodly City, built by the Geloi, under the conduct of Aitor and Pistus. The compass was ten miles about the walls; and it had sometimes in it eight hundred thousand Inhabitants. This City, by reason of the fertility of the soil, and the neighbour-hood of Carthage, grew in a short space from small beginnings, to great glory and riches. The plenty and luxury thereof was so great, as it caused Empedocles to say, that the Agrigentines built Palaces of such sumptuosity, as if they meant to live for ever; and made such feasts, as if they ment to dye the next day. But their greatest pomp and magnificence, was in their goodly Temples, and Theatres, Water-conduits, and Fish-ponds: the ruines whereof at this day are sufficient arguments, that Rome it self could never boast of the like. In the Porch of the Temple of Jupiter Olympius, (by which we may judge of the Temple it self) there was set out on one side the full proportion of the Giants, fighting with the gods, all cut out in polished marble of divers colours; a work the most magnificent and rare that ever hath been seen: on the other side, the war of Troy, and the encounters which hapned at that siege; with the personages of the Heroes that were doers in that war; all of the like beautiful stone, and of equal stature to the bodies of those men in ancient times: In comparison of which, the latter works of that kind, are but petty things, and meer trifles. It would require a volume to express the magnificence of the Temples of Hercules, Aesculapius, Concord, Juno Lucina, Chastitie, Proserpina, Castor and Pollux, wherein the Master-pieces of those exquisite Painters and Carvers Phidias, Zeuxis, Myron, and Polyclatus, were to be seen. But in process of time it ran the same fortune that all other great Cities have done, and was ruined by divers calamities of war: whereof this war present brought unto it not the least.

Agrigentum: and finding no enemy in the field, they besiege it, though it were stuffed with fifty thousand Souldiers. After a while, the time of harvest being come, a part of the Roman Army range the Country to gather corn, and those at the siege grow negligent; the Carthaginians sally furiously, and indanger the Roman Army, but are in the end repelled into the Town with great loss; but by the smart felt on both sides, the Assailants redoubled their guards, and the besieged kept within their covert. Yet the Romans, the better to assure themselves, cut a deep trench between the walls of the City and their Camp: and another on the outside thereof; that neither the Carthaginians might force them suddenly, by a sally; nor those of the Country without, break upon them unawares: which double Defence kept the besieged also from the receiving any relief of victuals, and munitions, whilst the Syracusian supplies the assailants with what they want. The besieged send for succour to Carthage, after they had been in this sort pent up five months. The Carthaginians imbark an Army, with certain Elephants, under the command of Hanno; who arrives with it at Heraclea, to the West of Agrigentum. Hanno put himself into the field, and surpriseth Erbesus, a City wherein the Romans had bestowed all their provision. By means hereof, the famine without grew to be as great, as it was within Agrigentum; and the Roman Camp no less straightly assieged by Hanno, than the City was by the Romans: insomuch, as if Hieron had not supplied them, they had been forced to abandon the siege. But seeing that this distress was not enough to make them rise, Hanno determined to give them battel. To which end departing from Heraclea, he makes approach unto the Roman Camp. The Romans resolve to sustain him, and put themselves in order. Hanno directs the Numidian horsemen to change the Vantguard, to the end to draw them further on; which done, he commands them to return as broken, till they came to the body of the Army, that lay shadowed behind some rising ground. The Numidians perform it accordingly; and while the Romans pursued the Numidians, Hanno gives upon them, and having slaughtered many, beats the rest into their Trenches.

After this encounter, the Carthaginians made no other attempt for two months, but lay strongly encamped, waiting untill some opportunity should invite them. But Annibal that was besieged in Agrigentum, as well by signs as messengers, made Hanno know how ill the extremity which he endured, was able to brook such dilatory courses. Hanno thereupon, a second time, provoked the Consuls to fight: But his Elephants being disordered by his own Vantguard, which was broken by the Romans, he lost the day: and with such as escaped, he recovered Heraclea. Annibal perceiving this, and remaining hopeless of succour, resolved to make his own way. Finding therefore that the Romans, after this dayes victory, wearied with labour, and secured by their good fortune, kept negligent watch in the night; he rusht out of the Town, with all the remainder of his Army, and past by the Roman camp without resistance. The Consuls pursue him in the morning, but in vain: sure they were, that he could not carry the City with him, which with little a-do the Romans entred, and pitifully spoiled. The Romans, proud of this victory, pursued rather to follow the direction of their present good fortunes, than their first determinations. They had resolved in the beginning of this War, only to succour the Mamertines, and to keep the Carthaginians from their own coasts: but now they determine to make themselves Lords of all Sicil; and from thence, being favoured with the wind of good success, to sail over into Africk. It is the disease of Kings, of States, and also of private men, to covet the greatest things, but not to enjoy the least; the desire of that which we neither have nor need, taking from us the true use and fruition of what we have already. This curse upon mortal men, was never taken from them since the beginning of the World unto this day.

To prosecute this War, Lucius Valerius and Titus Octacilius, two new Consuls, are sent into Sicil. Whereupon, the Romans being Masters of the field, many in-land Towns gave themselves unto them. On the contrary, the Carthaginians keeping still the Lordship of the Sea, many maritimate places became theirs. The Romans therefore, as well to secure their own coasts, often invaded by the African fleets, fleets, as to equal themſelves in every kind of warfare with their enemies, determine to make a fleet. And herein fortune favoured them with this accident, that being altogether ignorant inſhip-wrights craft, a ſtorm of wind thruſt one of the Carthaginian Gallies, of five banks, to the ſhore.

Now had the Romans a pattern, and by it they began to ſet up an hundred Quinqueremes which were Gallies, rowed by five on every bank; and twenty, of three on a bank: and while theſe were in preparing, they exerciſed their men in the feat of rowing. This they did after a ſtrange faſhion. They placed upon the Sea-ſands many ſeats, in order of the banks in Gallies, whereon they placed their water-men, and taught them to beat the ſand with long poles, orderly, and as they were directed by the Maſter, that ſo they might learn the ſtroke of the Gally, and how to mount and draw their Oares.

When their fleet was finiſhed, ſome rigging and other implements excepted, C. Cornelius, one of the new conſuls (for they changed every year) was made Admiral: who being more in love with this new kind of warfare, than well adviſed, paſt over to Meſſana with ſeventeen Gallies, leaving the reſt to follow him. There he ſtayed not, but would needs row along the coaſt to Lipara, hoping to do ſome piece of ſervice. Hannibal a Carthaginian was at the ſame time Governour in Panormus; who being advertiſed of this new Sea-mans arrival, ſent forth one Boodes, a Senator of Carthage, with twenty Gallies, to entertain him. Boodes, falling upon the Conſul unawares, took both him and the fleet he commanded. When Hannibal received this good news, together with the Roman Gallies, and their Conſul; he grew no leſs fooliſh hardy than Cornelius had been. For he, fancying to himſelf to ſurprize the reſt of the Roman fleet, on their own coaſt, ere they were yet in all points provided; ſought them out with a fleet of fifty ſail: wherewith falling among them, he was well beaten, and leaving the greater number of his own behind him, made an hard eſcape with the reſt: for of one hundred and twenty Gallies, the Romans under Cornelius had loſt but ſeventeen, ſo as one hundred and three remained, which were not eaſily beaten by fifty.

The Romans, being advertiſed of Cornelius his overthrow, make haſt to redeem him, but give the charge of their fleet to his Colleague, Duilius. Duilius, conſidering that the Roman veſſels were heavy and ſlow, the African Gallies having the ſpeed of them, deviſed a certain Engine in the prow of his Gallies, whereby they might faſten or grapple themſelves with their enemies, when they were (as we call it) boord and boord, that is, when they brought the Gallies ſides together. This done the weightier ſhips had gotten the advantage, and the Africans loſt it. For neither did their ſwiftneſs ſerve them, nor their Marriners craft; the veſſels wherein both Nations fought, being open: ſo that all was to be carryed by the advantage of weapon, and valour of the men. Beſides this, as the heavier Gallies were accidentally likely to cruſh, and crack the ſides of the lighter and weaker, ſo were they by the reaſon of their breadth, more ſteady; and thoſe that beſt kept their feet, could alſo beſt uſe their hands. The example may be given between one of the long boats of his Majeſties great ſhips, and a London-Barge.

Certainly, he that will happily perform a fight at Sea, muſt be ſkilful in making choice of Veſſels to fight in: he muſt believe that there is more belonging to a good man of War, upon the waters, than great daring; and muſt know, that there is a great deal of difference, between fighting looſe or at large, and grappling. The Guns of a ſlow ſhip pierce as well, and make as great holes, as thoſe in a ſwift. To clap ſhips together, without conſideration, belongs rather to a mad man, than to a man of War: for by ſuch an ignorant bravery was Peter Stroſſie loſt at the Azores, when he fought againſt the Marqueſs of Santa Cruz. In like ſort, had the Lord Charles Howard, Admiral of England, been loſt in the year 1588. if he had not been better adviſed, than a great many malignant fools were, that found fault with his demeanour. The Spaniards had an Army aboord them; and he had none: they had more ſhips than he had, and of higher building and charging; ſo that, had he intangled himſelf with thoſe great and powerful Veſſels, he had greatly endangered this Kingdom of England. For twenty men upon the defences, are equal to an hundred that boord and enter; whereas then, contrariwiſe, the Spaniards had an hundred, for twenty of ours to defend themſelves withall. But our Admiral knew his advantage, and held it: which had he not done, he had not been worthy to have held his head. Here to ſpeak in general of Sea-fights (for particulars are fitter for private hands than for the Preſs,) I ſay, that a fleet of twenty ſhips, all good ſailers, and good ſhips, have the advantage, on the open Sea, of an hundred as good ſhips and of ſlower ſailing. For if the fleet of an hundred ſail keep themſelves near together, in a groſs ſquadron; the twenty ſhips, charging ing them upon any angle, shall force them to give ground, and to fall back upon their own next fellows: of which so many as intangle, are made unserviceable or lost. Force them they may easily, because the twenty ships, which give themselves scope after they have given one broad side of Artillery, by clapping into the wind, and staying, they may give them the other: and so the twenty ships batter them in pieces with a perpetual volly; whereas those that fight in a troop, have no room to turn, and can alwayes use but one and the same beaten side. If the fleet of an hundred sail give themselves any distance, then shal the lesser fleet prevail, either against those that are arear and hindmost, or against those, that by advantage of over-sailing their fellows keep the wind, and if upon a Lee-shore, the ships next the wind: be constrained to fal back into their own squadron, then it is all to nothing, the whole fleet must suffer shipwrack, or render it self. That such advantage may be taken upon a fleet of uncequal speed, it hath been well enough conceived in old time; as by the Oration of Hermocrates, in Thucydides, which he made to the Syracusians, when the Athenians invaded them, it may easily be observed.

Of the Art of War by Sea, I had written a Treatise, for the Lord Henry, Prince of Wales; a subject, to my knowledge, never handled by any man, ancient or modern: but God hath spared me the labour of finishing it, by his loss; by the loss of that brave Prince; of which, like an Eclipse of the Sun, we shall find the effects hereafter. Impossible it is to equal words and sorrows; I will therefore leave him in the hands of God that hath him. Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent.

But it is now time to return to the beaten Carthaginians; who by losing their advantage of swift boats, and boarding the Romans, have lost fifty sail of their Gallies: as on the other side, their enemies by commanding the Seas, have gotten liberty to sail about the West part of Sicil; where they raised the siege laid unto Segesta by the Carthaginians, and won the Town of Macella, with some other places.

§. VII.

Divers Enterfeats of War, between the Romans and Carthaginians, with variable success. The Romans prepare to invade Africk: and obtain a great victory at Sea.

THE Victory of Duilius, as it was honoured at Rome, with the first Naval Triumph, that was ever seen in that City; so gave it unto the Romans great incouragement, to proceed in their Wars by Sea; whereby they hoped, not only to get Sicil, but all the other Isles between Italy and Africk, beginning with Sardinia, whither soon after they sent a fleet for that purpose. On the contrary side, Amilcar, the Carthaginian, lying in Panormus, carefully waited for all occasions, that might help to recompence the late misfortune: and being advertised, that some quarrel was grown between the Roman Souldiers, and their Auxiliaries, being such as caused them to incamp apart, he sent forth Hanno to set upon them; who taking them unawares, buried four thousand of them in the place. Now during the continuance of the Land-war in Sicil, Hannibal, who had lately been beaten by Sea, but escaped unto Carthage, meaning to make amends for his former errour, obtained the trust of a new fleet, wherewith he arrived at Sardinia: the conquest of which Island, the Romans had entertained for their next enterprise. Now it so fell out, that the Romans, crossing the Sea from Sicil, arrived in the Port where Hannibal with his new fleet anchored. They set upon him unawares, and took the better part of the fleet which he conducted; himself hardly escaping the danger. But it little availed him to have escaped from the Romans. His good friends the Carthaginians, were so ill pleased with this his second unfortunate voyage, that they hanged him up for his diligence: for (as it hath been said of old) Non est bis in bello peccare; In War it is too much to offend twice.

After this, it was long ere any thing of importance was done by the Consuls, till Pa-*

If we may give credit to Antiquities, which Fazellus a diligent Writer, hath left us in his History of Sicil. P normus, now c Palermo, is one of the first Cities that hath been built in all Europe. Fo whereas Thucydides seems to make it a Colony of the Phœnicians; F zanus, in libello de Panormo, lib. 6. affirms that it was first and long be the time which Thucydides set down founded by the Chaldæans, and D masœnes. To prove which, he tells us of two inscriptions upon Marble the Hebrew Character found at Panormus, in the time of William the secon King of Sicil, that were then beheld of all the Citizens and other str gers, which being translated into Latine, say as followeth; Vixerit [illegible] filio Abrahæ, & regnante in Idumea, atque in valle Damascena, F[illegible] Isaac, ingens Hebræorum manus, quibus adjuncti sunt multi Damasceni, [illegible] Phœnices, profecti in hanc triangularem insulam, sedes perpetuas locaturi hoc amœnissimo loco, quem Panormum nominaverunt. In the other Ma are found these words; Non est alius Deus præter unum Deum; non est [illegible] potens præter eundem Deum, &c. Hujus Turris Præfectus est Saphi filius phaz, filii Esau fratris Jacob filii Isaac, filii Abraham: & Turri quidem nomen est Bayeh; sed Turri huic proximæ nomen est Pharab. And this inscr tion (saith Fazellus) was found intire in the Castle Bayeh, in the year 1 Now whether these inscriptions were truly as ancient, as these men lieve they were, I leave every man to his own faith. But that the City of aged times, it appears by Thucydides, who affirmeth; when the Greeks first into Sicil, that then the Phœnicians inhabited Panormus: which tain it is they did in the first Punick war; to wit, the Carthaginians were Phœnicians, from whom the Romans (A. Aquilius, and C. Corn commanding this Army) took it; And when Marcellus besieged Syra sent him in aid 3000 Souldiers. But it was rather confederate, than ject to the Romans. For Cicero against Verres, names it among the free ties of Sicil. After Syracuse destroyed, it became the first City, and R Seat, as well of the Gothes and Saracens in that Island, as of the Empe of Constantinople; of the Normans, French, and Arragonians, which nour it holds this day, and is much frequented, for the excellen which grows about it.

normus was beſieged; where, when the Romans had ſought in vain to draw the Carthaginians into the field; being unable to force that great City, becauſe of the ſtrong Garriſon therein beſtowed: they then departed from thence, and took certain Inland Towns, as Myciſtratum, Enna, Camerina, Hippana, and others, between Panormus and Meſſana.

The year following, C. Atilius the Conſul who commanded the Roman fleet, diſcovered a company of the Carthaginian Gallies, ranging the coaſt: and, not ſtaying for his whole number purſued them with ten of his. But he was well beaten for the haſte he made, and loſt all, ſave the Gally which tranſported him: wherein himſelf eſcaped with great labour. But ere all was done, the reſt of Atilius his fleet was gotten up: who renewing the fight, recovered from the Carthaginians a double number of theirs; by which the Victory remaining doubtful, both challenge it. Now to try at once, which of theſe two Nations ſhould command the Seas, they both prepare all they can. The Romans make a fleet of three hundred and thirty Gallies; the Carthaginians, of three hundred and fifty, * Triremes, Quadriremes, and Quinqueremes.

The Romans reſolve to tranſport the War into Africk; the Carthaginians, to arreſt them on the coaſt of Sicil. The numbers, with which each of them filled their fleet, was (perhaps) the greateſt that ever fought on the waters. By Polybius his eſtimation, there were in the Roman Gallies an hundred and forty thouſand men; and in thoſe of Carthage, an hundred and fifty thouſand: Reckoning one hundred and twenty Souldiers, and three hundred Rowors to every Gally, one with the other. The Roman fleet was divided into four parts, of which the three firſt made the form of a Wedge or Triangle; the two firſt ſquadrons making the Flanks, and the third ſquadron, the Baſe: the point thereof (wherein were the two Conſuls as Admirals) looking toward the enemy, and the middle ſpace lying empty. Their Veſſels of carriage were towed by the third ſquadron. After all came up the fourth, in form of a Creſcent; very well manned, but exceeding thin: ſo that the horns of it incloſed all the third ſquadron, together with the corner of the firſt and ſecond. The order of the Carthaginian Fleet I cannot receive by relation; but, by the manner of the fight afterwards, I conjecture, that the front of their Fleet was thin, and ſtretched in a great length, much like to that which the French call Combat en haye, a long front of horſe, and thin: which form, ſince the Piſtol prevailed over the Lance, they have changed. Behind this firſt out-ſtretched front, their Battalions were more ſolid: for Amilcar, Admiral of the Carthaginians had thus ordered them, of purpoſe, his Gallies having the ſpeed of the Romans) that, when the firſt Fleet of the Romans haſted to break through the firſt Gallies, they ſhould all turn tail, and the Romans purſuing them (as after a victory) diſorder themſelves, and, for eagerneſs of taking the Run-awayes, leave their own three ſquadrons far behind them. For ſo it muſt needs fall out; ſeeing that the third ſquadron towed their horſe-boats and victuallers; and the fourth had the Rearward of all. According to Amilcars direction it ſucceeded. For when the Romans had charged, and broken the thin front of the Carthaginian firſt Fleet, which ran away, they forthwith gave after them with all ſpeed poſſible, not ſo much as looking behind them for the ſecond ſquadron. Hereby the Romans were drawn near unto the body of the Carthaginian Fleet, led by Amilcar, and by him (at the firſt) received a great loſs, until their ſecond ſquadron came up, which forced Amilcar to betake him to his Oars. Hanno alſo who commanded the right wing of the Carthaginian Fleet, invaded the Roman Rearward, and prevailed againſt them. But Amilcar being beaten off, Marcus Atilius fell back to their ſuccour, and put the Carthaginians to their heels; as not able to ſuſtain both ſquadrons. The Rear being relieved, the Conſuls came to the aid of their third Battalion, which towed their victuallers, which were alſo in great danger of being beaten by the Africans: but the Conſuls, joyning their ſquadrons to it, put the Carthaginians on that part alſo to running.

This victory fell unto the Romans, partly by the hardineſs of their Souldiers; but principally, for that Amilcar, being firſt beaten, could never after joyn himſelf unto any of his other ſquadons, that remained, as yet in a fair likelihood of prevailing, ſo long as they fought upon equal terms, and but ſquadron to quadron. But Amilcar forſaking the fight, thereby left a full fourth part of the Roman Fleet uningaged, and ready to give ſuccour to any of the other parts that were oppreſt. So as in concluſion, the

* The Quinqueremes are ſaid to draw it: the Quadriremes had four to an Oar: and the Triremes three. Some have thought, that the Quinqueremes had five ranks of Oars, one over another; and the other Gallies (rateably) fewer. But had this been ſo, they muſt then have had five decks each over other: which hath ſeldome been ſeen in ſhips of a thouſand tuns; neither could the third, fourth, and fifth ranks, have reached unto the water with the Oars.

the Romans got the honour of the day: for they loſt but four and twenty of theirs; whereas the Africans loſt thirty that were ſunk, and threeſcore and three that were taken.

Now, if Amilcar who had more Gallies than the Romans, had alſo divided his Fleet into four ſquadrons, (beſides thoſe that he ranged in the front to draw on the enemies, and to ingage them) and that whilſt he himſelf fought with one ſquadron that charged him, all the reſt of the enemies Fleet had been at the ſame time entertained, he had prevailed: but the ſecond ſquadron, being free, came to the reſcue of the firſt, by which Amilcar was oppreſt: and Amilcar, being oppreſt and ſcattered, the Conſuls had good leiſure to relieve both the third and the fourth ſquadron, and got the victory.

Charls the fifth, among other the Precepts to Philip the ſecond his Son, where he adviſed him concerning War againſt the Turks, tells him, that in all battels between them and the Chriſtians, he ſhould never fail to charge the Janiſars in the beginning of the fight, and to ingage them at once with the reſt. For (ſaith he) the Janiſars, who are alwayes reſerved intire in the Rear of the battel, and in whom the Turk repoſeth his greateſt confidence; come up in a goſs body, when all the troops on both ſides are diſbanded and in confuſion; whereby they carry the Victory before them without reſiſtance. By the ſame order of fight, and reſervation, did the Romans alſo prevail againſt other Nations. For they kept their Triarii in ſtore (who were the choice of their Army) for the up-ſhot and laſt blow. A great and victorious advantage it hath even been found, to keep ſome one or two good troops to look on, when all elſe are diſbanded and ingaged.

§. VIII.

The Romans prevail in Africk. Atilius the Conſul, propoundeth intolerable conditions of Peace to the Carthaginians. He is utterly beaten and made priſoner.

NOW the Romans, according to their former reſolution, after they had repaired and re-victualled their Fleet, ſet ſail for Africa, and arrived at the Promontory of Hercules, a great Head-land, ſomewhat to the Eaſt of the Port of Carthage, and ſome forty leagues from Heraclia in Sicil, where Amilcar himſelf as yet ſtaid. From this Head-land (leaving the entrance into Carthage) they coaſted the Eaſt-ſide of the Promontory, till they came to Clypea, a Town about fifty Engliſh mile from it. There they diſ-embarked and prepared to beſiege Clypea; which to eaſe them of labour, was yielded unto them. Now had they a Port of their own on Africa ſide; without which all invaſions are fooliſh. By this time were the Africans alſo arrived at their own Carthage, fearing that the Roman Fleet and Army had directed themſelves thither: but being advertiſed that they had taken Clypea, they made proviſions of all ſorts, both by Sea and Land, for their defence. The Romans ſend to Rome for directions, and in the mean while waſt all round about them. The order given for the Senate, was, That one of the Conſuls ſhould remain with the Army, and that the other ſhould return with the Fleet into Italy. According to this direction, Manlius the Conſul is ſent home to Rome; whither he carried with him twenty thouſand African Captains, with all the Roman Fleet and Army; except forty ſhips, fifteen thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, that were left with Atilius.

With theſe forces, Regulus eaſily wan ſome Towns and places that were unwalled, and laid ſiege to others. But he performed no great matter before he came to Adis. Yet I hold it worthy of relation, that near unto the River of Bragada, he encountred with a Serpent of one hundred and twenty foot long, which he ſlew, not without loſs of many Souldiers, being driven to uſe againſt it ſuch engines of War, as ſerved properly for the aſſaulting of Towns. At Adis he met with the Carthaginian Army, whereof the Captains were Hanno and Boſtar, together with Amilcar, who had brought over out of Sicil five thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe to ſuccour his Country. Theſe (belike) had an intent, rather to weary him out of Africk, by wary protraction of time, than to undergo the hazard of a main fight. They were careful to hold themſelves free from neceſſity of coming to blows: yet had they a great deſire to ſave the Town of Adis out of his hands. Intending therefore to follow their general purpoſe, and yet to diſturb him in the ſiege of Adis, they incamp near unto him, and ſtrongly (as they think) on the top of an hill: but thereby they loſe the ſervices both of their Elephants, and of their horſe-men. This diſadvantage of theirs, Regulus diſcovers, and makes uſe of it. He aſſails them in their ſtrength, which they defend a while, but in fine the Romans prevail, and force them from the place, taking the ſpoil of their Camp. Following this their good fortune at the heels, they they proceed to * Tunis a City within ſixteen miles of Carthage, which they aſſault and take.

* This City was taken from the Turks by Charls the fifth in the year 1536. and was one of the three Keyes, which he gave in charge to Philip the ſecond his ſon to keep ſafe; to wit, this Tunis, the Key of Africa: Flushing, the Key of the Netherlands: and Spain, the Key of Spain. But two of theſe Philip ſo loſt, that he never recovered them again; the third our English were bold, in the time of the renowned Queen Elizabeth, to wring out of his hand: where we ſtayed not to pick any lock, but brake open the doors, and having rifled all, caſt it into the fire.

By the loſs of this battail at Adis, and more eſpecially by the loſs of Tunis, the Carthaginians were greatly diſmayed. The Numidians, their next Neighbours towards the Weſt, inſult upon their misfortunes; invade, and ſpoil their Territory, and force thoſe that inhabite abroad, to forſake their villages and fields, and to hide themſelves within the walls of Carthage. By reaſon hereof, a great famine at hand threatens the Citizens. Atilius finds his own advantage, and aſſures himſelf that the City could not long hold out: yet he feared leſt he might defend it ſelf, untill his time of Office, that was near expired, ſhould be quite run out, whereby the new Conſuls were like to reap the honour of obtaining it. Ambition therefore, that hath no reſpect but to it ſelf, perſwades him to treat of peace with the Carthaginians. But he propounded unto them ſo unworthy and baſe conditions, as thereby their hearts, formerly poſſeſſed with fear, became now ſo couragious and diſdainful, that they reſolved, either to defend their liberty, or die to the laſt man. To ſtrengthen this their reſolution, there arrived at the ſame time a great troop of Greeks, whom they had formerly ſent to entertain. Among theſe was a very expert Souldier, named Xantippus, a Spartan: who being informed of what had paſſed, and of the overthrow which the Carthaginians received neer unto Adis, gave it out publickly; that the ſame was occaſioned by default of the Commanders, and not of the Nation. This bruit, ran till it came to the Senate; Xantippus is ſent for; gives the reaſon of his opinion; and in concluſion, being made General of the African forces, he puts himſelf into the field. The Army which he led, conſiſted of no more than twelve thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, with an hundred Elephants. No greater were the forces wherewith the Carthaginians fought for all that they had, Libertyes, Lives, Goods, Wives, and Children: which might well make it ſuſpected, that the Armies by Sea, before ſpoken of, were miſ-numbered; the one conſiſting of an hundred and forty thouſand, and the other of an hundred and fifty thouſand, were it not commonly found that they which uſe the ſervice of mercenary Souldiers, are ſtronger abroad, than at their own doors.

Xantippus, taking the field with his Army, marched directly towards the Romans; and ranging his troops upon fair and level ground, fitteſt both for his Elephants and Horſe, preſented them battel. The Romans wondred much, whence this new courage of their enemies might grow: but confident they were, that it ſhould ſoon be abated. Their chief care was, how to reſiſt the violence of the Elephants. Againſt them they placed the Velites, or light-armed Souldiers, as a forlorn hope; that theſe might either with darts and other caſting-weapons, drive back the beaſts upon the enemies, or at leaſt break their violence, and hinder them from ruſhing freely upon the Legions. To the ſame end, they made their battails deeper in file, than they had been accuſtomed to do. By which means, as they were the leſs ſubject unto the impreſſion of the Elephants; ſo were they ſo much the more expoſed unto the violence of the horſe, wherein the enemy did far exceed them. The Elephants were placed by Xantippus, all in one rank, before his Army; which followed them at a reaſonable diſtance: his horſemen, and ſome light-armed foot, of the Carthaginians Auxiliaries, were in the wings. The firſt onſet was given by the Elephants, againſt which the Velites were ſo unable to make reſiſtance, that they brake into the battalions following, and put them into ſome diſorder. In this caſe, the depth of the Roman battail was helpfull. For when the beaſts had ſpent their force, in piercing through a few of the firſt ranks; the ſquadrons nevertheleſs perſiſted in their order, without opening. But the Carthaginian horſe, haveing at the firſt encounter, by reaſon of their advantage in number, driven thoſe of Atilius out of the field, began to charge the Roman battalions in flank, and put them in great diſtreſs; who being forced to turn face every way, could neither paſs forward nor yet retire; but had very much ado to make good the ground whereon they ſtood. In the mean while, ſuch of the Romans, as had eſcaped the fury of the Elephants, and left them at their backs, fell upon the Carthaginian Army, that met them in very good array. It was no even match. The one were a diſordered Company, wearied with labour and hurt; the other, freſh, and well prepared, to have dealt with the enemy upon equal terms. Here was therefore a great ſlaughter with little fight; the Romans haſtily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being ſurrounded with the enemy, and ſpent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of theſe troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; deſtroying the whole Roman Army, ſave two thouſand, and taking five hundred priſoners, together with Atilius the Conſul. Of their own they loſt no more than eight hundred Mercenaries, which were ſlain when the fight began, by two thouſand of the Romans: that wheeling about to avoid the Elephants, bare down all before them: and made way even to the Carthaginian trenches. Theſe were the two thouſand that eſcaped, when the whole Army behind them was routed. All the reſt were either taken or ſlain. Hereby fortune made the Romans know, that they were no leſs her vaſſals, than were the Carthaginians: how inſolent ſoever they had been in their propoſition of peace, as if they had purchaſed from her the inheritance of their proſperity, which ſhe never gave nor ſold to any mortal man. With what joy theſe newes were welcomed, when they came to Carthage, we may eaſily conjecture; and what great things the vertue of one man hath often brought to paſs in the world, there are many examples to prove, no leſs than this of Xantippus: all of them confirming that ſentence of Eurypedes, Mens una ſapiens, plurium vincit manus; Many mens hands equal not one wiſe mind.

After this great ſervice done to the Carthaginians, Xantippus, returned into Greece; whether for that he was more envyed than honoured, or for what other cauſe, it is unknown.

The death of Atilius Regulus the Conſul, was very memorable. He was ſent from Carthage to Rome, about the exchange and ranſom of priſoners on both ſides: giving his faith to return if the buſineſs were not effected. When he came to Rome, and plainly ſaw that his Country ſhould loſe by the bargain: ſo far was he from urging the Senate unto compaſſion of his own miſery, that he earneſtly perſwaded to have the priſoners in Africk left to their ill deſtinies. This done, he returned to Carthage: where for his pains taken, he was rewarded with an horrible death. For this his conſtancy and faith, all Writers highly extoll him. But the Carthaginians ſeem to have judged him an obſtinate and malicious enemy, that neither in his proſperity would hearken to reaſon, nor yet in his calamity would have the natural care, to preſerve himſelf and others, by yielding to ſuch an office of humanity, as is common in all wars (not grounded upon deadly hatred) only in regard of ſome ſmall advantage. Whatſoever the Carthaginians thought of him; ſure it is that his faithful obſervance of his word given, cannot be too much commended. But that grave ſpeech, which he made in the Senate, againſt the exchange of priſoners, appears, in all reaſon, to have proceeded from a vain-glorious forwardneſs, rather than from any neceſſity of State. For the Exchange was made ſoon after his death; wherein the Romans had the worſe bargain, by ſo much as Regulus himſelf was worth. As for the authority of all Hiſtorians, that magnifie him in this point; we are to conſider, that they lived under the Roman Empire: Philinus, the Carthaginian, perhaps did cenſure it otherwiſe. Yet the death which he ſuffered with extream torments, could not be more grievous to him, than it was diſhonourable to Carthage. Neither do I think that the Carthaginians could excuſe themſelves herein; otherwiſe than by recrimination: ſaying, that the Romans deſerved to be no better intreated, for as much as it is their ordinary practice to uſe others in the like ſort. Cruelty doth not become more warrantable, but rather more odious, by being cuſtomary. It was the Roman faſhion, to whip almoſt to death, and then to behead, the Captains of their enemies whom they took, yea, although they were ſuch as had alwayes made fair wars with them. Wherefore it ſeems not meet, in reaſon, that they ſhould cry out againſt the like tyrannical inſolency in others, as if it were lawful only in themſelves.

The conſideration both of this misfortune, that rewarded the pride of Atilius his intolerable demands; and of the ſudden valour, whereinto the Carthaginians fear was changed by meer deſperation; calls to remembrance, the like inſolency of others in proſperity, that hath bred the like reſolution in thoſe, to whom all reaſonable grace hath been denyed. In ſuch caſes I never hold it impertinent, to add unto one, more teſtimonies; approving the true rules, from which our paſſions carry us away.

In the year 1378. the Genowaies won ſo faſt upon the Venetians, as they not only drave their Gallies out of the Sea, but they brought their own fleet within two miles of Venice it ſelf. This bred ſuch an amazement in the City of Venice, that they offered unto the Genowaies (their ſtate reſerved) whatſoever they would demand. But Peter Doria, blown blown up with many former victories, would hearken to no compoſition; ſave the yielding of their City and State to his diſcretion. Hereupon the Venetians, being filled with diſdain, thruſt out to Sea with all their remaining power, and aſſail Doria with ſuch deſperate fury, that they break his fleet, kill Doria himſelf, take nineteen of his Gallies, fourſcore boats of Padoa, and four thouſand priſoners, recover Chiozza, and all the places taken from them; and following their victory, enter the Port of Genoa, enforcing the Genowaies baſely to beg peace, to their extream diſhonour and diſadvantage, being beaten; which, being victorious, they might have commanded, to their greateſt honour and advantage. The like hapned to the Earl of Flanders, in the year 1380. when having taken a notable, and withal an over-cruel revenge upon the Gantois, he refuſed mercy to the reſt, who in all humility, ſubmitting themſelves to his obedience, offered their City, goods, and eſtates, to be diſpoſed at his pleaſure. This when he had unadviſedly refuſed, and was reſolved to extinguiſh them utterly; they iſſue out of their City with five thouſand choſen men, and armed with a deſperate reſolution, they charge the Earl, break his Army, enter Bruges (pell-mell) with his vanquiſhed followers; and enforce him to hide himſelf under an heap of ſtraw, in a poor cottage; out of which with great difficulty he eſcaped, and ſaved himſelf. Such are the fruits of Inſolency.

How the affairs of Carthage proſpered after the victory againſt Atilius: How the Romans, having loſt their fleet by tempeſt, reſolve to forſake the Seas: The great advantages of a good fleet in war, between Nations divided by the Sea.

BY the reputation of this late victory, all places that had been loſt in Africk, return to the obedience of Carthage. Only Clypea ſtands out; before which the Carthaginians ſit down, and aſſail it, but in vain: For the Romans, hearing of the loſs of Atilius, with their forces in Africk, and withal, that Clypea was beſieged, make ready a groſs Army, and tranſport it in a fleet of three hundred and fifty Gallies, commanded by M. Emilius, and Ser. Fulvius, their Conſuls. At the Promontory of Mercury, two hundred Carthaginian Gallies, ſet out of purpoſe, upon the bruit of their coming, encounter them: but greatly to their coſt. For the Romans took by force an hundred and fourteen of their fleet, and drew them after them to Clypea; where they ſtaid no longer, than to take in their own men that had been beſieged: and this done, they made amain toward Sicil, in hope to recover all that the Carthaginians held therein. In this haſty voyage they deſpiſe the advice of the Pilots, who pray them to find harbour in time, for that the ſeaſon threatned ſome violent ſtorms, which ever hapned between the riſing of Orion, and of the * Dog-ſtarr. Now although the Pilots of the Roman fleet had thus fore-warned them of the weather at hand, and certified them withal, that the South coaſt of Sicil had no good Ports, wherein to ſave themſelves upon ſuch an accident: yet this victorious Nation was perſwaded, that the wind and ſeas feared them no leſs, than did the Africans; and that they were able to conquer Elements themſelves. So refuſing to ſtay within ſome Port, as they were adviſed, they would needs put out to Sea; thinking it a matter much helping their reputation, after this victory againſt the Carthaginian fleet, to take a few worthleſs Towns upon the coaſt. The mercileſs winds in the mean while overtake them, and near unto Camerina, overturn and thruſt headlong on the rocks, all but fourſcore of three hundred and forty ſhips, ſo as their former great victory was devoured by the Seas, before the fame thereof recovered Rome.

* There is no part of the World, which hath not ſome times of outragious weather beſide their accidental ſtorms. We have upon our Coaſt a Michaelmas ſtaw that ſeldom or never fails in the Weſt Indies in the moneths of Auguſt and September, theſe moſt forcible winds, which the Spaniards call the Nortes, or North winds, are very fearful: and therefore they that navigate in thoſe parts, take harbour till thoſe moneths take end. Charles the fifth being as ill adviſed, in paſſing the Seas towards Algier, in the Winter quarter contrary to the counſel of A. Doria; as he was in like unſeaſonable times to continue his ſiege before Metz in Lorraine, loſt an hundred and forty ſhips by tempeſts, and fifteen Gallies, with all in effect in them, of men, victuallers, horſes, and munition: a loſs no leſs great, than his retreat, both from before the one and the other, was extream diſhonourable.

The Carthaginians, hearing what had hapned, repair all their warlike veſſels hoping once again to command the Seas: they are alſo as confident of their land-forces ſince the overthrow of Atilius. They ſend Aſdrubal into Sicil with all their old Souldiers, and an hundred and forty Elephants imbarked in two hundred Gallies. With this Army and fleet he arrives at Lilybæum; where he begins to vex the Partiſans of Rome. But adverſity doth not diſcourage the Romans: They build in 3. moneths (a matter of great note) one hundred and twenty ſhips; with which, and the remainder of their late ſhipwrack, they row to Panormus, or Palerma, the chief City of the Africans in Sicil, and ſurround it by Land and Water: after a therefore a great ſlaughter with little fight; the Romans haſtily recoiled to the body of their Army, which being ſurrounded with the enemy, and ſpent with travail, fell all to rout, upon the defeat of theſe troops, that open the way to a general overthrow. So the Carthaginians obtained a full victory; deſtroying the whole Roman Army, ſave two thouſand, and taking five hundred priſoners, together with Atilius the Conſul. while they take it, and leaving a Garriſon therein, return to Rome.

Very deſirous the Romans were to be doing in Africk: to which purpoſe they imployed C. Servilius, and C. Sempronius, their Conſuls. But theſe wrought no wonders. Some ſpoil they made upon the coaſts of Africk: but Fortune robbed them of all their gettings. For in their return, they were firſt ſet upon the ſands, and like to have periſhed, near unto the leſſer Syrtes, where they were fain to heave all over-boord, that ſo they might get off: then, having with much ado doubled the Cape of Lilybæum, in their paſſage from Panormus towards Italy, they loſt an hundred and fifty of their ſhips by foul weather. A greater diſcouragement never Nation had; the god of the wars favoured them no more, than the god of the waters afflicted them. Of all that Mars enricht them with upon the Land, Neptune robbed them upon the Seas. For they had now loſt, beſides what they loſt in fight, four hundred and ſix Ships and Gallies, with all the munition and Souldiers tranſported in them.

The exceeding damage hereby received, perſwaded them to give over their Navigation, and their fight by Sea, and to ſend only a Land-army into Sicil, under L. Cæcilius, and P. Furius, their Conſuls. Theſe they tranſport in ſome threeſcore ordinary paſſage boats, by the ſtraights of Meſſana, that are not above a mile and a half broad from land to land. In like ſort, the overthrow which Atilius received in Africa, occaſioned chiefly by the Elephants, made them leſs cholerick againſt the Carthaginians, than before; ſo that for two years after, they kept the high and woody grounds, not daring to fight in the fair and champion Countreys. But this late reſolution of forſaking the Seas laſted not long. For it was impoſſible for them to ſuccour thoſe places which they held in Sicil, without a Navy, much leſs to maintain the War in Africa. For, whereas the Romans were to ſend forces from Meſſana to Egeſta, to Lilybæum, and to other places in the extream Weſt parts of Sicil, making ſometime a march of above an hundred and forty Engliſh mile by land, which could not be performed without an Army, and the proviſions that follow it, in leſs than 14. dayes; the Carthaginians would paſs it with their Gallies, in eight and forty hours.

An old example we have, of that great advantage of tranſporting Armies by water, between Canutus, and Edmund Ironſide. For Canutus, when he had entred the Thames with his Navy and Army, and could not prevail againſt London, ſuddenly imbarqued; and ſailing to the Weſt, landed in Dorſet-ſhire, ſo drawing Edmund and his Army thither. There finding ill entertainment, he again ſhipt his men, and entred the Severn, making Edmond to march after him, to the ſuccour of Worceſter-ſhire, by him greatly ſpoiled. But when he had Edmond there, he ſailed back again to London: by means whereof, he both wearied the King, and ſpoiled where he pleaſed, ere ſuccour could arrive. And this was not the leaſt help, which the Netherlands have had againſt the Spaniards, in the defence of their liberty, that being Maſters of the Sea, they could paſs their Army from place to place, unwearied, and entire, with all the Munition and Artillery belonging unto it, in the tenth part of the time, wherein their enemies have been able to do it. Of this an inſtance or two. The Count Maurice of Naſſau, now living, one of the greateſt Captains, and of the worthieſt Princes, that either the preſent or preceding Ages have brought forth, in the year 1590. carryed his Army by Sea, with forty Canons to Breda: making countenance either to beſiege Boiſleduc, or Gertreviden Berg; which the enemy (in prevention) filled with Souldiers, and victuals. But as ſoon as the wind ſerved, he ſuddenly ſet ſail, arriving in the mouth of the Meuze, turned up the Rhine, and thence to Yſſel, and ſate down before Zutphen. So before the Spaniards could march over land round about Holland, above fourſcore mile, and over many great Rivers, with their Cannon and carriage, Zutphen was taken. Again, when the Spaniſh Army had overcome this wearifome march, and were now far from home, Prince Maurice, making countenance to ſail up the Rhine, changed his courſe in the night, and ſailing down the ſtream, he was ſet down before Hulſt in Brabant, ere the Spaniards had knowledge what was become of him. So this Town he alſo took, before the Spaniſh Army could return. Laſtly, the Spaniſh Army was no ſooner arrived in Brabant, than the Prince Maurice, well attended by his good fleet, having fortified Hulſt, ſet ſail again, and preſented himſelf before Nymegen in Gelders, a City of notable importance, and maſtered it.

And to ſay the truth; it is impoſſible for any maritime Countrey, not having the coaſts admirably fortified, to defend it ſelf againſt a powerful enemy, that is maſter of the Sea. Hereof I had rather, that Spain than England ſhould be an example. Let it therefore be ſuppoſed, that King Philip the ſecond had fully reſolved to hinder Sir John Norris

Norris in the year 1589. from preſenting Don Antonio, King of Portugal, before the gates of Lysborn; and that he would have kept off the Engliſh, by power of his land-forces; as being too weak at Sea, through the great overthrow of his mighty Armado, by the fleet of Queen Elizabeth, in the year foregoing. Surely, it had not been hard for him, to prepare an Army, that ſhould be able to reſiſt our eleven thouſand. But where ſhould this his Army have been beſtowed? If about Lisborn; then would it have been eaſie unto the Engliſh, to take, ranſack, and burn the Town of Croin, and to waſte the Country round about it. For the great and threatning preparations of the Earl of Altemira, the Marqueſs of Seralba, and others did not hinder them from performing all this. Neither did the haſty levy of eight thouſand under the Earl of Andrada, ſerve to more effect, than the increaſe of honour to Sir John Norris, and his Aſſociates: conſidering that the Engliſh charged theſe, at Puente de Burgos, and paſſing the great Bridge, behind which they lay, that was flanked with ſhot, and barricadoed at the further end, routed them, took their camp; took their General ſtandard with the Kings Arms, and purſued them over all the Country, which they fired. If a Royal Army, and not (as this was) a Company of private adventurers, had thus begun the war in Galicia; I think it would have made the Spaniards to quit the guard of Portugal, and make haſte to the defence of their St. Jago, whoſe Temple was not far from the danger. But, had they held their firſt reſolution, as knowing, that Sir John Norris his main intent was, to bring Don Antonio, with an Army into his Kingdom, whither coming ſtrong, he expected to be readily and joyfully welcomed: could they have hindred his landing in Portugal? Did not he land at Penicha, and march over the Country to Lisborn, ſix dayes journey? Did not he (when all Don Antonio his promiſes failed) paſs along by the River of Lysborn to Caſcaliz, and there, having won the Fort, quietly imbarque his men, and depart? But theſe, though no more than an handful, yet were they Engliſhmen. Let us conſider of the matter it ſelf; what another Nation might do, even againſt England, in landing an Army, by advantage of a fleet, if we had none. This queſtion, Whether an invading Army may be reſiſted at their landing upon the coaſt of England, were there no fleet of ours at the Sea to impeach it; is already handled by a learned Gentleman of our Nation, in his obſervations upon Cæſars Commentaries, that maintains the affirmative. This he holds only upon ſuppoſition; in abſence of our ſhipping: and comparatively, as that it is a more ſafe and eaſie courſe, to defend all the coaſt of England, than to ſuffer any enemy to land, and afterwards to fight with him. Surely I hold with him, that it is the beſt way, to keep our enemies from treading upon our ground; wherein, if we fail, then muſt we ſeek to make him wiſh, that he had ſtayed at his own home. In ſuch a caſe, if it ſhould happen, our judgements are to weigh many particular circumſtances, that belongs not unto this diſcourſe. But making the queſtion general, and poſitive. Whether England, without the help of her fleet, be able to debarr an enemy from landing; I hold that it is unable ſo to do: and therefore I think it moſt dangerous to make the adventure. For the incouragement of a firſt victory to an enemy, and the diſcouragement of being beaten to the invaded, may draw after it a moſt perilous conſequence.

It is true, that the Marſhal Monluc, in his Commentaries, doth greatly complain, that by his wanting forces, wherewith to have kept the frontier of Guyenne, they of the Proteſtant Religion, after the battel of Moncontour, entred that Country, and gathered great ſtrength and relief thence; for if the King (ſaith he) would have given me but reaſonable means, j'euſſe bien gardé à Monſieur l'Admiral de faire boire ſes Chevaux en la Garonne; I would have kept the Admiral from watering his horſes in the River of Garonne. Monſieur de Langey, on the contrary ſide, prefers the not fighting upon a frontier with an invading enemy, and commends the delay; which courſe the Conſtable of France held againſt the Emperour Charles, when he invaded Provence. Great difference I know there is, and a diverſe conſideration to be had, between ſuch a country as France is, ſtrengthened with many fortified places: and this of ours, where our Rampars are but of the bodies of men. And it was of invaſions upon firm land, that theſe great Captains ſpake: whoſe entrances cannot be uncertain. But our queſtion is of an Army to be tranſported over Sea, and to be landed again in an enemies countrey, and the place left to the choice of the invader. Hereunto I ſay, That ſuch an Army cannot be reſiſted on the coaſt of England, without a fleet to impeach it; no, nor on the coaſt of France, or any other Countrey: except every Creek, Port, or ſandy Bay, had a powerful Army, in each of them, to make oppoſition. For let his whole ſuppoſition be granted; granted; That Kent is able to furnish twelve thousand foot, and that those twelve thousand be layed in the three best landing places within that Country, to wit, three thousand at Margat, three thousand at the Nesse, and 6000. at Foulkston, that is somewhat equally distant from them both; as also that two of these troops (unless some other order be thought more fit) be directed to strengthen the third, when they shall see the enemies fleet to bend towards it: I say, that notwithstanding this provision, if the enemy, setting sail from the Isle of Wight, in the first watch of the night, and towing their long boats at their sterns, shall arrive by dawn of day at the Nesse, and thrust their Army on shore there; it will be hard for those three thousand that are at Margat, (twenty and four long miles from thence) to come time enough to re-enforce their fellows at the Nesse. Nay, how shall they at Foulkstone be able to do it, who are nearer by more than half the way? seeing that the enemy, at his first arrival, will either make his entrance by force, with three or four hundred shot of great Artillery, and quickly put the first three thousand, that were intrenched at the Nesse, to run; or else give them so much to do, that they shall be glad to send for help to Foulkston, and perhaps to Margat: whereby those places will be left bare. Now let us suppose, that all the twelve thousand Kentish Souldiers arrive at the Nesse, ere the enemy can be ready to dis-embarque his Army, so that he will find it unsafe, to land in the face of so many, prepared to withstand him; yet must we believe, that he will play the best of his own game; (having liberty to go which way he list) under covert of the night, set sail towards the East, where what shall hinder him to take ground, either at Margat, the Downes, or elsewhere, before they at the Nesse can be well aware of his departure? Certainly, there is nothing more easie than to do it. Yea, the like may be said of Waymouth, Purbeck, Poole, and of all landing places on the South Coast. For there is no man ignorant, that ships, without putting themselves out of breath, will easily out-run the Souldiers that coast them. Les armees ne volent point en poste; Armies neither flye, nor run post, saith a Marshal of France. And I know it to be true, that a fleet of ships may be seen at Sun-set, and after it, at the Lizard; yet by the next morning they may recover Portland, whereas an Army of foot shall not be able to march it in six dayes. Again, when those troops lodged on the Sea-shores, shall be forced to run from place to place in vain, after a fleet of ships; they will at length sit down in the mid-way; and leave all at adventure. But say it were otherwise; that the invading enemy will offer to land in some such place, where there shall be an Army of ours ready to receive him; yet it cannot be doubted, but that when the choice of all our Trained Bands, and the choice of our Commanders and Captains, shall be drawn together (as they were at Tilbury in the year 1588.) to attend the person of the Prince, and for the defence of the City of London: they that remain to guard the coast can be of no such force, as to encounter an Army like unto that wherewith it was intended that the Prince of Parma should have landed in England.

The Isle of Tercera hath taught us by experience, what to think in such a case. There are not many Islands in the world, better fenced by nature, and strengthned by art: it being every where hard of access; having no good harbour wherein to shelter a Navy of friends, and upon every cove or watering place a Fort erected, to forbid the approach of an enemies boat. Yet when Emanuel de Sylva, and Monsieur de Chattes, that held it to the use of Don Antonio, with five or six thousand men, thought to have kept the Marquess of Santa Cruz, from setting foot on ground therein; the Marquess having shewed himself in the Road of Angra, did set sail, ere any was aware of it, and arrived at the Port des Moles, far distant from thence; where he wan a Fort, and landed ere Monsieur de Chattes, running thither in vain, could come to hinder him. The example of Philip Strosse, slain the year before, without all regard of his worth, and of three hundred French prisoners murdered in cold blood; had instructed de Chattes, and his followers, what they might expect at that Marquess his hands: Therefore it is not like, that they were slow in carrying in relief to Port des Moles. Whether our English would be perswaded to make such diligent haste, from Margat to the Nesse, and back again, it may be doubted. Sure I am, that it were a greater march than all the length of Tercera; whereof the French-men had not measured the one half when they found themselvs prevented by the more nimble Ships of Spain.

This may suffice to prove, that a strong Army, in a good fleet, which neither foot, nor horse is able to follow, cannot be denyed to land where it list, in England, France, or elsewhere, unless it be hindred, encountred, and shuffled together, by a fleet of equal or answerable strength.

The

The difficult landing of our Engliſh, at Fayal, in the year 1597. is alledged againſt this: which example moves me no way to think, that a large Coaſt may be defended againſt a ſtrong Fleet. I landed thoſe Engliſh in Fayal my ſelf, and therefore ought to take notice of this inſtance. For whereas I find an Action of mine cited, with omiſſion of my name; I may, by a civil interpretation, think, that there was no purpoſe to defraud me of any honour; but rather an opinion, that the enterprize was ſuch, or ſo ill managed, as that no honour could be due unto it. There were indeed ſome which were in that voyage, who adviſed me not to undertake it: and I hearkned unto them ſomewhat longer than was requiſite, eſpecially, whilſt they deſired me to reſerve the title of ſuch an exploit (though it were not great) for a greater perſon. But when they began to tell me of difficulty; I gave them to underſtand, the ſame which I now maintain, that it was more difficult to defend a coaſt, than to invade it. The truth is, that I could have landed my men with more eaſe than I did; yea without finding any reſiſtance, if I would have rowed to another place; yea even there where I landed, if I would have taken more company to help me. But, without fearing any imputation of raſhneſs, I may ſay, that I had more regard of reputation in that buſineſs, than of ſafety. For I thought it to belong unto the honour of our Prince and Nation, that a few Iſlanders ſhould not think any advantage great enough, againſt a Fleet ſet forth by Q. Elizabeth: and further, I was unwilling, that ſome Low-Country Captains, and others, not of mine own ſquadron, whoſe aſſiſtance I had refuſed, ſhould pleaſe themſelves with a ſweet conceit (though it would have been ſhort, when I had landed in ſome other place) That for want of their help I was driven to turn tail. Therefore I took with me none, but men aſſured, Commanders of mine own ſquadron, with ſome of their followers, and a few other Gentlemen, voluntaries, whom I could not refuſe; as, Sir William Brook, Sir William Harvey, Sir Arthur Gorges, Sir John Skot, Sir Thomas Ridgeway, Sir Henry Tinnes, Sir Charles Morgan, Sir Walter Chute, Marcellus Throckmorton, Captain Laurence Kemis, Captain William Morgan, and others ſuch as well underſtood themſelves and the enemy: by whoſe help, with Gods favour, I made good the enterprize I undertook. As for the working of the Sea, the ſteepneſs of the Cliffs, and other troubles that were not new to us, we overcame them well enough. And theſe (notwithſtanding) made five or ſix companies of the enemies, that ſought to impeach our landing, abandon the wall, whereon their Muſketiers lay on the Reſt for us, and won the place of them without any great loſs. This I could have done with leſs danger, ſo that it ſhould not have ſerved for example of a Rule, that failed even in this example: but the reaſons before alledged, (together with other reaſons well known to ſome of the Gentlemen abovenamed, though more private than to be here laid down) made me rather follow the way of bravery, and take the ſhorter courſe; having it ſtill in mine own power to fall off when I ſhould think it meet. It is eaſily ſaid, that the Enemy was more than a Coward; (which yet was more than we knew) neither will I magnifie ſuch a ſmall piece of ſervice, by ſeeking to prove him better: whom had I thought equal to mine own followers, I would otherwiſe have dealt with. But for ſo much as concerns the propoſition in hand; he that beheld this, may well remember that the ſame enemy troubled us more in our march towards Fayal, than in our taking the ſhore; that he ſought how to ſtop us in place of his advantage, that many of our men were ſlain or hurt by him, among whom Sir Arthur Gorges was ſhot in that march; and that ſuch, as (thinking all danger to be paſt, when he had won good footing) would needs follow us to the Town, were driven by him, to forſake the pace of a man of war, and betake themſelves to an haſty trot.

For end of this Digreſſion, I hope that this queſtion ſhall never come to tryal; his Majeſties many movable Forts will forbid the experience. And although the Engliſh will no leſs diſdain, than any Nation under Heaven can do, to be beaten upon their own ground, or elſewhere by a forain enemy; yet to entertain thoſe that ſhall aſſail us, with their own Bief in their bellies, and before they eat of our Kentiſh Capons, I take it to be the wiſeſt way. To do which, his Majeſty after God, will imploy his good ſhips on the Sea, and not truſt to any intrenchment upon the ſhore.

§. X.

How the Romans attempt again to get the Maſtery of the Seas. The Victory of Cæcilius the Roman Conſul at Panormus: The ſiege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entred Lilybæum at pleaſure, in deſpight of the Roman Fleet. That it is a matter of great difficulty to ſtop the paſſage of good ſhips. The Romans, by reaſon of grievous loſſes received under Claudius and Junius their Conſuls, abandon the Seas again.

WHen, without a ſtrong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impoſſible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elſewhere; they reſolved once again, notwithſtanding their late miſadventures, to ſtrengthen their Fleet and Ships of war. So cauſing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Conſuls, C. Atilius, and L. Manlius. On the other ſide, Aſdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reaſon of the ſhipwrack which they had lately ſuffered, partly by reaſon of the overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were leſs daring than they had been in the beginning of the war: and withall, that one of the Conſuls was returned into Italy, with the one half of the Army, and that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus; he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Conſul was better adviſed. For when Aſdrubal had made his approaches ſomewhat near the Town, Cæcilius cauſed a deep trench to be cut, a good diſtance without the ditch of the City: between which and his trench he left ground ſufficient, to embattel a Legion of his Souldiers. To theſe he gave order that they ſhould advance themſelves, and paſs over the new trench, till ſuch time as the African Elephants were thruſt upon them. From thoſe beaſts he commanded them to retire by ſlow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means paſs. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a ſtand, they were ſo gawled and beaten, both by thoſe Souldiers that were on the inſide of the trench, and by thoſe that lay in the trench it ſelf, that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiouſly upon their own foot-men, and utterly diſordered them. Cæcilius eſpying his advantage; ſallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troops, that ſtood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great ſlaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome; the whole State filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two hundred ſail, which they ſent into Sicil, to give end to that war, that had now laſted fourteen years. With this Fleet and Army the Romans reſolved to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) ſave Drepanum, that was near adjoyning. They ſet down before it, and poſſeſs themſelves of all the places of advantage near unto it, eſpecially of ſuch as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They alſo beat to the ground ſix Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken ſo many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to deſpair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious ſallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that poſſibly could be made. He hath in Garriſon (beſides the Citizens) ten thouſand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty officers, that conſpire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly in danger of the like treaſon, ſaved Agrigentum. Himilco uſeth the help of Alexon, to aſſure the hired Souldiers, and imploys Hannibal to appeaſe the troops of the Gaules, which did waver, and had ſent their agents to the enemy. All, promiſe conſtancy and truth; ſo that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deſerve their bread. In the mean while, a ſupply of ten thouſand Souldiers is ſent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the Son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in deſpight of all reſiſtance, entred the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the beſieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perſwaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) reſolved to ſet upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the ſiege, or (at leaſt) to take from them, or ſet on fire their engines of battery. The attempt is preſently made, and purſued to the uttermoſt, with great ſlaughter on both ſides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the

the advantage of the ground, hold ſtill their places, and with extreme difficulty defend their engines.

They of Carthage deſire greatly to underſtand the ſtate of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to ſend into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the ſervice; and having received his diſpatch, ſails with one Gally to Æguſa, a little Iſland near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he ſteered directly with the Port; and having a paſſing ſwift Gally, he paſt through the beſt of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate ere any of thoſe which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thruſt from the ſhores on either ſide.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he ſet ſail, and ſhipped his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of ſteerage, and himſelf expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in deſpight of all the purſuit made after him. Then, finding himſelf out of danger of being encompaſſed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durſt come forth to undertake him. This enterpriſe, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in thoſe dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill afarr off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to paſs by the beſt appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths againſt him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sueden were at war, our Eaſt-land Fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the ſubjects of his enemies, and he threatned to ſink their ſhips if they came through the ſtraights of Elſenour. Notwithſtanding this, our Merchants (having a ſhip of her Majeſties, called the Minion to defend them) made the adventure, and ſuſtaining ſome Vollies of ſhot, kept on their courſe. The King made all the proviſion he could to ſtop them, or ſink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only paſs out with little loſs, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elſenour; which at that time was not ſo well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long, ſince that the Duke of Parma, beſieging Antwerp, and finding no poſſibility to maſter it, otherwiſe than by famine, laid his Cannon on the bank of the River, ſo well to purpoſe, and ſo even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impoſſible for the leaſt boat to paſs by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good market for their Butter and Cheeſe, even the poor men attending their profit when all things were extreme dear in Antwerp, paſſed in boats of ten or twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in deſpight of it; when a ſtrong Weſterly wind, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as alſo with a contrary wind, and an ebbing water, they turned back again: ſo as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the year 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four demi-cannons within point-blank, from ſix in the morning till twelve at noon. The ſiege of Oſtend, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to ſtop the paſſage of a good ſhip, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is ſo ſet, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no paſſage along beſide it, or that the ſhips are driven to turn upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of wind and tide; there, and in ſuch places, it is of great uſe, and fearful: otherwiſe not.

But to return to our adventrous Rhodian: He arrives in ſafety at Carthage, and makes them know the eſtate of Lilybæum. Others alſo, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the ſame ſucceſs. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel; and, for that purpoſe, fill many Merchants ſhips with great ſtones, and ſink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded ſo many of thoſe great bellied-boats in the beſt of the entrance, as at laſt it made a manifeſt riſing and heap, like a ragged Iſland in the paſſage. Hereby it came to paſs, that a Carthaginian Gally, taking her courſe by night, and not ſuſpecting any ſuch impediment, ran her ſelf aground thereon, and

How the Romans attempt again to get the Mastery of the Seas. The Victory of Cæcilius the Roman Consul at Panormus: The siege of Lilybæum. How a Rhodian Gally entred Lilybæum at pleasure, in despight of the Roman *Fleet. WHen, without a strong Navy, the Romans found it altogether impossible, either to keep what they had already gotten in Sicil, or to enlarge their Dominions in Africa, or elsewhere; they resolved once again, notwithstanding their late misadventures, to strengthen their Fleet and Ships of war. So causing fifty new Gallies to be built, and the old to be repaired, they gave them in charge (together with certain Legions of Souldiers) to the new Consuls, C. Aurunc. and L. Manlius. On the other side Asdrubal perceiving that the Romans, partly by reason of the shipwrack which they had lately suffered, partly by reason of the overthrow which they received by Xantippus in Africa, were less daring than they had been in the beginning of the war: and withall, that one of the Consuls was returned into Italy with the one half of the Army, and that Cæcilius, with only the other half, remained at Panormus; he removed with the Carthaginian forces from Lilybæum towards it, hoping to provoke Cæcilius to fight. But the Consul was better advised. For when Asdrubal had made his approaches somewhat near the Town, Cæcilius caused a deep trench to be cut, a good distance without the ditch of the City: between which and his trench he left ground sufficient, to embattel a Legion of his Souldiers. To these he gave order that they should advance themselves, and pass over the new trench, till such time as the African Elephants were thrust upon them. From those beasts he commanded them to retire by slow degrees till they had drawn on the Elephants to the brink of the new trench, which they could by no means pass. This they performed accordingly. For when the Elephants were at a stand, they were so galled and beaten, both by those Souldiers that were on the inside of the trench, and by those that lay in the trench it self that being inraged by their many wounds, they brake back furiously upon their own foot-men, and utterly disordered them. Cæcilius espying his advantage; sallied with all the force he had; and charging the other troops, that stood embattailed, he utterly brake them, and put them to their heels; making a great slaughter of them, and taking all their Elephants.

The report of this Victory being brought to Rome; the whole State filled with courage, prepared a new Fleet of two hundred sail, which they sent into Sicil, to give end to that war, that had now lasted fourteen years. With this Fleet and Army the Romans resolved to attempt Lilybæum, the only place of importance which the Carthaginians held in Sicil; and all (indeed) save Drepanum, that was near adjoyning. They set down before it, and possess themselves of all the places of advantage near unto it, especially of such as command the Haven, which had a very difficult entrance. They also beat to the ground six Towers of defence; and by forcible engines weaken so many other parts of the City, as the defendants begin to despair. Yet Himilco, Commander of the place, faileth not in all that belongs to a man of War. All that is broken he repaireth with admirable diligence; he maketh many furious sallies, and giveth to the Romans all the affronts that possibly could be made. He hath in Garrison (besides the Citizens) ten thousand Souldiers; among which there are certain Lieutenants, and other petty officers, that conspire to render and betray the Town. But the matter is revealed by an Achæan, called Alexon, who had formerly in danger of the like treason, saved Agrigentum. Himilco useth the help of Alexon, to assure the hired Souldiers, and imploys Hannibal to appease the troops of the Gaules, which did waver, and had sent their agents to the enemy. All, promise constancy and truth; so that the Traitors, being unable to perform what they had undertaken, are fain to live in the Roman Camp as fugitives, that had wrought no good whereby to deserve their bread. In the mean while, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Carthage to their relief, having Hannibal the Son of Amilcar for their Conductor: who, in despight of all resistance, entred the Port and City, to the incredible joy of the besieged. The old Souldiers, together with the new Companies, (thereto perswaded by Himilco with hope of great reward) resolved to set upon the Romans in their trenches, and either force them to abandon the siege, or (at least) to take from them, or set on fire their engines of battery. The attempt is presently made, and pursued to the uttermost, with great slaughter on both sides. But the Romans, being more in number, and having the

They of Carthage deſire greatly to underſtand the ſtate of things at Lilybæum; but know not how to ſend into the Town. A certain Rhodian undertakes the ſervice; and having received his diſpatch, ſails with one Gally to Ægusa, a little Iſland near Lilybæum. Thence, taking his time he ſteered directly with the Port; and having a paſſing ſwift Gally, he paſt through the beſt of the Channel, and recovered the water-gate ere any of thoſe which the Romans had to guard the Port, could thruſt from the ſhores on either ſide.

The next day, neither attending the covert of the dark night, nor dreading to be boorded by the Roman Gallies, who waited his return, he ſet ſail, and ſhipped his Oars (his Gally being exceeding quick of ſteerage, and himſelf expert in all parts of the Channel) recovered the Havens mouth, and the Sea, in deſpight of all the purſuit made after him. Then, finding himſelf out of danger of being encompaſſed by many, he turned again towards the mouth of the Haven, challenging any one, if any one durſt come forth to undertake him. This enterpriſe, and the well performing of it, was very remarkable, and much wondred at in thoſe dayes: and yet, where there was no great Artillery, nor any other weapons of fire, to kill afarr off, the adventure which this Rhodian made was not greatly hazardous. For in this Age, a valiant and judicious man of war will not fear to paſs by the beſt appointed Fort of Europe, with the help of a good Tide, and a leading gale of wind: no, though forty pieces of great Artillery open their mouths againſt him, and threaten to tear him in pieces.

In the beginning of our late Queens time, when Denmark and Sueden were at war, our Eaſt-land Fleet, bound for Leif-land, was forbidden by the King of Denmark to trade with the ſubjects of his enemies, and he threatned to ſink their ſhips if they came through the ſtraights of Elſenour. Notwithſtanding this, our Merchants (having a ſhip of her Majeſties, called the Minion to defend them) made the adventure, and ſuſtaining ſome Vollies of ſhot, kept on their courſe. The King made all the proviſion he could to ſtop them, or ſink them at their return. But the Minion, commanded (as I take it) by William Burrough, leading the way, did not only paſs out with little loſs, but did beat down, with Artillery, a great part of the Fort of Elſenour; which at that time was not ſo well rampard, as now perhaps it is: and the Fleet of Merchants that followed him, went through without any wound received. Neither was it long, ſince that the Duke of Parma, beſieging Antwerp, and finding no poſſibility to maſter it, otherwiſe than by famine, laid his Cannon on the bank of the River, ſo well to purpoſe, and ſo even with the face of the Water, that he thought it impoſſible for the leaſt boat to paſs by. Yet the Hollanders and Zelanders, not blown up by any wind of glory, but coming to find a good market for their Butter and Cheeſe, even the poor men, attending their profit when all things were extreme dear in Antwerp, paſſed in boats of ten or twelve Tun, by the mouth of the Dukes Cannon, in deſpight of it; when a ſtrong Weſterly wind, and a Tide of flood favoured them; as alſo with a contrary wind, and an ebbing water, they turned back again: ſo as he was forced, in the end, to build his Stockado overthwart the River, to his marvellous trouble and charge.

The Fort Saint Philip terrified not us in the year 1596. when we entred the Port of Caliz, neither did the Fort at Puntal, when we were entred, beat us from our anchoring by it; though it plaid upon us with four demi-cannons within point-blank, from ſix in the morning till twelve at noon. The ſiege of Oſtend, and of many other places, may be given for proof, how hard a matter it is to ſtop the paſſage of a good ſhip, without another as good to encounter it. Yet this is true, that where a Fort is ſo ſet, as that of Angra in Tercera, that there is no paſſage along beſide it, or that the ſhips are driven to turn upon a bow-line towards it, wanting all help of wind and tide; there, and in ſuch places, it is of great uſe, and fearful: otherwiſe not.

But to return to our adventrous Rhodian: He arrives in ſafety at Carthage, and makes them know the eſtate of Lilybæum. Others alſo, after this, take upon them to do the like, and perform it with the ſame ſucceſs. The Romans therefore labour to choak the Channel; and, for that purpoſe, fill many Merchants ſhips with great ſtones, and ſink them therein. The force of the Tides clears it again in part: but they grounded ſo many of thoſe great bellied-boats in the beſt of the entrance, as at laſt it made a manifeſt riſing and heap, like a ragged Iſland in the paſſage. Hereby it came to paſs, that a Carthaginian Gally, taking her courſe by night, and not ſuſpecting any ſuch impediment, ran her ſelf aground thereon, and was taken. Now comes that brave Rhodian, thinking to enter, as he had done before: but this Carthaginian Gally, a little before taken, gave him chase, and gathered upon him, he finds what she is, both by her form, and by her swiftness: and being not able to run from her, resolved to fight with her. But she is too well manned for him, so that he is beaten and taken.

Lilybæum, after this, is greatly distressed, the Souldiers being worn with labour and watching. But in this despair there rose so violent a tempest, as some of the Romans Wooden-Towers, by which they over-topt the walls of Lilybæum, were over-turned. A Greek Souldier undertakes to fire those that were fallen, and performs it: for the fire was no sooner kindled, but being blown unto by the bellows of a tempest, it increased so fast, as it became resistless, and in the end burned all to ashes, and melted the brazen heads of the battering Ramms. Hereupon, despair and wearines hinder the Romans from repairing their Engines: so that they resolve, by a long siege, to starve the defendants.

Upon relation of what had past, a supply of ten thousand Souldiers is sent from Rome, under M. Claudius, the Consul. He arrives at Messana, and marcheth over Land to Lilybæum: where having re-inforced the Army, and supplied the Gallies with new Rowers, he propounds the surprise of Drepanum, a City on the other side of the Bay of Lilybæum. This service the Captains and Souldiers willingly embrace. So the Consul embarques his troops, and arrives on the sudden in the mouth of the Port. Adherbal is Governour of the Town, a valiant and prudent man of war, who being ignorant of the new supply arrived at Lilybæum, was at first amazed at their sudden approach; but having recovered his spirits, he perswades the Souldiers rather to fight abroad, than to be encloſed. Herewithall he promiseth great rewards to such, as by their valour shall deserve them; offering to lead them himself, and to fight in the head of his Fleet. Having sufficiently encouraged his men, he thrust into the Sea towards the Romans. The Consul, deceived of his expectation, calls back the foremost Gallies, that he might now marshall them for defence. Hereupon some row backward, some forward, in great confusion. Adherbal finds and follows his advantage, and forceth the Consul into a Bay at hand, wherein he rangeth himself, having the Land on his back: hoping thereby to keep himself from being incompassed. But he was thereby, and for want of Sea-room, so straightned as he could not turn himself any way from his enemies, nor range himself in any order. Therefore when he found no hope of resistance, keeping the shore on his left hand, he thrust out of the Bay with thirty Gallies, besides his own, and so fled away: all the rest of his Fleet, to the number of ninety and four ships, were taken or sunk by the Carthaginians. Adherbal for this service is greatly honoured at Carthage; and Claudius, for his indiscretion and flight, as much disgraced at Rome.

The Romans, notwithstanding this great loss, arm threescore Gallies, with which they send away L. Junius, their Consul, to take charge of their business in Sicil. Junius arrives at Messana, where he meets with the whole remainder of the Roman Fleet, those excepted which rode in the Port of Lilybæum. One hundred and twenty Gallies he had; and besides these, he had gotten together almost eight hundred ships of burthen, which were laden with all necessary provisions for the Army. With this great Fleet he arrives at Syracuse, where he stayes a while; partly to take in Corn, partly to wait for some that were too slow of sail to keep company with him along from Messana. In the mean time he dispatcheth away towards Lilybæum his Questors or Treasurers; to whom he commits the one half of his victuallers, with some Gallies for their Convoy.

Adherbal was not careless after his late victory: but studied how to use it to the best advantage. The ships and prisoners that he had taken, he sent to Carthage. Of his own Gallies he delivered thirty to Carthalo, who had threescore and ten more under his own charge; and sent him to try what good might be done against the Roman Fleet in the Haven of Lilybæum. According to his direction, Carthalo suddenly enters the mouth of that Haven, where he finds the Romans more attentive to the keeping in of the besieged Carthaginians, than to the defence of their own against another Fleet. So he chargeth them, boords, and takes some, and fires the rest. The Roman Camp takes alarm, and hastens to the rescue. But Himilco, Governour of the Town, is not behind hand; who sallies out at the same time, and putting the Romans to great distress, gives Carthalo good leisure to go through with his enterprise.

After this exploit, Carthalo ran all along the South coast of Sicil, devising how to work mischief to the enemy; wherein Fortune presented him with a fair occasion, which he wisely managed. He was advertised tiſed by his Scouts, that they had diſcryed, near at hand, a great fleet, conſiſting of all manner of Veſſels. Theſe were the victuallers, which the Conſul Junius, more haſtily than providently, had ſent before him towards Lilybæum. Carthalo was glad to hear of their coming: for he and his men were full of courage, by reaſon of their late victories. Accounting therefore the great multitude of Roman Hulks, approaching, to be rather a prey than a fleet likely to make ſtrong oppoſition, he haſtens to encounter them. It fell out according to his expectation. The Romans had no mind to fight: but were glad to ſeek ſhelter in an open Road, full of Rocks under the covert of a poor Town, belonging to their party; that could help to ſave them only from the preſent danger, by lending them engines and other aid, wherewith to beat off the Carthaginians that aſſailed them. Carthalo therefore, having taken a few of them, lay waiting for the reſt, that could not long ride under thoſe Rocks, but would be forced by any great change of wind, either to put out into the deep, or to ſave their men how they could, by taking land, with the loſs of all their ſhipping. Whilſt he was buſie in this care, the Conſul Junius drew near, and was diſcovered. Againſt him Carthalo makes out, and finds him altogether unprepared to fight as being wholly ignorant of that which had hapned. The Conſul had neither means to fly, nor ability to fight. Therefore he likewiſe ran into a very dangerous Creek; thinking no danger ſo great as that of the enemy. The Carthaginian ſeeing this, betakes himſelf to a ſtation between the two Roman fleets; where he watcheth, to ſee which of them would firſt ſtir, with a reſolution to aſſault that, which ſhould firſt dare to put it ſelf into the Sea. So as now all the three fleets were on the South coaſt of Sicil, between the Promontory of Pachinus and Lilybæum; a Tract exceeding dangerous, when the wind ſtormed at South. The Carthaginians, who knew the times of tempeſt, and their ſignes, finding (belike) ſome ſwelling billow (for ſo we do in the Weſt of England, before a Southernly ſtorm) haſted to double the Cape of Pachinus, thereby to cover themſelves from the rage at hand. But the Romans, who knew better how to fight than how to Navigate, and never found any foul weather in the entrails of their beaſts, their South-ſayers being all land-Prophets, were ſuddenly overtaken with a boiſterous South-wind, and all the Gallies forced againſt the rocks, and utterly wrackt.

This calamity ſo diſcouraged the Romans, that they reſolved again to forſake the Seas, and truſt only to the ſervice of their Legions upon firm ground. But ſuch a reſolution cannot long hold. Either they muſt be ſtrong at Sea, or elſe they muſt not make war in an Iſland, againſt thoſe that have a mightier fleet. Yet are they to be excuſed, in regard of the many great calamities which they had ſuffered through their want of ſkill. Here I cannot forbear to commend the patient vertue of the Spaniards. We ſeldom or never find, that any Nation hath endured ſo many miſadventures and miſeries, as the Spaniards have done, in their Indian Diſcoveries. Yet perſiſting in their enterpriſes with an invincible conſtancy, they have annexed to their Kingdom ſo many goodly Provinces, as bury the remembrance of all dangers paſt. Tempeſts and ſhipwracks, famine, overthows, mutinies, heat and cold, peſtilence, and all manner of diſeaſes both old and new, together with extream poverty, and want of all things needful, have been the enemies wherewith every one of their moſt noble diſcoverers, at one time or other, hath incountred. Many years have paſſed over ſome of their heads in the ſearch of not ſo many leagues: yea more than one or two have ſpent their labour, their wealth, and their lives, in ſearch of a golden Kingdom, without getting further notice of it, than what they had at their firſt ſetting forth. All which notwithſtanding, the third, fourth, and fifth undertakers, have not been diſheartned. Surely, they are worthily rewarded with thoſe Treaſuries and Paradiſes which they enjoy; and well they deſerve to hold them quietly, if they hinder not the like vertues in others, which (perhaps) will not be found.

§. XI.

The City of Eryx is ſurpriſed by the Romans, and recovered by Amilcar, who ſtoutly holds war with them five years. The Romans, having emptied their common treaſury, build a new fleet at the charges of private men. The great victory at Sea of Lucſatius the Conſul; whereby the Carthaginians are forced to crave peace. The conditions of the peace between Rome and Carthage.

THE Romans were careful to ſupply with all induſtry, by land, the want of ſtrength at Sea. Therefore they continue the ſiege of Lilybæum, and ſeek to make ſure to themſelves all places, whither the enemies ſhips could not bring relief. The Conſul Junius, to cure the wound of diſhonour, which he had received, bethought him what enterpriſes to undertake. In the end he reſolved to attempt the Mountain and City of Eryx, with the Temple of Venus Erycina: which was the faireſt and richeſt of all the Iſland; and of theſe, by cunning or treaſon, he got poſſeſſion. Eryx was commodiouſly ſeated between Drepanum and Panormus; ſo that it ſeemed a fit place for a Garriſon, that ſhould reſtrain the Carthaginians from making roads into the Country. Wherefore Junius fortified both the top of the Mountain, and the firſt entrance of the paſſage from the bottom, (both of which places were very defenſible) with a good ſtrength of men. But ſhortly after, in the eighteenth year of this war, the Carthaginians ſet forth Amilcar, ſurnamed Barcas, Father of the great Hannibal, with a Fleet and Army, who ſailing to the coaſts of Italy, did throughly repay the ſpoils which the Romans made in Africa. For he firſt of all waſted and deſtroyed the Territories of the Locrians, and of the Brutians, that were dependants of Rome. Then entred he into Sicil, and finding there no walled City in the Carthaginians power, that ſerved fitly to infeſt the Romans, he occupied a piece of ground of great advantage, and lodged his Army thereon; to confront as well the Romans, that were in Panormus, as thoſe that kept about Eryx, putting himſelf between both Armies with admirable reſolution.

The place that Amilcar had ſeized upon, was not only very ſtrong by ſituation, but had the command of a Port: whereby it gave him opportunity to ſcour all the coaſt of Italy with his Fleet, waſting all along as far as to Cuma. In the Iſle of Sicil he held the Romans to hard work, lying near unto Panormus: where in three years abode, he did many notable acts, though not of much conſequence, for that the enemy could never be drawn to hazard the main chance. Having wearied himſelf and the Romans long enough about Panormus, he undertook a ſtrange piece of work at Eryx. The Roman Garriſons, placed there by Junius, on the top, and at the bottom of the Mountain, were very ſtrongly lodged. Nevertheleſs Amilcar found a way, lying towards the Sea-ſide, by which he conveighed his men into the City of Eryx, that was about the midſt of the aſcent, ere the enemy knew of it. By this it came to paſs, that the Romans which kept the top of the mountain, were ſtraightly held (as it were) beſieged. And no leſs was Amilcar himſelf reſtrained, by both of theſe Garriſons, and ſuch as came to relieve them. There he found them paſtime about two years more, hoping ſtill to weary out thoſe that lay over his head, as they on the contrary did their beſt, to thruſt him out of thoſe quarters.

At this time, all the care, both of the Romans and of the Carthaginians, was bent unto the proſecuting of this buſineſs at Eryx. Wherein it ſeems true (as Hanibal in Livie, ſpake unto Scipio) that the affairs of Carthage never ſtood in better terms, ſince the beginning of the war, than now they did. For whereas the Romans had utterly forſaken the Seas, partly by reaſon of their great loſſes; partly upon confidence of their land-forces, which they held reſiſtleſs; Amilcar, with a ſmall Army, had ſo well acquitted himſelf, to the honour of his Country, that by the tryal of five years war, the Carthaginian Souldier was judged equal, if not ſuperior to the Roman. Finally, when all, that might be, had been deviſed and done, for the diſlodging of this obſtinate Warriour: no way ſeemed better to the Senate of Rome, than once again to build a fleet; whereby, if the maſtery of the Sea could once be gotten, it was likely that Amilcar, for lack of ſupply, ſhould not long be able to hold out. But in performing this, extream difficulty was found. The common treaſury was exhauſted: and the coſt was not little, that was requiſite unto ſuch an enterpriſe. Wherefore there was none other way left, than to lay the burden upon private purſes. Divers of the principal Citizens undertook to build (each at his own charges) one Quinquereme, which example wrought ſo well, that they, whoſe ability would not ſerve to do the like, joyned with ſome others, and laying their mony together, concurred two or three of them, in building of another; with condition to be repayed, when the war was finiſhed. By this voluntary contribution, they made and finiſhed two hundred new Quinqueremes: taking for their pattern, that excellent ſhift rowing Gally which they had gotten from the Rhodian, in the Port of Lilybæum, as was ſhewed before. The charge of this fleet was committed to C. Lutatius Catulus; who paſt with the ſame into Sicil the Spring following, and entred the Port of Drepanum; indeavouring by all means to have forced the City. But being advertiſed that the Carthaginian fleet was at hand, and being mindful of the late loſſes which his Predeceſſors had received; he was carefull to put himſelf in order, againſt their arrival.

Hanno was Admiral of the Carthaginian fleet; a man (as his actions declare him) wiſe

in

in picture, exceedingly formal, and ſkilful in the art of ſeeming reverend. How his reputation was firſt bred, I do not find; but it was upheld by a factious contradiction, of things undertaken by men more worthy than himſelf. This quality procured unto him (as it hath done to many others) both good liking among the antient ſort, whoſe cold temper is averſe from new enterpriſes; and therewithall an opinion of great foreſight, confirmed by every loſs received. More particularly, he was gracious among the people, for that he was one of the moſt grievous oppreſſors of their ſubject Provinces; whereby he procured unto the Carthaginians much wealth, but therewithall ſuch hatred, as turned it all to their great loſs. He had ere this been imployed againſt the Numidians and wild Africans, that were more like to Rovers than to Souldiers, in making War. Of thoſe fugitive Nations he learned to neglect more manly enemies, to his own great diſhonour, and to the great hurt of Carthage; which loſt not more by his bad conduct, than by his malicious counſel, when, having ſhewed himſelf an unworthy Captain, he betook himſelf to the long Robe. Yet is he much commended in Roman Hiſtories, as a temperate man, and one that ſtudied how to preſerve the League between Carthage and Rome. In which regard, how well he deſerved of his own Country, it will appear hereafter: how beneficial he was to the Romans, it will appear, both hereafter, and in his preſent voyage; wherein he reduced the Carthaginians to a miſerable neceſſity of accepting, upon hard conditions, that peace which he thenceforth commended.

Hanno had very well furniſhed his Navy, with all needful proviſions for the Souldiers at Eryx (for dexterity in making preparation was the beſt of his qualities): but he had neither been careful in training his Marriners, to the practice of Sea-fight, nor in manning his Gallies with ſtout fellows. He thought, that the fame of a Carthaginian fleet was enough, to make the unexpert Romans give way: forgetting, that rather the reſiſtleſs force of tempeſts, than any other ſtrength of oppoſition, had made them to forſake the Seas. Yet in one thing he had either conceived aright, or elſe was ſent forth well inſtructed. It was his purpoſe, firſt of all to ſail to Eryx, and there to diſcharge his ſhips of their lading: and having thus lightned himſelf, he meant to take aboard ſome part of the Land-army, together with Amilcar himſelf, by whoſe help he doubted not, but that he ſhould be able to make his enemy repent of his new adventure to Sea. This was a good courſe, if it could have been performed. But Catulus uſed all poſſible diligence, to prevent the execution of this deſign: not becauſe he was informed of the enemies purpoſe, but that he knew it to be the beſt for them, and for that he feared no danger ſo greatly, as to encounter with Amilcar. Wherefore although the weather was very rough, and the Seas went high, when the Carthaginian fleet was deſcried; yet he rather choſe to fight with the enemy, that had the wind of him, than to ſuffer his convoy to paſs along to Eryx, upon unlikely hope of better opportunity in the future. All that Hanno ſhould have done, Catulus had performed. He had carefully exerciſed his men in Rowing; he had lightned his Gallies of all unneceſſary burthens; and he had taken aboard the choiſe men of the Roman Land-Souldiers. The Carthaginians therefore, at the firſt encounter were utterly broken and defeated, having fifty of their Gallies ſtemmed and ſunk, and ſeventy taken, wherein were few leſs than ten thouſand men, that were all made priſoners: the reſt, by a ſudden change of wind, eſcaping to the Ile of Hieroneſus.

The ſtate of Carthage, utterly diſcouraged by this change of fortune, knew not whereon to reſolve. Means to repair their fleet in any time, there were none left; their beſt men of war by Sea were conſumed; and Amilcar, upon whoſe valour and judgement the honour and ſafety of the Common-weal reſted, was now ſurrounded by his enemies in Sicil, where he could not be relieved. In this extremity, they make diſpatch unto Amilcar himſelf, and authorized him to take what courſe ſhould ſeem beſt unto his excellent wiſdom, leaving all concluſions to his election and ſole counſel.

Amilcar, whom no adverſity, accompanied with the leaſt hope or poſſibility of recovery, had ever vanquiſhed, looking over every promiſe, true or falſe, that the preſent time could make him, (for to attend any thing from the future he was not able) reſolved to make trial, whether his neceſſity might be compounded upon any reaſonable terms. He therefore ſent to Lutatius the Conſul an overture of peace: who conſidering it well, gathered ſo many arguments from the preſent poverty of the Roman State, waſted beyond expectation in the former war, that he formerly harkened unto it. So, in concluſion, an accord was made, but with proviſion, That it ſhould hold none otherwiſe, than if the Senate and People of Rome would ratifie it with their allowance.

The

The conditions were: First, that the Carthaginians should clearly abandon the Isle of Sicil. Secondly, that they should never undertake upon Hieron King of Syracuse, nor invade any part of his Territories, nor the Territories of any of his Friends and Allies. Thirdly, that they should set at liberty, and send back into Italy, all the Romans, whom they held prisoners, without ransome. Lastly, that they should pay unto the Romans two thousand and two hundred talents; which make, as the French reckon the talent, thirteen hundred and twenty thousand crowns: the same to be delivered within twenty years next following.

These Articles were sent to Rome, where they were not throughly approved: but ten Commissioners were sent into Sicil, to make perfect the agreement. These Commissioners added a thousand talents to the former sum; and required a shorter time of payment. Further also they took order, that the Carthaginians should not only depart out of Sicil it self, but should also withdraw their Companies out of all other Islands between it and Italy, renouncing their whole interest therein.

Such was the end of the first Punick War, that had lasted about twenty four years without intermission; in which time the Romans had lost, by fight or shipwrack, about seven hundred Quinqueremes; and the Carthaginians about five hundred: the greatness of which losses, doth serve to prove the greatness both of these two Cities, and of the War it self: wherein I hold good the judgement of Polybius. That the Romans, in general, did shew themselves the braver Nation; and Amilcar, the most worthy Captain.

CHAP. II.

Of divers actions passing between the first and second Punick Warrs.

§. I.

Of the cruel War begun between the Carthaginians and their own Mercenaries.

THE Romans having partly by force, and partly by composition, thrust the Carthaginians out of Sicil, and all the little Islands thereunto adjacent, gave them rather means and leisure to help themselves in a following war, than cause to hold themselves contented with the present peace. It is an ancient and true rule, Quòd leges à victoribus dicuntur, accipiuntur à victis; That laws are given by the Conquerors, and received of the conquered. But the Romans had either forgotten the answer that was made unto them, by one of the Privernates; or else had forgotten to follow it in this weighty business. For when one of Privernum, after a rebellion, defending in the Senate the cause of his City, was demanded by a Senator, What peace the Romans might hope for, or assure themselves of, if they quitted their present advantage over them; he answered in those words, Si bonam dederitis, & fidam & perpetuam; si malam, haud diuturnam; If the peace be good and faithful that you give us, it will be perpetual, if it be ill, then of little continuance. To this answer the Senate, at that time gave such approbation, that it was said, Viri & liberi vocem auditam; An credi posset, ullum populum, aut hominem deniq; in ea conditione, cujus eum pœnitcat, diutius quam necesse sit mansurum? That it was the speech of a manly, and free man; for who could believe, that any people, or indeed any one man, would continue longer in an over-burdened estate, than meer necessity did enforce? Now, if the Romans themselves could make this judgement of those Nations, who had little else besides their manly resolution, to defend their liberty; surely, they grosly flattered themselves, in presuming that the Carthaginians, who neither in power nor in pride, were any way inferiour unto themselves, would sit down any longer by the loss and dishonour received, than untill they could recover their legs, and the strength which had a while failed them to take revenge. But occasion, by which (while well entertained) not only private men, but Kings and publick States, have more prevailed, than by any proper prowess or vertue, with-held the tempest from the Romans for a time, and turned it most fearfully upon Africa, and the Carthaginians themselves.

For

For after the firſt Punick war was ended, Amilcar, leaving Eryx, went to Lilybæum, from whence moſt conveniently the Army might be tranſported into Africk: the care of which buſineſs he committed unto Geſco, to whom, as to a man of approved ſufficiency, he delivered over his charge. Geſco had an eſpecial conſideration of the great ſumms, wherein Carthage was indepted unto theſe Mercenaries; and withall, of the great diſability to make payment. Therefore he thought it the wiſeſt way, to ſend them over (as it were) by handfuls a few at a time; that ſo the firſt might have their diſpatch, and be gone, ere the ſecond or third Companies arrived. Herein he dealt providently. For it had not been hard to perſwade any ſmall number, lodged within ſo great a City as Carthage, unto ſome ſuch reaſonable compoſition, as the preſent emptineſs of the common Treaſury did require: ſo that the firſt might have been friendly diſcharged, and a good preſident left unto the ſecond and third, whilſt their diſ-junction had made them unable to recover their whole due by force. But the Carthaginians were of a contrary opinion. They thought to find, in the whole Army, ſome that would be contented to gratifie the Publick State, by remitting a great part of their own due: and hoped, by ſuch an example, to draw all the multitude to the like agreement and capitulation. So they detained the firſt and ſecond commers; telling them, that they would make an even reckoning with all together. Thus every day the number increaſed, and many diſorders (a thing incident among Souldiers) were committed; which much diſquieted the City, not accuſtomed unto the like. In this regard it was thought fit, to remove them all to ſome other place, where they might be leſs troubleſome. This muſt be done by ſome colourable words of perſwaſion: for their number was already ſo great, that it was not ſafe to offend them too far. Wherefore it is deviſed, that they ſhould all attend the coming of their fellows, at Sicca: receiving every one a piece of gold, to bear his charges in the mean while.

This motion is accepted, and the Souldiers began to diſ-lodge; leaving behind them their wives, their children, and all their baggage, as meaning ſhortly to fetch away all, when they came back for their pay. But the Carthaginians have no fancy to their returning into the Town; and therefore compel them to truſs up their fardels, that they might have none occaſion left to make any errands thither. So to Sicca they removed, with all their goods: and there lay waiting for news of their fellows arrival, and their own pay. Buſineſs they had none to do, and therefore might eaſily be drawn to mutiny: the whole argument of their diſcourſe inclining them to nothing elſe. Their daily talk was, how rich they ſhould be, when all their mony came in: how much would fall to every ſingle ſhare: and for how long time the City was behind hand with them in reckoning. They were all grown Arithmeticians; and he was thought a man of worth, that could find moſt reaſon to increaſe their demands, to the very higheſt, even beyond their due. No part of their long ſervice was forgotten; but the comfortable words and promiſes of their Captains, leading them forth to any dangerous fight, were called to mind, and ſo many obligations, not to be cancelled without ſatisfying their expectation by ſome unordinary largeſs.

Thus the time paſſeth away, untill the whole Army being arrived, and lodged in Sicca, Hanno comes thither to clear the accompt. Now is the day come, wherein they ſhall all be made rich; eſpecially if they can hold together, in maintaining ſtoutly the common cauſe. So think they all; and aſſemble themſelves to hear what good news this meſſenger had brought: with a full reſolution to help his memory, in caſe he ſhould happen to forget any part of the many promiſes made to them; all which were to be conſidered in their Donative. Hanno begins a very formal Oration; wherein he bewails the poverty of Carthage, tells them how great a ſumm of mony is to be paid unto the Romans; reckons up the exceſſive charges whereat the Common-wealth had been in the late War; and finally deſires them to hold themſelves contented with part of their pay, and out of the love which they bare unto the City, to remit the reſt. Few of them underſtood his diſcourſe: for the Carthaginian Army was compoſed of ſundry Nations, as Greeks, Africans, Gaules, Ligurians, Spaniards, and others; all of different languages. Yet they ſtared upon him, and were (as I think) little pleaſed with his very geſture. But when ſuch as conceived the whole tenour of his ſpeech, had informed the reſt what cold comfort he brought; they were all inraged, and fared like mad-men, ſo that nothing would ſerve to appeaſe them.

Hanno would fain have aſſwaged their fury, but he knew not how: for he leſs underſtood their diſſonant loud noiſes, than they did his Oration. An Army collected out of ſo many Countries, that have no one language common to all, or to the greater part of them, is neither easily stirred up to mutiny, nor easily pacified, when once it is broken into out-rage. The best that Hanno can do, is to use the help of Interpreters and Messengers. But these Interpreters mistake his meaning; some for want of skill; others of set purpose; and such as deliver his errands in the worst sense, are best believed. Finally, they think themselves much abused by the Carthaginians, and resolve to demand their own in peremptory terms, at a nearer distance. In this mood they leave Sicca, and march as far as Tunis, that is within a very little of Carthage, and there they encamp.

Now begin the Carthaginians to find their own errour. It is a good Rule,

Curandum inprimis, ne magna injuria fiat
Fortibus & miseris.

Have special care, that valiant poverty
Be not oppresst with too great injury.

But this proud City, having neglected the Rule, hath also been careless in providing to secure her self against the inconvenience that might follow. She had suffered the whole multitude, whereupon she was like to give cause of discontent, to joyn it self into one body, when the several troops might easily have been dispersed: she hath turned out of her gates the wives, children, and goods of these poor men, which, had she retained in shew of kindness, she might have used them as Hostages for her own safety; and by imploying a miserable penny-father, in her negotiation with men of War, she hath weakned the reputation of her bravest Captains, that might best have served to free her from the threatning danger. Yet likely it is, that Amilcar had no desire to be used as an instrument in defrauding his own Souldiers of their wages: especially considering, that as he best could bear witness of their merits, so was he not ignorant, that means to content them were not wanting, if the Citizens had been willing thereunto. Hereupon may be added a probable conjecture that Hanno, with his complices, who at this very time was a bitter enemy to Amilcar, had the boldness to impose the blame of his own wretched counsel upon the liberal promises made by the Captains. Amilcar therefore did wisely, in suffering those that maligned him, to have the managing of their own plot, and to deal the cards which themselves had shuffled. This they continue to do as foolishly as they had at first begun. They furnish a market at Tunis, for the Souldiers; whom they suffer to buy what they list, and at what price they list. They send ever and anon some of their Senatours into the Camp; who promise to satisfie all demands, as far forth as it should be possible. And thus by shifting from one extreme to another, they make the Souldiers understand into what fear the City was driven; which cannot chuse but add much insolency to the passions already stirred up.

This sudden change of weather, and the true cause of it, is quickly found by the Army, which thereupon grows wise, and finding the season fit, labours to make a great harvest. Mony must be had, and without any abatement. This is granted. Many have lost their horses in publick service of the State. The State shall pay for them. They had lived some years by making hard shift, without receiving their allowance of victuals from Carthage. If they had lived, they wanted not meat; therefore what was this to the Carthaginians? Was it not all one, whether the ships did bring in provision, or their Captains direct them where to fetch it? But this would not serve. They said that they had been sometimes driven to buy; and that (since they could not remember how much, or at what rate they bought) they would be paid for their provision during the whole time, and according to the dearest price that Wheat had born, whilst the War lasted. Such are now the demands of these Mutiners; who might easily have been satisfied with far less charges, and far more honour, by receiving their due at the first. But now they make no end of craving. For whilst the Carthaginians are perplexed about this Corn-mony; the Souldiers have devised many more tricks, whereby to extort a greater summ of mony, without all regard of shame. Since therefore no good end could be found of these controversies which daily did multiply, it was thought convenient, that one of the Carthaginians, which had commanded in Sicil, should be chosen by the Souldiers to reconcile all differences. Hereunto the Army condescended, and made choice of Gesco: partly out of good liking to him, who had shewed himself at all times, a friendly man to them, and carefull of their good, especially when they were to be transported into Africk: partly out of a dislike which they had conceived of Amilcar; for that he had not visited them in all this busie time. So Gesco comes among them; and to please them the better, comes not without mony: which might give better countenance to his proceedings, than barren eloquence had done to the negotiation of Hanno. He calls unto him first of all the the Captains, and then the ſeveral Nations apart, rebuking them gently for that which had paſſed; adviſing them temperately concerning the preſent; and exhorting them to continue their love unto the State, which had long entertained them, and would needs alwaies be mindful of their good ſervices. After this he began to put hand to his purſe, offering to give them their whole pay in hand; and then after to conſider of other reckonings at a more convenient time. This had been well accepted, and might have ſerved to bring all to a quiet paſs, if two ſeditious Ring-leaders of the multitude had not ſtood againſt it.

There was in the Camp one Spendius, a ſturdy fellow, and audacious, but a ſlave; that in the late war had fled from a Roman, whom he ſerved, and therefore ſtood in fear, leſt he ſhould be delivered back to his Maſter; at whoſe hands he could expect no leſs, than to be whipt and crucified. This wretch could find no better way to prolong his own life, than by raiſing ſuch troubles as might ſerve to withdraw men from care of private matters, and make his own reſtitution impoſſible, were his Maſter never ſo importunate. With Spendius there aſſociated himſelf one Matho, an hot-headed man, that had been ſo forward in ſtirring up the tumult, as he could not chooſe but fear, leſt his own death ſhould be made an example, to deterr others from the like ſeditious behaviour. This Matho deals with his Countrymen the Africans; telling them, that they were in far worſe condition, than either the Gaules, the Greeks, the Spaniards, or any foraign Mercenaries. For (ſaith he) Theſe our companions have no more to do, than to receive their wages, and ſo get them gone: but we that are to ſtay behind in Africa, ſhall be called to another manner of accompt, when we are left alone; ſo that we ſhall have cauſe to wiſh that we had returned home beggars, rather than loaden with the money, which (little though it be) ſhall break our backs. Ye are not ignorant, how tyrannically thoſe our haughty Maſters of Carthage do reign over us. They think it reaſonable, that our lives and goods ſhould be at their diſpoſition; which they have at other times been accuſtomed to take from us even without apparent cauſe, as it were to declare their ſoveraignty: What will they now do, ſeeing that we have demeaned our ſelves as free-men, and been bold to ſet a good face on the matter, demanding our own, as others have done? Ye all do know, that it were a very ſhame for us, if having been as forward in every danger of war, as any other men, we ſhould now ſtand quaking like ſlaves, and not dare to open our mouths, when others take liberty to require their due. This notwithſtanding ye may aſſure your ſelves, that we are like to be taught better manners, as ſoon as our fellows are gone: in regard of whom they are content to ſhadow their indignation with a good, but a forced countenance. Let us therefore be wiſe, and conſider that they hate and fear us: their hatred will ſhew it ſelf when their fear is once paſt: unleſs we now take our time, and whileſt we are the ſtronger, enfeeble them ſo greatly, that their hatred ſhall not be able to do us wrong. All their ſtrength conſiſteth in money, wherewithall they have hired others againſt us, and us againſt others. At the preſent they have neither money nor friends. The beſt Army that ever ſerved them, whereof we are no ſmall part, lyes at their gates, ready to help us if we be men. A better opportunity cannot be expected; for were our ſwords once drawn, all Africk would riſe on our ſide. As for the Carthaginians, Whither can they ſend for help? The caſe it ſelf is plain. But we muſt quickly reſolve. Either we muſt prevent the diligence of Geſco, by incenſing theſe Gaules and Spaniards, and procuring them to draw blood; or elſe it behoveth us to pleaſe our good Maſters, by joyning with them againſt our fellows, yea by offering to forgive unto them all our wages, if ſo (peradventure) they may be won to forgive us, or not over-cruelly to puniſh our faults committed. He is moſt worthily a wretched ſlave, that neither hath care to win his Maſters love, nor the courage to attempt his own liberty.

By ſuch perſwaſions Matho wins the African Souldiers to his own purpoſe. They are not now ſo greedy of money, as of quarrel, which he that ſeeketh will not miſs to find. When Geſco therefore offered to pay them their whole ſtipend preſently, but referred their other demands, for horſes and victuals, to ſome other more convenient time; they brake into great outrage, and ſay, that they will have all, even all at once, and that out of hand. In this tumult, the whole Army flock together about Matho and Spendius; whoſe diligence is not wanting to add more fuel to the fire already blazing. Matho and Spendius are the only men to whom the Souldiers will hearken: if any other ſtand up to make a ſpeech, a ſhowre of ſtones, flying about his ears, puts him to ſilence, that he ſhall never afterwards ſpeak word more. Neither ſtay they to conſider what it is that any man would ſay: enough hath been ſaid already by thoſe good ſpokes-men; ſo that no other word (though perhaps to the ſame purpoſe) can be heard, ſave only Throw, throw.

Now the rebellion begins to take form. Matho and Spendius are choſen Captains; who, followed by a deſperate crue of Ruffians, will ſuffer no man to make his own peace, but purſue their own ends, under fair pretence of the common cauſe. All which notwithſtanding, Geſco is not wanting to the good of his Country, but adventures himſelf upon their fury. One while he deals with the Captains, and other principal men; taking them by the hand, and giving gentle words: another while, he works with the ſeveral Nations; putting them all in hope of their own hearts deſire, if any reaſon would content them. None of them are ſo ſullen as the Africans: indeed none of them had ſo good cauſe. They require him peremptorily to give them their own, and not to feed them with words. The truth is, that they are not ſo covetous as they ſeem: but will be more glad of an ill anſwer, than of a good payment. This is more than Geſco knows: he ſees not that Matho hath any more than bare words to beſtow upon them. Wherefore, as rebuking their inconſiderate heat, he tells them, That they may do well, if they ſtand in want of money, to ſeek it of their Captain Matho. This is enough. Shall he both defraud them and deride them? They ſtay no longer, but lay violent hands upon the treaſure that he had brought; yea upon him alſo, and all that are with him: as intending to take this in part of payment, and, for the reſt, to take another courſe. Matho and Spendius are glad of this. It had little pleaſed them to ſee their fellows begin to grow calm, by his fair language: wherefore they caſt into bonds both him, and all the Carthaginians that they can find; that ſo the Army may be freed from danger of good admonition, which they call Treaſon. After this follows open war. Matho ſolicites all Africk, and his Embaſſadors are every where well entertained. Neither is it needful to uſe perſwaſion: the very fame of this rebellion ſufficeth to draw the whole Country into it. Now muſt the Carthaginians be plagued for thoſe oppreſſions, with which they have plagued others. It is true that adverſity hath never been untold of her errours: and as ſhe is ever aſſured to hear her own, ſo commonly with her own ſhe undergoes thoſe of other men. The Africans finding the Carthaginians hang under the wheel, tell them boldly, that their Impoſitions were mercileſs; that they took from them the one half of their Corn; that they doubled their tributes in all things elſe; and that they inflicted upon their vaſſals the greateſt puniſhment for the leaſt offences. Theſe cruelties the Carthaginians themſelves have forgotten: but the people, that have ſuffered ſo much, retain all in perfect memory. Wherefore not only ſuch as can bear arms, are ready to do ſervice in this great commotion; but the very women bring forth their Jewels, and other ornaments, offering all to ſail for the maintenance of ſo juſt a quarrel. By this great forwardneſs, and liberal contribution, Matho and Spendius are ſupplyed with a ſtrong aid of threeſcore and ten thouſand Africans: and are moreover furniſhed with money, not only to ſatisfie the preſent appetite of their men; but ſufficient to continue the war begun, though it ſhould be of long endurance.

§. II.

Divers Obſervations upon this War with the Mercenaries.

I.

Of Tyranny, and how Tyrants are fain to uſe the help of Mercenaries.

HEre let us reſt a while, as in a convenient place, whence we may take a proſpect of the ſubject, over which we travel. Behold a tyrannical City, perſecuted by her own Mercenaries with a deadly war. It is a common thing, as being almoſt neceſſary, that a tyranny ſhould be upheld by Mercenary forces: it is common that Mercenaries ſhould be falſe: and it is common that all war made againſt Tyrants, ſhould be exceeding full of hate and cruelty. Yet we ſeldome hear, that ever the ruine of a tyranny is procured or ſought by thoſe that were hired to maintaint the power of it: and ſeldome or never do we read of any war that hath been proſecuted with ſuch inexpiable hatred, as this that is now in hand.

That which we properly call Tyranny, is, A violent form of Government, not reſpecting the good of the ſubject, but only the pleaſure of the Commander. I purpoſely forbear to ſay that it is, the unjuſt rule of one over many: for very truly doth Cleon in Thucydides tell the Athenians, that their dominion over their ſubjects, was none other, than a meer tyranny; though it were ſo, that they themſelves were a great City, and a popular eſtate. Neither is it peradventure greatly needful, that I ſhould call this form of commanding, violent: ſince it may well and eaſily be conceived, that no man willingly performs obedience to one regardleſs of his life and welfare; unleſs himſelf be either a mad man, man, or (which is little better) wholly poſſeſſed with ſome extreme paſſion of love. The practice of tyranny is not alwayes of a like extremity: for ſome Lords are more gentle than others, to their very ſlaves; and he that is moſt cruel to ſome, is mild enough towards others, though it be but for his own advantage. Nevertheleſs, in large Dominions, wherein the Rulers diſcretion cannot extend it ſelf unto notice of the difference which might be found between the worth of ſeveral men, it is commonly ſeen, that the taſte of ſweetneſs drawn out of oppreſſion, hath ſo good a reliſh, as continually inflames the Tyrants appetite, and will not ſuffer it to be reſtrained with any limits of reſpect. Why ſhould he ſeek out bounds to preſcribe unto his deſires, who cannot endure the face of one ſo honeſt, as may put him in remembrance of any moderation? It is much that he hath gotten by extorting from ſome few: by ſparing none, he ſhould have riches in goodly abundance. He hath taken a great deal from every one: but every one could have ſpared more. He hath wrung all their Purſes, and now he hath enough: but (as Covetouſneſs is never ſatisfied) he thinks that all this is too little for a ſtock, though it were indeed a good yearly Income. Therefore he deviſeth new tricks of robbery, and is not better pleaſed with the gains, than with the Art of getting. He is hated for this, and he knows it well: but he thinks by cruelty to change hatred into fear. So he makes it his exerciſe, to torment and murder all whom he ſuſpecteth: in which courſe, if he ſuſpect none unjuſtly, he may be ſaid to deal craftily; but if Innocency be not ſafe, how can all this make any Conſpirator to ſtand in fear, ſince the Traitor is no worſe rewarded than the quiet man? Wherefore he can think upon none other ſecurity, than to diſarm all his Subjects; to fortifie himſelf within ſome ſtrong place; and, for defence of his Perſon and State, to hire as many luſty Souldiers as ſhall be thought ſufficient. Theſe muſt not be of his own Country: for if not every one, yet ſome one or other may chance to have a feeling of the publick miſery. This conſidered, he allures unto him a deſperate rabble of ſtrangers, the moſt unhoneſt that can be found; ſuch as have neither wealth nor credit at home, and will therefore be carefull to ſupport him, by whoſe only favour they are maintained. Now, leſt any of theſe, either by deteſtation of his wickedneſs, or (which in wicked men is moſt likely) by promiſe of greater reward than he doth give, ſhould be drawn to turn his ſword againſt the Tyrant himſelf: they ſhall all be permitted to do as he doth; to rob, to raviſh, to murder, and to ſatisfie their own appetites, in moſt outragious manner, being thought ſo much the more aſſured to their Maſter, by how much the more he ſees them grow hatefull to all men elſe. Conſidering in what age, and in what language I write; I muſt be fain to ſay, that theſe are not dreams: though ſome Engliſh-man perhaps that were unacquainted with Hiſtory, lighting upon this leaf, might ſuppoſe this diſcourſe to be but little better. This is to ſhew, both how tyranny grows to ſtand in need of mercenary Souldiers, and how thoſe mercenaries are, by mutual obligation, firmly aſſured unto the Tyrant.

§. II.

That the Tyranny of a City over her Subjects is worſe than the tyranny of one man: and that a tyrannical City muſt likewiſe uſe mercenary Souldiers.

NOW concerning the tyranny wherewith a City or State oppreſſeth her ſubjects; it may appear ſome wayes to be more moderate, than that of one man: but in many things it is more intolerable. A City is jealous of her Dominion; but not (as is one man) fearful of her life: the leſs need hath ſhe therefore to ſecure her ſelf by cruelty. A City is not luxurious in conſuming her treaſures, and therefore needs the leſs to pluck from her Subjects. If War, or any other great occaſion drive her to neceſſity of taking from her Subjects more than ordinary ſumms of money; the ſame neceſſity makes either the contribution eaſie, or the taking excuſable. Indeed no wrongs are ſo grievous and hatefull, as thoſe that are inſolent. Remember (ſaith Caligula the Emperour, to his Grand-mother Antonia) that I may do what I liſt, and to whom I liſt: theſe words were accounted horrible, though he did her no harm. And Juvenal reckons it, as the complement of all torments, inflicted by a cruel Roman Dame upon her ſlaves, that whileſt ſhe was whipping them, ſhe painted her face, talked with her Goſſips, and uſed all ſigns of neglecting what thoſe wretches felt. Now ſeeing that the greateſt grievances wherewith a domineering State offendeth her Subjects, are free from all ſenſe of indignity; likely it is, that they will not extremely hate her, although deſire of liberty make them weary of her Empire. In theſe reſpects it is not needfull that ſhe ſhould keep a Guard of licentious cut-throats, and maintain them in all villany, as a Dionyſius or Agathocles must do: her own Citizens are able to terrifie and to hold perforce in obedience, all male-contents. These things, considered alone by themselves, may serve to prove, That a City is scarce able to deserve the name of a Tyranness, in the proper signification.

All this notwithstanding, it shall appear, that the miseries wherewith a Tyrant loadeth his people, are not so heavy, as the burdens imposed by a cruel City. Not without some appearance of truth, it may be said, that Lust, and many other private passions, are no way incident to a City or Corporation. But to make this good, we shall have need to use the help of such distinctions, as the Argument in hand doth not require. Was not Rome lascivious, when Cato was fain to rise and leave the Theater, to the end, that the reverend regard of his gravity might not hinder the people from calling for a shew of naked Courtisans, that were to be brought upon the open stage? By common practice, and general approved custom, we are to censure the quality of a whole State; not by the private vertue or vice of any one man, nor by metaphysical abstraction of the universal from the singular; or of the Corporation, from those of whom it is compounded: I say therefore, (as I have said elsewhere) That it were better to live under one pernicious Tyrant, than under many thousands. The reasons proving this, are too many to set down, but a few may suffice. The desires of one man, how inordinate soever, if they cannot be satisfied, yet they may be wearied; he is not able to search all corners; his humour may be found, and soothed; age or good advice, yea, or some unexpected accident may reform him: all which failing; yet is there hope, that his successour may prove better.

Many Tyrants have been changed into worthy Kings: and many have ill used their ill-gotten Dominion, which, becoming hereditary to their posterity, hath grown into the most excellent form of Government, even a lawful Monarchy. But they that live under a tyrannical City, have no such hope: their Mistress is immortal, and will not slacken the reins, untill they be pulled out of her hands, and her own mouth receive the bridle of a more mightier Chariotter. This is wofull: yet their present sufferings make them less mindfull of the future. New flies, and hungry ones, fall upon the same sore, out of which others had already sucked their fill. A new Governour comes yearly among them, attended by all his poor kindred and friends, who mean not to return home empty to their hives, without a good lading of wax and honey. These fly into all quarters, and are quickly acquainted with every mans wealth, or whatsoever else, in all the Province, is worthy to be desired. They know all a mans enemies, and all his fears: becoming themselves, within a little space, the enemies that he feareth most. To grow into acquaintance with these masterfull guests, in hope to win their friendship, were an endless labour, (yet it must be undergone) and such as every one hath not means to go about: but were this effected, what availeth it? The love of our Governour is purchased with gifts: the Successour of this man, he is more loving than could be wished in respect of a fair Wife or Daughter, then comes the third, perhaps of the contrary faction at home, a bitter enemy to both his fore-goers, who seeks the ruine of all that have been inward with them. So the miseries of this tyranny are not simple, but interlaced (as it were) with the calamities of civil War. The Romans had a Law De Repetundis, or, Of Recovery, against extorting-Magistrates: yet we find, that it served not wholly to restrain their Provincial Governours; who presuming on the favour of their own Citizens, and of their kindred and friends at home, were bold in their Provinces, to work all these enormities rehearsed; though somewhat the more sparingly, for fear of judgement. If the Subjects of Rome groaned under such oppressions, what must we think of those that were Vassals unto Carthage? The Romans imposed no burthensome tributes; they loved not to hear, that their Empire was grievous; they condemned many noble Citizens for having been ill Governours. At Carthage all went quite contrary: the rapines newly devised by one Magistrate, served as presidents to instruct another; every man resolved to do the like, when it should fall to his turn; and he was held a notable States-man, whose robberies had been such, as might afford a good share to the common treasure. Particular examples of this Carthaginian practice are not extant: the Government of Verres the Roman in Sicil, that it is lively set out by Tully, may serve to inform us, what was the demeanour of these Punick Rulers, who stood in fear of no such condemnation, as Verres underwent. By prosecuting this discourse, I might inferr a more general proposition; That a City cannot govern her subject Provinces so mildly as a King: but it is enough to have shewed, That the tyranny of a City is far more intolerable, than that of any one most wicked man.

Suitable

Sutable to the cruelty of ſuch Lords, is the hatred of their ſubjects: and again, ſutable to the hatred of the ſubjects, is the jealouſie of their Lords. Hence it followed, that, in wars abroad, the Carthaginians durſt uſe the ſervice of African Souldiers; in Africk it ſelf they had rather be beholding to others, that were farther fetcht. For the ſame purpoſe did Hannibal, in the ſecond Punick war, ſhift his Mercenaries out of their own Countries; Ut Afri in Hiſpania, Hiſpani in Africa, melior procul ab domo futurus uterq; miles, velut mutuis pignoribus obligati ſtipendia facerent; that the Africans might ſerve in Spain, the Spaniards in Africk, being each of them like to prove the better Souldiers, the farther they were from home, as if they were obliged by mutual pledges. It is diſputable, I confeſs, whether theſe African and Spaniſh hirelings could properly be termed Mercenaries: for they were ſubject unto Carthage, and carried into the field, not only by reward, but by duty. Yet ſeeing their duty was no better than enforced, and that it was not any love to the State, but meer deſire of gain, that made them fight; I will not nicely ſtand upon propriety of a word, but hold them, as Polybius alſo doth, no better than Mercenaries.

Lib. Dec. 3.

†. III.

The dangers growing from the uſe of mercenary Souldiers, and forrain Auxiliaries.

THE extream danger, growing from the imployment of ſuch Souldiers, is well obſerved by Machiael: who ſheweth, that they are more terrible to thoſe whom they ſerve, than to thoſe againſt whom they ſerve. They are ſeditious, unfaithfull, diſobedient, devourers, and deſtroyers of all places and Countries, whereinto they are drawn; as being held by no other bond, than their own commodity. Yea, that which is moſt fearful among ſuch hirelings, is, that they have often, and in time of greateſt extremity, not only refuſed to fight, in their defence, who have entertained them, but revolted unto the contrary part; to the utter ruine of thoſe Princes and States that have truſted them. Thoſe mercenaries (ſaith Machiavel) which filled all Italy when Charls the eighth of France did paſs the Alpes, were the cauſe that the ſaid French King won the Realm of Naples with his Buckler without a Sword. Notable was the example of Sforza the Father of Francis Sforza, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by Queen Joan of Naples, abandoned her ſervice on the ſudden, and forced her to put her ſelf into the hands of the King of Aragon. Like unto his father was Francis Sforza, the firſt of that race, Duke of Millan; who being entertained by the Millanois, forced them to become his ſlaves, even with the very ſame army which themſelves had levied for their own defence. But Lodowick Sforza, the ſon of this Francis by the juſt judgement of God, was made a memorable example unto poſterity, in loſing his whole eſtate by the treachery of ſuch faithleſs Mercenaries, as his own Father had been. For having waged an army of Switzers, and committed his Dutchy, together with his perſon, into their hands, he was by them delivered up unto his enemy the French King, by whom he was incloſed in the Caſtle of Loches unto his dying day.

The like inconvenience is found, in uſing the help of forrain Auxiliaries. We ſee, that when the Emperour of Conſtantinople had hired ten thouſand Turks againſt his neighbour Princes; he could never, either by perſwaſion or force, ſet them again over the Sea upon Aſia ſide; which gave beginning to the Chriſtian ſervitude, that ſoon after followed. Alexander the Son of Caſſander, ſought aid of the great Demetrius: but Demetrius, being entred into his Kingdom, ſlew the ſame Alexander, who had invited him, and made himſelf King of Macedon. Syracon the Turk was called into Egypt by Sanar Soldan, againſt his oppoſite: but this Turk did ſettle himſelf ſo ſurely in Egypt, that Saladine his ſucceſſor became Lord thereof; and of all the holy Land, ſoon after. What need we look about for examples of this kind? Every Kingdom, in effect, can furniſh us. The Britains drew the Saxons into this our Countrey; and Mac Murrough drew the Engliſh into Ireland; but the one and the other ſoon became Lords of thoſe two kingdoms.

Againſt all this, may be alledged the good ſucceſs of the United Provinces of the Netherlands, uſing none other than ſuch kind of Souldiers, in their late war. Indeed theſe Low-Countreys have many goodly and ſtrong Cities, filled with Inhabitants that are wealthy, induſtrious, and valiant in their kind. They are ſtout Sea-men, and therein is their excellency; neither are they bad at the defence of a place well fortified: but in open field they have ſeldom been able to ſtand againſt the Spaniard. Neceſſity therefore compelled them to ſeek help abroad: and the like neceſſity made them forbear to arm any great numbers of their own. For, with money raiſed by their Trade, they maintained the War: and therefore could, ill ſpare unto the Pike and Musket, thoſe hands, that were of more uſe in helping to fill the common purſe. Yet what of this? they ſped well. Surely they ſped as ill as might be, whileſt they had none other than mercenary Souldiers. Many fruitleſs attempts, made by the Prince of Orenge, can witneſs it: and that brave Commander Count Lodowick of Naſſau, felt, to his grief, in his retrait from Græningham; when, in the very inſtant that required their ſervice in fight, his Mercenaries cried out aloud for money, and ſo ran away. This was not the only time, when the hired Souldiers of the States, have either ſought to hide their cowardize under a ſhew of greedineſs; or at leaſt, by meer covetouſneſs, have ruined in one hour, the labour of many moneths. I will not ſtand to prove this by many examples: for they themſelves will not deny it. Neither would I touch the honour of Monſieur the Duke of Anjou, brother to the French King; ſave that it is folly to conceal what all the world knows. He that would lay open the danger of forraign Auxiliaries, needeth no better pattern. It is commonly found, that ſuch Aiders make themſelves Lords over thoſe, to whom they lend their ſuccour: but where ſhall we meet with ſuch another as this Monſieur, who, for his protection promiſed, being rewarded with the Lordſhip of the Countrey, made it his firſt work, to thruſt by violence a galling yoak upon the peoples neck? Well, he lived to repent it, with grief enough. Even whileſt he was counterfeiting unto thoſe about him, that were ignorant of his plot, an imaginary ſorrow for the poor Burghers of Antwerpe, as verily believing the Town to be ſurpriſed and wone; the death of the Count St. Aignan, who fell over the wall, and the Cannon of the City, diſcharged againſt his own troops, informed him better what had hapned; ſhewing, that they were his own French who ſtood in need of the pity. Then was his feigned paſſion changed into a very bitter anguiſh of mind, wherein, ſmiting his breaſt, and wringing his hands, he exclaimed, Helas, mon dieu, que veux tu faire de moy? Alas, my God, what wilt thou do with me? So, the affairs of the Netherlands will not ſerve to prove, that there is little danger in uſing Mercenary Souldiers, or the help of forraign Auxiliaries. This notwithſtanding, they were obedient unto neceſſity, and ſought help of the Engliſh, Scots, and French: wherein they did wiſely, and proſpered. For when there was in France a King, partaker with them in the ſame danger; when the Queen of England refuſed to accept the Soveraignty of their Country, which they offered, yet being provoked by the Spaniard their enemy, purſued him with continual war; when the heir of England reigned in Scotland, a King too juſt and wiſe (though not ingaged in any quarrel) either to make profit of his neighbours miſeries, or to help thoſe that had attempted the conqueſt of his own inheritance: then might the Netherlanders very ſafely repoſe confidence in the forces of theſe their Neighbour Countries. The Souldiers that came unto them from hence, were (to omit any other commendations) not only regardfull of the pay that they ſhould receive, but well affected unto the cauſe that they took in hand: or, if any were cold in his devotion, unto the ſide whereon he fought, yet was he kept in order, by remembrance of his own home, where the Engliſh would have rewarded him with death, if that his faith had been corrupted by the Spaniard. They were therefore truſted with the cuſtody of Cities; they were held as friends, and patrons; the neceſſity of the poorer ſort was relieved, before the pay-day came, with lendings, and other helps, as well as the ability of the States could permit. When three ſuch Princes, reigning at one time, ſhall agree ſo well, to maintain againſt the power of a fourth, injurious (or at the leaſt ſo ſeeming) to them all, a Neighbour-Country of the ſame Religion, and to which they all are lovingly affected: then may ſuch a Country be ſecure of her Auxiliaries, and quietly intend her Trade, or other buſineſs, in hope of like ſucceſs. But theſe circumſtances meet ſo ſeldom, as it may well hold true in general: That mercenary and forraign auxiliary forces are no leſs dangerous, than the enemy againſt whom they are entertained.

†. IIII.

That the moderate government of the Romans, gave them aſſurance to uſe the ſervice of their own ſubjects in their Wars. That in mans nature there is an affection breeding tyranny, which hindereth the uſe and benefit of the like moderation.

HEre it may be demanded, whether alſo the Romans were not compelled to uſe the ſervice of other Souldiers in their many great wars, but performed all by their own Citizens? for if it were their manner to arm their own ſubjects, how hapned it, that they feared no rebellion? if ſtrangers, how then could they avoid the inconveniences above rehearſed? The anſwer is, that their Armies were compounded uſually of their their own Citizens, and of the Latines in equal number: to which they added, as occaſion required, ſome companies of Campanes, Hetrurians, Samnites, or other of their ſubjects, as were either intereſſed in the quarrel, or might beſt be truſted. They had, about theſe times, (though ſeldom they did imploy ſo many) ten Roman Legions; a good ſtrength, if all other help had been wanting; which ſerved to keep in good order their ſubjects, that were alwaies fewer in the army than themſelves. As for the Latines, if conſanguinity were not a ſufficient obligation; yet many priviledges and immunities, which they injoyed, made them aſſured unto the State of Rome: under which they lived almoſt at liberty, as being bound to little elſe, than to ſerve it in war. It is true, that a yoke how eaſie ſoever, ſeems troubleſome to the neck that hath been accuſtomed to freedom. Therefore many people of Italy have taken occaſion of ſeveral advantages, to deliver themſelves from the Roman ſubjection. But ſtill they have been reclaimed by war, the Authors of rebellion have ſharply been puniſhed, and the people by degrees have obtained ſuch liberty, as made them eſteem none otherwiſe of Rome, than as the common City of all Italy. Yea, in proceſs of time it was granted unto many Cities, and thoſe far off removed, even to Tarſus in Cilicia, where St. Paul was born, that all the Burgeſſes ſhould be free of Rome it ſelf. This favour was conferred abſolutely upon ſome; upon ſome, with reſtraint of giving voice in election of Magiſtrates, or with other ſuch limitation as was thought fit. Hereunto may be added, that it was their manner, after a great conqueſt, to releaſe unto their new ſubjects half of their tribute which they had been wont to pay to their former Lords, which was a ready way to bring the multitude into good liking of their preſent condition; when the review of harder times paſt, ſhould rather teach them to fear a relapſe, than to hope for better in the future, by ſeeking innovation. Neither would it be forgotten, as a ſpecial note of the Romans good Government, That when ſome, for their well-deſerving, have had the offer to Li. Dec. 1. n. 3. be made Citizens of Rome, they have refuſed it, and held themſelves better contented with their own preſent eſtate. Wherefore

De. ibid. it is no marvel, that Petellia, a City of the Brutians in Italy, choſe rather to endure all extremity of war, than, upon any condition, to forſake the Romans; even when the Romans themſelves had confeſſed, that they were unable to help theſe their ſubjects, and therefore willed them to look to their own good, as having been faithful to the utmoſt. Such love purchaſed theſe mild Governours, without impairing their Majeſty thereby. The ſum of all is; they had, of their own, a ſtrong army; they doubled it by adjoyning thereunto the Latines; and they further increaſed it, as need required, with other help of their own ſubjects: all, or the moſt of their followers, accounting the proſperity of Rome to be the common good.

The moderate uſe of ſoveraign power being ſo effectual, in aſſuring the people unto their Lords, and conſequently in the eſtabliſhment or inlargement of Dominion: it may ſeem ſtrange, that the practice of Tyranny, whoſe effects are contrary, hath been ſo common in all ages. The like, I know, may be ſaid of all Vice and Irregularity, whatſoever. For it is leſs difficult, (whoſoever think otherwiſe) and more ſafe, to keep the way of Juſtice and Honeſty, than to turn aſide from it; yet commonly our paſſions do lead us into by-paths. But where Luſt, Anger, Fear, or any the like Affection, ſeduceth our reaſon; the ſame unruly appetite, either bringeth with it an excuſe, or, at leaſt-wiſe, taketh away all cauſe of wonder. In tyranny it is not ſo: for as much as we can hardly deſcry the paſſion, that is of force to inſinuate it ſelf into the whole tenour of a Government. It muſt be confeſſed, that lawleſs deſires have bred many Tyrants: yet ſo that theſe deſires have ſeldome been hereditary, or long-laſting; but have ended commonly with the Tyrants life, ſometimes before his death; by which means the government hath been reduced to a better form. In ſuch caſes, the ſaying of Ariſtotle holds, That tyrannies are of a ſhort continuance. But this doth not ſatisfie the queſtion in hand. Why did the Carthaginians exerciſe tyranny? Why did the Athenians? Why have many other Cities done the like? If in reſpect of their general good; how could they be ignorant, that this was an ill courſe for the ſafety of the Weal publick? If they were led hereunto by any affection; what was that affection wherein ſo many thouſand Citizens, divided and ſubdivided within themſelves by factions, did all concurr, notwithſtanding the much diverſity of temper, and the vehemency of private hatred among them? Doubtleſs, we muſt be fain to ſay, That Tyranny is, by it ſelf, a vice diſtinct from others. A Man, we know, is Animal politicum, apt even by Nature, to command or to obey; every one in his proper degree. Other deſires of Mankind, are common likewiſe unto brute beaſts; and and ſome of them, to bodies wanting ſenſe: but the deſire of rule belongeth unto the nobler part of reaſon; whereunto is alſo anſwerable an aptneſs to yield obedience. Now as hunger and thirſt are given by nature not only to Man and Beaſt, but unto all ſorts of Vegetables, for the ſuſtentation of their life: as Fear, Anger, Luſt, and other affections are likewiſe natural, in convenient meaſure, both unto Mankind, and to all Creatures that have ſenſe, for the ſhunning or repelling of harm, and ſeeking after that which is requiſite: even ſo is this deſire of ruling or obeying, ingraffed by Nature in the race of Man, and in Man only as a reaſonable creature, for the ordering of his life, in a civil form of Juſtice. All theſe in-bred qualities are good and uſeful. Nevertheleſs, Hunger and Thirſt are the Parents of Gluttony and Drunkenneſs, which, in reproach, are called beaſtly, by an unproper term: ſince they grow from appetites, found in leſs worthy creatures than beaſts, and are yet not ſo common in beaſts, as in men. The effects of Anger, and of ſuch other Paſſions as deſcend no lower than unto brute beaſts, are held leſs vile; and perhaps not without good reaſon: yet are the more pernicious. But as no corruption is worſe by ſharper Laws, as being in general more horrible, and puniſhed more grievouſly, than of that which is beſt; there is not any paſſion, that nouriſheth a vice more hurtful unto Mankind, than that which iſſueth from the moſt noble root, even the depraved Affection of Ruling. Hence ariſe thoſe two great miſchiefs, of which hath been an old queſtion in diſpute, whether be the worſe; That all things, or that nothing ſhould be lawful. Of theſe, a dull ſpirit and overloaden by fortune with power, whereof it is not capable, occaſioneth the one; the other proceedeth from a contrary diſtemper, whoſe vehemency the bounds of Reaſon cannot limit. Under the extremity of either, no Country is able to ſubſiſt, yet the defective dulneſs, that permitteth any thing, will alſo permit the execution of Law, to which meer neceſſity doth enforce the ordinary Magiſtrate; whereas Tyranny is more active, and pleaſeth it ſelf in the exceſs, with a falſe colour of Juſtice. Examples of ſtupidity, and unaptneſs to rule, are not very frequent, though ſuch natures are every where to be found: for this quality troubles not it ſelf in ſeeking Empire; or if by ſome errour of fortune, it encounter therewithall, (as when Claudius, hiding himſelf in a corner, found the Empire of Rome) ſome friend, or elſe a wife, is not wanting to ſupply the defect, which alſo cruelty doth help to ſhadow. Therefore this Vice, as a thing unknown, is without a name. Tyranny is more bold, and feareth not to be known, but would be reputed honourable: for it is proſperum & fœlix ſcelus, a fortunate miſchief, as long as it can ſubſiſt. There is no reward or honour (ſaith Peter Charron) aſſigned unto thoſe, that know how to increaſe, or preſerve humane nature: all honours, greatneſs, riches, dignities, Empires, triumphs, trophees, are appointed for thoſe, that know how to afflict, trouble, or deſtroy it. Cæſar and Alexander, have un-made and ſlain, each of them, more than a million of men: but they made none, nor left none behind them. Such is the errour of Mans judgement in valuing things according to the common opinion. But the true name of Tyranny, when it grows to ripeneſs, is none other than Feritie: the ſame that Ariſtotle ſaith to be worſe than any vice. It exceedeth indeed all other vices, iſſuing from the paſſions incident both to Man and Beaſt; no leſs, than Perjury, Murder, Treaſon, and the like horrible crimes, exceed in villany, the faults of Gluttony and Drunkenneſs, that grow from more ignoble appetites. Hereof Sciron, Procruſtes, and Pityocamptes, that uſed their bodily force to the deſtruction of Mankind, are not better examples, than Phalaris, Dionyſius, and Agathocles, whoſe miſchievous heads were aſſiſted by the hands of deteſtable Ruffians. The ſame barbarous deſire of Lordſhip, tranſported thoſe old examples of Feritie, and theſe latter Tyrants, beyond the bounds of reaſon: neither of them knew the uſe of Rule, nor the difference between Freemen and ſlaves.

The rule of the husband over the wife, and of Parents over their children, is natural, and appointed by God himſelf; ſo that it is alwayes, and ſimply, allowable and good. The former of theſe, is as the dominion of Reaſon over Appetite; the latter is the whole authority, which one Freeman can have over another. The rule of a King is no more, nor none other, than of a common Father over his whole Country: which he that knows what the power of a Father is, or ought to be, knows to be enough. But there is a greater and more Maſterly rule, which God gave unto Adam, when he ſaid; Have dominion over the fiſh of the ſea, Gen.1.28. and over the fowl of the air, and every living thing that moveth upon the earth: which alſo he continued unto Noah and his children, ſaying, The fear of you, and the dread of you, Gen.9.2. ſhall be upon every beaſt of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fiſhes of the Sea: into your hands are they delivered. He who gave this dominion unto Man, did give alſo an aptitude to uſe it. The execution of this power hath ſince extended it ſelf, over a very great part of Mankind. There are indeed no ſmall numbers of men, whoſe diſability to govern themſelves, proves them, according to Ariſtotles doctrine, to be naturally ſlaves.

Arist. pol. l. c. 3.

Yet find I not in Scripture any warrant to oppreſs men with bondage: unleſs the lawfulneſs thereof be ſufficiently intimated, where it is ſaid, That a man ſhall not be puniſhed for the death of a ſervant; whom he hath ſlain by correction, if the ſervant live a day or two, becauſe he is his money: or elſe by the captivity of the Midianitiſh girls, which were made bond-ſlaves, and the Sanctuary had a part of them for the Lords tribute. Doubtleſs the cuſtom hath been very ancient: for Noah laid this curſe upon Canaan, that he ſhould be a ſervant of ſervants; and Abraham had of Pharaoh, among other gifts, men-ſervants and maid-ſervants, which were none other than ſlaves. Chriſtian Religion is ſaid to have abrogated this old kind of ſervility: but ſurely they are deceived that think ſo. Saint Paul deſired the liberty of Oneſimus, whom he had won unto Chriſt: yet wrote for this unto Philemon by way of requeſt, craving it as a benefit, not urging it as a duty. Agreeable hereto is the direction, which the ſame Saint Paul giveth unto ſervants: Let every man abide in the ſame calling wherein he was called: art thou called, being a ſervant? care not for it, but if thou maiſt be made free, uſe it rather. It is true, that Chriſtan Religion hath procured liberty unto many; not only in regard of piety, but for that the Chriſtian Maſters ſtood in fear of being diſcovered by their ſlaves, unto the perſecutors of Religion. Mahomet likewiſe, by giving liberty to his followers, drew many unto his impiety: but whether he forbade it, as unlawful, unto his ſectators, to hold one another of them in bondage, I cannot tell; ſave that by the practice of the Turks and Moors, it ſeems he did not. In England we had many bond-ſervants, untill the time of our laſt civil wars; and I think that the Laws concerning Villenage are ſtill in force, of which the lateſt are the ſharpeſt. And now, ſince ſlaves were made free, which were of great uſe and ſervice, there are grown up a rabble of Rogues, Cutpurſes, and other the like trades; ſlaves in Nature, though not in Law.

Exod. 21. 21. Num. 30. 40. Gen. 9. 25. Gen. 12. 16. Epiſt. to Phil. v. 14. 1 Cor. 7. 20, 21.

But whether this kind of dominion be lawful, or not; Ariſtotle hath well proved, that it is natural. And certainly, we find not ſuch a latitude of difference in any creature, as in the nature of man; wherein (to omit the infinite diſtance in eſtate of the Elect and Reprobate) the wiſeſt excel the moſt fooliſh, by far greater degree, than the moſt fooliſh of men doth ſurpaſs the wiſeſt of beaſts. Therefore when Commiſeration hath given way to reaſon, we ſhall find, that nature is the ground even of Maſterly power, and of ſervile obedience, which is thereto correſpondent. But it may be truly ſaid, that ſome Countries have ſubſiſted long without the uſe of any ſervility; as alſo it is true, that ſome Countries have not the uſe of any tame Cattel. Indeed the affections which uphold civil rule, are (though more noble) not ſo ſimply needful, unto the ſuſtentation either of our kind, as are Luſt, and the like; or of every one, as are Hunger and thirſt; which notwithſtanding are the loweſt in degree. But where moſt vile and ſervile diſpoſitions have liberty to ſhew themſelves begging in the ſtreets, there may we more juſtly wonder, how the dangerous toil of Sea-faring men can find enough to undertake them, than how the ſwarm of idle vagabonds ſhould increaſe, by acceſs of thoſe, that are weary of their own more painful condition. This may ſuffice to prove, that in Mankind there is found, ingraffed even by Nature, a deſire of abſolute dominion: whereunto the general cuſtom of Nations doth ſubſcribe; together with the pleaſure which moſt men take in flatterers, that are the baſeſt of ſlaves.

This being ſo, we find no cauſe to marvel, how Tyranny hath been ſo rife in all ages, and practiſed, not only in the ſingle rule of ſome vicious Prince, but ever by conſent of whole Cities and Eſtates: ſince other vices have likewiſe gotten head, and born a general ſway, notwithſtanding that the way of vertue be more honourable, and commodious. Few there are that have uſed well the inferiour Paſſions: how then can we expect, that the moſt noble affections ſhould not be diſordered? in the government of wife and children, ſome are utterly careleſs, and corrupt all by their dull connivency: others, by maſterly rigour, hold their own blood under condition of ſlavery. To be a good Governour is a rare commendation: and to prefer the Weal publick above all reſpects whatſoever, is the Vertue juſtly termed Heroical. Of this Vertue many ages afford not many examples. Hector is named by Ariſtotle as one of them; and deſervedly, if this praiſe be due to extraordinary height of fortitude, used in defence of a mans own Country. But if we consider, that a love of the general good cannot be perfect, without reference unto the fountain of all goodness: we shall find, that no moral vertue, how great soever, can by it self, deserve the commendation of more than Vertue, as the Heroical doth. Wherefore we must search the Scriptures, for patterns hereof; such as David, Josaphat, and Josias were. Of Christian Kings, if there were many such, the world would soon be happy. It is not my purpose to wrong the worth of any, by denying the praise where it is due, or by preferring a less excellent. But he that can find a King religious, and zealous in Gods cause, without enforcement, either of adversity, or of some regard of State; a procurer of general peace and quiet; who not only useth his authority, but adds the travel of his eloquence, in admonishing his Judges to do justice; by the vigorous influence of whose Government, civility is infused, even into those places, that have been the dens of savage Robbers and Cut-throat; one that hath quite abolished a slavish Brehon Law, by which a whole Nation of his subjects were held in bondage; and one, whose higher vertue and wisdom doth make the praise not only of Nobility and other ornaments, but of abstinence from the blood, the wives, and the goods of those that are under his power, together with a world of chief commendations belonging unto some good Princes, to appear less regardable: he, I say, that can find such a King, findeth an example, worthy to add unto vertue an honourable title, if it were formerly wanting. Under such a King, it is likely, by Gods blessing, that a Land shall flourish, with increase of Trade, in Countries before unknown; that Civility and Religion shall be propagated, into barbarous and heathen Countries; and that the happiness of his subjects, shall cause the Nations far off removed, to wish him their Soveraign. I need not add hereunto, that all the actions of such a King, even his bodily exercises, do pertake of vertue; since all things tending to the perservation of his life and health, or to the mollifying of his cares, (who fixing his contemplation upon God, seeketh how to imitate the unspeakable goodness, rather than the inaccessible majesty, with both of which himself is indued, as far as humane nature is capable) do also belong to the furtherance of that common good, which he procureth. Lest any man should think me transported with admiration, or other affection, beyond the bonds of reason; I add hereunto, that such a King is nevertheless a man, must dye, and may err: yet wisdome and fame shall set him free, from error, and from death, both with and without the help of time. One thing I may not omit, as a singular benefit (though there be many other besides redounding unto this King, as the fruit of his goodness,) The people that live under a pleasant yoke, are not only loving to their Soveraign Lord, but free of courage; and no greater in muster of men, than of stout fighters, if need require: whereas on the contrary, he that ruleth as over slaves, shall be attended in time of necessity, by slavish minds, neither loving his person, nor regarding his or their own honour. Cowards may be furious, and slaves outragious, for a time: but among spirits that have once yielded unto slavery, universally it is found true, what Homer saith, God bereaveth a man of half his vertue, that day when he casteth him into bondage. Hom. Od. l. 17.

Of these things, I might perhaps more seasonably have spoken, in the general discourse of Government: but where so lively an example of the calamity following a tyrannical rule, and the use of Mercenaries, thereupon depending, did offer it self, as is this present business of the Carthaginians; I thought that the note would be more effectual, than being barely delivered, as out of a common place.

§. III.

How the war against the Mercenaries was diversly managed by Hanno and Amilcar, with variable success. The bloody councels of the Mercenaries; and their final destruction.

BEing now to return unto those Mercenaries, from whom I have thus far digressed, I cannot readily find, by what name henceforth I should call them. They are no longer in pay with the Carthaginians; neither care they to pretend, that they seek their wages already due; so that they are neither Mercenaries, nor Mutiners. Had they all been subjects unto Carthage, then might they justly have been termed Rebels: but Spendius, and others, that were the principal part of them, ought none allegiance to that State, which they endeavoured to subvert. Wherefore I will borrow the name of their late occupation, and still call them Mercenaries, as Polybius also doth.

These, using the advantage of their present strength, strength, besieged * Utica and Hippagreta, Cities of great importance, as being seated upon the western Haven of Carthage, where it is divided by a neck of land; Hippagreta standing towards upon the great Lake, Utica further out upon the Sea. Neither was the Camp at Tunis abandoned, which lay fitly to hinder the Carthaginians from passing up into the Countrey: for Matho and Spendius wanted not men to follow the war in all parts at once.

* Utica is seated in the great bay that enters towards Carthage, not far within the promontory of Apollo. At this time it is called Porto Farina, or Biserta, and by the Africans themselves, Geral Melha. Niger saith, that the Town it self is ruined, and the place whereon it stood, now called Marghacces. It was very ancient, and built before Carthage, saith Silius. As it flourished before Carthage was set up, so did it after Carthage was thrown down by the Romans in the third Punick war. Famous it was by the death of Cato the younger, who held it against Cæsar. Victor that worthy Divine, was Bishop thereof in the time of Genserick the Arrian, who lived all the time of that Tyrant, and hath written the story of his cruelties.

How the Carthaginians were amazed with this unexpected peril, any man may conceive. But the business it self awakes them hastily. They are hardly prest on all sides; and therefore travelled their brains the uttermost, how to shake off these furious dogs from their shoulders, who sometimes by night, sometimes by day, came unto the very wals of their City. In this exigent, Hanno was made their General: who failed not in his accustomed diligence of making all good preparation: but had gotten together whatsoever was needfull, as well to relieve a Town besieged, as to batter and assail any place defended against him. With these provisions, and with an hundred Elephants, he came to Utica, so suddenly, that the enemies as men surprised, forsook their Trenches, and retired themselves unto a rising piece of woody ground, where they might be safe against the violence of his beasts. Hanno, thinking that he had to do with Numidians, whose custome was after any loss, to flie two or three whole daies journey off; presently entred the Town; to shew himself after this his victory. But these good fellows, against whom he was to war, had learned of Amilcar, to retire and to fight again, many times in one day, as need required. Therefore as soon as they perceived, that he knew not how to use a victory; they assailed their own Camp, and with great slaughter, drave the Carthaginians out of it, forced them to hide themselves within Utica; and got possession of all the store that Hanno had brought for the relief of the Town. This bad beginning Hanno followed with sutable indiscretion; losing the benefit of many fair opportunities, and suffering the enemies to take possession of all the entrance from Carthage to the firm land.

The Carthaginians perceiving this, were exceedingly troubled, and did therefore let fall their shete-anchor; sending to the field their great Captain Amilcar, whom they furnished with ten thousand foot of supply, and seventy Elephants. Amilcar had work enough to do, before he should be able to meet with the enemy upon equal ground. For, besides other places of advantage that the Mercenaries had occupied. Hanno had suffered them to win the only bridge, by which the River Macra, or Bagradas, was passable unto these, that were to travel into the Continent. This River had not many foords, nor those easie for a single man to get over: but upon them all was kept such guard, as gave to Amilcar little hope of prevailing in seeking way by force. As for the Bridge it self, Matho and his followers were there lodged: and had there built a Town, wherein to lye commodiously, intentive only to the custody thereof. But Amilcar had observed, that the very mouth of Bagradas used to be sometimes cloyed with sand and gravel, that was driven in by certain customary winds, and could not be driven out again, by force of that slow River, till the wind failing, or changing suffered the weight of the waters, to disburden their channel. Hereof he made use; and taking his opportunity passed the River, contrary to all expectation, either of the enemy, or of his own Citizens.

There was no need to bid Spendius look about him, when once it was heard, that Amilcar was come over Bagradas: all the Mercenaries were troubled with the news; knowing that they were no longer to deal with the improvident gravity of Hanno, but with an able spirit, even with their own Master in the Art of War, whom they admired, though they hated him. But this fear was soon changed into presumption; when more than fifteen thousand of their own society, were come from Utica, and other ten thousand from the guard of the Bridge. Their Army was far greater, than that of Amilcar; and they were in their own judgement, the better men; upon which confidence, they resolved to charge him on all sides, and beat him down, in despight of his worth and reputation. With this resolution they attend upon him, watching for some advantage; and still exhorting one another to play the men, and give the onset. Especially they that followed him in the Rear, had a great mind to begin the fight; whereunto their promptness was such, as took from them their former circumspection. Amilcar held his way toward the Bridge, keeping himself on plain grounds, that were fittest for the service of his Elephants, which he placed in front of his Army. Neither made he shew of any desire to fight, but suffered the rashness of his enemies to encrease, till it should break into some disorder. At length perceiving, that with more boldness than good heed, they followed him so near, as would be little for their good, if he should turn unto them, he hasted his march, even to such a pace, as made a shew little differing from plain flight. The Mercenaries presently fell upon his skirts; believing, that for fear of them he was ready to run away. But whilst they confusedly, as in sudden opinion of victory, were driven at the heels of those that had the Rear; Amilcar wheeled about, and met them in the face, charging them hotly, but in very good order, so that amazed, with the apprehension of unexpected danger, they fled without making any resistance. In this overthrow there were six thousand of the Mercenaries slain, and about two thousand taken, the rest fled, some to the Camp at Utica, others to the Town at the Bridge; whither Amilcar followed them so fast, that he wan the place easily; the enemies being thence also fled unto Tunis, as not having recollected their spirits to make it good.

The fame of this victory, together with the diligence of Amilcar in pursuing it, caused many Towns revolted, partly by fear, partly by force, to return to their former obedience. Yet was not Matho wanting to himself in this dangerous time. He sent about Numidia and Africk, for new supplies; admonishing the people, now or never, to do their best, for the recovery of their freedom: he perswaded Spendius, and Autarius, that was a Captain of the Gaules, to wait upon Amilcar, and always to keep the higher grounds, or at least, the foot of some hill, where they might be free from the Elephants; and he himself continued to press the Town of Hippagreta with an hard siege. It was necessary for Amilcar, in passing from place to place, as his business required, to take such wayes as there were: for all the Country lay not level. Therefore Spendius, who still coasted him, had once gotten a notable advantage of ground; the Carthaginians lying in a plain, surrounded with hills, that were occupied by the Mercenaries, with their Numidian and African succours. In this difficulty, the fame of Amilcar his personal worth did greatly benefit his Countrey. For Naravasus, a young Gentleman commanding over the Numidians, was glad of this occasion, serving to get the acquaintance and love of so brave a man, which he much desired: and therefore came unto Amilcar signifying his good affection to him, with offer to do him all service. Amilcar joyfully entertained this friend, promised unto him his own daughter in marriage; and so wan from the enemies 2000. horse, that following Naravasus turned unto the Carthaginians side. With this help he gave battel unto Spendius: wherein the Numidian laboured to approve his own valour to his new friend. So the victory was great: for there were slain ten thousand of Spendius his fellows, and four thousand taken prisoners; but Spendius himself, with Autarius the Gaul, escaped to do more mischief. Amilcar dealt very gently with his prisoners: pardoning all offences past, and dismissing as many as were unwilling to become his followers; yet with condition, that they should never more bear arms against the Carthaginians; threatning to take sharp revenge upon all that should break this Covenant.

This humanity was vehemently suspected by Matho, Spendius, and Autarius, as tending to win from them the hearts of their Souldiers. Wherefore they resolved to take such order, that no man among them should dare to trust in the good nature of Amilcar, nor to hope for any safety whilst Carthage was able to do him hurt. They counterfeited letters of advertisment, wherein was contained, that some of their company, respective only of their private benefit, and careless of the general good, had a purpose to betray them all unto the Carthaginians, with whom they held intelligence; and that it was needfull to look well unto Gesco, and his companions, whom these traitors had a purpose to inlarge. Upon this Theme Spendius makes an Oration to the Souldiers, exhorting them to fidelity; and shewing with many words, that the seeming humanity of Amilcar, toward some, was none other than a bait, wherewith to intrap them all at once together; as also telling them what a dangerous enemy Gesco would prove, if he might escape their hands. Whilest he is yet in the midst of his tale, were letters come to the same purpose. Then steps forth Autarius, and speaks his mind plainly: saying, that it were the best, yea, the only way, for the common safety, to cut off all hope of reconciliation with Carthage; that if some were devising to make their own peace, it would go hard with those that had a care of the war; that it were better to make an end of Gesco his life, than to trouble themselves with looking to his custody; that by such a course every one should be ingaged in the present Action, as having none other hope left, than in victory alone; finally, that ſuch as would ſpeak here-againſt, were worthy to be reputed Traitors. This Autarius was in great credit with the Souldiers, and could ſpeak ſundry languages, in ſuch ſort, that he was underſtood by all. According to his motion therefore it was agreed, that Geſco, and all the other priſoners, ſhould forthwith be put to horrible death, by torments. Nevertheleſs there were ſome, that for love of Geſco ſought to alter his intended cruelty; but they were forthwith ſtoned to death, as a Document unto others; and ſo the Decree was put in execution. Neither were they therewithall contented, but further ordained, that all Carthaginian priſoners which they took, ſhould be ſerved in like ſort: and that the ſubjects or friends of Carthage, ſhould loſe their hands, and ſo be ſent home, which rule they obſerved ever afterwards.

Of this cruelty I need ſay no more, than that it was moſt execrable ferity. As for the councel of uſing it, it was like unto the councel of Achitophel; All Iſrael ſhall hear, that thou art abhorred of thy father; then ſhall the hands of all that are with thee be ſtrong. Such are the fruits of deſperation. He that is paſt all hope of pardon, is afraid of his own fellows, if they be more innocent; and to avoid the puniſhment of leſs offences, committeth greater. The cowardize of offenders, and the revengeful ſpirits of thoſe that have been wronged, are breeders of this deſperation: to which may be added ſome deficiency of Laws, in diſtinguiſhing the puniſhments of malefactors, according to the degree of their ſeveral crimes. A coward thinks all proviſion too little for his own ſecurity. If Phocas be a coward (ſaid the Emperour Mauritius) then is he murderous. To be ſteadfaſt and ſure, in taking revenge, is thought a point of honour, and a defenſative againſt new injuries. But wrongfully: for it is oppoſite to the rule of Chriſtianity; and ſuch a quality diſcovered, makes them deadly enemies, who otherwiſe would have repented, and ſought to make amends, for the wrong done in paſſion. This was it which wrought ſo much woe to the Carthaginians; teaching Matho, and his Africans, to ſuſpect even their gentleneſs, as the introduction to extream rigour. Like unto the errours of Princes and Governours, are the errours of Laws. Where one and the ſame puniſhment is awarded unto the leſs offence, and unto the greater, he that hath adventured to rob a man, is eaſily tempted to kill him, for his own ſecurity.

Againſt theſe inconveniences, Mercy and Severity, uſed with due reſpect are the beſt remedies. In neither of which Amilcar failed. For as long as theſe his old Souldiers were any way likely to be reclaimed by gentle courſes, his humanity was ready to invite them. But when they were tranſported with beaſtly outrage, beyond all regard of honeſty and ſhame, he rewarded their villany with anſwerable vengeance, caſting them unto wild beaſts to be devoured.

Untill this time Hanno, with the Army under his command, had kept himſelf apart from Amilcar, and done little as may ſeem, for that nothing is remembered of him ſince his late loſſes. Neither was Amilcar ſorry to want his help; as being able to do better without him. But when the war grew to ſuch extremity, as threatened utter ruine to the one or the other ſide: then was Hanno ſent for, and came to Amilcar, with whom he joyned his forces. By this acceſs of ſtrength Amilcar was not enabled to do more than in former times; rather he could now perform nothing: ſuch was the hatred between him and his unworthy Colleague. The Towns of Utica and Hippagreta, that had ſtood alwayes firm to the Carthaginian party, did now revolt unto the enemy, murdering all the Souldiers that they had in Garriſon, and caſting their bodies forth, without ſuffering them to be buried. The proviſions brought by ſea, for maintenance of the Army, were loſt in foul weather; and Carthage it ſelf ſtood in danger of being beſieged, about which Matho and Spendius conſulted, whileſt one of the Carthaginian Generals did (as it were) bind the others hands.

It hath in all Ages been uſed as the ſafeſt courſe, to ſend forth, in great Expeditions, two generals of one Army. This was the common practice of thoſe two mighty Cities Athens and Rome, which other States and Princes have often imitated; perſwading themſelves, that great Armies are not ſo well conducted by one, as by two: who out of emulation to excell each other, will uſe the greater diligence. They have alſo joyned two chief Commanders in equal commiſſion, upon this further conſideration; the better to reſtrain the ambition of any one, that ſhould be truſted with ſo great a ſtrength. For hereof all Common-weals have been jealous, having been taught by their examples that have made themſelves Tyrants over thoſe Cities and States that have imployed them. In this point the Venetians having been ſo circumſpect, as they have, for the moſt part, truſted ſtrangers, and not their own in all the wars which they have made. It is true, that the equal authority of two commanding in chief, serveth well to bridle the ambition of one or both, from turning upon the Prince or State that hath given them trust: but in managing the war it self, it is commonly the cause of ill success. In wars made near unto Rome it self, when two good friends were Consuls, or such two at least, as concurred in one desire of Triumph, which honour (the greatest of any that Rome could give) was to be obtained by that one years service; it is no marvel, though each of the Consuls did his best, and inferred all his thoughts unto none other end than victory. Yet in all dangerous cases, when the Consuls proceeded otherwise than was desired, one Dictator was appointed, whose power was neither hindred by any partner, nor by any great limitation. Neither was it indeed the manner, to send forth both the Consuls to one war; but each went whither his lot called him, to his own Province; unless one business seemed to require them both, and they also seemed fit to be joyned in the administration. Now although it was so, That the Romans did many times prevail with their joynt-Generals: yet was this never so seldom, without as much concord, as any other vertue of the Commanders. For their modesty hath often been such, that the less able Captain, though of equal authority, hath willingly submitted himself to the other, and obeyed his directions. This notwithstanding, they have many times by ordaining two Commanders of one Army, received great and most dangerous overthrows; wherefore in the second Punick War we shall find examples. On the contrary side, in their wars most remote, that were alwayes managed by one, they seldom failed to win exceeding honour, as hereafter shall appear. Now of those ten Generals, which served the Athenians at the battel of Marathon, it may be truly said, that had not their temper been better than the judgment of the people that sent them forth, and had not they submitted themselves to the conduction of Miltiades; their affairs had found the same success which they found at other times, when they coupled Nicias and Alcibiades together in Sicil: the one being so over-wary, and the other so hasty, as all came to nought that they undertook: whereas Cimon alone, as also Aristides, and others, having sole charge of all, did their Country and Common-weal most remarkable service. For it is hard to find two great Captains of equal discretion and valour; but that the one hath more of fury than of judgment, and so the contrary, by which the best occasions are as often overslipt, as at other times many actions are unseasonably undertaken. I remember it well, that when the Prince of Conde was slain after the Battle of Jarnac, (which Prince, together with the admiral Chastillan, had the conduct of the Protestant Army) the Protestants did greatly bewail the loss of the said Prince, in respect of his Religion, person, and birth; yet comforting themselves, they thought it rather an advancement, than an hinderance to their affairs. For so much did the Valour of the one out-reach the advisedness of the other, as whatsoever the Admiral intended to win by attending the advantage, the Prince adventured to lose, by being over-confident in his own courage.

But we need no better example, than of the Carthaginians in this present business: who, though they were still sick of their ill-grounded love to Hanno, and were unwilling to disgrace him; yet seeing that all ran towards ruine, through the discord of the Generals, committed the decision of their Controversies, unto the Army that served under them. The judgment of the Army was, that Hanno should depart the Camp: which he did, and Hannibal was sent in his stead, one that would be directed by Amilcar, and that was enough.

After this, the affairs of Carthage began to prosper somewhat better. Matho and Spendius had brought their Army near unto the City; and lay before it, as in a siege. They might well be bold to hope and adventure much, having in their Camp above fifty thousand, besides those that lay abroad in Garrisons. Nevertheless, the City was too strong for them to win by assault: and the entrance of victuals they could not hinder, if any should be sent in by friends from abroad.

Hieron King of Syracuse, though during the wars in Sicil he assisted the Romans, and still continued in their alliance, yet now sent succours to the Carthaginians: fearing their fall, and consequently his own; because if no other State gave the Romans somewhat to trouble their digestion, the Principality of Syracuse would soon be devoured by them. The Romans also gave them some slender assistance, and, for the present, refused good offers made unto them by the Mercenaries, This they did to shew a noble kind of disposition; which was indeed but counterfeit, as the sequel manifestly proved.

Whilst Matho and his followers were busily pressing the City, Amilcar was as diligent in waiting at their backs, and cutting off

off all that come to their ſupply: ſo that finding themſelves more ſtraightly beſieged by him, than Carthage was by them, they purpoſed to deſiſt from their vain attempt, and try ſome other courſe. Hereupon they iſſued into the field: when Spendius, and one Zarcas an African Captain aſſiſting the rebellion, take upon them to find Amilcar work; leaving Matho in Tunis, to negotiate with their friends, and take a general care of the buſineſs. The Elephants of Carthage, and horſe of Naravaſus, made Spendius fearful to deſcend into the Plains. Wherefore he betook himſelf to his former method of war, keeping the mountains, and rough grounds, or occupying the ſtraighteſt paſſages, wherein the deſperate courage of his men might ſhew it ſelf, with little diſadvantage. But Amilcar had more ſkill in this Art, than could be matched by the labour of Spendius. He drew the enemy to many ſkirmiſhes; in all which the ſucceſs was ſuch, as added courage to his own men, and abated the ſtrength and ſpirit of the Rebells. Thus he continued, provoking them night and day: ſtill intrapping ſome of them, and ſometimes giving them the overthrow in plain battel: untill at length he got them into a ſtraight, whence ere they ſhould get out, he ment to take of them a good account. Their judgment was enough to perceive their own diſadvantage; and therefore they had the leſs ſtomach to fight; but awaiting for help from Tunis. Amilcar prudently foreſeeing, that neceſſity might teach them to dare impoſſibilities, uſeth the benefit of their preſent fear, and ſhut them cloſe up with Trench and Rampart. There they waited miſerably, for ſuccour thrt came not: and having ſpent all their victuals, were ſo pinched with hunger, that they fed upon the bodies of their priſoners. This they ſuffered patiently, as knowing that they had not deſerved any favour from Carthage: and hoping that their friends at Tunis would not be unmindful of them. But when they were driven to ſuch extremity, that they were fain to devour their own companions, and yet ſaw none appearance or likelihood of relief: their obſtinacy was broken, and they threatned their Captains with what they deſerved, unleſs they would go forth to Amilcar, and ſeek ſuch peace as might be gotten. So Spendius, Zarxas, and Autarius, fell to conſultation, wherein it was reſolved to obey the multitude, and yield themſelves, if it were ſo required, unto the death, rather than periſh by the hands of their own companions. Hereupon they ſend to crave parlie, which is granted; and theſe three come forth to talk with Amilcar in perſon. What they could ſay unto him it is hard to conjecture: yet by the conditions which Amilcar granted, it ſeems that they took the blame upon themſelves, and craved pardon for the multitude. The conditions were, that the Carthaginians ſhould chuſe, out of the whole number of theſe enemies, any ten whom they pleaſed, to remain at their diſcretion; and that the reſt ſhould all be diſmiſſed, each in his ſhirt, or in one ſingle coat. When the peace was thus concluded, Amilcar told theſe Ring-leaders, that he choſe them preſently, as part of the ten, and ſo commanded to lay hands on them: the reſt he forthwith went to fetch with his whole Army in order. The Rebels, who knew not that peace was concluded upon ſo gentle Articles, thought themſelves betrayed: and therefore amazedly ran to Arms. But they wanted Captains to order them; and the ſame aſtoniſhment that made them break the Covenants of peace, whereof they were ignorant, gave unto Amilcar both colour of Juſtice, in accompliſhing revenge and eaſe in doing the execution. They were all ſlain: being forty thouſand, or more, in number.

This was a famous exploit: and the news thereof exceeding welcome to Carthage; and terrible to the revolted Cities of Africk. Henceforward Amilcar, with his Naravaſus, and Hannibal, carried the war from Town to Town, and found all places ready to yield: Utica & Hippagreta only ſtanding out, upon fear of deſerved vengeance; and Tunis, being held by Matho, with the remainder of his Army. It was thought fit to begin with Tunis, wherein lay the chief ſtrength of the enemy. Coming before this Town, they brought forth Spendius, with his fellows, in view of the defendants, and crucified them under the walls; to terrifie thoſe of his old companions, that were ſtill in Arms. With this rigour the ſiege began; as if ſpeedy victory had been aſſured. Hannibal quartered on that part of Tunis, which lay toward Carthage. Amilcar on the oppoſite ſide: too far aſunder to help one another in ſudden accidents: and therefore it behoved each to be the more circumſpect.

Matho from the walls beheld his own deſtiny, in the miſery of his companion, and knew not how to avoid it otherwiſe than by a caſt at dice with fortune. So he brake out upon that part of the Carthaginian Army, that lay ſecure, as if all danger were paſt, under the command of Hannibal; and with ſo great and unexpected fury he ſallied, that after an exceeding ſlaughter, he took Hannibal priſoner:

priſoner; on whom, and thirty the moſt noble of the Carthaginian priſoners, he preſently revenged the death of Spendius, by the ſame torture. Of this, Amilcar knew nothing, till it was too late; neither had he ſtrength enough remaining, after this great loſs, to continue the ſiege; but was fain to break it up, and remove unto the mouth of the River Bagradis, where he incamped.

The terrour was no leſs within Carthage, upon the ſame of this loſs, than had been the joy of the late great victory. All that could bear arms, were ſent into the field, under Hanno; whom, it ſeems, they thought the moſt able of their Captains ſurviving the late accidents of War. If there were any Law among them forbidding the imployment of one ſole General near unto their City (for they are known to have truſted one man abroad) the time did not permit, in this haſty exigent, to deviſe about repealing it. But thirty principal men are choſen by the Senate, to bring Hanno to Amilcars Camp, and by all good perſwaſions to reconcile them. This could not be effected in one day. It nearly touched Amilcar in his honour, that the careleſneſs of Hannibal ſeemed to be imputed unto him, by ſending his enemy to moderate his proceedings. Nevertheleſs after many conferences, the authority of the Senators prevailed; Amilcar and Hanno were made friends; and thenceforth, whilſt this war laſted, Hanno took warning by Hannibals calamities, to follow good directions, though afterwards he returned to his old and deadly hatred.

In the mean ſeaſon Matho was come abroad, as meaning to uſe the reputation of his late ſucceſs, whilſt it gave ſome life unto his buſineſs. He had reaſon to do as he did: but he wanted ſkill to deal with Amilcar. The ſkirmiſhes, and light exerciſes of war, wherein Amilcar trained his Carthaginians, did ſo far abate the ſtrength, and withall diminiſh the credit of Matho; that he reſolved to try the fortune of one battel: wherein either his own deſire ſhould be accompliſhed, or his cares ended. To this concluſion the Carthaginians were no leſs prone, than Matho: as being weary of theſe long troubles, and inſupportable expences; confident in the valour of their own men, which had approved it ſelf in many tryals; and well aſſured of Amilcar his great worth, whereunto the enemy hath not what to oppoſe. According to his determination, each part was diligent in making proviſion: inviting their friends to help; and drawing forth into the field, all that lay in Garriſon.

The iſſue of this battel might have been foretold, without help of witchcraft. Matho, and his followers, had nothing whereon to preſume, ſave their daring ſpirits, which had been well cooled by the many late ſkirmiſhes, wherein they had learned how to run away. The Carthaginians had reaſon to dare, as having been often victorious: and in all points elſe they had the better of their enemies; eſpecially (which is worth all the reſt) they had ſuch a Commander, as was not eaſily to be matched in that Age. Neither was it likely that the deſire of liberty ſhould work ſo much, in men accuſtomed to ſervitude; as the honour of their State would, in Citizens, whoſe future and preſent good lay all at once ingaged in that adventure. So the Carthaginians wan a great victory, wherein moſt of the Africans their enemies were ſlain; the reſt fled into a Town, which was not to be defended, and therefore they all yielded; and Matho himſelf was taken alive. Immediately upon this victory, all the Africans that had rebelled, made ſubmiſſion to their old Maſters: Utica only, and Hippagreta ſtood out, as knowing how little they deſerved of favour. But they were ſoon forced to take what conditions beſt pleaſed the victours. Matho and his fellows were led to Carthage in triumph; where they ſuffered all torments that could be deviſed, in recompence of the miſchiefs which they had wrought in this war. The war had laſted three years, and about four months, when it came to this good end: which the Carthaginians, whoſe ſubjects did not love them, ſhould with leſs expence, by contenting their Mercenaries, have prevented in the beginning.

§. IV.

How the Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, that were in Sardinia, rebelled: and were afterwards driven out by the Ilanders. The faithleſs dealing of the Romans with the Carthaginians, in taking from them Sardinia, contrary to the peace.

WHilſt Matho and Spendius were making terrible combuſtion in Africk; other Mercenaries of the Carthaginians had kindled the like fire in Sardinia: where murdering Boſtar the Governour, and other Carthaginians, they were in hope to get, and hold that Iſland to their own uſe. Againſt theſe, one Hanno was ſent with a ſmall Army (ſuch as could be ſpared in that buſie time) conſiſting likewiſe of Mercenaries, levied on the ſudden. But theſe companies that followed Hanno, finding it more for their ſafety, safety, and present profit, to joyn themselves with those that were already revolted, than to endanger themselves by battel, for the good of that Common-weal, of which they had no care; began to enter into practice with the Sardinian Rebels, offering to run one course of fortune with them in their enterprise. This their offer was kindly taken; but their faith was suspected. Wherefore to take away all jealousie and distrust, they resolved to hang up their Commander Hanno, and performed it. A common practice it hath been in all Ages, with those that have undertaken the quarrel of an unjust war, to enjoyn the performance of some notorious and villainous act, to those that come in to them as seconds, with offer to partake, and to assist the impious purposes which they have in hand. It is indeed the best pawn, that desperate men can deliver to each other, to perform some such actions, as are equally unpardonable to all.

By such a kind of cruelty did the ungratefull Mantinæans murder a Garrison of Achaians, sent unto them for their defence against the Lacedæmonians, by Aratus; who, when he had formerly possest himself of their City, by right of war, did not only spare the sack and spoil thereof, but gave them equal freedom, with the rest of the Cities united. These revolts are also common in our Court-wars; where, in the Conquests of new fortunes, and making of new parties, and factions, without the depression or destruction of old friends, we cannot be received and trusted by old enemies. Ceſont les coups de vieille eſcrime. These (say the French) be the blows of the old Art of fencing.

These Mercenaries in Sardinia were no whit less violent in their purpose, than were Spendius, and his associates: only they wanted a Matho among them, to negotiate with the inhabitants of the Province. The Illanders were no less glad, than the Souldiers, that the Carthaginians were expelled the Country: but they could not agree about the profit of the victory. The Sardinians thought that it was enough, if they rewarded the souldiers for their pains taken. Contrariwise, the souldiers were of opinion, that the title of the Carthaginians to that Isle, was devolved unto themselves, by right of Conquest. The same quarrel would (in likelihood) have risen between Spendius with his Mercenaries, and their African friends; if the common desire of both had once taken effect: unless the riches of Carthage had served to content them all. But in Sardinia, where there was none other valuable reward, than possession and rule of the Country; the matter was not easily taken up. So they fall to blows; which how they were dealt, I know not; but finally the Mercenaries were driven out, and compelled to save themselves in Italy. Before their departure out of Sardinia, they had invited the Romans into it; with as good right, as the Mamertines had called them into Sicil. Yet this offer was refused, upon reasons that follow.

Some Italian Merchants had relieved Matho and Spendius with Corn: of whom the Carthaginians took almost five hundred, and held them in prison. Hereof was made a great complaint: so that the Romans sent Embassadours to Carthage, requiring satisfaction. It was no time for the Carthaginians to dispute: they quietly yielded to release them all. This was so kindly taken, that they forbade all their Merchants to trade thenceforth with the Rebels; admonishing them to carry all provisions to Carthage. And upon the same reason did they forbear to meddle with Sardinia, or to accept the City of Utica, offering it self unto their subjection. This might have served as a notable example of the Roman Faith, to all posterity: had not the issue proved, that it was meer regard of greater profit, which kept them so temperate, no longer than the hope lasted of thriving better thereby, than they should have done by open breach of Faith. The whole estate of Carthage depended at that time, upon the vertue of Amilcar: who, had he been overthrown by Spendius or Matho, in one main battel, that mighty City must either have fallen into the barbarous hands of mercilesse villains, or have humbled her self under protection of the Romans, with whom she had lately striven for superiority. That extreme necessity, whereinto Matho reduced the City, by the fortune of one sally made out of Tunis, is enough to prove, that Carthage was not far from such a miserable choice. Wherefore it was not unwisely done of the Romans, to make such demonstration of kindness, and honourable dealing, as might invite a rich but sinking ship, to run her self aground upon their shore. But when all was well ended in Africk, and the Carthaginians began to prepare for the recovery of Sardinia; then did Ambition put off her goodly vizor. The Romans perceiving that Carthage, beyond their hope, had recovered her feet again; began to strike at her head. They entertained the proffer of those Mercenaries, that were fled out of Sardinia; and they denounced war against this enfeebled and impoverished City, under a shameless pretence, that the preparations made for Sardinia, were made indeed against Rome it self. The Carthaginians knew themselves unable to resist, and therefore yielded to the Romans demand; renouncing unto them all their right in Sardinia. But this was not enough. They would have twelve hundred talents, in recompence belike (for I see not what reason they could alledge) of the great fear which they had endured, of an invasion from Carthage. It is indeed plain, that they impudently sought occasion of war. But necessity taught the Carthaginians patience; and the mony was payed, how hardly soever it was raised. From this time forward, let not Rome complain of the Punick faith, in breach of Covenants: she her self hath broken the peace already, which Amilcar purposeth to make her dearly repent; but what Amilcar lives not to perform, shall be accomplished by Hannibal his renowned Son.

§. V.

How the Affairs of Carthage went, between the African Rebellion, and the second Punick War.

THE injurious dealings of the Romans, expressing their desire to pick a quarrel, served to instruct the Carthaginians in a necessary lesson; That either they must make themselves the stronger, or else resolve to be obedient unto those that were more mighty. In a City long accustomed to rule, the braver determination easily took place: and the best means were thought upon for the increase of Puissance and Empire. The strength, and the jealousie of the Romans, forbade all attempts upon the Mediterranean Sea; but the riches of Spain, that lay upon the Ocean, were unknown to Rome: wherefore that Province might serve both to exercise the Carthaginians in war, and to repair their decayed forces, with all needful supplies. Of the Spanish Expedition, the charge and soveraign trust was committed unto Amilcar: upon whom his Country did wholly repose it self; in hope to recover strength by his means, that had saved it from ruine.

Hanno, with some other envious men that were of his faction, took little pleasure in the general love and honour, which daily increased towards Amilcar and his friends. Yet could they not deny him to be the most worthy of command in all the City: only they commended peace and quietness; advising men to beware of provoking the Romans, in whose amity they said, that the felicity of Carthage did consist. By such discourses, harsh to the ears of good Citizens, who had feeling of the wrong done to their Common-weal, they got none other reputation, than of singularity: which the ignorant sort suspected to be wisdom.

But the glory of Amilcar was continually upheld and enlarged, by many notable services that he did, to the singular benefit of his Country. He passed the straights of Hercules, (now called the straights of Gibralter) and landed on the Western coasts of Spain; in which Country, during nine years that he lived there, he subjected unto the State of Carthage the better part of all those Provinces. But finally in a battel that he fought with a Nation in Portugal, called the Vettones, (defending himself a long time with an admirable resolution) he was invironed and slain: carrying with him to the grave the same great honour and fame, by which in many signal victories, he had acquired the name of a second Mars.

After the death of Amilcar, Asdrubal his Son-in-law was made General of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. This was a good man of war; but far better in practice and cunning than in deeds of arms. By his notable dexterity in matter of negotiation, he greatly enlarged the Dominion of Carthage: adding so many subjects and confederates thereunto, that the Romans began to grow jealous again of this hasty increase. He built a goodly City upon a commodious Haven, in the Kingdom of Granado, opposite to that of Oran in Africa, and gave it the name of New Carthage, which to this day it nearly retaineth, being called now * Carthagena. With this success of the Carthaginians in Spain, the Romans were not a little troubled; but began to accuse their own negligence. For whereas they had formerly taken so much pains to beat them out of the Isle of Sicil, as suspecting their neighbourhood there; they had now, by cumbring themselves in a war of far less importance, (whereof I shall speak anon) given them leisure without interruption, to recover upon their own Continent, a Dominion by far exceeding both in the bodies of men, and in revenue, that which the Romans had taken from them. But how to help this, at the present they know not; for they daily expected to be invaded by the Gaules, their ancient enemies, and neerest neighbours to the West. But he needeth little help of force, that knoweth himself to be feared: it is enough if he request, since his request, requeſt ſhall have the vertue of a command.

Yet were the Romans utterly deſtitute of all good colour, that might help them to intermeddle in Spain. The Spaniards were then unacquainted with Rome, whereof (in probability) they ſcarce had heard the name: ſo that there were no Mamertines, nor other ſuch Rebels, to call in Roman ſuccours; but in the enterpriſe of Sardinia, the Romans had learned an impudent pretence, that might alſo ſerve their turn in Spain. For though it were apparent, that the Spaniſh affairs had no relation to the peace between theſe two Cities; and though it were nothing likely, that Aſdrubal had any purpoſe to extend his victories unto the gates of Rome, or to any of the Roman frontiers: yet (as if ſome ſuch matter had been ſuſpected) they ſent unto him, requiring that he ſhould forbear to proceed any further, than to the River of Iberus. In addreſſing their meſſengers, rather to Aſdrubal, than to the City of Carthage; they ſeem to have hoped, that howſoever the generality of the Carthaginians had ſweetly ſwallowed many bitter pills, to avoid all occaſion of war with Rome, yet the bravery of one man might prove more faſtidious, and reſenting the injury, return ſuch anſwer, as would intangle his whole Country in the quarrel, that they ſo much deſired; and might embrace at leiſure, when once they had found apparent cauſe. But Aſdrubal finely deluded their expectation. He pretended no manner of diſlike at all: and whereas they would have this inſolent covenant inſerted into the Articles of peace; he took upon him to do it of his own power, with ſuch appearance of conformity to their will, that they went their wayes contented, and ſought no further.

If it had been ſo, that the State of Carthage, thereunto preſſed by the Romans, for fear of preſent war, had ratified this new compoſition made by Aſdrubal; yet ſhould it not have ſtood bound in honour, to obſerve the ſame carefully, unleſs an oath had alſo been extorted, to make all ſure. But ſince all paſſed quietly, under the bare authority of Aſdrubal, this Capitulation was none other in effect than a ſecond breach of peace; whereof the Romans might be accuſed more juſtly, than they could accuſe the Carthaginians of perjury, (as they after did) for refuſing to ſtand to it.

By this Treaty with Aſdrubal, the Romans wan ſome reputation in Spain. For when it was once conceived by the Spaniards, that the City which would needs be Miſtreſs over them, ſtood in fear her ſelf of receiving blows from a ſtouter Dame; there were ſoon found ſome, that by offering themſelves to the protection of Rome, became (as they thought) fellow-ſervants with Carthage. But the Carthaginians will ſhortly teach them another leſſon. The Saguntines, a people on the South-ſide of Iberus, entred into confederacy with the Romans, and were gladly accepted. Surely it was lawful unto the Romans to admit the Saguntines, or any other people (neither ſubject, nor open enemy in war to the Carthaginians) into their ſociety: and unlawful it was unto the Carthaginians, to uſe violence towards any that ſhould thus once become confederate with Rome. Nevertheleſs, if we conſider the late agreement made with Aſdrubal, we ſhall find that the Romans could have none other honeſt colour of requiring it, than an implicit covenant of making the River Iberus a bound, over which they themſelves would not paſs, in any Diſcovery or Conqueſt by them intended to be made upon Spain: in which regard, they might have ſome honeſt pretence to require the like of the Carthaginians; though Rome, as yet, had no foot on the one ſide of Iberus, whereas Carthage on the other ſide of that River, held almoſt all the Country. Howſoever it were, this indignity was not ſo eaſily digeſted, as former injuries had been. For it was a matter of ill conſequence, that the Nations which had heard of no greater power than the Carthaginian, ſhould behold Saguntum reſting ſecurely among them, upon confidence of help from a more mighty City. Wherefore either in this reſpect, or for that the ſenſe is moſt feeling of the lateſt injuries; or rather for that now the Carthaginians were of power to do themſelves right: war againſt Saguntum was generally thought upon, let the Romans take it how they liſt. In ſuch terms were the Carthaginians, when Aſdrubal dyed, after he had commanded in Spain eight years (being ſlain by a ſlave, whoſe Maſter he had put to death) and the Great Hannibal, Son of the Great Amilcar, was choſen General in his ſtead.

§. VI.

The eſtate of Greece from the death of Pyrrhus, to the reign of Philip the Son of Demetrius in Macedon.

IN the long term of the firſt Punick war, and the vacation following, between it and the ſecond; the eſtate of Greece, after the death of Pyrrhus, was grown ſomewhat like unto that, wherein Philip of Macedon had found it; though far weaker, as the after-spring. The whole Country had recovered by degrees, a form of liberty: in petty tyrannies (bred of those inferiour Captains, which in the times of general combustion, had seised each upon such towns as he could get) were, by force or accident, extirpated, and reformed; and some States were risen to such greatness, as not only served to defend themselves, but to give protection to others. This conversion to the better, proceeded from the like dissensions and tumults in Macedon, as had been in Greece, when Philip first began to encroach upon it. For after many quarrels and great wars, about the Kingdom of Macedon, between Antigonus the elder, Cassander, Demetrius, Lysimachus, Seleucus, Pyrrhus, and the Gaules: Antigonus the son of Demetrius, finally got and held it, reigning six and thirty years; yet so, that he was divers times thence expelled, not only by the Gaules, and by Pyrrhus, as hath been already shewed, but by Alexander the Son of Pyrrhus the Epirot from whose father he had hardly won it. This happened unto him, by the revolt of his Souldiers, even at such time, as having overthrown with great slaughter an Army of the Gaules, he was converting his forces against the Athenians, whom he compelled to receive his Garrisons. But his young son Demetrius raised an Army, wherewith he chased Alexander, not only out of Macedon, but out of his own Epirus, and restored his Father to the Kingdom.

By the help of this young Prince Demetrius (though in another kind) Antigonus got into his possession the Citadel of Corinth; which was justly termed the fetter of Greece. This Citadel called Acrocorinthus, stood upon a steep rocky hill on the North side of the Town, and was by nature and art so strong, that it seemed impregnable. It commanded the Town; which was of much importance, as occupying the whole breadth of the Isthmus, that running between the Ægean and Ionique Seas, joyneth Peloponnesus to the Main of Greece. Wherefore he that held possession of this Castle was able to cut off all passage by land, from one half of Greece unto the other; besides the commodity of the two Seas, upon both of which, this rich and goodly City had commodious havens. Alexander, the son of Polysperchon; and after his death, Cratesipolis his wife, had gotten Corinth in the great shuffling of Provinces and Towns, that was made between Alexanders Princes. Afterwards it passed from hand to hand, untill it came, I know not how, to one Alexander; of whom I find nothing else, than that he was thought to be poisoned by this Antigonus, who deceived his wife Nicæa thereof, and got it from her by a trick. The device was this: Antigonus sent his young son Demetrius to Corinth, willing him to court Nicæa, and seek her marriage. The foolish old widow perceived not how unfit a match she was for the young Prince, but entertained the fancy of marriage; whereto the old King was even as ready to consent, as was his son to desire, and came thither in person to solemnize it. Hereupon all Corinth was filled with sacrifices, feasts, plaies, and all sorts of games: in the midst of which, Antigonus watched his time, and got into the Castle, beguiling the poor Lady, whose jealousie had been exceeding diligent in keeping it. Of this purchase he was so glad, that he could not contain himself within the gravity beseeming his old age. But as he had stollen it; so was it again stollen from him: neither lived he to revenge the loss of it, being already spent with age.

Demetrius, the son of this Antigonus, succeeding unto his Father, reigned ten years. He made greater proof of his vertue before he was King, than after. The Dardanians, Ætolians, and Achæans, held him continually busied in war; wherein his fortune was variable, and for the more part ill. About these times the power of the Macedonians began to decay: and the Græcians to cast off their yoke.

Philip, the only son of Demetrius, was a young child when his Father dyed; and therefore Antigonus, his Uncle, had the charge of the Kingdom, during the minority of the Prince; but he assumed the name and power of a King, though he respected Philip as his own son, to whom he left the Crown at his death; This Antigonus, was called the Tutor, in regard of his Protectorship; and was also called Doson, that is as much as, Will-give, because he was slow in his liberality. He repressed the Dardanians and Thessalians, which molested his Kingdom, in the beginning of his reign. Upon confidence of this good service, he took state upon him, as one that rather were King in his own right, than only a Protector. Hereupon the people fell to mutiny; but were soon appeased by fair words, and a seeming unwillingness of his to meddle any more with the Government. The Achaians took from him the City of Athens, soon after Demetrius his death; and likely they were to have wrought him out of all, or most that he held in Greece, if their own estate had not been endangered by a nearer enemy. But civil dissension, which had had overthrown the power of Greece, when it flouriſhed moſt, overthrew it eaſily now again, when it had ſcarcely recovered ſtrength after a long ſickneſs; and gave to this Antigonus no leſs authority therein, than Philip the Father of Alexander, got by the like advantage.

Theſe Achaians from ſmall beginnings, had increaſed in ſhort time to great ſtrength and fame: ſo that they grew the moſt redoubted Nation of all the Greeks. By the equality of their Laws, and by their clemency (notwithſtanding that they were a long time held under by the Macedonians and Spartans) they did not only draw all others by their love and alliance, but induced, through their example, the reſt of the Cities of Peloponneſus, to be governed by one Law, and to uſe one and the ſame ſort of weights, meaſure, and money.

Aratus, the Sicyonian, was the firſt that united them again; and gave them courage, after that they had been by the Macedonian Captains divided into many Principalities. In elder times they were governed by Kings, as moſt of the great Cities of Greece were; to which kind of rule they firſt ſubjected themſelves, after the deſcent of the Heraclidæ, when Tiſamenus the ſon of Oreſtes poſſeſt the Territory of Achaia. In this eſtate they continued to the time of Gyges, after whom, when his ſons ſought to change the Legal Government of their Predeceſſors unto Tyranny, they expelled them, and made their State popular; as ſeeming moſt equal. This form of Common-weal had continuance, with ſome ſmall changes according to the diverſity of times, till the reign of Philip and Alexander Kings of Macedon: who tempeſt-like overturned all things in that part of the world. For thoſe twelve Cities, called the Cities of Alliance (whereof, Helice, and Bura or Olenus, the Sea had eaten up a little before the Battel of Leuctres) were, by diſturbance of the Macedonians, divided from each other, and trained into a war, no leſs fooliſh than cruel, among themſelves. But in the one hundred and four and twentieth Olympiad (in which, or near it, Ptolemy the ſon of Lagus, Lyſimachus, Seleucus, and Ptolemy Ceraunus, left the world) two of ten remaining Cities and people, namely, the Patrenſes and the Dimæi, united themſelves, and laid the foundation of the general accord, and re-union, which after followed. For having been, ſome of them Partiſans with ſundry Macedonian Captains, and others having been governed by petty Kings; they began to faſten themſelves in a ſtrong league of amity, partly, in the Olympiad before ſpoken of, and partly, at ſuch time as Pyrrhus made his firſt voyage into Italy. Now after the uniting of the Patrenſes and Dimæi, to whom alſo the Cities of Titræa, and Phara, joyned themſelves; Ægira chaſed out her Garriſons: and the Burians, killing their Kings, entred with the Ceraunians into the ſame Confederacy. Theſe Cities, for twenty and five years, uſed the ſame form of Government with the Achaians; who by a Senatory and two Prætors, ordered all things in their Common-weal; and ſoon after by one Prætor, or Commander: of which, Marcus Carynenſis was the firſt, and Aratus the ſecond.

This Aratus was a noble young Gentleman of Sicyon, who, living at Argos in exile, whileſt his Country was oppreſſed by Tyrants, found means, through the help of other baniſhed men, to enter their own City by night, with ladders; whence they chaſed the Tyrant, and reſtored the people to liberty. This was in the time of Antigonus Gonatas King of Macedon, a Prince more buſie in watching what to get among the Greeks, than wiſe in looking to his own. For fear of Antigonus, the Sicyonians enter into the Achaian league: which though at that time it received more increaſe by their acceſſion than it added ſtrength to them; yet the benefit of this conjunction ſerved well enough againſt Antigonus, whoſe ſubtlety was ſomewhat greater than his valour. As the induſtry and counſel of Aratus delivered his County from bondage, and fortified it by the Achaian league; ſo further, by his great liberality, with the exceeding great coſt of 150. talents, he pacified the inexplicable controverſies, between the baniſhed Sicyonians, which returned with him, and the other Citizens that had poſſeſſion of theſe mens Lands; as alſo with the ſame money he drew many others to aſſiſt him in thoſe enterpriſes following, that redounded to the ſingular good of all Achaia. The money he obtained of Ptolemy Euergetes King of Ægypt; who partly had a deſire to hold ſome ſtrong and ſure friendſhip in Greece, partly was delighted with the converſation of Aratus himſelf, that made a dangerous voyage to him into Ægypt, and fed his pleaſure in goodly pictures, with the gift of many curious pieces, wherein the workmen of Sicyon excelled.

The firſt of Aratus his great attempts, was the ſurprize of the Acrocorinthus or Citadel of Corinth; which he wan by night, being thereinto guided by ſome theeves that he had hired for the purpoſe, who living in the place, had practiſed to rob Antigonus his his treasury, passing in and out by a secret path among the rocks. Yet was he fain to fight for it, ere he could get it: though indeed Antigonus his Souldiers were rather overcome by their own fear, than by any force of the assailants; as mistrusting lest the Achaians were more in number, than in truth they were, and having lost the advantages of the place already, upon which they had presumed, before they were aware of any enemy.

In these kinds of night-services, ambushments, surprises, and practices, Aratus was very cunning, adventurous, and valiant: in open field, and plain battail, he was as timorous. By this strange mixture of cowardize and courage, he ministred argument of disputation, to Philosophers and others; Whether a valiant man (as he was esteemed, and in some cases approved) might look pale and tremble, when he began battail; and Whether the vertue of Fortitude were diversified, by the sundry natures of men, and in a manner confined unto several sorts of action. In resolving which doubts it may be said, that all vertue is perfected in men by exercise, wherein they are trained by occasion: though a natural inclination standeth in need of little practice; whereas the defect hereof must be supplyed with much instruction, use, good success, and other help, yet hardly shall grow absolute in general. Such was Aratus in matter of War. In sincere affection to his Country he was unreprovable, and so acknowledged: as his following actions will truly testifie.

When Acrocorinthus was taken, and joyned unto the Common-wealth of Achaia, the Megarians revolted soon after from Antigonus, and entred into the same Corporation. So did the Trazenians, and the Epidaurians: whereby this new erected State grew so powerful, that it adventured to take Athens, from the Macedonians, and Argos and Megalopolis, from tyrants that held them. The enterprise upon the Athenians was of none effect. For though Aratus wasted the Isle of Salamis, to shew his strength, and sent home the Athenian prisoners, without ransome, to allure the City by shew of love; yet the Athenians stirred neither against him, nor for him, as being now grown honest slaves to the Macedonians. Upon Argos the adventure was carryed more strongly. The Achaians came sometimes to the gates of the City, but the people stirred not: once they entred it, and might have won it, if the Citizens would have lent any help to the recovery of their own freedom; sundry times, and with divers events, they fought with the Tyrants, (who rose up one after another in Argos) in open field, and slew one of them in battail; but all sufficed not: untill at length Aristomachus the Tyrant was so terrified, perswaded, and hired by Aratus, that he consented to resign his Estate. The like did Xenon the Tyrant of Hermione, and Cleonymus, that had oppressed the Phliasians.

Whilest this business with the Argives was on foot, Lysiadas the Tyrant of Megalopolis, was so well handled by Aratus, that, without compulsion, he gave liberty to his City, and annexed it to the Council of Achaia: whereby he got such credit, that he was chosen General of their forces (which was a yearly Office, and might not be held two years together by one man:) every second year, for a certain while, he and Aratus succeeded one another by turns. But those late Tyrants, and new Citizens, Lysiadas and Aristomachus, were carried with private passion from care of the general good; in which courses they opposed Aratus, to the great hurt of Achaia, as shall appear in due time.

The Achæans having obtained so much puissance and reputation, that Ptolemy King of Egypt was become Patron of their Alliance, and (in title of honour) General of their forces by Sea and Land; made open War upon Demetrius the son of Antigonus Gonatus, for the liberty of Athens. It is strange and worthy of noting, That when Aratus in this quarrel had lost a battail, the Athenians wore Garlands, in sign of joy, to flatter their good Lords the Macedonians, that had won the victory. Such were now the Athenians become; in whom the rule was verified, that holds true in general of the multitude, Aut humiliter servit, aut superbe dominatur; It is either base in service, or insolent in command. Nevertheless when Demetrius was dead, Aratus performed that by money, which he could not by force; and corrupting the Captain of the Macedonian Garrison, purchased liberty to the Athenians, who thenceforth held good correspondence with the Achæans, loving them, and speaking well of them, which was all that they could do: but into their Corporation they entred not, scorning it belike, in regard of their own out-worn glory.

Now as the Common-wealth of Achaia daily increased within Peloponnesus, by justice and honesty; so did the Ætolians, in the utter part of Greece, yea and within Peloponnesus it self, wax very powerful, by sturdiness of body, and rude courage in fight, without help of any other vertue. They had stoutly ſtoutly defended themſelves againſt Antipater and Craterus; partly by daring to do and ſuffer much, partly by the natural ſtrength and faſtneſs of their Country; but eſpecially by the benefit of the time, which called away theſe famous Captains to other buſineſs, as hath been related. They had moleſted Caſſander, in favour of Antigonus, and were themſelves as much plagued by him, and by the Acarnanians, a little, but a ſtout Nation, that took his part. Afterwards they had to do with Demetrius, the Son of the firſt Antigonus, and more or leſs with all the Kings of Macedon ſucceeding him. They likewiſe held often war with the Acarnanians, Athamanians, Epirots, and many Cities in Peloponneſus: ſo that they were hardened with a perpetual travail; ſeldom putting off their Armour. But their hardineſs ill deſerved the name of valour, ſeeing they had no regard of honeſty or friendſhip, meaſuring all things by their own inſolent wills, and thinking all people baſe-minded, that were not as fierce and outragious as themſelves.

Theſe Ætolians had lately made great ſpoils in Peloponneſus, and occupied a good part of the Country. They had invaded the friends of the Achæans; taken and ſacked Pallene; where, although they were ſoundly beaten by Aratus, yet their deſire of gain made them make a new voyage thither, as to a Country wherein ſomewhat was to be gotten. But they were forced to look another way, by Demetrius the Son of Antigonus Gonatas: who preſſed them ſo hardly, that they were driven to ſeek help of the Achæans; which they obtained. The war which the Achæans made upon Demetrius, without Peloponneſus, in Attica, though it tended to expelling the Macedons out of Greece, yet the benefit thereof redounded chiefly unto the Ætolians, at whoſe inſtance it was ſet on foot: for thereby were the Macedonian forces diverted from them. Neither was this good turn unacknowledged; though very baſely the Ætolians, giving thanks in words, deviſed how to requite the benefit with ſome great miſchief. They ſaw that the Achæans were deſirous to bring all Peloponneſus into their Alliance and Corporation: of which intent, the Lacedæmonians were very jealous. Wherefore theſe Ætolians laboured earneſtly to ſet the Lacedæmonians and Achæans together by the ears: hoping that if this might come to paſs, they themſelves ſhould be called in to help (it ſkilled not on what ſide) and ſo get no ſmall ſhare, both in booty and Territory. Neither did they forbear to communicate this their device unto Antigonus; offering to make him partaker of their gain, whom they knew to be offended with the many loſſes, that this Kingdom hath ſuſtained by the Achæans. Of this plot Aratus was aware: who therefore determined to ſuffer many indignities, rather than to give the Lacedæmonians cauſe to take Arms. But this reſolution was taken ſomewhat too late: and not altogether in his own power to hold. He had been medling with the Arcadians, that were dependants of Lacedæmon: and thereby had provoked the Lacedæmonians to look about them; ſeeing that all Peloponneſus, excepting themſelves, the Eleans, and a few Arcadians their friends (who alſo were attempted) was already become Achæan.

The City of Sparta was in ill caſe about theſe times; and ſubject to the injuries of any ſtronger neighbour. Pyrrhus had greatly weakned it; The Ætolians entring Liconia with an Army, had carried away fifty thouſand ſlaves; and, which was worſe, their diſcipline was corrupted, Avarice and Luxury reigned among them, the poor was oppreſſed by the rich, and the generoſity of ſpirit, that had ſometime been their general vertue, was hardly now to be found among the beſt of them. There was left in Sparta no more than ſeven hundred natural Citizens; of whom not above one hundred had Lands: all the reſt were needy people, and deſirous of innovation. Hereupon followed inteſtine ſedition; which endangered the City moſt of all. Agis a good King, who ſought to reform the diſorders of the State, exhorted the people to a ſtrict obſervation of Lycurgus his Laws. To which purpoſe he cauſed them to paſs an Act, for the aboliſhing of all debts, and equal diviſion of Lands. All the younger, and poorer ſort were glad of this: but the rich men oppoſed it. Theſe had recourſe unto Leonidas the other King, (for in Sparta were two Kings) who took their part: being himſelf a diſſolute man, as one trained up in the Court of Syria, whence alſo he had his wife. In this contention Leonidas was expelled the City, and a new King choſen in his ſtead. But Agis his friends and Counſellors in this enteprize, abuſed his good meaning to their own private commodity. They were haſty to take away all debts, and cancel all bonds, for they themſelves were deeply indebted: but the diviſion of Lands they afterwards hindred, becauſe their own poſſeſſions were great. Hence aroſe a tumult in Sparta, which theſe men increaſed by their foul oppreſſion of the poorer Citizens. So that in fine, Leonidas was brought home, and reſtored to his Kingdom, and the two adverſe Kings driven to take Sanctuary; out of which, Cleombrotus, the late-made King, was diſmiſſed into exile: but Agis was trained forth, drawn into priſon, and there by his enemies condemned and ſtrangled, together with his Mother, and his old Grand-mother. The like to this was never known in Sparta: and (which is the more odious) this cruelty proceeded from the Ephori, Magiſtrates that ſhould have given Patronage to the Laws, uſing their power, and more power than to them belonged, againſt a King, that had proceeded orderly in reforming the City as the Law required.

The death of Agis was much lamented by all good Citizens; and ſerved to eſtabliſh the impotent rule of a few tyrannical oppreſſors. In which caſe Aratus might well hope to adjoyn Lacedæmon to the Achæans Commonwealth: though it were great injuſtice to take ſuch advantages, and attempt by force, that which would have redounded to the general good of Peloponneſus, and to the benefit of Sparta it ſelf, if it could have been wrought by perſwaſion.

But the ſame man who redreſſed the diſorders of Sparta, and revenged the death of Agis, did alſo requite the unjuſt attempts of the Achæans, even in their own kind: obtruding upon them by force an union of all Peloponneſus, though little to their good liking, for that the Lacedæmonians and their King ſhould have been the principal; not they and their Prætor. Leonidas having thus cauſed Agis to be ſlain, took his wife that was very rich and beautiful, and gave her in marriage (perforce) to his own Son Cleomenes. This young Prince fell greatly inamoured on his wife, and ſought to win her affection, as well as he had her perſon. He diſcourſed much with her about the purpoſe of her former huſband Agis, and by pitying his misfortune, began to entertain a deſire of accompliſhing that, wherein Agis had failed. So coming himſelf to be King, whileſt he was very young, he gladly embraced all occaſions of War: for that he hoped by ſtrong hand to effect that, which Agis by proceeding formally in ſo corrupt an eſtate of the City, had attempted to his own ruine. Therefore when the Ephori gave him in charge, to take and fortifie Athenæum, a Temple on the marches of Laconia, to which both they and the Megalopolitans pretended title, he readily performed it. Hereof Aratus made no complaint, but ſought to take by ſurprize Tegea and Orchomenus, Cities then Confederate with the Lacedæmonians: wherein, his intelligence failing, he loſt the labour of a painful night travel, and diſcovered his enmity to Sparta; of which Cleomenes was nothing ſorry. By theſe degrees the war began. In the entrance whereto Aratus had diſcovered the Ætolian practice, and therefore would have ſtayed the quarrel from proceeding too far. But Lyſiadas and Ariſtomachus would needs fight, and he could do none other than be ruled by them; eſpecially ſeeing Cleomenes was ſo urgent. Ariſtomachus was at that time General of the Achæans, (He and Lyſiadas being of great account, ſince they had abandoned their tyranny) who ſent unto Aratus, lying then in Athens, and required his aſſiſtance in a journey to be made into Laconia. No diſſwaſions of Aratus would ſerve, therefore he came in perſon, and took part of a buſineſs, little pleaſing him in the preſent, and leſs in the future. When he met with Cleomenes, he durſt not fight; but oppoſed himſelf againſt Ariſtomachus, who deſired to give battel. Yet had the Achæans twenty thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe, in their Army: whereas Cleomenes had no more than five thouſand in all. This gave reputation to the Lacedæmonian, and raiſed an ill report upon Aratus; which Lyſiadas helped to make worſe, by accuſing his cowardize. Nevertheleſs the Achæans would not fall out with Aratus their Benefactor, but choſe him their General the year following; againſt Lyſiadas his accuſer that ſued for the place. Being General himſelf, it behoved him to confute with deeds, the ſlanderous words of Lyſiadas. Therefore he purpoſed to ſet upon the Eleans: but was met withall on the way, near unto the Mount Lycæus, by Cleomenes, who vanquiſhed him in a great battel, and drave him to hide himſelf all night for fear, ſo that he was thought to have been ſlain. This miſadventure Aratus recompenced by a trick of his own more natural occupation: performing with his broken Army, that which could hardly have been expected, had he been victorious. For whileſt there was no ſuſpicion of any great matter that he could undertake; he ſuddenly wrought with ſome of the Mantinæans, who did let him into their City. Theſe Mantinæans, (whom he had thus brought to his purpoſe) had once before joyned themſelves with the Achaians; but ſhortly upon fear, or ſome other paſſion, they gave themſelves to the Ætolians; and from the Ætolians, preſently after this victory, to Cleomenes, from whom immediately they were thus won. For this their levity they were not puniſhed, but freely admitted now again into the Achæan ſociety. As this good good ſucceſs repaired the credit of Aratus; ſo another battel almoſt ruined it. Cleomenes and he encountred near unto Megalopolis; where the Achæans had ſomewhat the better at the firſt, but their General durſt not follow his advantage. Thereupon Lyſiadas, of whom we ſpake before, grew ſomewhat impatient with anger; and taking with him all the horſe, brake upon the Lacedæmonians whom he routed at the beginning, but purſuing them too far into places of hard paſſage, he was ſlain by them, and his followers driven back upon their own Companions; in ſuch ſort, that finally all the Army was diſordered an put to flight. This was a great loſs, and incenſed the Achæans againſt Aratus: yet their indignation proceeded no further, than that they refuſed to make any longer contribution, towards the pay of thoſe Mercenaries which he had waged. This Aratus took patiently, and followed the war nevertheleſs; wherein though Cleomenes wan ſome Towns, and Aratus got the better in one ſmall fight, yet little of importance was done; the Achæans being weary, and the Spartan King intentive to another buſineſs.

Cleomenes having led into the field all that were like to hinder his purpoſe, and tired them with painfull journeys, forſook the Achæan war on a ſudden, and came unexpected home to Sparta, where he ſlew the Ephori, and reſtored by force the ancient diſcipline of Lycurgus. Then he gave an account of his doings; and ſhewing by what degrees the Ephori had incroached upon the power of Kings, and many diſorders had grown in the City; he juſtified his proceedings, and forthwith began to make equal diviſion of the Lands, reducing all to the firſt inſtitution. He alſo ſupplied the defect of Citizens, by chuſing new, out of ſuch as were friends to the State, and valiant men: ſo that henceforth his Countrey might not altogether ſtand in need of Mercenary help, as it lately had done, to ſave it ſelf from the Ætolians, Illyrians, and ſuch other enemies. All this was diſpatched in great haſte; the Spartans well ſatisfied, and Cleomenes himſelf ready in the field, ere his enemies could take any advantage of theſe his domeſtical troubles.

The Achæans hearing of this great alteration in Sparta, thought that it would be long ere Cleomenes durſt iſſue forth of the City, for fear of ſome rebellion. But it was not long ere they heard, that he had waſted all the Countrey of Megalopolis; had ranged over all Arcadia at his pleaſure; and was admitted into Mantinæa; and ready to take other places, even of Achaia. Theſe news diſpleaſed them not a little: but they muſt patiently endure to hear worſe. For when Cleomenes had ſhaken off the power of the Ephori, that curbed his authority, he proceeded more roundly in his work, being better obeyed, and by better men. His Lacedæmonians reſumed their ancient courage; and he himſelf had the heart to demand the Principality of Greece. He did not therefore henceforth contend about the poſſeſſion of a few Towns: but adventured to win or loſe all. The Ætolians, in favour of his attempt, declared themſelves on his ſide: and whereas he had gotten Mantinæa, Tegea, and other places; to which they had ſome title, they willingly renounced all their intereſt unto him.

Aratus did apprehend the danger of his Countrey, and ſaw that Antigonus, with the Ætolians, or perhaps without them, would ſhortly make an end of that, which Cleomenes had thus begun. Therefore he adviſed how to provide againſt the worſt, and either to repair all, or (if it could not be) to ſave all from utter ruine. The office of General, when it was next put upon him, he refuſ'd; fearing to be ſo far preſt, as to hazard in one battel all the force of his Countrey, to which as he had never any affection, nor perchance courage, ſo was his manner of warfare otherwiſe. For he commonly attempted by ſurpriſe, and defended upon the advantage of place, after the manner of the Iriſh, and of all other Nations, overcharged with numbers of men. Yet did he not forſake the care of the Weal-publick, though in aiming at the general good, it ſeems that private paſſion drew him into an ill courſe. He ſaw that Megalopolis could not be defended without making a dangerous hazard of battel; that Mantinæa had not only opened her gates unto Cleomenes, but ſlain the Achæan Garriſon that lay therein; that other Towns had yielded unto him, without compulſion; and that Ariſtomachus, once Tyrant of Argos, and ſince General of the Achæans, was now revolted unto the enemy following the fortune of Cleomenes. Ptolemy was too far off to help; and the nearneſs of Antigonus was very dangerous; yet might be uſefull, if this King would (as Polybius ſaith) like others, be friend or enemy, as ſhould beſt agree with his own profit. To make trial hereof, Aratus practiſed with ſome of Megalopolis, whom he found apt unto his purpoſe; and inſtructed them how to deal with Antigonus, and the Achæans.

The City of Megalopolis had been well

affected to the Macedonians, ever ſince the time of Philip the Father of Alexander, who had obliged it unto him by ſome ſpecial benefits. At this time it lay neareſt unto the danger; was very faithfull, and therefore deſerved ſuccour; yet could not well be relieved by the Achæans, with their own proper ſtrength. Wherefore it was thought meet, that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent unto the General Council of Achaia, requeſting leave and good allowance, to try the favour of Antigonus in their neceſſity. This was granted, for lack of what elſe to anſwer: and the ſame Embaſſadours diſpatched away to Antigonus. They did their own errand briefly; telling him of the good will and reſpect which their City had of long time born unto him and his Predeceſſors; of their preſent need; and how it would agree with his honour to give them aid. But when they delivered the more general matter, wherein Aratus had given them inſtruction; ſhewing how the ambition of Cleomenes, and violence of the Ætolians, might redound to his own great loſs or danger, if the one and the other were not in time prevented; how Aratus himſelf did ſtand affected; and what good likelihood there was of reducing the Achæans under the Patronage of Macedon: then began Antigonus to lend a more attentive ear to their diſcourſe. He embraced the motion: and to give it the more life, he wrote unto the Megalopolitans, that his help ſhould not be wanting, ſo far forth as it might ſtand with the Achæans good liking. Particularly he commended himſelf by theſe Meſſengers to Aratus, aſſuring them, that he thought himſelf highly bound to this honourable man, whoſe former actions he now perceived not to have been grounded upon any hatred to the Macedonians, but only upon a juſt and worthy love to his own Notion. With this anſwer they returned to Megalopolis: and are preſently ſent away to the Council of Achaia; there to make ſome ſpeedy concluſion, as the neceſſity of the time required. The Achæans were glad to hear, that Antigonus was ſo inclinable to their deſire; and therefore were ready to entertain his favour, with all good correſpondence. Hereunto Aratus gave his conſent; and praiſed the wiſdom of the Countrimen, that ſo well diſcerned the beſt and likelieſt means of their common ſafety: adding nevertheleſs, that it were not amiſs, firſt of all to try their own ability; which if it failed, then ſhould they do well to call in this gracious Prince, and make him their Patron and Protector. Thus he ſhewed himſelf moderate; in that which himſelf of all others did moſt wiſh: to the end, that he might not afterward ſuſtain the common reprehenſion, if any thing fell out amiſs; ſince it might appear, that he had not been Author of this Decree, but only followed, and that leiſurably, the general conſent.

Nevertheleſs, in true eſtimation, this fineneſs of Aratus might have been uſed, with his greater commendation, in a contrary courſe. For it had been more honourable to make an end of the war, by yielding unto Cleomenes that power which they gave unto Antigonus: ſince thereby he ſhould both have freed his Country from all further trouble; and withall, ſhould have reſtored unto the univerſal ſtate of Greece, that honourable condition, whereof the Macedonians had bereft it. But it is commonly found, (which is great pity) that Vertue, having riſen to honour by degrees, and confirmed it ſelf, (as it were) in the ſeat of principality, by length of time, and ſucceſs of many actions, can ill endure the haſty growth of any others reputation, wherewith it ſees it ſelf likely to be overtopped. Other cauſe to deſpiſe the Lacedæmonians there was none, than that they lately had been in dangerous caſe: neither could any reaſon be found, why Aratus ſhould prefer Antigonus before Cleomenes, than that he had ſtood in doubt of the one, when he thought himſelf more mighty than the other. Wherefore he was juſtly plagued, when he ſaw his own honours reverſed by the inſolent Macedonians: and inſtead of living as a companion with Cleomenes, that was deſcended of a long race of Kings, the poſterity of Hercules, was fain to do ſacrifice unto Antigonus, as unto a god, and was finally poyſoned by Philip, whoſe Nobility was but of five deſcents, and whom perhaps he might have ſeen his fellows, if he had not made them his Lords. By this inclination to the Macedonians, the love of Ptolemy was loſt: who forthwith took part with Cleomenes, though he did not ſupply him with ſuch liberality, as he had uſed to the Achæans; being warned, as may ſeem, by their example, to be more wary both in truſting and diſburſting. Cleomenes himſelf, whilſt this buſineſs with Antigonus was a-foot, paſſed through Arcadia with an Army, and laboured by all means to draw the Achæans to battel. At the City of Dymes in Achaia were aſſembled all the remaining forces of the Nation; with which it was concluded to make trial; whether perhaps they might amend their eſtate, without ſeeking help of the Macedonian. Thither went Cleomenes, and there fought with them; where he had ſo great a victory, that the enemy was no longer able to keep the open field. The calamity was ſuch, that Aratus himſelf durſt not take upon him to be their General, when his turn came in the next election. Wherefore the Achæans were compelled to ſue for peace; which was granted upon this eaſie condition: That they ſhould not arrogate unto themſelves the command of Peloponneſus, but ſuffer the Lacedæmonians (as in former ages) to be their Leaders in war. Hereunto if they would condeſcend, he promiſed unto them, that he would preſently reſtore all places taken from them, and all his priſoners ranſom-free: alſo that they ſhould enjoy their own Laws and Liberties without moleſtation. This gentle offer of Cleomenes was very pleaſing to the Achæans: who deſired him to come to the City of Lerna, where a Parliament ſhould be held, for the concluſion of the war.

Now ſeeming the affairs of Greece likely to be ſetled in better order, than they had ever been ſince the beginning of the Peloponneſian Wars, yea, or ſince the Perſian invaſion: when God, who had otherwiſe diſpoſed of theſe matters, hindred all with a draught of cold water, which Cleomenes drank in great heat, and thereupon fell extream ſick, and ſo could not be preſent at Lerna, but cauſed the Parliament to be deferred to another time. Nevertheleſs he ſent home the chief of his priſoners, to ſhew that he meant none other than good faith. By this fair dealing he confirmed the Achæans in their deſire of his friendſhip; who aſſembled again at Argos, there to eſtabliſh the League. But Aratus was violently bent againſt it, and ſought by great words, and terrible threats, to make his Country-men afraid of reſolving. When all would not ſerve turn, he betook himſelf to his cunning; and ſent word to Cleomenes, that he ſhould do well to leave his Army behind him, and come alone into Argos, receiving hoſtages for ſafety of his perſon. Cleomenes, was already far on his way, when he met with this advertiſement; and took it in ill part, that he ſhould be thus deluded. For it had been an eaſie matter, to have told him ſo much at the firſt, & not have made him come ſo far with an Army, which afterwards he muſt diſmiſs. Yet that which chiefly ſeems to have troubled him, was the drift of his oppugners; who ſought thereby, either to make him wait without the gates, and deal only with themſelves and their Meſſengers, or if he would adventure himſelf into the City, then to deprive him of all Royal ſhew, that might breed reſpect of him in the multitude. This was that indeed which Aratus feared, and for which he ſought to hinder his coming thither in perſon; leſt the people, hearing the promiſes of Cleomenes ratified by his own mouth, ſhould preſently be won with his gentle words, and finiſh the bargain without more ado. Therefore Cleomenes wrote unto the whole Councel, bitterly complaining againſt theſe juggling tricks: and Aratus was not far behind with him in as bitter an Oration. So between fear of the one, and reverence of the other, the Aſſembly knew not how to proceed, but abruptly brake up, leaving all, as it were to fortune. Cleomenes took his advantage of their preſent weakneſs, and renewed the War. Many Cities yielded unto him willingly; many he forced; and partly by force, partly by terror, he wan Argos, which never King of Sparta before him could do. In this caſe Aratus ſent his own ſon to Antigonus, intreating him to defer no time, but come preſently to relieve the diſtreſſed Achæans. Antigonus gave good words as could be wiſhed: ſaveing that he utterly refuſed to do any thing, unleſs he might firſt have Acrocorinthus put into his hands. This demand was ſomewhat like unto that of the Hunter, who promiſed to help the horſe againſt his enemy the Stagg: but with condition, that the horſe ſhould ſuffer him to be ſaddled and bridled. Aratus was herewithall contented, but wanting all honeſt colour to do it: ſeeing the Corinthians had no way deſerved to be thus given away to the Macedonians. Yet at length an occaſion was found; for that the Corinthians, perceiving what he intended, were minded to arreſt him. So he withdrew himſelf out of their City, and ſent word to Antigonus, that their Caſtle ſhould be ready to let him in. The Corinthians on the other ſide ran to Cleomenes; who loſt no time, but made haſt with them to Corinth, where he ſought how to get poſſeſſion of their Caſtle, or at leaſt to ſave it from Antigonus, by ſurrounding it within Trenches, that none might iſſue nor enter without his leave. Whileſt this was doing, he took ſpecial order, that Aratus his houſe and goods, within the Town, ſhould be kept for the Owner; to whom he ſent Meſſenger after Meſſenger, deſiring him to come to agreement, and not to bring in the barbarous Macedonians, and Illyrians, to Peloponneſus; promiſing, that if he would hearken to theſe perſwaſions, then would he give him double the ſame penſion, which he had been wont to receive of King Ptolomy. As for the Caſtle of Corinth, which was the gate of Peloponneſus, and without which none could hold aſſured ſoveraignty of the Country; he desired that it might not be committed unto his own disposition, but be joyntly kept by the Lacedæmonians and Achæans. All this entreaty served to no purpose. For Aratus, rejecting utterly the motion, sent his own son as an Hostage to Antigonus; and laboured with the Achæans, to put Acrocorinthus into his hands. Which when Cleomenes understood, he seised upon the goods of Aratus in Corinth, and wasted all the Countrey of Sicyon, whereof this his Adversary was native.

Antigonus in the mean time drew near to the Isthmus; having passed with his Army through Eubœa, because the Ætolians held the straights of Thermopylæ against him. This they did, either in favour of Cleomenes, which they pretended; or in doubt of the greatness, whereunto the Macedonians might attain by the good success of this journey. At his coming thither, he found the Lacedæmonians ready to forbid his entrance: and that with sufficient strength; yet with no purpose to hazard battel, but rather to weary him thence with hunger; against which he came not well provided. Antigonus therefore laboured hard to make his way by force; but he was not able so to do: he secretly got into the Corinthian Haven; but was violently driven out again, with great loss of men; finally he resolved to turn aside, and seek a passage over the gulfe of Corinth, to Sicyon, or some other part of Achaia; but this required much time, and great preparation, which was not easily made.

In this perplexity, news from Argos came by Sea, that greatly comforted Antigonus, and no less troubled his enemies. The Achæans were gotten into that City; and the Garrison which Cleomenes had left therein, though it was not driven out of the Citadel, yet was hardly distressed, and stood in need of present help. Argos had always been enemy to Sparta, and well affected to the King of Macedon. When Cleomenes took it, he forbare to chase out those whom he most suspected; partly, at the entreaty of friends, and partly, for that they all made shew to be glad of his prosperity. They were glad indeed of Cleomenes his victories, both in Argos and elsewhere, as many as hoped that he would cause all debters to be discharged from their creditors, as he had lately done in Sparta. But that which Cleomenes had done in Sparta was agreeable to the Spartan institution: in other places, where it would have been tyrannical, he did not. Thereupon, such as were disappointed of their unjust hopes, began to turn good Common-wealthmen; and called him Tyrant for his doings at home, because he would not do the like abroad. So they took their time, invited the Achæans, assailed his Garrison, cut in pieces the rescue that he sent, and compelled him at length to forsake the defence of Corinth, and look unto the enemies that were behind his back. For when he understood by continual messengers, that his men which held the Citadel at Argos were almost lost: he began to fear lest his labour in guarding the entry should grow frivolous; the Achæans in the mean while spoiling all that lay within. Therefore he forsook his custody of the Isthmus, and made all haste towards Argos: which if he could save, he meant to trust fortune with the rest. And so far he prevailed at his coming to Argos, that both Argives and Achæans were glad to house themselves, leaving him Master of the streets; when the horsemen of Antigonus were discovered afar off, hasting to relieve the Citizens; and Antigonus himself (to whom Corinth was yielded, as soon as the Spartan had turned his back) following apace with the body of his Army. Cleomenes therefore had no more to do, then to make a safe retreat. This he did, and got him home into Laconia: losing in short space all, or most of that which he had been long in getting.

Antigonus having shewed himself at Argos, and commended the Citizens, went into Arcadia; where he wan such Castles as were held for Cleomenes, and restored them to the old Possessors. This done, he took his way to Ægium, where was held a Parliament by the Achæans; to whom he declared the cause of his coming, and spake brave words, that filled them with hope. The Achæans were not behind with him; but made him Captain-General over them and their Confederates: and further entered into covenant with him, That they would not deal with any Prince or State, either by writing, or Embassadour, without his consent. All this while & somewhat longer Aratus was the only man, that seemed to rule the Kings heart: carrying him to Sicyon his own Town, (for Winter was come on) where he not only feasted him as a great Prince, but suffered more than humane honours, as sacrifices and the like, to be done unto him. This example of Aratus and his Sicyonians, was followed by the rest of Achaia: which had made (forsooth) a very wise bargain, if in stead of Cleomenes that would have been a King, it had obtained the protection of a God. But this god was poor, and wanting wherewith to pay his Macedonians, imposed the burthen upon the Achæans. This was hardly taken: yet worſe muſt be indured in hope of better. Neither was Aratus himſelf over-carefully reſpected; when the ſtatues of thoſe Tyrants, which he had thrown down in Argos, were again erected by Antigonus; or when the ſtatues which he had erected, of thoſe that had taken Acrocorinthus with him, were all thrown down by the ſame King, and one only left unto himſelf at his earneſt intreaty. It might therefore appear, that this god was alſo ſpightful. Nevertheleſs in taking revenge upon thoſe that offended him, Aratus did ſatisfie his own paſſion by the aid of theſe Macedonians. For with extreme torments he did put Ariſtomachus to death, who had been once Tyrant of Argos, afterwards General of the Achæans, and from them revolting unto Cleomenes, did fall at length into their hands. In like ſort handled he (though not as yet) the Mantinæans, for their ingratitude and cruelty ſhewed to the Achæans. For he ſlew all the principal Citizens, and ſold the reſt, men, women and children, all for bond-ſlaves: dividing the ſpoil; two parts to the Macedonians, and the third to the Achæans. The Town it ſelf was given by Antigonus to the Argives, who peopled it with a Colony of their own; and Aratus having charge of this buſineſs, cauſed it be new named Antigonia. Surely of this cruelty there can be no better excuſe, than even the flattery which Aratus was driven to uſe to Antigonus: foraſmuch as it was a token of ſervility, whereinto they had urged and brought him; whom he, as in revenge thereof, did thus requite. But leaving to ſpeak of this change, which the coming in of the Macedonian wrought in the Civil State of the Achæans; let us return unto this war againſt the Lacedæmonian.

The next Summer Antigonus wan Tegea, Mantinæa, Orchomenus, Heræa, and Telphuſſa: Mantinæa he diſ-peopled, as was ſaid before; in Orchomenus he placed a Garriſon of his Macedonians; the reſt he reſtored to the Achæans, with whom he wintered at Ægium, where they held a Parliament. Once only Cleomenes had met him this year; and that was on the borders of Laconia, where he lay ready to defend his own Territory. The reaſon why he ſtirred no further, nor followed Antigonus to Mantinæa, & to thoſe other Towns that he wan, was this: He had few Souldiers, and had not money enough to wage more. Ptolemy the Egyptian promiſed much, but would perform nothing, unleſs he might have Cleomenes his own Mother, and his children in pledge. Theſe were ſent unto Egypt, yet the aid came not. For Ptolemy was ſlow; as dealing in the buſineſs of Greece, rather for his minds ſake, than upon any apprehenſion of neceſſity. Cleomenes therefore provided for himſelf, as well as his own ability would ſerve. He manumiſed all the Heilotes which were the Lacedæmonian ſlaves: taking money for their liberty, and arming two thouſand of them after the Macedonian faſhion. Having thus increaſed his forces, he came on the ſudden to Megalopolis, that lay ſecure, as having defended it ſelf in more dangerous times, and having now Antigonus near at hand in Ægium. The Town he wan: but after he was entred, all that were fit to bear Arms roſe haſtily againſt him; and though they could not drive him out, yet ſaved the multitude, to whom they gave a Port free for their eſcape. He ſent after the Citizens, offering their Town and goods to them again, if they would be of his party. But they bravely refuſed his offer: wherefore he ſacked and ruined it, carrying with him to Sparta a great booty that he found therein. Theſe news aſtoniſhed the Achæans at Ægium: who thereupon brake up their Parliament. Antigonus ſent haſtily for his Macedonians, out of their wintering-places: but they were ſo long in coming, that Cleomenes was ſafely gone home. Therefore he returned them back to their lodgings, and went himſelf to Argos, there to paſs the reſt of his unlucky winter, ſomewhat further from the eyes of the grieved Achæans. When he had layn a while at Argos, Cleomenes was at the gates, with no great number of men, yet with more than Antigonus had then about him. The Argives perceiving that their Country would be ſpoiled, if Antigonus did not iſſue into the field, were very earneſt with him to go forth and fight. But he was wiſer than to be moved with their clamors, and ſuffered them to ſee their villages burnt; to bid him reſign his Office of Protector unto ſome that were more valiant; and to ſatisfie their paſſions with fooliſh words, rather than he would be overcome in fight, and thereby loſe more honour than could eaſily be repaired. By this Cleomenes had his deſire, in weakning the reputation of his enemy: though he hereby added neither followers, nor other ſtrength unto Lacedæmon.

Afterwards, when the ſeaſon was more fit for war, Antigonus gathered together all his troops; meaning to requite theſe bravadoes of his enemy, with the conqueſt of Sparta. Cleomenes, on the other ſide laboured to keep the war from his own gates; and therefore entred upon the Country of Argos, where where he made such a havock, as drew Antigonus thither, from his intended invasion of Laconia. Many great affronts the Macedonian was fain to endure, in coasting of the Spartan King; that ranging over the Country of the Argives, Phliasians, and Orchomenians, drave a Garrison of his out of Oligyrtis; and did sacrifice, as it were before his face, in the suburbs of Argos, without the Temple of Juno, that was shut up; sending unto him in scorn, to borrow the keys. These were light things; yet served to dis-hearten the Achæan side, and to fill the enemy with courage, which was no matter of light importance. Therfore he concluded to lay apart all other regard of things abroad, and to put all to hazard; by setting up his rest, without any more delay, upon Sparta it self. He had in his Army eight and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, collected out of sundry Nations, as Macedonians, Illyrians, Gaules, Epirots, Bœotians, Acarnanians, and others; together with the Achæans; and their friends of Peloponnesus. Cleomenes had of all sorts twenty thousand, with which he lay at Selasia: fortifying slightly the other passages into Laconia, through which the Macedonians were not likely to seek entrance. Antigonus coming unto Selasia, found his enemy so strongly encamped, upon and between the hills of Eva and Olimpus, that he was constrained to spend much time there, before he could advance any one foot: neither lay it in his power to come hastily to blows, which he greatly desired, without the hazard of his whole Army, in assailing their well defenced Camp. But at length (as it happens, when men are weary both of their hopes and fears) both Kings being resolved to make an end one way or other; Antigonus attemped with his Illyrians, to force that part which lay on the hill Eva. But his Illyrians were so ill seconded by the Achæan foot, that the Spartan horse, and light-armed foot, incamped in the straight valley between those hills, issuing forth, fell upon their skirts, and not only disordered them, but were like to have endangered all the rest. If Cleomenes himself had stood in that part of the battel, he would have made great use of such a fair beginning. But Eucydas, his Brother, a more valiant than skilfull Souldier, commanded in that wing: who neither followed this advantage, nor took such benefit as the ground afforded, whereon he lay. Philopœmen the Arcadian of Megalopolis, who afterwards proved a famous Captain, served then on horse, as a private young man, among the Achæans. He seeing that all was like to go to rout, if their Illyrians were driven to fall back upon the Army following them; perswaded the Captains of the Achæan horse, to break upon the Spartan Mercenaries. But they would not: partly despising his youth and want of charge; partly, for that Antigonus had given order, that they should keep their places, untill they received a sign from him, which was not as yet. Philopœmen perceiving them to be more orderly than well advised, intreated some of his own Country-men to follow him, gave a charge on the Spartans, and forced them, not only to leave the Illyrians, but seek how to save themselves. Being so far advanced, he found the place which the Illyrians had attemped, like enough to be won, through the unskilfulness of him that held it. Wherefore he alighted, and perswaded the men at Arms his Companions to do the like: the folly of Eucydas being manifest, who kept the top of the Hill, and stirred not to hinder those that ascended, but waited for them in a Plain, where they might fight upon even terms. So he recovered the Hill-top; where, though he was sore hurt, yet he made good the place that he had gotten, until the whole Army came up to him; by which the Lacedæmonians were beaten from it, with great slaughter of them in their descent. This overthrow, and death of Eucydas, made Cleomenes lose the day: who fighting bravely on the other side, upon Olympus, against Antigonus himself, was like to have been surrounded and lost, if he had not withdrawn himself with an extraordinary speed. In this battel ended the glory of Lacedæmon, which, as a light ready to go out, had with a great, but not long blaze, shined more brightly of late, than in many ages past.

Cleomenes fled unto Sparta; where he had no desire to stay; finding only two hundred left, of six thousand Spartans that he had led unto this battel, and most of his hired Souldiers dead, or gone away. So he perswaded his people to yield themselves unto Antigonus; and promising to do all that should at any time lye in his own power, for their good, he hasted away to the Sea-side (where he had shipping long before provided against all that might happen) and imbarked himself for Egypt. He was lovingly entertained by Ptolemy Euergetes; who undertook to restore him to his Kingdom, and (perhaps) meant no less, as being much delighted with his gallant behaviour, and qualities. In the mean season, he had a Pension allowed him, of four and twenty Talents, yearly. But this Ptolemy died; and his Son Ptolemy Philopater succeeded him: a vicious young Prince, Prince, wholly governed by lewd Women, and baſe Men, unmindful of all vertue, and hating any in whom it was found. When therefore Cleomenes was deſirous to return into Greece, whither the troubles in Peloponneſus did ſeem to invite him; Ptolomy and his Minions, would neither give him aid; nor yet dared to diſmiſs him (as he deſired) to try his own friends in Greece, becauſe he was too well acquainted with the weakneſs of Egypt: nor well knew how to detain him againſt his will. At length they deviſed matter againſt him, and made him priſoner, the laſt act of him was, that with thirty of his Country-men, he undertook a deſperate enterprize: breaking out of the priſon, and provoking the Alexandrians to rebell and ſeek their liberty. In which attempt he ſlew ſome enemies of his that he met; and having walked up and down the ſtreets without reſiſtance (no man offering to take his part, or, which is very ſtrang, to fight againſt him on the Kings behalf) he, and his Companions, agreed together to be miniſters of their own death. Upon his dead body Ptolemy was bold to ſhew his indignation: and ſlew his Mother and Children, that had been ſent thither, as Hoſtages, together with the Wives of his Adherents, as many as were there, attending upon the old Queen. Such was the end of Cleomenes, a generous Prince, but Son of Leonidas, who had cauſed Agis, with his Mother and Grand-mother, to come to ſuch a bloody end, as now befell his own Wife, Son, and Grand-children.

After the victory at Sellaſia: Antigonus without reſiſtance entred Sparta: wherein to never the force of any Enemy, before him, could make way. He kindly intreated the Citizens, and left them to their own Laws and Government: tarryiug there no longer than two or three daies: after which he haſtned out of Peloponneſus, and never returned. The cauſe of his ſpeedy departure was an advertiſment that he received out of Macedon; how the Illyrians over-ran and deſtroyed the Country. Had theſe news come a little ſooner, or had Cleomenes either deferred the fight, a few daies longer, or at leaſt-wiſe tarried a few daies after the fight, in Sparta; the Kingdom of Lacedæmon would have ſtood, and perhaps have extended it ſelf over all Greece. But God had otherwiſe determined.

Antigonus fought a great battel with the Illyrians, and overcame them. Yet therein he caught his bane: not by any wound, but by over-ſtraining his voice; wherewith he brake a vein that bled inwardly, and in ſhort ſpace finiſhed his life, who was troubled before with a conſumption of the lungs. His Kingdom deſcended unto Philip the Son of Demetrius, being then a Boy: as alſo about the ſame time it was, that Antiochus, ſurnamed (I know not why) the Great; and Ptolomy Philopater, began to reign in Aſia and Egypt; Boyes all. Of theſe, Ptolomey, though old enough to love Harlots, when he firſt was King, yet continued a Boy all the ſeventeen years of his reign. The unripe age of Philip and Antiochus; bred ſuch inteſtine inconvenience to their Kingdoms, as is uſual in the minority of Princes: but their elder years brought them acquainted with the Romans; upon which occaſion, when it comes, we ſhall more ſeaſonably ſpeak of them, and of their Kingdoms, more at large.

§. VII.

How the Illyrians infeſted the Coaſt of Greece; and how they were ſubdued by the Romans

WHilſt things thus paſſed in Greece, and whilſt the Carthaginians were buſie in their conqueſt of Spain; the Romans had found themſelves work among the Sardinians and Corſicans, that were eaſily ſubdued at firſt, and eaſily vanquiſhed again, when they rebelled. They made alſo war with the Illyrians, wherein they got much honour with little pain. With the Gaules they had much ado, that laſted not long; being rather, as Livy ſaith, a tumult than a war. So that by all theſe light exerciſes their valour was hardly kept from ruſt. How they got the Iſlands in the Mediterranean Sea, it hath been ſhewed before: of their dealings with the Illyrians and Gaules, it is not meet to be utterly ſilent. Liv. lib. 21.

The Illyrians inhabited the Country now called Slavonia; a troubleſome Nation, impatient of reſt, and continually making war for gain, without either regard of friend or foe. They were invited by Demetrius, King of Macedon, to help the Mydionians his friends, that were beſieged by the Ætolians, for that they refuſed to be of their ſociety. Before the Illyrians ſuccours came, the Mydionians were ſo far ſpent, that the Ætolians contended about the booty: the old Prætor, or chief Magiſtrate of their Nation, who was going out of his office, claiming to have the honour of the victory, and the diviſion of the ſpoyl to be referred unto him; for that he had in a manner brought the ſiege to an end, and won the Town: others, that were in hope to be choſen into the Office, contradicting this.

this, and desiring that old orders might be kept. It was a petty strife, and somewhat like to that of the French in latter ages, who thought upon dividing the prey, before they had won the victories, which anon they lost, at Poitiers and Agincourt. The Ætolians wisely compounded the difference, ordering it thus, That the old and the new Prætor should be joyntly intituled in the victory, and have equal authority in distributing of the gettings. But the Illyrians finished the strife much more elegantly, and after another fashion. They arrived and landed ere any was aware of them; they fell upon the Ætolians, and though good resistance was made, yet got the victory, partly by force of their multitude, partly by the help of the Mydionians, that were not idle in their own business, but stoutly sallied out of the Town. Many of the Ætolians were slain, more were taken, their Camp and all their baggage was lost: the Illyrians took the spoil, and went their way; the Mydionians erected a Trophie, inscribing the names both of their old and new Magistrates (for they also chose new Officers at the same time) as the Ætolians had directed them by example.

The success of this voyage highly pleased Agron King of the Illyrians: not only in regard of the money, wherewith Demetrius had hired his assistance; or of the booty that was gotten; but for that having vanquished the stoutest of the Greeks, he found it not uneasie to enrich himself by setting upon the less warlike. For joy of this he feasted, and drank so immoderately, that he fell into a Pleurisie, which in few daies ended his life. His Kingdom, together with his great hopes, he left unto Teuta his wife.

Teuta gave her people free liberty to rob all sorts at Sea, making no difference between friend and foe; as if she had been sole Mistress of the salt Waters. She armed a fleet and sent it into Greece; willing her Captains to make war where they found advantage, without any further respect. These fell on the western coast of Peloponnesus; where they invaded the Eleans, and Messanians. Afterwards they returned along by Epirus, and stayed at the City of Phœnice, to take in victuals and other necessaries. There lay in Phœnice eight hundred Gaules, that having been Mercenaries of the Carthaginians, went about to betray, first Agrigentum, then Eryx, to the Romans; but failing to do either, they nevertheless revolted, and were for their misdeeds disarmed and sent to Sea by the Romans, yet entertained by these Epirots, and trusted to lye in Garrison within their Town. The Gaules were soon grown acquainted with the Illyrians, to whom they betrayed Phœnice; which deserved none other, in trusting them. All Epirus was presently in arms, and hastned to drive out these unwelcome guests. But whilst the Epirots lay before the Town, there came news into their Camp, of another Illyrian Army, that was marching thitherward by Land, under one Scerdilaidas, whom Queen Teuta had sent to help his fellows. Upon this advertisement, a part of them is sent away towards Antigonia, to make good that Town, and the straights adjoyning, by which these new comers must enter into their Countrey; another part of them remains at Phœnice, to continue the siege. Neither the one nor the other speed well in their business. For Scerdilaidas found means to joyn with his fellows; and they that were besieged within Phœnice, sallied out of the Town, and gave such an overthrow to the Epirots, as made them despair of saving their Country, without great and speedy help from abroad. Wherefore Embassadours were sent to the Achæans and Ætolians: craving their help, with very pitifull terms of intreaty. They obtained their suit; neither was it long, before an Army, sent by these two Nations, was ready in Epirus to present battel unto Scerdilaidas. But Scerdilaidas was called home by letters from Teuta the Queen, that signified a rebellion of some Illyrians against her: so that he had no mind to put his forces to hazard, but offered composition, which was accepted. The agreement was, That the Epirots might ransome their Town, and all their people that were prisoners; and that the Illyrians should quietly depart with all their booty and slaves. Having made this profitable and honourable bargain, the Illyrians returned into their own Country by Land, sending their booty away by Sea.

At their coming home, they found no such great trouble, as that which they brought, or had occasioned in this voyage. For, in fulfilling the commandment of their Queen, they had taken many Italian Merchants, whiles they lay at Phœnice; and made them good prize. Hereof the complaints made unto the Roman Senate, were so frequent, that Embassadours were sent to require of Teuta, that she should abstain from doing such injuries. These Embassadours found her very jolly; both for the riches which her fleet had brought in; and for that she had, in short ſpace, tamed her rebells, and brought all to good order, ſave only the Town Iſſa, which her forces held ſtraightly beſieged. Swelling with this poſperity, ſhe could hardly afford a good look to the Romans, that found fault with her doings, and, calling them by a true name, Piracy, required amends. Yet when their ſpeech was ended, ſhe vouchſafed to tell them, That injury in publick ſhe would do them none: as for private matters, no account was to be made of them; neither was it the manner of Kings to forbid their ſubjects to get commodity, how they beſt could by Sea. But (ſaid the younger of the two Embaſſadours) we Romans have a manner, and a very laudable one, to take revenge in publick, of thoſe private wrongs that are born out by publick authority: therefore we ſhall teach you, God willing, to reform your Kingly manners, and learn better of us. Theſe words the Queen took ſo impatiently, that no revenge could ſatisfie her, but the death of him that had ſpoken them. Wherefore, without all regard of the common Law of Nations, ſhe cauſed him to be ſlain: as if that had been the way to ſet her heart at reſt; which was indeed the mean to diſquiet and afflict it ever after.

The Romans, provoked by this outrage, prepare two great Armies; the one by Sea, conſiſting of two hundred ſail, commanded by C. Fulvius; the other by Land, led by A. Poſthumus. They trouble not themſelves any more with requiring ſatisfaction: for this injury is of ſuch nature, as muſt be requited with mortal war. It is indeed contrary to all humane Law, to uſe violence towards Embaſſadours: the reaſon and ground whereof, ſeems to be this; that ſince without mediation, there would never be an end of war and deſtruction, therefore it was equally received by all Nations, as a leſſon taught by Nature, that Embaſſadours ſhould paſs freely, and in ſafety, between enemies. Nevertheleſs, as I take it, this general Law is not without limitation. For if any King or State lay hold upon Embaſſadours ſent by their enemies, not unto themſelves, but unto ſome third, whom they ſhould draw into the quarrel; then it is as lawful to uſe violence to thoſe Embaſſadours (thus employed to make the war more terrible) as it is to kill the men of war, and ſubjects of an enemy. And ſo might the Athenians have anſwered it when they ſlew the Lacedæmonian Embaſſadours, that were ſent to Xerxes, to draw him into a war upon the Athenians. Neither are thoſe Embaſſadours, which practiſe againſt the perſon of that Prince, in whoſe Countries they reſide, warranted by any law whatſoever. For whereas the true office of an Embaſſadour reſiding, is the maintenance of amity; if it be not lawfull for one Prince to practice againſt the life of another; much leſs may an Embaſſadour do it without incurring juſtly the ſame danger to puniſhment, with other Traitors; in which caſe, his place gives him no priviledge at all. But we will leave this diſpute to the Civilians; and go on with the revenge, taken by the Romans, for the ſlaughter of their Embaſſadour Coruncanus.

The Illyrian Queen was ſecure of the Romans, as if they would not dare to ſtir againſt her. She was indeed in an errour, that hath undone many of all ſorts, greater and leſs than ſhe, both before and ſince: Having more regard unto fame, than unto the ſubſtance of things. The Greeks were at that time more famous than the Romans; the Ætolians and Epirots had the name of the moſt warlike people in Greece; theſe had ſhe eaſily vanquiſhed, and therefore thought, that with the Romans ſhe ſhould be little troubled. Had ſhe conſidered that her whole Army, which wrought ſuch wonders in Greece; was not much greater than of ten thouſand men; and that nevertheleſs, it prevailed as much by odds of number, as by valour, or ſkill in arms; ſhe would have continued to uſe her advantage againſt thoſe that were of more fame than ſtrength, with ſuch good caution, that ſhe ſhould not have needed to oppoſe her late-gotten reputation, againſt thoſe that were more mighty than her ſelf. But ſhe was a woman, and did what ſhe liſted. She ſent forth a greater fleet than before, under Demetrius of Pharos; with the like ample commiſſion to take all that could be gotten. This fleet divided it ſelf, & one part of it fell with (a) Dyrrachium, the other with Corcyra. Dyrrachium was almoſt ſurpriſed by the Illyrians; yet was it reſcued by the ſtout Citizens. In (b) Corcyra the Illyrians landed, waſted the Iſle, and beſieged the Town. Hereupon the Ætolians and Achæans were called in to help; who came, and were beaten in a fight at Sea: loſing, beſides others of leſs note, Marcus Caryncnſis, the firſt Prætor of Achaia, whom Aratus ſucceeded. The Town of Corcyra, diſmayed with this overthrow, opened the gates unto Demetrius Pharius, who took poſſeſſion of it with an Illyrian Garriſon: ſending the reſt of his forces to beſiege Dyrrachium. In the mean ſeaſon, Teuta was angry with her Captain Demetrius: I know not why; but ſo as he reſolved to try any other courſe, rather than to truſt her.

(a) Dyrrachium, ſometime called Epidamnus, and now Durazzo, ſeated upon the Adriatick ſea, between the Iſlands of Phoros and Corfu.

(b) Corcyra, an Iſland of the Adriatick ſea, not far from Durazzo, called now Corfu, and in the poſſeſſion of the Venetians.

The Romans were even ready to put to Sea, though uncertain which way to take, when advertisement was brought to C. Fulvius the Consul, of Demetrius his fear and discontent. Likely it was that such an occasion might greatly help to advance the business in hand. Wherefore the Consul sailed thither; where he found the Town of Corcyra so well prepared to his hand by Demetrius, that it not only received him willingly, but delivered into his power the Illyrian Garrison, and submitted it self unto the Roman protection.

After this good beginning, the Consul sailed along the coast to (c) Apollonia; accompanied with Demetrius, whom he used thenceforth as his Councellor and guide. To Apollonia came also Posthumus, the other Consul, with the Land-Army, numbred at twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse. Thence they hastened towards Dyrrachium, which the Illyrians had besieged; but upon news of the Roman army they disperse themselves. From thence the Romans enter Illyria, and take Parthenia; beat the Illyrians by sea, take twenty of their ships, and enforce the Queen Teuta to forsake the coast, and to cover her self in Rison far within the Land. In the end, part of the Romans haste them homeward, and leave the best places of Illyria in the hands of Demetrius; another part staies behind, and prosecutes the war, in such sort, that Teuta was forced to beg peace; which she obtained upon miserable conditions; to wit, That she should quit the better part of Illyria, and pay tribute for the rest; and from thenceforth never send any of her ships of war towards the coasts of Greece, beyond the Island of Lissa: except it were some one or two vessels unarmed, and by way of Trade.

(c) Apollonia, a City near Dyrrachium, or Durazzo, upon the Sea coast. Teuta called in Virgil.

After this Illyrian war, the Romans sent Embassadours into divers parts of Greece, signifying their love to their Country, and how, for good will thereunto, they had made war with good success upon Teuta, and her people. They hoped, belike, that some distressed Cities would take this occasion, to desire their patronage: which if it hapned, they were wise enough to play their own games. But no such matter fell out. The Embassadours were only rewarded with thanks; and a decree made at Corinth, That the Romans thenceforth might be partakers of the Isthmian pastimes. This was an idle courtesie, but well meant by the vain Greeks, and therefore well taken by the Romans: who by this Illyrian expedition got nothing in Greece, save a little acquaintance, that shall be more hereafter.

§. VIII.

Of the War between the Romans and Gauls, somewhat before the coming of Hannibal into Italy.

THe Gaules that dwelt in Lombardy were the next, against whom the Romans took Arms. These were a populous Nation, and often molested Rome; sometimes with their own forces, and sometimes with the assistance of those that inhabited France. Once their fortune was good, when they took Rome and burnt it: though the issue of that war proved not answerable to the beginning, if we may give credit unto Roman Historians. In following times their success was variable, and commonly bad. Many overthrows they received; and if they got any victory, it yielded them no profit, but was soon extorted out of their hands. They were indeed more fierce than well advised: lightly stirred up to war, and lightly giving over. At the first brunt, they were said to be more than men; but when that was past, less than women. The Romans were acquainted with their temper, by long experience, and knew how to handle them: yet gave alwayes careful heed to their approach, were it only bruited. For the danger of them was sudden, and uncertain; by reason of their neighbourhood and want of intelligence among them. Few of their attempts upon Rome were called wars, but tumultus Gallici, tumults of the Gaules: and rightly. For they gave many alarums to Italy, and used to rise with great Armies, but after a few dayes march, and sometimes before their setting forth, any small occasion served to disperse them. Having received an overthrow, they would rest ten or twelve years, sometimes twenty or thirty: till they were stirred up again, by younger heads, unacquainted with the danger. Whilst they rested, the State of Rome, that against these made only defensive war, had leisure to grow, by setting upon others. Herein God provided well for that Monarchy, which he intended to raise: that the Gaules never fell upon Italy with a mighty power, in the time of any other great and dangerous war. Had they attempted to conquer it, whilst Pyrrhus was travelling in the same enterprize: or in either of the two former Punick wars: it may be doubled what would have become of this Imperious City. But it seems that the Gaules had no better intelligence in the affairs of Italy, than strangers had in Gaule. At least, they knew not how to use their times: and were therefore like to smart, whenwhensoever the enemies, whom they had much provoked, and little hurt, should find leisure to visit them at their own home: which was now after the first Punick War. Once before this, the Romans had been bold to set upon the Gauls in their own Countrey: and that was three years before the coming of Pyrrhus into Italy. At that time the Senones, a Tribe of the Gauls, invading Hetruria, and besieging Arretium, had won a great battel, and slain L. Cælius, with the most of his Army. Mannius Curius the new Consul, sent Embassadours to them, to treat about ransom of prisoners. But these Embassadours they slew. Therefore when fortune turned to the better, the Romans followed it so well, that they expelled their Senones out of their Countrey, and sent a colony of their own to inhabit it. This caused the (a) Boji, another people of Gaul, to fear the like measure: who thereupon took arms, and drew the Hetrurians to their side. But the Romans overthrew them in two great battels; and thereby made them sue for peace, which lasted untill the end of this Illyrian war.

(a) There were divers Nations of the Boji, as in Pannonia, Italy in Germany, in Bohemia, in France, and in Aquitaine; but these Boji were of French race, and dwelt at this time about the mouth of the River Po.

It vexed the Gauls to see a Roman colony planted in their Countrey; who had been accustomed to enlarge their bounds, by driving out their neighbours perforce. Wherefore they laboured with the Transalpines (so the Romans called those in France, as lying from them beyond the Alpes, though to us they were neerer; like as they called Cisalpines, or by-hither the Alpes, those who dwelt between them and the Mountains) to draw them to their party: reasonably presuming, that as their disjunction had caused their loss, so their union might recompence it, with large amends. But the business was so foolishly carryed, that the Cisalpines and Transalpines fell together by the ears, putting the Romans only to a tumult, without further trouble of war. Soon after, they were urged by a greater indignity, to go more substantially to work. For C. Flaminius, a popular man in Rome proposed a Decree, which was ratified by the people; That, besides one Colony already planted in the territory of the Senones, as many more should be carried thither, as would serve to people the whole Country between Ancona and Ariminum: exterminating utterly those Gauls. Such an offer were it made in England, concerning either Virginia, or Guiana it self, would not over-joy the Multitude. But the Commonalty of Rome took this in so good part, notwithstanding all danger joyned with the benefit, that Flaminius had ever after their good will.

This dreadfull President extremely displeased the Boji; who being neighbours to Ariminum, feared the like displantation. And because the rest of the Gauls had reason to resolve, that themselves also should be rooted out by degrees; the great Nation of the Insubrians, which inhabited the Dutchy of Milan, joyned with the Boji, and upon a common purse entertained the Gessates, Nations about Rhodanus, wageable as the Switzers in these times. The Gessates having received a great impress, come to the field under the conduct of their Kings Concolitanus and Anoroestus: who with the Boji, and Insubrians, compound an Army of fifty thousand foot, and twenty thousand horse, and those of the best men, and best appointed, that ever invaded the Roman Territory; to whom the Senogalli, that had been beaten out of their possessions, gave a great increase of strength. On the contrary side, the Venetians, and the (b) Cenomanni, adhered to the Romans: as better believing in their prosperity and rising fortune. For fear of whose incursions therefore, the Gauls were forced to leave a good part of their Army, on the frontier of Milan: with the rest of their forces they entred into Tuscane. The Romans hearing of this danger, send Æmilius to Rimine, to stop their passage; and in the place of C. Atilius their other Consul, who then was in Sardinia, they imploy one of their Prætors, for the defence of Tuscane.

(b) Cenomanni are the people about Bergamo, on the north side of the River Po in Italy. There were also of these Cenomanni in France, and inhabited the Countrey of Maine.

Being at this time greatly troubled with the consideration of this powerfull Army, which the Gauls had assembled, they caused a view to be taken, as well of all their own forces, as of those of their Allies: who were no less willing than themselves, to oppose the incursions of the barbarous people; fearing, as they had cause, that their own destruction could not be prevented otherwise, than by the good fortune of Rome. The numbers, found in this Muster, deserve to be recorded: because they set out the power of the Romans in those dayes. With the Consuls they sent forth to the war four Legions of their own: every Legion consisting of five thousand two hundred foot, and three hundred horse; and of their Allies thirteen thousand foot, and two hundred horse. There were also appointed for supplies (if any misadventure came to these) of the Sabines and Hetrurians fifty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, which Army was to be lodged in the border of Hetruria. Of the Umbri and Sarsinates, which inhabited the Apenines, there were twenty thousand; and of the Venetians and Cenomans, other twenty thouſand: which latter Armies were directed to invade the Boji, that forcing them to defend their own Territories, the General Army of the Gauls ſhould be thereby greatly diminiſhed. There were beſides theſe, to be ready againſt all uncertain chances of war, thirty thouſand foot, and fifteen hundred horſe, garriſoned in Rome it ſelf, of their own people; and of their Allies, thirty thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe. Over and above theſe great troops; in the Roll of the Latines, that was ſent unto the Senate, there were numbred fourſcore thouſand foot, and five thouſand horſe; in that of the Samnites, ſeventy thouſand foot, and of horſe ſeven thouſand; in that of the (g) Iapyges and Meſſapyges, fifty thouſand foot, and ſixteen thouſand horſe; the Lucans ſent a liſt of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe; the (h) Marſi, (i) Maruſini, (k) Ferrentani, and the Veſtini, of twenty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe. The Romans had alſo two Legions in Sicil, and about Tarentum, containing eight thouſand four hundred foot, and four hundred horſe. So as of the Romans and Campanes joyntly, reckoning men armed, and fit to bear arms, there were regiſtred two hundred and fifty thouſand foot; and of horſe three and twenty thouſand: of which, reckoning the Romans apart, there were an hundred and fifty thouſand foot, and about ſix thouſand horſe. Caſting up the whole forces of all the Provinces in Italy, both of the Romans and their confederates, it amounted to ſeven hundred thouſand foot, and ſeventy thouſand horſe. But the number is ſomewhat miſ-caſt by Polybius; not with a purpoſe to inrich himſelf by the dead payes; for where he reckons nine hundred horſe too many, he falls ſhort nine thouſand two hundred of the foot.

(g) Iapyges and Meſſapyges ſeem to be one Nation; who are alſo called Salentini, Peucetiani, Apuliani, and Calabrians. The Country is now Apulia, containing the Northermoſt Lead-land of Calabria.

(h) A people of the Kingdom of Naples.

(i) Ptolomy calls them a people of Italy.

(k) A people of Campania, called to this day Ferentino, ſaith Leander.

How great ſoever this muſter was, it ſeems to have been like unto that, which Lodowick Sforza made, when Lewis the twelfth invaded Milan: at what time, the better to encourage himſelf and his ſubjects he took a Roll of all perſons able to bear arms, within the Dutchy, though indeed he were never able to bring a tenth part of them into the field. Certain it is, that the battels of Trebia, Thraſymene, and Cannæ, did not conſume any ſuch proportion, as was anſwerable to this large accompt. Yet were the Romans fain to arm their ſlaves, even for want of other Souldiers, after their overthrow at Cannæ. Wherefore the marvel is not great, that the Carthaginians and others were little terrified with report of ſuch a multitude. For all heads are not fit for Helmets: though the Roman Citizens were, in general, as good fighting men, as elſewhere might be found.

Notwithſtanding all theſe counter preparations, the Gauls keep on their way: and entring into Tuſcane, deſtroy, and put to fire and ſword, all that lay before them. From thence they march directly towards Rome; hoping to find the Romans rather in deliberation, than in the field. But their intelligence fails them. For the Roman Army, ſent into Tuſcane, having taken ſome other way than they did, and finding that it had miſſed of them, came again faſt after them, to arreſt them in their journey. Hereof when they heard the rumour, fearing to be charged on their backs, they turned head: and in the ſame evening diſcovered the Roman Army, by whom they incamped. It was now a matter of apparent neceſſity, that fight they muſt. Wherefore they helped themſelves with a ſtratagem, that ſhewed no great fineneſs of wit, but ſuch as well beſeemed thoſe that had none other occupation than war; and ſtood them in good ſtead at the preſent. In the dead of the night, they cauſe their foot to march away, but not far, leaving their horſe in guard; to whom they give order to come off at the firſt light of day, with ſuch a ſpeed, as might rather argue a running away, than a retreat; as if they had not dared to abide battell. The Romans, interpreting this their haſty departure, as the Gauls deſired they ſhould, follow them in diſorder. The Gauls return, charge them, and kill ſix thouſand upon the place; the reſt take a piece of ground of advantage, and defend themſelves, till L. Æmilius, being at Ariminum, comes to their ſuccour. Upon the coming of the Conſul, the Gauls conſult, whether they ſhould give the Romans battel, or forbear. In which diſpute, Aneroeſtus, one of their Kings, perſwades them, rather to return into their own Countreys; where, after they had diſpoſed of the great ſpoils and riches which they had gotten, they ſhould then renew the war, being without carriage, peſter or other impediment. This advice they all embrace; for, ſeeing they that were Mercenaries, had obtained what they came for, to wit, the ſpoils of their enemies, they thought it wiſdom, to hazard neither it, nor themſelves any further.

This indeed had been a good reſolution, if they had taken it, before the enemy had been in ſight. But as well in the wars of theſe later ages, as in former times, it hath ever been found extream dangerous to make a retreat in the Head of an Enemies Army. For although they that retire, do often turn head;

head; yet in always going on from the purſuing enemy, they find within few miles, either ſtraight, hedge, ditch or place of diſadvantage, which they are inforced to paſs in diſorder. In ſuch caſes, the Souldier knows it as well as the Captain, that he which forſakes the field, perceives and fears ſome advantage of the Enemies. Fear, which is the betrayer of thoſe ſuccours that reaſon offereth, when it hath once poſſeſt the heart of man, it caſteth thence both courage and underſtanding. They that make retreat, are alwayes in fear to be abandoned; they that lead the way, fear to be ingaged: and ſo the hindmoſt treads on his heels that is foremoſt, and conſequently, all disband, run, and periſh, if thoſe that favour the retrait be not held to it by men of great courage. The miſerable overthrow that the French received in Naples, in the year 1503. upon a retreat made by the Marqueſs of Sal, doth teſtifie no leſs. For although a great troop of French horſe ſuſtained the purſuing Enemy a long time, and gave the foot leaſure to trot away; yet being retarded by often turnings, the Spaniſh foot overtook and defeated them utterly. During the wars between the Imperials and the French, Boiſi and Mont were loſt at Brignolles, who in a bravery would needs ſee the enemy, before they left the field. So was Stroſi overthrown by the Marqueſs of Marignan, becauſe he could not be perſwaded to diſlodge the night before the Marqueſs his arrivall. Therefore did the French King Francis the firſt wiſely: when without reſpect of point of honour, he diſlodged from before Landerſey, by night, as many other the moſt adviſed Captains, (not finding themſelves in caſe to give battel) have done. Je ne trouve point (ſaith the Marſhall Monluc) ant fait des armes choſe ſi difficile, qu'unne retraitte; I find nothing in the art of war ſo difficult as to make a ſafe retreat. A ſure rule it is that there is leſs diſhonour to diſlodge in the dark, than to be beaten in the light. And hereof M. de la Noue gives this judgement of a days retreat, made in France, preſently before the battel at Moncountour. For (ſaith he) ſtaying upon our reputation, in ſhew, not to diſlodge by night; we loſt our reputation indeed, by diſlodging by day: whereby we were forced to fight upon our diſadvantage, and to our ruine. And yet did that worthy Gentleman Count Lodowick of Naſſau, brother to the late famous Prince of Orange, make the retreat at Moncountor with ſo great reſolution, as he ſaved the one half of the Proteſtant Army, then broken and diſbanded; of which my ſelf was an eye-witneſs, and was one of them that had cauſe to thank him for it.

Now the Gauls, embracing the ſafe advice (as they take it) of one of their Kings, turn their backs to the enemy, and their faces homeward. Æmilius follows them as near as he can, without ingaging himſelf, attending his advantage. In the mean while, C. Atilius the other Conſul, with the Legions of Sardinia, lands at Piſa; ſo as the Gauls incloſed between two Armies, are forced to fight. They therefore equally ſtrengthen their Rear and Front. To ſuſtain Æmilius, they appoint the Geſſates, and the Milanois; in the Front they range the Piemontois, and the reſt of the Gauls inhabiting upon the River of Po. The manner of the fight Polybius deſcribeth at large: which was well fought of all hands. But in the end the Gauls fell; and ſo did Atilius the Conſul: who died in the place, accompanied with the two Kings of the Gauls, Concolitanus and Aneroeſtus; with forty thouſand of their Vaſſals.

After this fatal overthrow, the Gauls loſt courage; and, ere long, all that they held in Italy. For they were invaded the year following this overthrow, by the new Conſuls, Fulvius and Manlius. The Romans knew well how to uſe their victory: they gave not ten, twenty, or thirty years time to the Gauls, to repair their forces, as the Gauls had done to them. Theſe new Conſuls beat the Boji; but by reaſon of the great rains that fell, and the great peſtilence that reigned, they were compelled for that preſent to ſurceaſe. In the ſecond year, Furius and Flaminius invade the Milanois; and prevail very far, being ſtrongly aſſiſted by the Cenomanni and the Venetians. Nevertheleſs theſe Conſuls were revoked out of their Province, by the Senate of Rome, and compelled to reſign their Office; becauſe the Augures, or Soothſayers, had found, that ſome token or other of the Birds (in which, and all ſorts of their divination, the Romans were extremely ſuperſtitious) had not only foreſhewed little good, when they were choſen, but had alſo nullified the election. C. Flaminius, receiving letters of this revocation from the Senate, and being otherwiſe advertiſed of the contents, was not haſty to open them: but firſt gave battel unto the enemies, vanquiſhed them, and ſpoiled their Countrey; then peruſed the letters; and returning home obtained a triumph, ſore againſt the will of the Senate, and not altogether with good liking of the people, who yet bear him out, for that he ſided in faction with the Commonalty, though a man of great Nobility.

This

This was that Flaminius, who had propounded the Decree, for dividing the Countrey of the Senones among the people of Rome. He was the first, or one of the first, that understanding the Majesty of Rome to be indeed wholly in the people, and no otherwise in the Senate, than by a way of Delegacy, or grand Commission; did not stand highly upon his birth and degree, but courted the multitude, and taught them to know and use their power, over himself and his fellow Senators, in reforming their disorders. For this, the Commons highly esteemed him, and the Senators as deeply hated him. But he had the surer side, and found imitators, that rose by the same art, which in process of time, grew the only or chief way to preferment.

Flaminius and his Colleague, being disposed, M. Claudius Marcellus, and Cn. Cornelius Scipio, were chosen Consuls, for the rest of that year. The Gauls about this time desired peace; and were like to have obtained it: though the new Consuls were against it, as fearing to want work. But when thirty thousand of the Gessates following their King Britomarus, were come over the Alpes, and joyned with the Insubrians: all other discourse, than of present war, was at an end. So the Consuls hasted into their Province, where they besieged Acerræ, a Town not far from Novarro (so far had the Romans pierced already in the Dutchy of Milan.) To divert them from this siege, Britomarus sat down before Clastidium, a Town in the same Tract, with a great part of his forces: leaving the rest, with the Insubrians, to attend upon the Consuls at Acerræ, and to look to the defence of Milan. But this would not suffice, to make the Romans break up their siege. Marcellus, taking with him the greatest part of the horse, and six hundred foot lightly armed, thought to deal well enough with those at Clastidium. Britomarus heard of the Consuls coming, and met him upon the way: so suddenly, that the Romans had no leisure to rest themselves after their journey, but were compelled instantly to fight: Herein Britomarus had done well, if he had not forthwith, in a rash bravery, lost his game at a cast. He had advantage enough in number, both of horse and foot: but he thought so well of his own personal valour, that he rode out single before his Army, provoking any one to fight with him. Marcellus was no less daring, than the barbarous King: whether more wise in this action, I will not dispute; he was more fortunate, and that sufficed to commend him. He slew and disarmed Britomarus, in the presence of both Armies: whereby his own men took such courage, and his enemies were so dismayed, that without much trouble of fight the Romans obtained a great Victory.

This was the third and last time, that ever any Roman General slew the General of the enemies, with his own hand. To this kind of victory, belonged a peculiar triumph; whereof only Romulus, Cossus, and this Marcellus, had the honour: yet I dare say, that the two Scipio's, and divers of the Roman Captains, especially Cæsar, were better men of war than any of these three; though they never offered up to Jupiter, Opima spolia, The Armour of a General slain by themselves, when they were Generals, nor perhaps affected so to do.

After this victory, Acerræ was yielded to the Romans; and Milan soon after: with all that belonged to the Cisalpines, or Gauls, that dwelt in Lombardie. Thus was that valiant and mighty Nation, that had so many years vexed the State of Rome, and in former times taken the City it self, brought to nothing in a short time; their pleasant and fertile Territory possest by the Romans; and the remainder of their Nation, inhabiting Italy, so many as would not subject their necks to the Roman yoke, either forced to abandon their Countreys, or to hide themselves in the cold and barren Mountains, like Outlawes and Thieves. And thus did the Romans spend the three and twenty years following the peace made with Carthage. In part of which time, they were at such leisure, that they closed up the Temple of Janus: which they never did before, (it standing alwayes open, when they had any war) save once in the reign of Numa; nor in long time after, untill the reign of Augustus. But this their present happiness was not to last long: a dangerous War, and perhaps the greatest that had ever been, was to come unto their Gates; which being well ended, they might boldly undertake, to extend their Monarchy as far as their ambition could reach.

CHAP. III.

§. I.

The Wars of Hannibal in Spain. Quarrels between the Romans and Carthaginians. Hannibal beſiegeth and taketh Saguntum, whilſt the Romans are buſied with the Illyrians. War proclaimed between Rome and Carthage.

HANNIBAL, the Son of Amilcar, was about ſix and twenty years old, when he was choſen General of the Carthaginian forces in Spain. He was elected by the Army, as ſoon as Aſdrubal was dead: and the election was ratified by the State of Carthage; wherewith Hanno and his Complices were nothing pleaſed. This was now the third of the Barchine family (ſo called of Amilcar, whoſe ſurname was Barcas) that had command in chief, over the men of war. Which honour would perhaps have been leſs envied by theſe domeſtical enemies, if the Alies and friends of the Bachine houſe, had not alſo born the whole ſway in Government, and been the only men regarded, both by the Senate and the people. This general good will, as it was firſt purchaſed by the moſt worthy deſerts of Amilcar in ſaving his Country from imminent ruine, inlarging the Dominion thereof, and inriching it with treaſures and great revenues; ſo was it retained, by the ſame good Arts, among his friends and followers. Hanno therefore, and his Partiſans, being neither able to tax the vertue of their enemies, that was unreprovable; nor to perform the like ſervices unto the common-weal; had nothing left whereby to value themſelves, excepting the general reprehenſion of War, and cautelous advice of not provoking the Romans. This they ſeaſoned other-whiles with detraction; ſaying, that the Barchine faction went about to oppreſs the liberty of the City. But their malicious words were unregarded; and if it were factious, to bear ill-will to Rome, then were all the Citizens (very few excepted) no leſs Barchine, than Hannibal himſelf. For it was long ſince apparent, that the oath of the Romans, to the articles of peace, afforded no ſecurity to Carthage, were ſhe never ſo quiet, and officious; unleſs ſhe ſhould yield to become their ſubject. Since therefore the peace was like to hold no longer, than until the Romans could find ſome good advantage, to renew the war: it was rather deſired by the Carthaginians, that whileſt their owne ſtate was in good caſe, the war ſhould begin; than that in ſome unhappy time of famine or peſtilence, or after ſome great loſs of Army or Fleet, they ſhould be driven to yield unto the impudent demands of their enemies; and to give away baſely their lands and treaſures, as they had lately done; ot miſerably fight, upon terms of diſadvantage.

This diſpoſition of his Country-men, Hannibal well underſtood. Neither was he ignorant (for his father, and other friends, had long time deviſed of this buſineſs) that in making war with the Romans, it was no ſmall advantage to get the ſtart of them. If once he could bring an Army into Italy, without moleſtation; there was good hope that he ſhould find friends and aſſiſtance, even of thoſe people, that helped to increaſe the Roman Armies in foreign wars. But this could never be effected, if the matter were openly diſputed at Carthage. For it was to be doubted, that the Carthaginians, how glad ſoever they would be, to hear that he had ſet the war on foot, would nevertheleſs be ſlow and timorous, as commonly men are in the beginning of great enterpriſes, if the matter were referred to their deliberation. Which if it ſhould happen, then were the Romans like to be made acquainted, not only with the generalities of his purpoſe, but with ſuch particulars as muſt be diſcourſed of, in procuring allowance to his deſign. This might ſuffice to diſorder the whole Project. Wherefore, he reſolved to lay ſiege unto Saguntum, which might ſeem not greatly to concern the Romans, and would highly pleaſe the Carthaginians, that had freſh in mind the indignity of that Spaniſh Towns alliance with her half friends. So ſhould he aſſay both the patience of his enemies, and the diſpoſition of his own Citizens.

Having

Having thus concluded, he nevertheleſs went fair and orderly to work: and beginning with thoſe that lay next in his way, approaching unto Saguntum by degrees. This he did (ſaith Livie) to give ſome colour to his proceedings: as if he had not principally intended the war againſt Saguntum, but had been drawn thither by courſe of buſineſs. Yet reaſon teacheth plainly, that without regard of ſuch formalities, it was needful to finiſh the conqueſt of the reſt, before he did any thing that ſhould provoke the Romans. Firſt therefore he entred upon the Territory of the * Olcades; and having beſieged Althæa (Livie called it Carteia) their chief City, he became, in a few daies, Maſter not only thereof, but of all the other Towns of their Country. This Nation which he firſt undertook, being ſubdued, and the winter at hand, he reſted his Army in new Carthage, or Carthagena; and imparted liberally to the Souldiers, the ſpoils he had gotten in his late Conqueſt.

In the Spring following, he purſued the war againſt the (a) Vaccæi; and without any great difficulty, wan firſt Salmantica, now called Salamanca; and after it, (b) Arbucala, by aſſault: though not without a long ſiege, and great difficulty. But in his return, he was put to the height, both of his courage, and of his Martial judgment. For all ſuch of the Vaccæi, as were able to bear arms, being made deſperate by the ſpoil of their Country, with thoſe of Salamanca, and of the Olcades, that had eſcaped in the late overthrow, joyning themſelves with the Toletans; compounded an Army of an hundred thouſand able men: and ſtayed Hannibal on the banks of the River Tagus, which runneth to the Sea by Lisborn in Portugal. Theſe four Nations, having had experience of Hannibals invincible courage, and that he never ſaw enemy, upon whom he durſt not give charge; were throughly reſolved, that his natural valour would at this time no leſs neglected the cold advice of diſcretion, than at other times it had ſeemed to do, when the like great occaſion perſwaded him to uſe it. But he that makes himſelf a body of Cryſtal, that all men may look thorow him, and diſcern all the parts of his diſpoſition, makes himſelf (withall) an Aſs: and thereby teacheth others, either how to ride, or drive him. Wiſe men, though they have ſingle hearts in all that is juſt and vertuous; yet they are like Coffers with double bottoms: which when others look into, being opened, they ſee not all that they hold, on the ſudden, and at once. It is true, that this ſubtle Carthaginian, when he ſerved under Aſdrubal, was, of all the men of mark in the Army, the moſt adventrous, but that which may beſeem a Captain, or inferiour Commander, doth not alwayes become a Chief; though it hath ſomtime ſucceeded well with ſuch great ones, as have been found more fortunate than wiſe. At this time, our great Man of war knew as well how to diſſemble his courage, as at other times to make it good. For he with-drew himſelf from the River-ſide, as if fearfull to foord it; thereby to draw over that great multitude from their banks of advantage. The Spaniards, apprehending this in ſuch ſort, as Hannibal deſired that they ſhould thruſt themſelves in fury and diſorder, into the ſwift ſtream, with a purpoſe to charge the Carthaginians, abandoning (as they thought for fear) the defences on the contrary ſide. But when Hannibal ſaw them in their way, and well-near over; he turned back his Elephants to entertain them at their landing: and thruſt his Horſe-men, both above and beneath them, into the River, Theſe carrying a kind of Lance de Gay, ſharp at both ends, which they held in the midſt of the ſtaff; had ſuch an advantage over the foot, that were in the River, under their ſtrokes, clattered together, and unable to move or ſhift their bodies, as on firm ground, that they ſlew all thoſe (in a manner) without reſiſtance, which were already entered into the water; and purſued the reſt, that fled like men amazed, with ſo great a ſlaugher, as from that day forward, there was not any Spaniard, on that ſide the River of Iberus, (the Saguntines excepted) that had the daring to lift up their hands againſt the Carthaginians.

The Saguntines perceiving the danger towards them, cryed before they were hurt. They ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, and bemoaned themſelves, as likely to ſuffer that, which afterwards they ſuffered indeed; only becauſe of their alliance and friendſhip with this honourable City, which the Carthaginians hated. This tale moved the Senate, but much more a report, that Saguntum was already beſieged. Hereupon ſome cry out, that War ſhould be proclaimed by Land and Sea; as alſo that the two Conſuls ſhould be ſent with Armies, the one into Spain, the other into Africk. But others went more Roman-like to work, and carried it. So it was only concluded; that Embaſſadours ſhould be ſent into Spain, to view the ſtate of their confederates: which were indeed none other than the Saguntines. For if Hannibal intended war againſt Rome, it was likely that he ſhould give them, ere it were long, long, a more plauſible occaſion to take Arms againſt him: if he had no ſuch purpoſe, yet would it be in their power to determine what they liſted themſelves, upon the report of theſe Embaſſadours; and this their gravity, in being not too raſh at firſt, would ſerve to countenance their following Decree. Of theſe Embaſſadours Livie reports, that they found Hannibal before Saguntum, but could not get audience of him, and therefore went to Carthage, where alſo they were not regarded, nor heard. But Polybius an Hiſtorian of ſincerity leſs queſtionable, tells, that they found him at Carthagena, and had conference with him, though ſuch as left them doubtful. This is more agreeable to the reſt of Hannibal his whole courſe. And ſurely we might wonder, why the Carthaginians ſhould afterwards admit a more peremptory Embaſſage (as Livie confeſſeth) and fall to diſputation about the covenants of Peace; if they had rejected that which was ſent, upon none other pretence than prevention of war.

* A people (ſaith Strabo) near the River of Iberus. But in the old deſcription of Spain, Carteia, they are found near Tagus, and by Sudias, not far from New Carthage.

(a) A people on Calis the Old.

(b) Arbucala, or Arbacala, an inland City of the Vaccæi in Spain.

Whileſt the Embaſſadours paſſed to and fro, Hannibal prepared not only his forces, but ſome Roman pretences, againſt Saguntum. He found out Mamertines, or people that ſhould do as the Mamertines in Sicil had done for the Romans; and implore his help againſt the Saguntines. Theſe were the Turdetani, a Nation adjoyning to Saguntum, and having many quarrels with them. (as happens commonly among neighbours) of which, Hannibal himſelf hatched ſome. Finding therefore ſuch an occaſion, whatſoever it was, as made him able to ſay, that the Saguntines had firſt provoked him, ere he medled with them; he made no more ado, but ſate down with his whole power before their Town. He was now more ſecure, than he had formerly been of his own Citizens: for that they had not entertained the Roman Embaſſadours, with any trembling reverence, as of late years they had been wont. Nevertheleſs, he was glad of any handſome colour, to ſhadow his actions: not only becauſe the War, which he ſo much deſired, was not proclaimed; but that he might not be checked in his courſe, as an open enemy, before he could ſet foot in Italy. The Romans had the like, though contrary deſire. They were glad of the quarrel; as hoping that Carthage, with all thereto belonging, ſhould thereby in ſhort ſpace become their own. Yet were they not haſty to threaten, before they were ready to ſtrike; but meant to temporize, until they had an Army in readineſs to be ſent into Spain, where they thought to make Saguntum, the ſeat of the War.

In the mean while, Demetrius Pharius, whom the Romans had made King over a great part of Illyria, rebelled againſt them: either for that he found himſelf overſtraightly tyed up by them, with hard conditions; or rather becauſe he was of an unthankful diſpoſition. The commotion of the Gauls, and afterward the fame of the Carthaginian war, emboldened him to deſpiſe his Benefactors and Patrons: whom he ought to have defended and aided, in all perils, even with the hazard of his whole eſtate, which he had received of their gift. But he was a Traitor to his own Queen; and therefore dealt according to his kind, with thoſe that had rewarded him for being ſuch. Firſt, he built ſhips, and ſpoiled the Iſles of Greece; againſt the covenants to which he was bound. Then he adventured further, and ſeiſed upon ſome places, that the Romans kept in their own hands. If he had begun ſooner, or rather if he had ſtayed ſomewhat longer, he might have ſped better. For the buſineſs with the Gauls was ended; with Hannibal, not throughly begun, when he declared himſelf by his doings, an enemy, and was vanquiſhed. The Roman Conſul, Æmilius, was ſent againſt him: who in ſeven daies wan the ſtrong Town of Dimalum; and thereby brought ſuch terrour upon the Country round about, that Embaſſadours were ſent from all places, to yield themſelves, without putting him to further pains. Only the City of Pharus, in which Demetrius lay, prepared to reſiſt: which he might have done long, if the hot-headed Rebel had not been too fooliſh. Æmilius landed a great part of his Army in the Iſle of Pharus, by night; and beſtowed them in covert, preſenting himſelf the next morning with twenty ſhips before the Town, and offering to force the Haven. Demetrius with all his power iſſued out againſt the Conſul, and was ſoon intercluded from the Town, by thoſe that lay in ambuſh. Wherefore he fled away through by-paths to a Greek, where he had ſhipping ready for him, and imbarqued himſelf: leaving all his eſtate unto them, of whoſe liberality he firſt had it.

This buſineſs, though it were ſoon diſpatched, yet prevented it not the ſiege of Saguntum; before which Hannibal ſate down, ere Æmilius was landed in Illyria. In the beginning of the ſiege, the Carthaginians were much diſcouraged, by reaſon of the brave ſallies made by the Saguntines; in one of which, their General received a dangerous wound in the thigh, that cauſed him to lye many daies unable to move. Nevertheleſs, he was not unmindfull of his work in the mean while; but gave order to raiſe certain movable Towers, that might equal thoſe which were built on the walls of the City; and to prepare to batter the curtains, and make a breach. Theſe being finiſhed and applied, had ſoon wrought their effect. A great and large breach was made, by the fall of divers Towers, and a great length of wall; whereat an hot aſſault was given: but it was ſo well ſuſtained by the Saguntines, as the Carthaginians were not only beaten from the breach, and out of ſome ground within the Town, which upon the firſt fury they had won; but they were purſued even to their own trenches and camp. Nevertheleſs the Carthaginian Army, wherein were about an hundred and fifty thouſand men, did ſo weary the Towns-men with continual travel, that at length it got within the walls; and was only hindred from taking full poſſeſſion of the City, by ſome counter-works of the Saguntines, that were alſo ready to be won. In this extremity, there was one Alcon a Saguntine, that conveyed himſelf out of the Town, to treat with Hannibal for ſome accord. But the conditions which the Carthaginian offered were ſo ſevere, and without all compaſs of honour, as Alcon durſt not return to propound them to his Countrymen. For Hannibal demanded all that they had, gold, ſilver, plate, and other riches within the City: yea, the City it ſelf to be abandoned by the Citizens; promiſing, that he would aſſign ſome other place for their habitation: not allowing them to carry out with them any other thing, wherewith to ſuſtain themſelves, than the cloaths on their backs; or other arms, to defend them, than their nails and teeth. Yet might they far better have ſubmitted themſelves unto this miſerable appointment, (ſeeing thereby they might have injoyed their lives, and ſaved the honour of their wives and daughters) than to have reſted at the diſcretion of the Conquerour, as ſoon after they did: by whom their wives and daughters were deflowred before their own faces; and all put to ſword, that were above fourteen years of age. For it was a poor comfort, which a great number of them took; when not daring to fight, and ſell their blood at the deareſt rate, they ſhut themſelves up like moſt wretched creatures in their own houſes, and therein burnt themſelves with all that they had: ſo dying unrevenged. The treaſures found in Saguntum, which were very great, Hannibal kept wherewith to pay his Army: the ſlaves and other booty, he divided among his Souldiers, reſerving ſome things of choice, wherewith to preſent his friends at Carthage, and to animate them unto the War.

Theſe tydings exceedingly vexed the Romans, who had good cauſe to be angry at their own ſlowneſs, in forbearing to ſend help unto the Saguntines, that held out eight months, looking ſtill for ſuccour, but in vain. Wherefore they determined to repair their honour, by taking ſharp revenge. To this end they ſent Embaſſadours again to Carthage: demanding only, Whether it were by general conſent and allowance of the Carthaginians, that Hannibal had made war upon Saguntum: which if they granted (as it ſeemed they would) then to give them defiance. Hereunto anſwer was made, in the Senate of Carthage, to this effect; That this their ſecond Embaſſage, howſoever qualified with mild words, was indeed more inſolent than the former. For in that, they only required juſtice againſt Hannibal; but in this, the very State and Common-wealth of Carthage, was urged to plead guilty, or not guilty. But (ſaid the Carthaginian ſpeaker) whether the General of our Army in Spain, in beſieging Saguntum, have only followed his own counſel; or whether he did it, by direction from us: it is not the queſtion which the Romans ought to aſk us. That which is indeed worthy examination or diſpute, is; Whether it were lawful or unlawful for Hannibal to do as he hath done. For it belongs to us, to call our own Commanders in queſtion, and to puniſh them according to their faults and errours; to you, to challenge us, if we have done any thing contrary to our late League and contract. It is true, that in our negotiation with Lutatius the Conſul, the Allies of both Nations were comprehended: but the Saguntines were not then of your Allies, and therefore no parties to the peace then made; for of your Allies in the future, or of ours, there was no diſpute. As touching the laſt agreement between you and Aſdrubal, wherein you will ſay that the Saguntines were comprehended by name; it is you that have taught us how to anſwer that particular. For whatſoever you found in the Treaty between us and Lutatius, to your own diſadvantage, you caſt it upon your Conſuls preſumption as promiſing thoſe things, for which he had no warrant from the Senate and people of Rome. If then it be lawfull for the Romans, to diſavow the actions of their Conſuls and Commanders, concluding any thing without punctual and preciſe warrant; the ſame liberty may we alſo aſſume, and hold our ſelves no way bound in honour to perform thoſe bargains which Aſdrubal hath made for for us, without our commandment and conſent.

This was an impertinent anſwer, and little better than a meer cavil. For Lutatius the Conſul, in his Treaty of Peace with the Carthaginians, had expreſly referred the allowance thereof to the people of Rome. It had been therefore much better to have dealt plainly, and to have alledged, That after this League was made and confirmed on both parts, it was broken by the Romans, in robbing the Carthaginians of the Ile of Sardinia, and withall of twelve hundred talents: which perjury the State of Carthage, being now grown able, would revenge with open War. As for the Saguntines, it little ſkilled that the Romans had admitted them into confederacy, and forthwith inſerted their names into the Treaty of Peace with Aſdrubal: ſeeing that the Treaty with Aſdrubal, and all other buſineſs between Rome and Carthage, following the violence and breach of Peace, in taking away Sardinia, were no better than Roman injuries, as implying this commination, Do whatſoever we require; elſe will we make War, without regard of our oath, which we have already broken.

But this the Carthaginians did not alledge, forgetting, in heat of contention (as Polybius takes it) the beſt of their Plea. Yet ſince Livie himſelf doth remember and acknowledge, that the taking of Sardinia from the Carthaginians, did inflame the ſpirit of Amilcar with deſire of revenge: we may reaſonably think, that the mention of this injury was omitted, not ſo much upon forgetfulneſs, as for that it was not thought convenient, by ripping up ſuch ancient matter of quarrel, to ſhew that the war, now towards, had long been thought upon, and like to be made with extraordinary force, in other manner than heretofore. In concluſion, the Carthaginian Senate moved the Roman Embaſſadours, to deliver unto them in plain terms the purpoſes of thoſe that ſent them, and the worſt of that, which they had long determined againſt them: as for the Saguntines, and the confining of their Armies within Iberus; thoſe were but their pretences. Whereupon Q. Fabius gathering up the ſkirt of his gown, as if ſomewhat had been laid in the hollow thereof, made this ſhort reply: I have here (quoth he) in my Gown-ſkirt both Peace and War: make you (my Maſters of the Senate) election of theſe two, which of them you like beſt, and purpoſe to imbrace. Hereat all cryed out at once; Even which of them you your ſelf have a fancy to offer us. Marry then (quoth Fabius) take the War, and ſhare it among you: Which the aſſembly willingly accepted.

This was plain dealing. To wrangle about pretences, when each part had reſolved to make War, it was meerly frivolous. For all theſe diſputes of breach of Peace, have ever been maintained by the party unwilling, or unable to ſuſtain the War. The ruſty ſword, and the empty purſe, do alwayes plead performance of covenants. There have been few Kings or States in the World, that have otherwiſe underſtood the obligation of a Treaty, than with the condition of their own advantage: and commonly (ſeeing Peace between ambitious Princes and States, is but a kind of breathing) the beſt adviſed have rather begun with the ſword, than with the trumpet. So dealt the Arragonois with the French in Naples; Henry the ſecond of France, with the Imperials, when he wrote to Briſac, to ſurpriſe as many places as he could, ere the War brake out; Don John, with the Netherlands; and Philip the ſecond of Spain, with the Engliſh, when in the great Imbarge he took all our ſhips and goods in his Ports.

But Hannibal, beſides the preſent ſtrength of Carthage, and the common feeling of injuries received from theſe enemies, had another private and hereditary deſire, that violently carryed him againſt the Romans. His Father Amilcar, at what time he did ſacrifice, being ready to take his journey into Spain, had ſolemnly bound him by oath, to purſue them with immortal hatred, and to work them all poſſible miſchief, as ſoon as he ſhould be a man, and able. Hannibal was then about nine years old, when his Father cauſed him to lay his hand upon the Altar, and make this vow: ſo that it was no marvel, if the impreſſion were ſtrong in him.

That it is inhumane to bequeath hatred in this ſort, as it were by Legacy, it cannot be denyed. Yet for mine own part, I do not much doubt, but that ſome of thoſe Kings, with whom we are now in peace, have received the like charge of their Predeceſſors, that as ſoon as their coffers ſhall be full, they ſhall declare themſelves enemies to the people of England.

§. II.

Hannibal takes order for the defence of Spain, and Africk. His Journey into Italy.

WArr being thus proclaimed, Hannibal reſolved not to put up his ſword which he had drawn againſt the Saguntines, untill he had therewith opened his paſſage unto the gates of Rome. So began the ſecond Punick War; ſecond to none that ever the Senate and people of Rome ſuſtained. Hannibal wintred at Carthagena; where he licenſed his Spaniſh Souldiers to viſit their friends, and refreſh themſelves againſt the Spring. In the mean while he gave inſtructions to his Brother Aſdrubal for the Government of Spain in his abſence. He alſo took order, to ſend a great many troops of Spaniards into Africk, to equal the number of Africans formerly drawn thence into Spain; to the end, that ſo the one Nation might remain as pledges and gages for the other. Of the Spaniards, he tranſported into Africk thirteen thouſand, eight hundred and fifty foot, and twelve hundred horſe; alſo eight hundred ſlingers of the * Baleares. Beſides theſe, he ſelected four thouſand foot, all young men, and of quality, out of the beſt Cities of Spain; which he appointed to be garriſoned in Carthage it ſelf, not ſo much in regard of their forces, as that they might ſerve for hoſtages: for among thoſe four thouſand, the beſt of the Spaniſh Citizens, and thoſe that ſwayed moſt in their ſeveral States, had their Sons or Kinſmen. He alſo left with his Brother, to guard the Coaſts and Ports, fifty and ſeven Gallies; whereof thirty ſeven were preſently armed, and appointed for the war. Of Africans and other Nations, ſtrangers, he left with him above twelve thouſand foot, and two thouſand horſe, beſides one and twenty Elephants.

Having in this ſort taken order for the defence of Spain and Africk; he ſent diſcoverers before him, to view the Paſſages of the Pyrenæan Mountains, and of the Alps. He alſo ſent Embaſſadours to the Mountainers of the Pyrenes, and to the Gauls, to obtain a quiet paſſage: that he might bring his Army entire into Italy, and not be compelled to diminiſh his force, by any War in the way, till he came to encounter the Romans. His Embaſſadours and Diſcoverers being returned with good ſatisfaction; in the beginning of the Spring, he paſt over the River of Iberus, with an Army conſiſting of fourſcore and ten thouſand foot, and twelve thouſand horſe. All thoſe parts of Spain, into which he had not entred before, he now ſubdued: and appointed Hanno (not that old enemy of his houſe, who ſate ſtill at Carthage) to govern Spain on the Eaſt ſide of Iberus; to whom he left an Army of ten thouſand foot, and one thouſand horſe. Being arrived at the borders of Spain, ſome of his Spaniſh Souldiers returned home, without aſking leave: which that others might not alſo do, or attempt, he courteouſly diſmiſſed many more that ſeemed willing to be gone. Hereby it came to paſs, that the Journey ſeemed the leſs tedious unto thoſe that accompanied him, as being not enforced by compulſion. With the reſt of his Army, conſiſting now but of fifty thouſand foot, and nine thouſand horſe, he paſt the Pyrenes, and entred into Gaul. He found the Gauls that bordered upon Spain, ready in Arms to forbid his entrance into their Countrey: but won them with gentle ſpeech, and rich preſents that he beſtowed upon their Leaders, to favour his Expedition. So without any moleſtation, he came to the bank of Rhodanus; where dwelt, on each ſide of the River, a people called Volcæ. Theſe were unacquainted with the cauſe of his coming; and therefore ſought to keep him from paſſing over the water. But he was greatly aſſiſted by ſome of thoſe Gauls, that inhabited on the Weſt ſide of Rhodanus, to wit, by thoſe of Vivaretz and Lyonnois. For although many of them had tranſported themſelves and their goods, into the Country of Dauphine, thinking to defend the further bank againſt him: yet ſuch as remained, being very deſirous to free their Countrey of ſo many ill gueſts, were better pleaſed to have their Countrey-men well beaten, which had abandoned them, than to have their own ſtore of corn and cattel waſted, by the long ſtay of ſo great an Army, as lay upon them. For which reaſon, they helped him to make boats; informed him of another more eaſie paſſage, higher up the River; and lent him guides. When the Veſſels for tranſportation of his Army were in readineſs; he ſent Hanno, the Son of Bomilcar, up the River: himſelf in the mean while making countenance to enter the Foord below. The end of this labour, was, that Hanno charging the Gaules unawares upon their own ſide, and Hannibal, at the ſame time, paſſing the River in their faces, the further bank was won, though with ſome difficulty; and the enemies diſperſed. Yet was he greatly troubled in conveying over his Elephants; who marvellouſly feared the water. He was therefore driven to make raffs of trees, and cover them with Earth and Turf; whereof he faſtned one to each bank, that might ſerve as a bridge, to and from another of the ſame ſort, but looſe upon which the beaſts were towed over.

Having paſt this firſt brunt, and overcome both the rage of the River, and of thoſe that defended it, he was viſited by the Princes of the Gauls Ciſalpiñes, that inhabited Piemont and Milan, who lately had revolted from from the Romans. Theſe informed him of the paſſages of the Alps; that they were not ſo difficult, as common report made them; and from theſe he received guides, with many other encouragements. All which notwithſtanding, he found himſelf extreamly incombred by the Savoyans; and loſt, both of his carriages, and of his Carthaginians, more than willingly he would, or had formerly thought that he ſhould. For he was twice mainly aſſailed by them, before he could recover the plain Countreys on the other ſide. And whereas his Journey over the Mountains coſt him fifteen dayes travel, he was every day, more or leſs, not only charged by thoſe Mountainers, but withall extreamly beaten with grievous weather and ſnow: it being the beginning of Winter, when he began, and overcame this paſſage. But the fair and fertile Plains, which were now ready to receive them; with the aſſiſtance and conduct of the Ciſalpine Gauls, who by their proper forces had ſo often invaded the Roman Territory; gave them great comfort and encouragement to go on: having nothing elſe of difficulty remaining, but that which from the beginning they made accompt to overcome, by their proper valour and reſolution; namely, the Roman Armies, and reſiſtance.

§. III.

How the Romans in vain ſolicited the Spaniards and Gauls to take their part. The Rebellion of the Ciſalpine-Gauls againſt the Romans.

THE Countries of Spain and Gaul, through which the Carthaginians marched thus far, had been ſolicited before, by the ſame Roman Embaſſadours, who had denounced the war at Carthage. Theſe, as they were inſtructed by the Senate, took Spain in their way home-ward from Carthage, with a purpoſe to draw into the Roman Alliance, as many of the Cities and Princes as they could; at leaſt to diſſwade them from contracting any friendſhip with the Carthaginians. The firſt which they attempted were the Volcians, a people in Spain, from whom, in open aſſembly, they received by one that ſpake for the reſt, this uncomfortable anſwer: With what face (ſaith he) can ye Romans perſwade us to value your Alliance, or to prefer it before the friendſhip of the Carthaginians; ſeeing we are taught by the example of the Saguntines, to be more wiſe than ſo? For they, relying on your faith and promiſed aſſiſtance, have been utterly rooted out, and deſtroyed by the Carthaginians; whom they might elſe have held their aſſured friends, and good neighbours, as we, and other the people of Spain have found them. Ye may therefore be gone, with this reſolution from us, That for our parts (and ſo I think, I may anſwer for the reſt of our Country-men) the Romans henceforth are not to expect any kindneſs at our hands; who are reſolved, never to make account of their protection, nor amity. From the Volcians, the Embaſſadours took their way towards the Gauls; uſing their beſt arguments to perſwade them not to ſuffer the Carthaginians to paſs into Italy, thorow their Territory: and withall greatly glorifying themſelves, their ſtrength, and large Dominion. But the Gauls laught them to ſcorn, and had hardly the patience to hear them ſpeak. For ſhall we (ſaid one of their Princes) by reſiſting Hannibals paſſage into Italy, entertain a war which is not meant to be made againſt us? Shall we hold the war among our ſelves, and in our own Territory, by force which marcheth with a ſpeedy pace from us, toward our ancient enemies? Have the Romans deſerved ſo well of us, and the Carthaginians ſo ill, that we ſhould ſet fire on our own houſes, to ſave theirs from burning? No, we know it well, that the Romans have already forced ſome Nations of ours, out of their proper Territory and inheritance: and conſtrained others, as free as themſelves, to pay them tribute. We will not therefore make the Carthaginians, our enemies, who have no way as yet offended us, nor we them.

With this unpleaſing anſwer the Embaſſadours returned home, carrying no good news, of friends likely to help them; but rather ſome aſſurance from the people of Maſſilia, which were confederates with Rome, that the Gauls were determined to take part with their enemy. Of this inclination, the Ciſalpine Gauls gave haſty proof. For when the news was brought into Italy, that the Carthaginians had paſſed Iberus, and were on the way towards Rome; this alone ſufficed to ſtir up the Boji, and Inſubrians, againſt the Romans. Theſe people were lately offended at the plantation of new Roman Colonies, at Cremona, and Placentia, within their Territories. Relying therefore upon the Carthaginian ſuccour, which they ſuppoſed to be now at hand; they laid aſide all regard of thoſe hoſtages, which they had given to the Romans, and fell upon the new Colonies. The Towns it ſeems they could not win; for Hannibal ſhortly after failed to get them. But they forced the Roman Commiſſioners

Commissioners, (who belike were abroad in the Country) to flye to Modena: where they besieged them. The siege of Modena had continued some small time; when the Gaules, having little skill in assaulting Cities, waxed weary, and seemed desirous to have peace, and to come to some good accord with the Romans. This they did of purpose, to draw on some meeting; that they might therein lay hand upon the Roman Deputies, thereby to redeem their Hostages in way of exchange. And it fell out, in part, according to their wish. For the Romans sent out Embassadours to treat with them, and to conclude a Peace; whom they detained. Manlius the Prætor, who lay in these quarters with an Army, hearing this outrage; marched in all haste to the relief of the besieged. But the Gaules, having laid a strong ambush in a wood joyning to the way, fell upon the Prætor so opportunely, as he was utterly overthrown, and all his followers left dead in the place, a few excepted, that recovered, by fast running to a little village, but defensible; upon the River of Po. When this was heard at Rome, C. Attilius, another of the Prætors, was hastily sent to relieve the besieged with a Legion, and five thousand of the Roman associates: which forces were taken out of the Consuls Army, and supplyed by a new levy.

As the Gaules were too rash and hasty; so were the Romans too slow, and indeed too ill-advised, in the beginning of this war. They were not perswaded that Carthage, which had almost servilely endured so many indignities in time of the late peace; would be so brave and couragious on the sudden, as to attempt the conquest of Italy it self. Wherefore they appointed one of their Consuls to make war in Spain, the other in Africk: resting secure of all danger at home. Titus Sempronius took his way toward Africk, with an hundred and sixty Quinqueremes, or Gallies of five to an Oar, which preparation may seem to threaten even the City of Carthage, to which it shall not come near. P. Cornelius Scipio, the other Consul, made all possible haste, by the way of Genoa, into Provence; and used such diligence, having the wind also favourable, as in five dayes he recovered Massilia. There he was advertised of Hannibal his having passed the River of Rhodanus, whom he thought to have found busie yet a while in Spain. Hannibal had also news of the Consuls arrival: whereof he was neither glad, nor sorry, as not meaning to have to do with him. Each of them sent forth Scouts to discover the others number and doings: Hannibal, about five hundred Numidians; Scipio, three hundred of his better appointed Roman horse. These met and fought, and the Numidians were beaten: yet could not the Romans greatly brag, having slain only two hundred, and lost of their own, one hundred and forty. But when Scipio drew near, to have met with the Carthaginians; he found, that they were gone three dayes before; and that (as he then found assuredly true) with an intent to look upon the walls of Rome. This interrupted his intended Voyage into Spain. Nevertheless he sent away thither his Brother Cn. Cornelius Scipio, with the greatest part of his Fleet and Army, to try what might be done against Asdrubal, and the other Carthaginian Lieutenants in the Country. He himself, taking with him a few choise bands, returned by Sea to Pisa; and so passing thorow Tuscane into Lumbardie, drew together the broken troops of Manlius and Atilius that lately had been beaten by the Gaules: with which forces he made head against the enemy, thinking to find him over-laboured, with travel of his painful Journey.

§. IV.

Scipio the Roman Consul overcome by Hannibal at Ticinum. Both of the Roman Consuls beaten by Hannibal, in a great battel at Trebia.

FIve Months Hannibal had spent in his tedious Journey from Carthagena; what great muster he could make, when he had passed the Alpes, it is not easily found. Some reckon his foot at an hundred thousand, and his horse at twenty thousand; others report them to have been only twenty thousand foot, and six hundred horse. Hannibal himself in his monument which he raised, in the Temple of Juno Lacinia, agreeth with the latter summ. Yet the Gaules, Ligurians, and others that joyned with him, are likely to have mightily increased his Army, in short space. But when he marched Eastward from the banks of Rhodanus, he had with him eight and thirty thousand foot, and eight thousand horse; of which, all save those remembred by himself in the Inscription of his Altar in Juno's Temple, are like to have perished by diseases, enemies, Rivers and Mountains; which mischiefs had devoured, each their several shares.

Having newly passed the Alpes, and scarce refreshed his wearied Army in the Country of Piemont; he sought to win the friendship of of the (a) Taurini, who lay next in his way. But the Taurini held war at that time with the Inſubrians, which were his good friends; and refuſed (perhaps for the ſame cauſe) his amity. Wherefore he aſſaulted their Town; and wan it by force in three daies. Their ſpoil ſerved well to hearten his Army; and their calamity, to terrifie the Neighbour places. So the Gauls, without more ado, fell unto his ſide: many for fear, many alſo for good-will, according to their former inclination. This diſpoſition ran thorow the whole Country: which joyned, or was all in readineſs to joyn with the Carthaginians; when the news of Scipio the Conſul his arrival, made ſome to be more adviſed than the reſt. The name of the Romans was terrible in thoſe quarters; what was in the Carthaginians, experience had not yet laid open. Since therefore the Roman Conſul was already gotten thorow the moſt defenſible paſſages, ere any ſpeech had been heard of his approach: many ſate ſtill for very fear, who elſe would fain have concluded a League with theſe new-come friends; and ſome, for greater fear, offered their ſervice againſt the Carthaginians, whom nevertheleſs they had wiſhed well to ſpeed.

This wavering affection of the Province, whereinto they were entred, made the two Generals haſten to the tryal of a battail. Their meeting was at Ticinum, now called Pavia; where each of them wondred at the others expedition: Hannibal thinking it ſtrange that the Conſul, whom he had left behind him on the other ſide of the Alpes, could meet him in the face, before he had well warmed himſelf in the Plains; Scipio admiring the ſtrange adventure of paſſing thoſe Mountains, and the great ſpirit of his Enemy. Neither were the Senate at Rome little amazed at Hannibals ſucceſs, and ſudden arrival. Wherefore they diſpatched a Meſſenger in all haſte unto Sempronius, the other Conſul, that was then in Sicily, giving him to underſtand hereof: and letting him further know, that whereas he had been directed to make the war in Africa, it was now their pleaſure that he ſhould forbear to proſecute any ſuch attempt, but that he ſhould return the Army under his charge, with all poſſible ſpeed, to ſave Italy it ſelf. According to this order, Sempronius ſent off his Fleet from Lilybæum; with direction to land the Army at Ariminum, a Port Town not far from Ravenna: quite another way from Carthage, whither he was making haſte. In the mean while, Scipio and Hannibal were come ſo near, that fight they muſt, ere they could part aſunder. Hereupon both of them prepared the minds of their Souldiers, by the beſt arguments they had: unto which Hannibal added the Rhetorick of a preſent example, that he ſhewed upon certain priſoners of the Savoians, which he brought along with him, fitted for the purpoſe, into Italy. For theſe, having been no leſs miſerably fettered and chained, than ſparingly fed; and withall ſo often ſcourged on their naked bodies, as nothing was more in their deſire, than to be delivered from their miſeries by any kind of preſent death, were brought into the middle of the Army: where it was openly demanded, which of them would fight hand to hand with ſome other of his Companions, till the one of them were ſlain, with condition, being the Victor, to receive his liberty, and ſome ſmall reward. This was no ſooner propounded, than all of them together accepted the offer. Then did Hannibal cauſe lots to be caſt, which of them ſhould enter the Liſt, with ſuch weapons, as the Chieftains of the Gauls were wont to uſe in ſingle combats. Every one of theſe unhappy men wiſhed, that his own lot might ſpeed; whereby it ſhould at leaſt be his good fortune, to end his miſeries by death, if not to get a reward by victory. That couple, whoſe good hap it was to be choſen, fought reſolvedly: as rather deſiring, than fearing death; and having none other hope, than in vanquiſhing. Thus were ſome few couples matched, it ſkilled not how equally: for all theſe poor creatures were willing, upon whatſoever uneven terms, to rid themſelves out of ſlavery. The ſame affection that was in theſe Combatants, and in their fellows which beheld them, wrought alſo upon the Carthaginians, for whom the ſpectacle was ordained. For they deemed happy, not only him, that by wining the victory had gotten his liberty, together with an horſe and armour: but even him alſo, who being ſlain in fight, had eſcaped that miſerable condition, unto which his Companions were returned. Their General perceiving what impreſſion this dumb ſhew had wrought in them, began to admoniſh them of their own condition, ſpeaking to this effect: That he had laid before them an example of their own eſtates: ſeeing the time was at hand, wherein they were all to run the ſame fortune, that theſe ſlaves had done; all to live victorious and rich; or all to die, or (which theſe priſoners eſteemed far more grievous) to live in a perpetual ſlavery: That none of them all, in whom was common ſenſe, could promiſe to himſelf any hope of life by flight: ſince the Mountains, the Rivers, the great di-

ſtance from their own Countries, and the purſuit of mercileſs Enemies, muſt needs retrench all ſuch impotent imaginations. He therefore prayed them to remember, that they, who had even now praiſed the fortune both of the Victor, and of the vanquiſhed, would make it their own caſe; ſeeing that there was never any in the world, appointed with ſuch a reſolution, that had ever been broken, or beaten by their enemies. On the contrary, he told them that the Romans, who were to fight upon their own ſoil, and in view of their own Towns; who knew as many waies to ſave themſelves by flight, as they had bodies of men to fight withall, could no way entertain ſuch a reſolution as theirs: ſeeing the ſame Neceſſity, (to which nothing ſeems impoſſible) did no way preſs them, or conſtrain them. In this ſort did Hannibal, with one ſubſtantial Argument, That there was no mean between Victory and Death, encourage his Companions. For, (ſaith a great Captain of France) La commodite de la retraitte advance la fuite; The commodity of a retrait, doth greatly advance a flat running away.

Scipio on the other ſide, after that he had given order for the laying of a bridge over the River of Ticinus, did not neglect to uſe the beſt arguments and reaſons he could, to encourage the Army he led: putting them in mind of the great conqueſts and victories of their Anceſtors; againſt how many Nations they had prevailed; and over how many Princes, their Enemies, had they triumphed. As for this Army commanded by Hannibal, although it were enough to tell them, that it was no better than of Carthaginians, whom in their late war they had ſo often beaten, by Land and Sea; yet he prayed them withall to conſider, that at this time it was not only ſo diminiſhed in numbers, as it rather ſeemed a troup of Brigants and Thieves, than an Army likely to encounter the Romans, but ſo weather-beaten, and ſtarved, as neither the men, nor horſes, had ſtrength or courage to ſuſtain the firſt charge that ſhould be given upon them. Nay (ſaid he) ye your ſelves may make judgment what daring they have now remaining, after ſo many travails and miſeries; ſeeing when they were in their beſt ſtrength, after they had paſt the Roan, their horſe-men were not only beaten by ours, and driven back to the very Trenches of their Camp, but Hannibal himſelf, fearing our approach, ran headlong towards the Alps: thinking it a leſs diſhonour to die there by froſt, famine, and preſſure, than by the ſharp ſwords of the Romans, which had ſo often cut down his people, both in Africa, and in Sicil. It was not long after this, ere the two Generals met: each being far advanced before the groſs of his Army, with his Horſe; and the Roman having alſo with him ſome light-armed foot, to view the ground, and the enemies countenance. When they diſcovered the approach one of the other; Scipio ſent before him his horſemen of the Gauls, to begin the fight, and beſtowing his Darters in the void ground between their troups, to aſſiſt them: himſelf with his Roman men at arms, followed ſoftly in good order. The Gauls (whether deſirous to try the metal of the Carthaginians, or hoping thereby to get favour of the Romans) behaved themſelves couragiouſly, and were as couragiouſly oppoſed. Yet their foot that ſhould have aided them, ſhrank at the firſt brunt, or rather fled cowardly away, without caſting a Dart; for fear of being trodden down by the enemies horſe. This notwithſtanding, the Gauls maintained the fight, and did more hurt than they received; as preſuming that they were well backt. Neither was the Conſul unmindful to relieve them: their hardineſs deſerving his aid; and the haſty flight of thoſe that ſhould have ſtood by them, admoniſhing him that it was needful. Wherefore he adventured himſelf ſo far, that he received a dangerous wound; and had been left in the place, if his Son (afterward ſurnamed Africanus) had not brought him off: though others give the honour of this reſcue to a Ligurian ſlave. Whilſt the Romans were buſied in helping their Conſul; an unexpected ſtorm came driving at their backs, and made them look about how to help themſelves. Hannibal had appointed his Numidian light-horſe, to give upon the Romans in flank, and to compaſs them about, whilſt he with his men at Arms ſuſtained their charge, and met them in the face. The Numidians performed this very well: cutting in pieces the ſcattered foot, that ran away at the firſt encounter; and then falling on the backs of thoſe, whoſe looks were faſtned upon Hannibal and Scipio. By this impreſſion, the Romans were ſhuffled together, and routed: ſo that they all betook them to their ſpeed, and left unto their enemies the honour of the day.

When Scipio ſaw his horſemen thus beaten, and the reſt of his Army thereby greatly diſcouraged; he thought it a point of wiſdom, having loſt ſo many of his Fleet upon the firſt puff of the wind, to take Port with the reſt, before the extremeſt of the tempeſt overtook him. For he ſaw by the lowring morning what manner of day it was like to prove. Therefore his battail of foot being yet unbroken, he in a manner ſtole the retrait; and recovered the Bridge over Ticinus, which he had formerly built. But notwithſtanding all the haſte that he made, he left ſix hundred of his Rear behinde him: who were the laſt that ſhould have paſſed, and ſtaid to break the bridge. Herein he followed this rule of a good man of War, Si certamen quandoque dubium videatur, tacitam miles arripiat fugam: fuga enim aliquando laudanda: which muſt be underſtood in this ſort: If a General of an Army, by ſome unproſperous beginnings doubt the ſucceſs; or find his Army fearful or wavering, it is more profitable to ſteal a ſafe retrait, than to abide the uncertain event of battail.

It was two dayes after, ere Hannibal could paſs the River; Scipio the whileſt refreſhing his men, and eaſing himſelf of his wound in Placentia. But as ſoon as Hannibal preſented his Army before the Town, offering battail to the Romans, who durſt not accept it, nor iſſue forth of their Camp; the Gauls, that hitherto had followed Scipio for fear, gathered out of his fear, courage to forſake him. They thought that now the long-deſired time was come, in which better Chieftains and Souldiers, than Aneroeſtus, Britomarus, and Geſſates, were come to help them: if they had the hearts to help themſelves. Wherefore the ſame night they fell upon the Roman Camp; wounded and ſlew many eſpecially of thoſe guards that kept watch at the gate; with whoſe heads in their hands, they fled over to the Carthaginians, and preſented their ſervice. Hannibal received them exceeding courteouſly, and diſmiſt them to their own places: as men likely to be of more uſe to him, in perſwading the reſt of their Nation to become his Confederates, than in any other ſervice at the preſent.

About the fourth watch of the night following, the Conſul ſtole a retrait, as he had done before; but not with the like eaſe and ſecurity. Hannibal had a good eye upon him, and ere he could get far, ſent the Numidians after him: following himſelf with all his Army. That night the Romans had received a great blow, if the Numidians, greedy of ſpoil, had not ſtaid to ranſack their Camp: and thereby given time to all (ſave ſome few in Rear, that were ſlain or taken) to paſs the River of Trebia, and ſave themſelves. Scipio, being both unable to travel by reaſon of his wound, and withall, finding it expedient to attend the coming of his fellow-Conſul; incamps himſelf ſtrongly upon the banks of Trebia. Neceſſity required that he ſhould ſo do; yet this diminiſhed his reputation. For every day more and more of the Gauls fell to the Carthaginian ſide; among whom came in the Boji, that brought with them the Roman Commiſſioners, which they had taken in the late Inſurrection. They had hitherto kept them as pledges, to redem their own hoſtages: but now they deliver them up to Hannibal, as tokens and pledges of their affections towards him; by whoſe help they conceived better hope of recovering their own men and lands. In the mean while, Hannibal, being in great ſcarcity of victuals, attempted the taking of Claſtidium, a Town wherein the Romans had laid up all their ſtore and munition. But there needed no force; a Brunduſian, whom the Romans had truſted with keeping it, ſold it for a little money.

The news of theſe diſaſters, brought to Rome, filled the Senate and People, rather with a deſire of haſty revenge, than any great ſorrow for their loſs received; ſeeing that in a manner, all their Foot, wherein their ſtrength and hope conſiſted, were as yet entire. They therefore haſted away Sempronius, that was newly arrived, towards Ariminum, where the Army, by him ſent out of Sicil, awaited his coming. He therefore haſted thither; and from thence he marched ſpeedily towards his Colleague: who attended him upon the banks of Trebia. Both the Armies being joyned in one, the Conſuls deviſed about that which remained to be done: Sempronius received from Scipio the relation of what had paſſed ſince Hannibals arrival; the fortune of the late fight; and by what errour or miſadventure the Romans were therein foiled: which Scipio chiefly laid on the revolt and treaſon of the Gauls.

Sempronius, having received from Scipio the ſtate of the affairs in thoſe parts; ſought by all means to try his fortune with Hannibal, before Scipio were recovered of his wounds, that thereby he might purchaſe to himſelf the ſole glory of the victory, which he had already, in his imagination, certainly obtained. He alſo feared the election of the new Conſuls: his own time being well-near expired. But Scipio perſwaded the contrary; objecting the unſkilfulneſs of the new-come Souldiers: and withall, gave him good reaſon, to aſſure him that the Gauls, naturally unconſtant, were upon terms of abandoning the party of the Carthaginians; thoſe of them inhabiting between the rivers of Trebia and Po, being already revolted. Sempronius knew all this as well as Scipio: but being both guided and blinded by his ambition, he made haſte to find out the diſhonour which he might otherwise easily have avoided. This resolution of Sempronius was exceeding pleasing to Hannibal: who feared nothing so much as delay and loss of time. For the strength of his Army, consisting in strangers, to wit, in Spaniards and Gauls; he no less feared the change of affection in the one, than the impatience of the other: who being far from their own home, had many passions moving them to turn their faces towards it. To further the desire of Sempronius, it fell out so, that about the same time, the Gauls, inhabiting near unto Trebia, complained of injuries done by the Carthaginians. They did not supply Hannibal with necessaries, as he supposed that they might have done; although he daily reprehended their negligence, telling them, that for their sakes, and to set them at liberty, he had undertaken this Expedition. Seeing therefore how little they regarded his words, he was bold to be his own Carver; and took from them by force, as much as he needed of that which they had. Hereupon they fly to the Romans for help: and, to make their tale the better, say that this wrong is done them, because they refused to joyn with Hannibal. [illegible] cared not much for this: he suspected [illegible]hood, and was assured of their mu[illegible]g. But Sempronius affirmed, that it stood with the honour of Rome, to preserve their Confederates from suffering injury: and that hereby might be won the friendship of all the Gauls. Therefore he sent out a thousand Horse: which coming unlooked for upon Hannibal his forragers, and finding them heavy loaden, cut many of them in pieces, and chased the rest even into their own Camp. This indignity made the Carthaginians sally out against them: who caused them to retire faster than they came. Sempronius was ready to back his own men; and repelled the enemies. Hannibal did the like. So that at length all the Roman Army was drawn forth; and a battel ready to be fought, if the Carthaginian had not refused it.

This victory) for so the Consul would have it called) made the Romans in general desirous to try the main chance in open field: all the perswasions of Scipio to the contrary notwithstanding. Of this disposition Hannibal was advertised by the Gauls, his Spies, that were in the Roman Camp. Therefore he bethought himself how to help forward the victory by adding some stratagem to his forces: he found in the hollow of a watercourse, over-grown with high reed, a fit trench to cover an ambush. Therein he cast his brother Mago with a thousand choice Horse, and as many foot. The rest of his Army, after they had well warmed, and well fed themselves in their Camp, he led into the field, and marched towards the Consul. Early in the morning, he had sent over Trebia some companies of Numidian light-horse, to brave the enemy, and draw him forth to a bad dinner, ere he had broken his fast. Sempronius was ready to take any opportunity to fight: and therefore not only issued out of his Camp, but foorded the River of Trebia, in a most cold and miserable day; his foot being wet almost to the arm-holes: which, together with the want of food, did so enfeeble and cool their courages, as they wanted force to handle the arms they bare. Strong they were in foot, as well of their own Nation, as of the Latines: having of the one sixteen, of the other twenty thousand. The mass of these they ranged in a gross Battalion, guarded on the flanks with three thousand horse; thrusting their Light-armed, and Darters, in loose troops in the head of the rest, in the nature of a Vantguard. The Carthaginian numbers of foot were in a manner equal to their enemies; in horse they had by far the better, both in number and goodness. When therefore the Roman horse ranged on the flanks of their foot, were broken by the Numidians; when their foot, were charged both in front and flank, by the Spaniards, Gauls and Elephants; when finally the whole Army was unawares prest in the Rear, by Mago and his two thousand, that rose out of their place of ambush; then fell the Romans, by heaps, under the enemies swords: and being beaten down, as well fighting in disorder, as flying towards the River, by the Horsemen that pursued them, there escaped no more of six and thirty thousand, than ten thousand of all sorts, Horse and Foot.

Three great errours Sempronius committed, of which every one deserved to be recompensed with the loss that followed. The first was, that he fought with Hannibal in a Champain, being by far inferiour in Horse, and withall, thereby subject to the African Elephants, which in inclosed or un-even grounds & wood-lands, would have been of no use. His second errour was, that he made no discovery of the place upon which he fought; whereby he was grossly over-reacht, and insnared, by the ambush which Hannibal had laid for him. The third was, that he drencht his footmen with empty stomacks, in the River of Trebia, even in a most cold and frosty day, whereby, in effect, they lost the use of their limbs. For, as one saith well, There is nothing more inconvenient and perilous, than to present an Army tyred with travel, to an enemy freſh and fed; ſince where the ſtrength of body faileth, the generoſity of mind is but as an unprofitable vapour.

The broken remainder of the Roman Army, was collected by Scipio, who got therewith into Placentia; ſtealing away the ſame night, which was exceeding rainy, from the Carthaginians, who either perceived him not, becauſe of the ſhowrs; or would not perceive him, becauſe they were over-wearied. Sempronius eſcaped with extream danger, flying, through the Country that was over-run by the enemies horſe. He was attended by more than were requiſite in a ſecret flight; yet by fewer than could have made reſiſtance; if the enemy had met with him. Nevertheleſs he got away, and came to Rome; where he did his office in chuſing new Conſuls for the year following: and then returned into his Province, with a freſh ſupply againſt Hannibal.

§. V.

The departure of Hannibal from the Ciſalpine Gauls into Hetruria. Flaminius the Roman Conſul ſlain, and his Army deſtroyed by the Carthaginians, at the Lake of Thraſymene.

THE Winter growing on apace, was very ſharp, and unfit for ſervice: to the great contentment of the Romans who, being not able to keep the field, lay warm in Placentia, and Cremona. Yet Hannibal did not ſuffer them to reſt very quiet; but vexed them with continual Alarms: aſſayled divers places, and taking ſome; beating the Gauls their adherents, and winning the Ligurians to his party, who preſented him, in token of their faithful love, with two Roman Queſtors, or Treaſurers, two Colonels, and five Gentlemen, the Sons of Senators, which they had intercepted. Theſe, and in general all ſuch priſoners as he had of the Romans, he held in ſtraight places, loaden with Irons, and miſerably fed: thoſe of their followers he not only well intreated, but ſent them to their Countries without ranſome; with the proteſtation, That he therefore undertook the War in Italy, to free them from the oppreſſion of the Romans. By theſe means he hoped, and not in vain, to draw many of them to his party and aſſiſtance. But the Gauls were not capable of ſuch perſwaſions. They ſtood in fear, leſt he ſhould make their Country the ſeat of War, and perhaps take it from them. They were alſo more grieved than reaſon willed them, at his feeding upon them, and waſting their territory. Wherefore ſome of them conſpired againſt his life; others admoniſhed him of the danger: and theſe that gave him the advice, were ready ſoon after to practiſe againſt him; but were in like ſort detected. He was therefore glad to uſe Periwigs of hair, and falſe beards of divers colours; to the end that he might not be deſcryed, nor known, to thoſe that ſhould undertake to make him away. Fain he would have paſſed the Appenines, upon the firſt appearance of Spring; but was compelled by the violence of weather, to tarry among the Gauls, till he had ſeen more ſwallows than one. At length, when the year was ſomwhat better opened, he reſolved to take his leave of theſe giddy companions and bring the war nearer to the gate of Rome. So away he went, having his Army greatly increaſed with Ligurians and Gauls; more ſerviceable friends abroad, than in their own Country. That the paſſage of the Appenine Mountains was troubleſome, I hold it needleſs to make any doubt. Yet ſince the Roman Armies found no memorable impediment, in their marches that way: the great vexation which fell upon Hannibal, when he was travelling thorow and over them, ought in reaſon to be imputed rather to the extremity of Winter, that makes alwayes foul, than to any intollerable difficulty in that journey. Nevertheleſs, to avoid the length of war, together with the reſiſtance and fortifications which may not improbably be thought to have been erected upon the ordinary paſſages towards Rome: he choſe at this time, though it were with much trouble, to travel thorow the Fens and rotten grounds of Tuſcane. In thoſe Mariſhes, and bogs, he loſt all his Elephants, ſave one, together with the uſe of one of his eyes; by the moiſtneſs of the air, and by lodging on the cold ground, and wading thorow deep mire and water. In brief, after he had, with much ado, recovered the firm and fertile Plains, he lodged about Arretium; where he ſomewhat refreſhed his wearied followers, and heard news of the Roman Conſuls.

C. Flaminius, and Cn. Servilius had of late been choſen Conſuls for this year: Servilius a tractable man, and wholly governed by advice of the Senate; Flaminius an hot-headed popular Orator; who having once been robbed (as he thought) of his Conſulſhip, by a device of the Senators, was afraid to be ſerved ſo again, unleſs he quickly finiſhed the war. This jealous Conſul thought it not beſt for him to be at Rome, when he entred into his Office, leſt his adverſaries, by feigning ſome religious impediment, ſhould detain him within the City, or find other business for him at home, to disappoint him of the honour that he hoped to get in the war. Wherefore he departed secretly out of the Town, and meant to take possession of his Office when the day came at Ariminum. The Fathers (so the Senators were called) highly displeased with this, revoked him by Embassadors: but he neglected their injunction; and hastening to meet with the Carthaginians, took his way to Aretium, where he shortly found them.

The fiery disposition of this Consul, promised unto Hannibal great assurance of victory. Therefore he provoked, with many indignities, the vehement nature of the Roman; hoping thereby to draw him unto fight, ere Servilius came with the rest of the Army. All the Country between Fesulæ and Aretium, he put to fire and sword, even under the Consuls nose; which was enough to make him stir, that would not have sitten still, though Hannibal had been quiet. It is true that a great Captain of France hath said; Pays gaste n'est pas perdu; A wasted Country is not thereby lost. But by this waste of the Country, Flaminius thought his own honour to be much impaired; and therefore advanced towards the Enemy. Many advised him (which had indeed been best) to have patience a while, and stay for his Colleague. But of this he could not abide to hear; saying, that he came not to defend Aretium, whilst the Carthaginians went burning down all Italy before them, to the gates of Rome. Therefore he took horse, and commanded the Army to march. It is reported as ominous, that one of their Ensigns stuck so fast in the ground, as it could not be plucked up by the Ensign-bearer. Of this tale, whether true or false, Tully makes a jest, saying, That the cowardly knave did faintly pull at it (as going now to fight) having hardly pitched it into the earth. Neither was the answer of Flaminius (if it were true) disagreeable hereto: for he commanded that it should be digged up, if fear had made the hands too weak to lift it: asking withall, whether letters were not come from the Senate, to hinder his proceedings. Of this their jealousie, both he and the Senate that did give him cause, are likely to repent.

All the Territory of Cortona, as far as to the lake of Thrasymene, was on a light fire; which while the Consul thought to quench with his enemies blood, he pursued Hannibal so unadvisedly, that he fell with his whole Army into an ambush cunningly laid for him between the Mountains of Cortona and the Lake. There was he charged unawares, on all sides, (save only where that great Lake of Perusia, permitted neither his enemies to come at him, nor him to flye from them) knowing not which way to turn, or make resistance. So was he slain in the place, accompanied with fifteen thousand dead carkasses of his Country-men. About six thousand of his men, that had the Vantguard, took courage, as for the most part it happens, out of desperation: and breaking thorow the enemies, that stood in their way, recovered the tops of the Mountains. If these had returned, and given charge upon the Carthaginians backs, it was thought that they might have greatly amended, if not wholly altered the fortune of the day. But that violence of their fear, which, kindled by necessity had wrought the effects of hardiness, was well asswaged, when they ceased to despair of saving their lives by flight. They stood still, in a cold sweat, upon the Hill-top, hearing under them a terrible noise, but not any way discovering how things went, because of the great fogg that held all that morning. When it grew toward noon, the Air was cleared, and they might plainly discern the lamentable slaughter of their fellows. But they staid not to lament it; for it was high time, they thought, to be gone ere they were descryed and attached by the enemies horse. This they should have thought upon sooner, since they had no mind to return into the fight. For, descryed they were, and Maharbal sent after them, who overtook them by night in a Village, which he surrounded with his horse: and so they yielded the next day, rendring up their arms, upon his promise of their lives and liberties.

This accord Hannibal refused to confirm; saying, that it was made by Maharbal without sufficient warrant, as wanting his authority to make it good. Herein he taught them (yet little to his own honour) what it was to keep no faith: and fitted them with a trick of their own. For if it were lawful unto the Romans, to alter covenants, or add unto them what they listed; if the Carthaginians must be fain to pay certain hundreds, and yet more hundreds of talents, besides their first bargains; as also to renounce their interest in Sardinia, and be limited in their Spanish Conquests, according to the good pleasure of the Romans, whose present advantage is more ample, than the conditions of the late concluded Peace: then can Hannibal be as Roman, as themselves; and make them know, that perfidiousness gaineth no more in prosperity, than it loseth in the the change of fortune. Fifteen thousand Italian prisoners, or thereabout, he had in his hands: of which, all that were not Romans, he set free without ransom; protesting, as he had done before, that it was for their sakes, and to free them and others from the Roman tyranny, that he had undertaken this war. But the Romans he kept in straight prison, and in fetters, making them learn to eat hard meat. This was a good way to breed in the people of Italy, if not a love of Carthage, yet a contempt of Rome: as if this war had not concerned the general safety, but only the preserving of her own neck from the yoke of slavery, which her over-strong enemies would thrust upon her in revenge of her oppressions. But an antient reputation confirmed by success of many ages, is not lost in one or two battles. Wherefore more is to be done, ere the Carthaginians can get any Italian Partisans.

Presently after the battle of Thrasimene, C. Centronius, with four thousand Roman horse, drew near unto the Camp of Hannibal. He was sent from Ariminum by Servilius the other Consul, to increase the strength of Flaminius: but, coming too late, he increased only the misadventure. Maharbal was employed by Hannibal, to intercept this company; who finding them amazed with report which they had newly heard of the great overthrow, charged them, and brake them: and killing almost half of them, drave the rest unto a high piece of ground, where they came down, and simply yielded to mercy the next day. Servilius himself was in the mean time skirmishing with the Gauls; against whom he had wrought no matter of importance, when the news was brought him of his Colleagues overthrow and death in Hetruria; that made him hasten back to the defence of Rome.

In these passages, it is easie to discern the fruits of popular jealousie, which perswaded the Romans to the yearly change of their Commanders in the wars; which greatly endangered, and retarded the growth of that Empire. Certain it is, that all men are far better taught by their own errours, than by the examples of their foregoers. Flaminius had heard in what a trap Sempronius had been taken up but the year before, by this subtile Carthaginian; yet suffered he himself to be caught soon after in the same manner. He had also belike forgotten how Sempronius, fearing to be prevented by a new Consul, and ambitious of the sole honour of beating Hannibal in battle, without help of his companion Scipio, had been rewarded with shame and loss; else would he not, contrary to all good advice, have been so hasty to fight, before the arrival of Servilius. If Sempronius had been continued in his charge, it is probable that he would have taken his companion with him the second time, and have searched all suspected places, proper to have shadowed an ambush: both which this new Consul Flaminius neglected. We may boldly avow it, that by being continued in his Government of France ten years, Cæsar brought that mighty Nation, together with the Helvetians and many of the Germans, under the Roman yoke; into which parts had there been every year a new Lieutenant sent, they would hardly, if ever, have been subdued. For it is more than the best wit in the World can do, to inform it self, within one years compass, of the nature of a great Nation, of the Factions, of the Places, Rivers, and of all good helps, whereby to prosecute a War to the best effect. Our Princes have commonly left their Deputies in Ireland three years; whence by reason of the shortness of that their time, many of them have returned as wise as they went out; others have profited more, & yet when they began but to know the first rudiments of War, and Government, fitting the Country, they have been called home, and new Apprentices sent in their places, to the great prejudice both of this and that Estate. But it hath ever been the old course of the World rather to follow the errours, than to examine them: and of Princes and Governours to uphold their slothful ignorance, by the old examples and policy of other ages and people; though neither likeness of time, of occasion, or of any other circumstance, have perswaded the imitation.

§. VI.

How Q. Fabius the Roman Dictator, sought to consume the force of Hannibal, by lingring War. Minutius the Master of the Horse, honoured and advanced by the People, for bold and successful attempting; adventures rashly upon Hannibal, and is like to perish with his Army, and rescued by Fabius.

GReatly were the Romans amazed at this their ill success, and at the danger apparent; which threatned them in more terrible manner, than ever did war since Rome it self was taken. They were good Souldiers, and so little accustomed to receive an overthrow, that when Pyrrhus had beaten them, once and again, in open field, all Italy was strangely affected with his success, and held him in admiration, as one that could could work wonders. But Pyrrhus his quarrel was not grounded upon hate: he only ſought honour, and fought (as it were, upon a bravery; demeaning himſelf like a courteous enemy. This Carthaginian deteſted the whole Roman name; againſt which he burned with deſire of revenge. Ticinum, Trebia, and Thraſymene, witneſſed his purpoſe, and his ability; which to withſtand, they fled unto a remedy that had long been out of uſe, and created a Dictator. The Dictators power was greater than the Conſuls, and ſcarcely ſubject unto controll of the whole City. Wherefore this Officer was ſeldom choſen, but upon ſome extremity, and for no longer time than ſix months. He was to be named by one of the Conſuls, at the appointment of the Senate: though it were ſo, that the Conſul (if he ſtood upon his prerogative) might name whom he pleaſed. At this time the one Conſul being dead, and the other too far off, the people took upon them, as having ſupream authority, to give the Dignity by their election, to Q. Fabius Maximus; the beſt reputed man of war in the City. Novum factum novum conſilium expetit, contrary winds, contrary courſes. Q. Fabius choſe M. Minutius Rufus Maſter of the horſe: which Officer was cuſtomarily as the Dictators Lievtenant; though this Minutius grew afterwards famous, by taking more upon him.

The firſt act of Fabius, was the reformation of ſomewhat amiſs in matters of Religion: a good beginning and commendable, had the Religion been alſo good. But if it were true (as Livie reports it) that the Books of Sybil were conſulted, and gave direction in this buſineſs of devotion; then muſt we believe that thoſe books of Sybil, preſerved in Rome, were dictated by an evil ſpirit. For it was ordained, that ſome Vow, made in the beginning of this war to Mars, ſhould be made anew, and amplyfied, as having not been rightly made before: alſo that great Plays ſhould be vowed unto Jupiter, and a Temple to Venus; with ſuch other Trumpery. This vehemency of ſuperſtition, proceeds always from vehemency of fear. And ſurely this was a time, when Rome was exceedingly diſtempered with paſſion; whereof that memorable accident, of two women that ſuddenly died, when they ſaw their Sons return alive from Thraſymene, may ſerve to bear witneſs, though it be more properly an example of motherly love. The Walls and Towers of the City were now repaired and fortified; the Bridges upon Rivers were broken down, and all care taken for defence of Rome it ſelf. In this tumult, when the Dictator was newly ſet forth againſt Hannibal, word was brought that the Carthaginian Fleet had intercepted all the ſupply, that was going to Cn. Scipio in Spain. Againſt theſe Carthaginians, Fabius commanded Servilius the Conſul to put to Sea; and taking up all the ſhips about Rome and Oſtia, to purſue them: whilſt he, with the Legions, attended upon Hannibal. Four Legions he had levied in haſte: and from Ariminum he received the Army which Servilius the Conſul had conducted thither.

Liv. lib. 22.

With theſe forthwith he followed apace after Hannibal; not to fight, but to affront him. And knowing well, what advantage the Numidian horſe had over the Romans, he alwayes lodged himſelf on high grounds, and of hard acceſs. Hannibal in the mean while, purſuing his victory, had ranged over all the Country, and uſed all manner of cruelty towards the inhabitants; eſpecially to thoſe of the Roman Nation, of whom he did put to the ſword all that were able to bear arms. Paſſing by Spoletum and Ancona, he incamped upon the Adriatick ſhores; refreſhed his diſeaſed, and over-travelled Companies, armed his Africans after the manner of the Romans, and made his diſpatches from Carthage; preſenting his friends, which were in effect, all the Citizens with part of the ſpoils that he had gotten. Having refreſhed his army, fed his horſes, cured his wounded Souldiers, and (as Polybius hath it) healed his horſe heeles of the ſcratches, by waſhing their paſterns in old wine: he followed the coaſt of the Adriatick Sea towards Apulia a Northern Province of the Kingdom of Naples ſpoiling the Murrucini, and all other Nations lying in his way. In all this ground that he over-ran, he had not taken any one City: onely he had aſſayled Spoletum a Collony of the Romans; and finding it well defended, preſently gave it over. The malice of a great Army is broken, and the force of it ſpent in a great ſiege. This the Proteſtant Army found true at Poictiers, a little before the battle of Moncountour; and their victorious enemies, anon after at S. Jean d' Angely. But Hannibal was more wiſe. He would not engage himſelf in any ſuch enterpriſe, as ſhould detain him, and give the Romans leave to take breath. All his care was to weaken them in force and reputation: knowing, that when once he was abſolute Maſter of the field, it would not be long ere the walled Cities would open their gates, without expecting any engine of battery. To this end he preſented Fabius with battle, as ſoon as he ſaw him; and provoked him with all manner of bravadoes. But Fabius would not bite. He knew well the differences between ſouldiers bred up, ever ſince they were boyes, in war and in blood, trained and hardened in Spain, made proud and adventurous by many victories there, and of late by ſome notable acts againſt the Romans; and ſuch, as had no oftner ſeen the enemy, than been vanquiſhed by him. Therefore he attended the Carthaginian ſo neer, as he kept him from ſtragling too far; and preſerved the countrey from utter ſpoil. He inured his men by little and little, and made them acquainted with dangers by degrees, and he brought them firſt to look on the Lyon afar off, that in the end he might fit on his tail.

Now Minutius had a contrary diſpoſition, and was as fiery as Flaminius: taxing Fabius with cowardize and fear. But all ſtirred not this well-adviſed Commander. For wiſe men are no more moved with ſuch noiſe, than with wind bruiſed out of a bladder. There is nothing of more indiſcretion and danger, than to purſue misfortune: it waſteth it ſelf ſooner by ſufferance, than by oppoſition. It is the invading Army that deſires battel: and this of Hannibal, was both the invading and victorious. Fabius therefore ſuffered Hannibal to croſs the Appenines, and to fall upon the moſt rich and pleaſant Territory of Campania; neither could he by any arguments be perſwaded, to adventure the Roman Army in battel: but being far too weak in horſe, he alwayes kept the Hills and faſt grounds. When Hannibal ſaw he could by no means draw this wary Dictator to fight, that the Winter came on, and that the Towns ſtood firm for the Romans, whoſe Legions were in ſight, though afar off; he reſolved to reſt his Army, that was loaden with ſpoil, in ſome plentiful and aſſured place, till the following ſpring. But ere this can be done he muſt paſs along by the Dictators camp, that hung over his head upon the hills of Collicula, and Caſilinum: for other way there was none, by which he might iſſue out of that goodly garden-countrey, which he had already waſted, into places more abundant of proviſion for his wintering. It was by meer errour of his guide, that he firſt entred within theſe ſtraights. For he would have been directed unto Caſſinum, whence he might both aſſay the fair City of Capua, which had made him friendly promiſes under-hand, and hinder the Romans from coming near it to prevent him. But his guide miſ-underſtood the Carthaginian pronunciation, and conducted him awry another way, from Caſſinum to Caſilinum, whence Fabius hoped that he ſhould not eaſily eſcape. Now began the wiſdom of Fabius to grow into credit; as if he had taken the Carthaginians in a trap, and won the victory without blows. But Hannibal reformed this opinion, and freed himſelf, by a ſleight invention, yet ſerving the turn as well as a better. In driving the countrey he had gotten about two thouſand Kine, whoſe hornes he dreſſed with dry faggots, and ſetting fire to them in the dark night, cauſed them to be driven up the hills. The ſpectacle was ſtrange, and therefore terrible; eſpecially to thoſe that knew it to be a work of a terrible enemy. What it ſhould mean, Fabius could not tell; but thought it a device to circumvent him, and therefore kept within his Trenches. They that kept the hill tops were horribly affraid, when ſome of theſe fiery Monſters were gotten beyond them; and ran therefore haſtily away, thinking the enemies were behind their backs; and fell among the light-armed Carthaginians, that were no leſs afraid of them. So Hannibal, with his whole Army recovered ſure ground without moleſtation: where he ſtaid till the next morning, and then brought off his light footmen, with ſome ſlaughter of the Romans, that began to hold them in ſkirmiſh. After this, Hannibal made ſemblance of taking his journey towards Rome: and the Dictator coaſted him in the wonted manner; keeping ſtill on high grounds, between him and the City, whileſt the Carthaginian waſted all the Plains. The Carthaginian took Geryon, an old ruinous Town in Apulia, forſaken by the Inhabitants, which he turned into Barns and Store-houſes for winter, and incamped under the broken wall. Other matter of importance he did none: but the time paſſed idly, till the Dictator was called away to Rome, about ſome buſineſs of Religion, and left the Army in charge with Minutius the Maſter of the horſe.

Minutius was glad of this good occaſion to ſhew his own ſufficiency. He was fully perſwaded, that his Romans, in plain field would be too hard for the Africans and Spaniards: by whom if they had been foiled already twice or thrice, it was not by open force, but by ſubtilty and ambuſh, which he thought himſelf wiſe enough to prevent. All the Army was of his opinion; and that ſo earneſtly, as he was preferred, by judgement of the Souldiers, in worthineſs to command, before the cold and wary Fabius. In this jollity of conceit, he determined to fight. Yet had he been peremptorily forbidden ſo to do, by the Dictator; the breach of whoſe command was extream peril of death death. But the honour of the victory, which he held undoubtedly his own; and the love of the Army, and the friends that he had at home bearing office in Rome, were enough to save him from the Dictators rods and axes, took he the matter never so hainously. Hannibal on the other side was no less glad, that he should play with a more adventurous Gamester. Therefore he drew near, and to provoke the Romans, sent forth a third part of his Army to waste the Countrey. This was boldly done, seeing that Minutius incamped hard by him: but it seems, that he now despised those whom he had so often vanquished. There was a piece of high ground between the two Camps; which because it would be commodious to him that could occupy it, the Carthaginians seized upon by night with two thousand of their light armed. But Minutius, by plain force, wan it from them the next day; and intrenching himself thereupon, became their neerer neighbour.

The main business of Hannibal at this time was, to provide abundantly, not only for his men, but for his Horses, which he knew to be the chief of his strength; that he might keep them in good heart against the next Summer: if besides this he could give the Romans another blow, it would increase his reputation, incourage his own men, terrifie his enemies, and give him leave to forrage the Countrey at will. Since therefore Minutius did not in many dayes issue forth of his Camp, the Carthaginian sent out (as before) a great number of his men, to fetch in harvest. This advantage Minutius wisely espied, and took. For he led forth his Army, and setting it in order, presented battel to Hannibal, that was not in case to accept it, even at his own Trenches. His horses, and all his light Armature, divided into many companies, he sent abroad against the forragers; who being dispersed over all the fields, and loaden with booty, could make no resistance. This angred Hannibal, that was not able to help them; but worse did it anger him, when the Romans took heart to assail his Trenches. They perceived that it was meer weakness, which held him within his Camp, and therefore were bold to despise his great name, that could not resist their present strength. But in the heat of the business, Asdrubal came from Geryon with four thousand men, being informed of the danger, by those that had escaped the Roman horse. This imboldened Hannibal to issue forth against the Romans; to whom nevertheless he did not much hurt, as he had received.

For this piece of service Minutius was highly esteemed by the Army, and more highly by the people at Rome, to whom he sent the news, with somewhat greater boast than truth. It seemed no small matter, that the Roman Army had recovered spirit, so far forth that it dared to set upon Hannibal in his own Camp; and that in so doing, it came off with the better. Every man therefore praised the Master of the Horse, that had wrought this great alteration; and consequently, they grew as far out of liking with Fabius and his timerous proceedings, thinking that he had not done any thing wisely, in all his Dictatorship: saving that he chose such a worthy Lieutenant; whereas indeed in no other thing he had so greatly erred. But the Dictator was not so joyful of a little good luck, as angry with the breach of discipline; and fearfull of greater danger, thereon likely to ensue. He said that he knew his own place, and what was to be done: that he would teach the Master of the Horse to do so likewise; and make him give account of what he had done, if he were Dictator: speaking it openly, That good success issuing from bad counsel, was more to be feared, than calamity; for as much as the one bred a foolish confidence, the other taught men to be wary. Against these Sermons every one cryed out, especially Metellus, a Tribune of the people: which office warranted him to speak, and do what he list, without fear of the Dictator. Is it not enough (said he) that this our only Man, chosen to be General, and Lord of the Town, in our greatest necessity, hath done no manner of good, but suffered all Italy to be wasted before his eyes, to the utter shame of our State; unless he also hinder others, from doing better than himself can, or dares? It were good to consider what he means by this. Into the place of C. Flaminius he hath not chosen any new Consul all this while; Servilius is sent away to Sea, I know not why; Hannibal and he, have as it were taken Truce; Hannibal sparing the Dictators grounds: (for Hannibal had indeed forborn to spoil some grounds of Fabius, that so he might bring him into envy and suspicion) and the Dictator giving him leave to spoil all others, without impeachment. Surely his drift is even this: he would have the War to last long, that he himself might be long in office, and have the sole Government both of our City and Armies. But this must not be so. It were better, that the Commonalty of Rome, which gave him this authority, should again take it from him and conferr it upon one more worthy. But lest, in moving the people hereto, I ſhould ſeem to do him injury; thus far forth I will regard his honour: I will only propound, That the Maſter of the Horſe may be joined in equal authority with the Dictator; a thing not more new, nor leſs neceſſary, than was the election of this Dictator, by the People.

Though all men, even the Senators, were ill perſwaded of the courſe which Fabius had taken againſt Hannibal, as being neither plauſible, nor ſeeming beneficial at the preſent; yet was there none ſo injurious, as to think that his general intent, and care of the Weal-publique, was leſs than very honourable. Whereas therefore it was the manner, in paſſing of any act, that ſome man of credit and authority, beſides the propounder, ſhould ſtand up, and formally deliver his approbation; not one of the principal Citizens was found ſo impudent, as to offer that open diſgrace, both unto a worthy Perſonage, and (therewithal) unto that dignity, whoſe great power had freed the State at ſeveral times, from the greateſt dangers. Only C. Terentius Varro, who the year before had been Prætor, was glad of ſuch an opportunity, to win the favour of the Multitude. This fellow was the ſon of a Butcher, afterwards became a Shop-keeper; and being of a contentious ſpirit, grew by often brabling, to take upon him as a Pleader, dealing in poor mens cauſes. Thus by little and little he got into Office; and roſe by degrees, being advanced by thoſe, who in hatred of the Nobility favoured his very baſeneſs. And now he thought the time was come, for him to give a hard puſh at the Conſulſhip; by doing that, which none of the great men, fearing or favouring one another, either durſt or would. So he made an hot invective, not only againſt Fabius, but againſt all the Nobility; ſaying, That it grieved them to ſee the people do well, and take upon them what belonged unto them, in matter of Government; That they ſought to humble the Commons by poverty, and to impoveriſh them by War; eſpecially by War at their own doors, which would ſoon conſume every poor mans living, and find him other work to think upon, than matter of State. Therefore he bade them to be wiſe; and ſince they had found one (this worthy Maſter of the Horſe) that was better affected unto them and his Countrey, to reward him according to his good deſerts; and give him authority, according as was propounded by the Tribune, that ſo he might be encouraged and enabled to proceed as he had begun. So the Act paſſed.

Before this buſie day of contention, Fabius had diſpatched the election of new Conſull, which was M. Atilius Regulus, in the room of C. Flaminius: and, having finiſhed all requiſite buſineſs, went out of Town, perceiving well, that he ſhould not be able to withſtand the multitude in hindering the decree. The news of Minutius his advancement, was at the camp as ſoon as Fabius: ſo that his old Lieutenant, and new Colleague, began to treat with him as a Companion; asking him at the firſt, in what ſort he thought it beſt to divide their authority: whether that one, one day; and the other, the next; or each of them ſucceſſively, for ſome longer time, ſhould command in chief. Fabius briefly told him, That it was the pleaſure of the Citizens, to make the Maſter of the Horſe equal to the Dictator, but that he ſhould never be his ſuperior: He would therefore divide the Legions with him by lot, according to the cuſtom. Minutius was not herewith greatly pleaſed; for that with half of the Army he could not work ſuch wonders as otherwiſe he hoped to accompliſh. Nevertheleſs he meant to do his beſt, and ſo taking his part of the Army, incamped about a mile and a half from the Dictator. Needful it was (though Livy ſeems to tax him for it) that he ſhould ſo do. For where two ſeveral Commanders are not ſubordinate one unto another, nor joyned in Commiſſion, but have each intire and abſolute charge of his own followers, there are the forces (though belonging to one Prince or State) not one, but two diſtinct Armies: in which regard, one Camp ſhall not hold them both without great inconvenience. Polybius neither finds fault with this diſtinction, nor yet reports, that Fabius was unwilling to command in chief ſucceſſively (as the two Conſuls uſed) with Minutius, by turns. He ſaith that Minutius was very refractory, and ſo proud of his advancement, that continually he oppoſed the Dictator: who thereupon referred it to his choice, either to divide the forces between them, as is ſaid before, or elſe to have command over all by courſe. This is likely to be true. For Natures impatient of ſubjection, when once they have broken looſe from the rigour of authority, love nothing more, than to conteſt with it; as if herein conſiſted the proof and aſſurance of their liberty.

It behoved the Maſter of the horſe to make good the opinion which had thus advanced him. Therefore he was no leſs careful of getting occaſion to fight, than was Fabius of avoiding the neceſſity. That which Minutius and Hannibal equally deſired, could not long be wanting. The countrey lying between them was open and bare, yet as fit for ambush, as could be wished: for that the sides of a naked valley adjoyning, had many and spacious caves; able some one of them, to hide two or three hundred men. In these lurking places Hannibal bestowed five hundred horse, and five thousand foot; thrusting them so close together, that they could not be discovered. But lest by any misadventure they should be found out, and buried in their holes; he made offer betimes in the morning, to seize upon a piece of ground that lay on the other hand: whereby he drew the eyes and the thoughts of the Romans, from their more needful care, to business little concerning them. Like unto this was the occasion, which not long before had provoked Minutius to adventure upon the Carthaginians. Hoping therefore to increase his honour, in like sort as he got it; he sent first his light armature, then his horse, and at length (seeing that Hannibal seconded his own troops with fresh companies) he followed in person with the Legions. He was soon caught, and so hotly charged on all sides, that he knew neither how to make resistance, nor any safe retrait. In this dangerous case, whilst the Romans defended themselves losing many, and those of their best men: Fabius drew near in very good order to relieve them. For this old Captain, perceiving afar off, into what extremity his new Colleague had rashly thrown himself & his followers, did the office of a good Citizen; and regarding more the benefit of his Countrey, than the disgrace which he had wrongfully sustained, sought rather to approve himself by hasting to do good, than by suffering his enemy to feel the reward of doing ill. Upon Fabius his approach, Hannibal retired: fearing to be well wetted with a showre, from the cloud (as he termed the Dictator) that had hung so long on the Hill-tops. Minutius forthwith submitted himself to Fabius; by whose benefit he confessed his life to have been saved. So from this time forwards the war proceeded coldly, as the Dictator would have it; both whilest his Office lasted which was not long, and likewise afterwards, when he delivered up his charge unto the Consuls, that followed his instructions.

Servilius the Consul had pursued in vain a Carthaginian fleet, to which he came never within kenning. He ran along all the coast of Italy; took hostages of the Sardinians and Corsicans; passed over into Africk; and there negligently falling to spoil the countrey, was shamefully beaten aboord his ships, with the loss of 1000. men. Weighing anchor therefore in all haste, he returned home by Sicil; and (being so required by the Dictators letters) repaired to the camp, with his fellow-Consul, where they took charge of the Army.

§. VII.

The Roman people, desirous to finish the war quickly, choose a rash and unworthy Consul. Great forces levied against Hannibal. Hannibal taketh the Romans provisions in the Castle of Cannæ. The new Consuls set forth against Hannibal.

With little pleasure did they of the poorer sort in Rome hear the great commendations that were given to Fabius by the principal Citizens. He had indeed preserved them from receiving a great overthrow; but had neither finished the war, nor done any thing in appearance thereto tending. Rather it might seem that the reputation of this his one worthy act, was likely to countenance the slow proceedings or perhaps the cowardize (if it were no worse) of those that followed him, in protracting the work to a great length. Else, what meant the Consuls to sit idle the whole winter, contrary to all former custome; since it was never heard before, that any Roman General had willingly suffered the time of his command to run away without any performace: as if it were honourable to do just nothing? Thus they suspected they knew not what; and were ready every man to discharge the grief and anger of his own private loss, upon the ill administration of the publick.

This affection of the people, was very helpful to C. Terentius Varro, in his suit for the Consulship. It behoved him to strike, whilst the Iron was hot: his own worth being little or none; and his credit over-weak, to make way into that high Dignity. But the Commonalty were then in such a mood, as abundantly supplied all his defects. Wherein to help, he had a kinsman, Bibius Herennius, then Tribune of the People; who spared not to use the liberty of his place, in saying what he listed, without all regard of truth, or modesty. This bold Orator stuck not to affirm, that Hannibal was drawn into Italy, and suffered therein to range at his pleasure, by the Noblemen; That Minutius indeed with his two Legions, was likely to have been overthrown, and was rescued by Fabius with the other two: but, had all been joyned together, what they might have done, it was apparent, by the victory of Minutius when he commanded over all as Master of the horse; That without a Plebeian Consul, Conſul, the war would never be brought to an end; That ſuch of the Plebeians as had long ſince been advanced to honour by the people, were grown as proud as the old Nobility, and contemned the meaner ſort, ever ſince themſelves were freed from contempt of the more mighty; That therefore it was needful to chooſe a Conſul, who ſhould be altogether a Plebeian, a meer new man, one that could boaſt of nothing but the Peoples love, nor could wiſh more, than to keep it, by well deſerving of them. By ſuch perſwaſions the Multitude was won, to be wholly for Terentius: to the great vexation of the Nobles, who could not endure to ſee a man raiſed for none other vertue, than his detracting from their honour; and therefore oppoſed him with all their might. To hinder the deſire of the People, it fell out, or at leaſt was alledged, that neither of the two preſent Conſuls could well be ſpared from attending upon Hannibal, to hold the Election. Wherefore a Dictator was named for that purpoſe; and he again depoſed (either as was pretended) for ſome religious impediment, or becauſe the Fathers deſired an Inter-regnum, wherein they might better hope to prevail in choice of the new Conſuls. This Inter-regnum took name and being in Rome, at the death of Romulus: and was in uſe at the death of other Kings. The order of it was this. All the Fathers, or Senators, who at the firſt were an hundred, parted themſelves into Tens or Decuries; and governed ſucceſſively, by the ſpace of five dayes, one Decurie after another in order: yet ſo, that the Lictors, or Virgers, carrying the Faſces, or bundles of rods and axes, waited only upon the chief of them with thoſe Enſigns of power. This cuſtome was retained in times of the Conſuls; and put in uſe, when by death, or any caſualty, there wanted ordinary Magiſtrates of the old year, to ſubſtitute new for the year following. The advantage of the Fathers herein was, that if the election were not like to go as they would have it, there needed no more, than to ſlip five dayes, and then was all to begin anew: by which interruption, the heat of the multitude was commonly well aſſwaged. Upon ſuch change of thoſe, that were Preſidents of the election, it was alſo lawful unto new Petitioners, to ſue for the Magiſtracies that lay void: which otherwiſe was not allowed; but a time limited, wherein they ſhould publickly declare themſelves to ſeek thoſe offices. But no device would ſerve againſt the general favour born unto Terentius. One Inter-regnum paſſed over, and the malice of the Fathers, againſt the vertue (as it was believed) of this mean, but worthy man, ſeemed ſo manifeſt, that when the People had urged the buſineſs to diſpatch, only Terentius was choſen Conſul: in whoſe hand it was left, to hold the election of his Colleague. Hereupon all the former Petitioners gave over. For whereas men of ordinary mark had ſtood for the place before, it was now thought meet, that, both, to ſupply the defect, and to bridle the violence of this unexpert, and hot-heated man, one of great ſufficiency and reputation, ſhould be joyned with him, as both Companion and Oppoſite. So L. Æmilius Paulus, he who a few years ſince had overcome the Illyrians, and chaſed Demetrius Pharius out of his Kingdome, was urged by the Nobility to ſtand for the place; which he eaſily obtained, having no Competitor. It was not the deſire of this honourable man, to trouble himſelf any more in ſuch great buſineſs of the Common-wealth. For, notwithſtanding his late good ſervice, He, and M. Livius that had been his companion in office, were afterwards injuriouſly vexed by the people, and called unto judgement: wherein Livius was condemned, and Æmilius hardly eſcaped. But of this injuſtice they ſhall put the Romans well in mind each of them in his ſecond Conſulſhip wherein they ſhall honourably approve their worth; the one of them nobly dying, in the moſt grievous loſs; the other bravely winning, in the moſt happy victory that ever befell that Common-wealth.

Theſe new Conſuls, Varro and Paulus omitted no part of their diligence in preparing for the war; wherein though Varro made the greater noiſe, by telling what wonders he would work, and that he would ask no more, than once to have a ſight of Hannibal, whom he promiſed to vanquiſh the very firſt day: yet the providence aud care of Paulus travelled more earneſtly toward the accompliſhment of that, whereof his fellow vainly boaſted. He wrote unto the two old Conſuls Servilius and Atilius, deſiring them to abſtain from hazard of the main chance; but nevertheleſs, to ply the Carthaginians with daily skirmiſh, and weaken them by degrees: that when he and his Colleague ſhould take the field, with the great Army which they were now levying, they might find the four old Legions well accuſtomed to the enemy, and the enemy well weakned to their hands. He was alſo very ſtrict in his Muſters; wherein the whole Senate aſſiſt him ſo carefully, as if in this Action they meant to refute the ſlanders, with which Terentius and his adherents had burdened them. What number of men they raiſed, it is uncertain. Fourscore thousand foot, at the least, and six thousand horse, they were strong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had so greatly desired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuse, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were distressed by their own Mercenaries; so did he now send help to Rome, a thousand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other Provisions: fearing nothing more, than that one of these two mighty Cities should destroy the other, whereby his own estate would fall to ruine, that stood upright, by having them somewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them also counsel, to send forces into Africa; it (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and instructions were given to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicil, that he should accordingly pass over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more serve to declare their puissance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of such as were not easily drawn into the field, and fitted for service. For, besides these Armies of the Consuls, and that which went into Sicil, twenty five thousand, with L. Posthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went against the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the passage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their present strength might well embolden them to do as they did. They sent Embassadours to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their subject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They also sent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already past. What answer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not sent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the shifts that they were driven soon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little soever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whilest the City was busied in these cares, the old Consuls lay as near unto Hannibal as possibly they could without incurring the necessity of a battel. Many skirmishes they had with him; wherein their success, for the most part, was rather good than great. Yet one mischance not only blemished the honour of their other services, but was indeed the occasion to draw on the misery following. Hannibal for the most part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his store for the Winter. The Romans to be near him, lodged about Cannusium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aside for all necessaries, to the loss of good opportunities, they bestowed much of their provisions in the Castle of Cannæ: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furnished himself, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unless they would be troubled with far carriage. Besides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himself to abide in that open Country, fit for the service of his Horse, longer than the Romans, having so many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battel, which he most desired. Of this mishap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them understand how this Piece taken by Hannibal, would serve him to command no small part of the Country adjacent; it then seemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themselves, to adventure a battel with the Carthaginian, rather than suffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheless answer was returned unto Servilius, that he should have patience yet awhile: for that the Consuls would shortly be there, with a Power sufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the season of the year commodious to take the field, the two Consuls, with their Army, set forth against Hannibal. This was alwayes done with great solemnity: especially, whensoever they went forth to war against any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and solemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the rest of their gods, for good success and Victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, (not only such as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Voluntaries for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and dismissed with friendly leave-taking, and good wishes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable service. Terentius his Attendants

Attendants were the whole multitude of the poorer Citizens; a troop no less in greatness, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is said to have exhorted the Consul Paulus, with many grave words, to shew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious folly of his fellow-Consul. The answer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would do his best for his Country, but if he saw his best were likely to be ill taken, he would think it less rashness to adventure upon the Enemies sword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Dissension between the two Roman Consuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans pressed him to fight. The great battail of Cannæ.

These new Generals, arriving at the Camp, dismissed M. Atilius, one of the last years Consuls, requesting it because of his age and weakness: Servilius they retained with them, as their assistant. The first thing that Æmilius thought necessary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad success hitherto, had gathered more cause of fear, than of courage. He willed them to consider not only now, their victories in time past against the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no less than all that Rome at the present was able to set forth. He told them in what danger their Country stood; how the state and safety thereof rested upon their hands; using some such other common matter of perswasion. But the most effectual part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambush he had stoln the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thrasymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconsiderate rashness of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one saw not his enemies, untill he was surrounded by them; the other scarce saw them, when they struck off his head, by reason of the thick mist, through the darkness whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their snares. Finally declaring what advantages they had against the Enemy; and how destitute the Enemy was of those helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed against them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their best. They were easily perswaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Arms, gave them cause to think, that under a Captain so well experienced, and every way sufficient, as Æmilius was known to be, they should easily prevail against the Carthaginians, that came short of them in all things else, save craft; which would not alwayes thrive. But in one thing they mistook the meaning of their General. It was his desire that they should have heart to fight; not that they should lose the patience of awaiting a convenient season. But they, having preconceived a victory, thought all delayes to be impediments: and thereby sought to rob themselves of their best help; which was, Good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themselves affected with the vulgar desire, of ending the war quickly; wherein since Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them, forbear to use it: Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus also thought the Consul Terentius; who was no less popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of most importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull passions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who hastened their desire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than should his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themselves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Dissension of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would so too, but said that it was not yet time; why? because the enemy must shortly dislodge, and remove hence, into places less fit for his horse. But shall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his last years provisions, return into Campania to gather a second Harvest? This would (said Varro) savour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haste (said Paulus) doth savour no less of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Æmilius lodged six miles from Hannibal, where the uncertain. Fourſcore thouſand foot, at the leaſt, and ſix thouſand horſe, they were ſtrong in the field, when the day came, which Varro had ſo greatly deſired, of looking upon Hannibal.

Hiero the old King of Syracuſe, as he had relieved the Carthaginians, when they were diſtreſſed by their own Mercenaries; ſo did he now ſend help to Rome, a thouſand Archers, and Slingers, with great quantity of Wheat, Barly, and other Proviſions: fearing nothing more, than that one of theſe two mighty Cities ſhould deſtroy the other, whereby his own eſtate would fall to ruine, that ſtood upright, by having them ſomewhat evenly ballanced. He gave them alſo counſel, to ſend forces into Africa; if (perhaps) by that means they might divert the war from home. His gifts, and good advice were lovingly accepted; and inſtructions were given to Titus Otacilius the Prætor, which was to go into Sicil, that he ſhould accordingly paſs over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

The great Levies, which the Romans made at this time, do much more ſerve to declare their puiſſance, than any, though larger accompt by Poll, of ſuch as were not eaſily drawn into the field, and fitted for ſervice. For, beſides theſe Armies of the Conſuls, and that which went into Sicil, twenty five thouſand, with L. Poſthumius Albinus, another of the Prætors, went againſt the Gauls, to reclaim that Province, which the paſſage of Hannibal through it, had taken from them. The contemplation of this their preſent ſtrength might well embolden them to do as they did. They ſent Embaſſadours to Philip, the Son of Demetrius, King of Macedon, requiring him to deliver into their hands Demetrius Pharius: who, having been their ſubject, and rebell, was fled into his Kingdom. They alſo ſent to the Illyrians, to demand their tribute; whereof the day of payment was already paſt. What anſwer they received, it is not known: only this is known, that Demetrius Pharius was not ſent unto them; and that Philip henceforth began to have an eye upon them, little to their good. As for the Illyrian money, by the ſhifts that they were driven ſoon after to make, it will appear, that the one half of it (how little ſoever) would have been welcome to Rome, and accepted, without any cavil about forfeiture for non-payment of the whole.

Whileſt the City was buſied in theſe cares, the old Conſuls lay as near unto Hannibal as poſſibly they could without incurring the neceſſity of a battel. Many ſkirmiſhes they had with him; wherein their ſucceſs, for the moſt part, was rather good than great. Yet one miſchance not only blemiſhed the honour of their other ſervices, but was indeed the occaſion to draw on the miſery following. Hannibal for the moſt part of that time, made his abode at Geryon; where lay all his ſtore for the Winter. The Romans to be near him, lodged about Cannuſium; and, that they might not be driven to turn aſide for all neceſſaries, to the loſs of good opportunities, they beſtowed much of their proviſions in the Caſtle of Cannæ: for the Town was razed the year before. This place Hannibal wan, and thereby not only furniſhed himſelf, but compelled his enemies to want many needfull things, unleſs they would be troubled with far carriage. Beſides this, and more to his advantage, he enabled himſelf to abide in that open Country, fit for the ſervice of his Horſe, longer than the Romans, having ſo many mouths to feed, could well endure to tarry; without offering battel, which he moſt deſired. Of this miſhap when Servilius had informed the Senate, letting them underſtand how this Piece taken by Hannibal, would ſerve him to command no ſmall part of the Country adjacent; it then ſeemed needfull, even unto the Fathers themſelves, to adventure a battel with the Carthaginian, rather than ſuffer him thus to take root in the ground of Italy. Nevertheleſs anſwer was returned unto Servilius, that he ſhould have patience yet awhile: for that the Conſuls would ſhortly be there, with a Power ſufficient to do as need required.

When all things were ready in the City, and the ſeaſon of the year commodious to take the field, the two Conſuls, with their Army, ſet forth againſt Hannibal. This was alwayes done with great ſolemnity: eſpecially, whenſoever they went forth to war againſt any noble or redoubted Enemy. For Sacrifices, and ſolemn Vows, were made unto Jupiter, and the reſt of their gods, for good ſucceſs and Victory: which being performed, the Generals in warlike attire, with an honourable train of the principal men, (not only ſuch as were of their kindred and alliance, or followed them to the war, as Voluntaries for love, but a great number of others that meant to abide at home,) were accompanied on their way, and diſmiſſed with friendly leave-taking, and good wiſhes. At this time, all the Fathers, and the whole Nobility, waited upon Æmilius Paulus, as the only Man, whom they thought either worthy of this honour, or likely to do his Country remarkable ſervice. Terentius his Attendants

Attendants were the whole multitude o the poorer Citizens; a troop no leſs in greatneſs, than the other was in dignity. At the parting, Fabius the late Dictator, is ſaid to have exhorted the Conſul Paulus, with many grave words, to ſhew his magnanimity, not only in dealing with the Carthaginians, but (which he thought harder) in bridling the outragious folly of his fellow-Conſul. The anſwer of Paulus, was, That he meant not again to run into danger of condemnation by offending the multitude; that he would do his beſt for his Country, but if he ſaw his beſt were likely to be ill taken, he would think it leſs raſhneſs to adventure upon the Enemies ſword, than upon the malice of his own Citizens.

§. VIII.

Diſſenſion between the two Roman Conſuls. Whether it be likely, that Hannibal was upon point of flying out of Italy, when the Romans preſſed him to fight. The great battail of Cannæ.

THeſe new Generals, arriving at the Camp, diſmiſſed M. Atilius, one of the laſt years Conſuls, requeſting it becauſe of his age and weakneſs: Servilius they retained with them, as their aſſiſtant. The firſt thing that Æmilius thought neceſſary, was, to hearten his Souldiers with good words; who out of their bad ſucceſs hitherto, had gathered more cauſe of fear, than of courage. He willed them to conſider not only now, their victories in time paſt againſt the Carthaginians, and other more warlike Nations than were the Carthaginians, but even their own great numbers: which were no leſs than all that Rome at the preſent was able to ſet forth. He told them in what danger their Country ſtood; how the ſtate and ſafety thereof reſted upon their hands; uſing ſome ſuch other common matter of perſwaſion. But the moſt effectual part of this Oration, was, That Hannibal with this his terrible Army, had not yet obtained one victory by plain force and valour: but that only by deceit and ambuſh he had ſtoln the honour, which he had gotten at Trebia and Thraſymene. Herewithall he taxed the inconſiderate raſhneſs of Sempronius and Flaminius; of whom the one ſaw not his enemies, untill he was ſurrounded by them; the other ſcarce ſaw them, when they ſtruck off his head, by reaſon of the thick miſt, through the darkneſs whereof he went groping (as it were blinde-fold) into their ſnares. Finally declaring what advantages they had againſt the Enemy; and how deſtitute the Enemy was of thoſe helps, by which he had hitherto prevailed againſt them; he exhorted them to play the men, and do their beſt. They were eaſily perſwaded: for the contemplation of their own multitude, and confidence of the Roman vertue in matter of Arms, gave them cauſe to think, that under a Captain ſo well experienced, and every way ſufficient, as Æmilius was known to be, they ſhould eaſily prevail againſt the Carthaginians, that came ſhort of them in all things elſe, ſave craft; which would not alwayes thrive. But in one thing they miſtook the meaning of their General. It was his deſire that they ſhould have heart to fight; not that they ſhould loſe the patience of awaiting a convenient ſeaſon. But they, having preconceived a victory, thought all delayes to be impediments: and thereby ſought to rob themſelves of their beſt help; which was, Good conduct. They remembred what talk they had heard at Rome: and were themſelves affected with the vulgar deſire, of ending the war quickly; wherein ſince Æmilius had acknowledged, that the advantage was theirs, why did he make them, forbear to uſe it: Thus thought the common Souldier: and thus alſo thought the Conſul Terentius; who was no leſs popular in the Camp, than he had been in the City. Expectation is alwayes tedious; and never more, than when the Event is of moſt importance. All men longed, both at Rome, and in the Army, to be freed from the doubtfull paſſions of Hope and Fear: therefore Terentius, who haſtened their deſire to effect, was likely to win more thanks, than ſhould his Colleague, though greater in performance.

Thus while the Romans think themſelves to have the better of their enemies, they fall into an inconvenience, than which few are more dangerous; Diſſenſion of their chief Commanders. Varro would fight: Æmilius would ſo too, but ſaid that it was not yet time; why? becauſe the enemy muſt ſhortly diſlodge, and remove hence, into places leſs fit for his horſe. But ſhall the Romans wait, till Hannibal, having eaten up his laſt years proviſions, return into Campania to gather a ſecond Harveſt? This would (ſaid Varro) ſavour too much of Q. Fabius: And your haſte (ſaid Paulus) doth ſavour no leſs of C. Flaminius. Their deeds were like their words: for they commanded by turns interchangeably every day. Æmilius lodged ſix miles from Hannibal, where the

the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out o. Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. Nevertheless, he sate down close by Hannibal; who, as an unbidden guest, gave him but a rude welcome and entertainment. The Carthaginian Horse, and light armature, fell upon the Roman Vant-courrers; and put the whole Army in tumult, whilest it was yet in march: but they were beaten off, not without loss, for that the Romans had among their Velites, some troops weightily armed, whereas the Carthaginians had none. The day following, Æmilius, who could not handsomely withdraw the Army out of that level ground, incamped upon the River Ausidus; sending a third part of his forces over the water, to lie upon the Eastern bank, where they entrenched themselves. He never was more unwilling to fight than at this present; because the ground served wholly for the advantage of his enemy; with whom he meant to deal, when occasion should draw him to more equal terms. Therefore he stirred not out of his Trenches, but fortified himself, expecting when Hannibal should dislodge, and remove towards Geryon, Cannæ, or some other place, where his store lay, for want of necessaries: whereof an Army forraging the Countrey, was not likely to carry about with it sufficient quantity, for any long time.

Here it would not be passed over with silence, That Livie differeth much in his Relation from Polybius; telling many strange tales, of the misery into which Hannibal had been driven; and of base courses that he devised to take, if the Romans could have retained their patience a little longer. He had (saith Livie) but ten dayes provision of meat. He had not money to pay his souldiers. They were an unruly Rabble, gathered out of several Nations, so that he knew not how to keep them in order; but that from murmuring, they fell to flat exclamations, first, about their Pay, and Provant, and afterwards for very famine. Especially the Spaniards were ready to forsake him, and run over to the Romans side. Yea Hannibal himself was once upon the point, to have stoln away into Gaul with all his horse, and left his foot unto their miserable destinies. At length for lack of all other counsel, he resolved to get him as far as he could from the Romans, into the Southermost parts of Apulia; to the end, that both his unfaithfull Souldiers might find the more difficulty in running from him; and that his hunger might be relieved with the more early harvest. But whilest he was about to put this device in execution, the Romans prest him so hard, that they even forced him to that, which he most desired, even to fight a battel upon open Champain ground: wherein he was victorious. It was not uncommendable in Livie, to speak the best of his own Citizens; and, where they did ill, to say, That, without their own great folly, they had done passing well. Further also he may be excused; as writing only by report. For thus he saith, Hannibal de fuga in Galliam [dicitur] agitasse; Hannibal [is said] to have bethought himself of flying into Gaul: where he makes it no more than a matter of hear-say; as perhaps was all the rest of this Relation. As for the process it self, it is very incredible. For if Hannibal, coming out of Gaul, thorow the Marishes and Bogs of Hetruria, could find victuals enough, and all things needfull unto his Army, the Summer foregoing: what should hinder him to do the like this year; especially since he had plaid the carefull Husband in making a great harvest; since he had long been Master of the open field; and besides, had gotten, by surprise, no small part of the Romans provisions? Sutable hereunto is all the rest. If Hannibal had taken nothing but Corn and Cattel, his Souldiers might perhaps have fallen into mutiny for pay. But he brought gold with him into Italy: and had so well increased his stock, since he came into that Country, that he had armed his African Souldiers, all Roman-like, and loaded his followers with spoil: having left wherewith to redeem as many of his own, as were taken by the enemy; when the Romans were not willing, as finding it not easie to do the like. In this point therefore, we are to attend the general agreement of Historians; who give it as a principal commendation unto Hannibal, That he alwayes kept his Army free from sedition, though it were composed of sundry Nations, no less different in Manners, Religion, and almost in Nature, than they were in languages: and well might he so do, having not only pronounced, That which of his men soever fought bravely with an enemy, was thereby a Carthaginian; but solemnly protested and swore, (besides other rewards) to make as many of them as should deserve and seek it, free Citizens of Carthage. The running away into Gaul, was a senseless device. Hannibal being there with his whole Army, took so little little pleaſure in the Country and People, that he made all haſte to get him out of it. And what ſhould he now do there with his horſe? or could he be truſted, either there, or elſewhere? yea, how could he deſire to live, having betrayed all his Army, and relinquiſhed his miſerable foot to the butchery of their enemies? This tale therefore Plutarch omitteth, who in writing the life of Hannibal, takes in a manner all his directions from Livie. But of this and the like it is enough to ſay, That all Hiſtorians love to extoll their own Country-men; and where a loſs cannot be diſſembled, nor the honour of the victory taken from the enemy, and given unto blind Fortune, there to lay all the blame on ſome ſtrange miſ-government of their own forces: as if they might eaſily have won all, but loſt all through ſuch folly, as no Enemy can hope to find in them another time.

Now let us return back to the two Armies, where they lye incamped on the River Aufidus. Varro was perſwaded, that it concerned him in honour to make good his word unto the people of Rome: and ſince he had thus long waited in vain to get the conſent of Paulus, now at length to uſe his own authority; and, without any more diſputing of the matter, to fight when his own day came. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the firſt break of the day he began to paſs the River, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and ſought, as in former times, to have diſſwaded him from putting the eſtate of his Country to a needleſs hazard. Againſt thoſe words and ſubſtantial arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of Honour. Hannibal had preſented them battel at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Bravado? He had ſent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Camp; and drave them ſhamefully to run within their defences; which alſo they made offer to aſſail: Muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured victory. When Æmilius perceived that he could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Ten thouſand Roman foot he cauſed to be left behind, in the greater Camp oppoſite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches (which out of his paucity he was leſs able to ſpare from the battel, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Conſuls went over the water with their Army to the leſſer Camp, whence alſo they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battel: the ground on the Eaſt part of the River, ſeeming perhaps more fit for marſhalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cauſe; and without any delay, paſſed likewiſe over, ſomewhat higher up the ſtream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own Camp ſo many, as he thought would ſerve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; he bade them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did ſo. And could you (ſaid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn battel with the Romans upon ſuch a level ground, where the ſtronger in horſe are ſure to prevail? They all aſſented to him; and ſhewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (ſaid he further) ye are firſt of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into neceſſity of playing for their lives, where they are ſure to loſe them. As for theſe Romans, I was fain to encourage you againſt them, when ye met them firſt: but now ye may even encourage your ſelves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as ſeen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other reſpects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themſelves, and all the riches within them; which this victory ſhall make yours. Therefore play the ſtout Souldiers: and ere many hours paſs, ye ſhall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had ſaid this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had ſent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal aſked him, what news; and what work they were likely to have with theſe Romans? Work enough (anſwered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are the ground was somewhat uneven. Thither if the Carthaginians would take pains to come, he doubted not to send them away in such haste, as they should not leave running till they were out o. Italy. But they came not. Terentius therefore the next day descended into the Plains; his Colleague holding him, and beseeching him to stay. When therefore it was his turn to command; at the firſt break of the day he began to paſs the River, without ſtaying to bid his Colleague good morrow. But Paulus came to him, and ſought, as in former times, to have diſſwaded him from putting the eſtate of his Country to a needleſs hazard. Againſt thoſe words and ſubſtantial arguments, Terentius could alledge none other than point of Honour. Hannibal had preſented them battel at their Trenches: ſhould they endure this Bravado? He had ſent his Numidians over the River but even the day before, who fell upon the Romans that were fetching water to the leſſer Camp; and drave them ſhamefully to run within their defences; which alſo they made offer to aſſail: Muſt this alſo be ſuffered? He would not endure it: for it could not but weaken the ſpirit of the Roman Souldier; which as yet was lively, and full of ſuch courage, as promiſed aſſured victory. When Æmilius perceived that he could not hinder the obſtinate reſolution of his Companion, he took all care, that what he ſaw muſt be done, might be done well. Ten thouſand Roman foot he cauſed to be left behind, in the greater Camp oppoſite unto the Carthaginian, to the intent, that either Hannibal might be compelled to leave behind him ſome anſwerable number, for defence of his Trenches (which out of his paucity he was leſs able to ſpare from the battel, than were the Romans) or that theſe ten thouſand, falling upon the Carthaginian Camp, when the fight began, and taking it with all the wealth therein, might thereby (as commonly do ſuch accidents) terrifie and diſtract the enemies in the heat of fight. This done, the two Conſuls went over the water with their Army to the leſſer Camp, whence alſo they drew forth their men, and ranged them in order of battel: the ground on the Eaſt part of the River, ſeeming perhaps more fit for marſhalling of their Army. Hannibal was glad of this, as he had great cauſe; and without any delay, paſſed likewiſe over, ſomewhat higher up the ſtream, which ran from the South; leaving in his own Camp ſo many, as he thought would ſerve to defend it, and no more. To encourage his men; he bade them look about them, and view the ground well, upon which they were to fight. They did ſo. And could you (ſaid he) pray for any greater fortune, than to joyn battel with the Romans upon ſuch a level ground, where the ſtronger in horſe are ſure to prevail? They all aſſented to him; and ſhewed by their countenances, that they were very glad of it. Well then (ſaid he further) ye are firſt of all to thank the gods, that have brought them hither; and then Us, that have trained them along, and drawn them into neceſſity of playing for their lives, where they are ſure to loſe them. As for theſe Romans, I was fain to encourage you againſt them, when ye met them firſt: but now ye may even encourage your ſelves, by calling to mind that they are the men, whom ye have as often beaten as ſeen. Of one thing only I will put you in mind: That whereas hitherto you fought for other reſpects, as, to drive them before you out of Gaul; and to win the open Country, and fields of Italy; both of which ye have obtained: now are ye to fight for the Towns themſelves, and all the riches within them; which this victory ſhall make yours. Therefore play the ſtout Souldiers: and ere many hours paſs, ye ſhall be Lords of all that the Romans hold.

When he had ſaid this; his Brother Mago came to him, whom he had ſent to view the countenance of the enemy. Hannibal aſked him, what news; and what work they were likely to have with theſe Romans? Work enough (anſwered Mago) for they are an horrible many. As horrible a many as they are (thus Hannibal replied) I tell thee, Brother, that among them all, ſearch them never ſo diligently, thou ſhalt not find one man, whoſe name is Mago. With that he fell a laughing, and ſo did all that ſtood about him; which gladded the ſouldiers, who thought their General would not be ſo merry, without great aſſurance. Whether it were ſo, that Hannibal, in the pride of his victories already gotten, valued one Mago above many thouſand Romans; or whether he intimated, that the Romans were no leſs troubled with thinking upon Mago and his Companions, than was Mago with beholding their huge multitude; or whether he meant only to correct the ſad mood of his Brother with a jeſt, and ſhew himſelf merry unto the Souldiers: this his anſwer was more manly, than was the relation of his diſcoverer. But if Hannibal himſelf had been ſent forth by Mago, to view the Romans, he could not have returned with a more gallant report in his mouth, than that which Captain Cam, before the battel of Agincourt, made unto our King Henry the fifth: ſaying, That of the Frenchmen, there were enow to be killed; enow to be taken priſoners; and enow to run away. Even ſuch words as theſe, or ſuch pleaſant jeſts as this of Hannibal, are not without their moment; but ſerve many times, when battel is in hand, to work upon ſuch paſſions, as muſt govern more of the buſineſs: eſpecially, where other needful care is not wanting; without which they are but vain boaſts.

In this great day, the Carthaginian excelled himſelf, expreſſing no leſs perfection of his military ſkill, than was greatneſs in his ſpirit and undertakings. For to omit the commodiouſneſs of the place, into which he had long before conceived the means to draw his enemies to battel; he marſhalled his Army in ſuch convenient order, that all hands were brought to fight, where every one might do his beſt ſervice. His Darters, and Slingers of the Balcares, he ſent off before him, to encounter with the Roman Velites. Theſe were looſe troops, anſwerable in a manner to thoſe, which we call now by a French name, Enfans Perdues; but when we uſe our own terms, the forlorn-hope. The groſs of his Army following them, he ordered thus. His Africans, armed after the Roman manner, with the ſpoils which they had gotten at Trebia, Thraſymene, or elſewhere; and well trained in the uſe of thoſe weapons that were of more advantage, than thoſe wherewith they had formerly ſerved; made the two wings very deep in File. Between theſe he ranged his Gauls and Spaniards, armed each after their own Country manner; their ſhields alike; but the Gauls uſing long broad ſwords, that were forcible in a down-right ſtroak; the Spaniards, ſhort and well pointed blades, either to ſtrike or thruſt; the Gauls, naked from their navel upwards, as confident in their own fierceneſs: the Spaniards, wearing white Caſſocks embroidered with Purple. This medley of two Nations, differing as well in habit and furniture, as in quality, made a gallant ſhew, and terrible, becauſe ſtrange. The Gauls were ſtrong of body, and furious in giving charge, but ſoon wearied, as accuſtomed to ſpend their violence at the firſt brunt, which diſpoſition all that come of them have inherited to this day. The Spaniards were leſs eager, but more wary; neither aſhamed to give ground, when they were over-preſſed; nor afraid to return, and renew the fight, upon any ſmall encouragement. As the roughneſs of the one, and patience of the other, ſerved mutually to reduce each of them to a good and firm temper; ſo the place which they held in this battel, added confidence joyntly unto them both. For they ſaw themſelves well and ſtrongly flanked with Carthaginians and other Africans; whoſe name was grown terrible in Spain, by their Conqueſts, and in Gaul, by this their preſent war. Since therefore it could not be feared, that any great calamity ſhould fall upon them, whilſt the wings on either ſide ſtood faſt: theſe Barbarians had no cauſe to ſhrink, or forbear to imploy the uttermoſt of their hardineſs, as knowing that the enemy could not preſs far upon them, without further ingaging himſelf than diſcretion would allow. Hereunto may be added that great advantage, which the Carthaginian had in horſe; by which he was able, if the worſt had hapned, to make a good retrait. The effect of contraries is many times alike. Deſperation begetteth courage; but no greater, nor ſo lively, as doth aſſured Confidence. Hannibal therefore cauſed the Gauls and Spaniards to advance, leaving void the place wherein they had ſtood, and into which they might fall back, when they ſhould be over-hardly preſſed. So, caſting them into the form of a Creſcent, He made them as it were his Vantguard: the two points of this great half Moon, that looked toward the empty ſpace from which he had drawn it, being narrow and thin, as ſerving only to guide it orderly back, when need ſhould require; the foremoſt part of the Ring, ſwelling out toward the enemies, being well ſtrengthned and thickned againſt all impreſſion. The circle hereof ſeemeth to have been ſo great, that it ſhadowed the Africans, who ſtood behind it: though ſuch figures, cut in braſs, as I have ſeen of this Battle, preſent it more narrow; with little reaſon, as ſhall anon appear: as alſo in the ſame figures it is omitted, That any Companies of Africans, or others, were left in the Rear, to ſecond the Gauls and Spaniards when they were driven to retrait; though it be manifeſt, that Hannibal in perſon ſtood between the laſt ranks of his long Battalions, and in the head of his Rear, doubtleſs well accompanied with the choice of his own Nation. Between the left Battalion and the River Auſidus, were the Gauls and Spaniſh horſe, under the command of Aſdrubal: On the right wing, toward the wide Plains, was Hanno (Livie ſaith Maharbal) with the Numidian light-horſe. Hannibal himſelf, with his brother Mago, and the leading of the Rear. The whole ſumm of Hannibals Army in the field this day, was ten thouſand horſe, and forty thouſand foot, his enemies having two to one againſt him in foot; and He, five to three againſt them in horſe.

The Roman Army was marſhalled in the uſual form: but ſomewhat more narrow, and deep than was accuſtomed; perhaps, becauſe this had been found convenient againſt the Carthaginians, in the former war. It was indeed no bad way of reſiſtance againſt Elephants, to make the Ranks thick and ſhort, but the Files long; as alſo to ſtrengthen well the Rear, that it might ſtand faſt compacted as a wall, under ſhelter whereof the diſordered troops might re-ally themſelves. Thus much it ſeems, that Terentius had learned of ſome old Souldiers; and therefore he now ordered his Battels accordingly, as meaning to ſhew more ſkill, than was in his underſtanding. But the Carthaginians had here no Elephants with them in the field: their advantage was in Horſe; againſt which this manner of imbattailing was very unprofitable, foraſmuch as their charge is better ſuſtained in front, than upon a long flank. As for Æmilius, it was not his day of command: He was but an Aſſiſtant; and in ſuch caſes it happens often, that wiſe men yield for very wearineſs unto the more contentious. Upon the right hand, and toward the River, were the Roman horſemen, under the Conſul Paulus: On the left wing, was C. Terentius Varro the other Conſul, with the reſt of the horſe, which were of the Latines, and other aſſociates: Cn. Servilius the former years Conſul, had the leading of the battel. The Sun was newly riſen, and offended neither part; the Carthaginians having their faces Northward, the Romans toward the South.

After ſome light ſkirmiſh, between the Roman Velites, and Hannibal his Darters and Slingers of the Baleares; Aſdrubal brake upon the Conſul Paulus, and was roughly encountred: not after the manner of ſervice on horſe-back, uſed in thoſe times, wheeling about Alman like; but each giving on in a right line, Pouldron to Pouldron, as having the River on the one hand, and the ſhoulder of the foot on the other hand; ſo that there was no way left, but to pierce and break thorow. Wherefore they not only uſed their Lances and Swords; but ruſhing violently amongſt the Enemies, graſped one another: and ſo their horſes running from under them, fell many to the ground; where ſtarting up again, they began to deal blows like footmen. In concluſion, the Roman horſe were over-born, and driven by plain force to a ſtaggering recoil. This the Conſul Paulus could not remedy. For Aſdrubal, with his boiſterous Gauls and Spaniards, were not to be reſiſted by theſe Roman Gentlemen, unequal both in number, and in horſmanſhip. When the battels came to joyning, the Roman Legionaries found work enough, and ſomewhat more than enough, to break that great Creſcent, upon which they firſt fell: ſo ſtrongly for the while, did the Gauls and Spaniſh foot make reſiſtance. Wherefore the two points of their battel drew towards the midſt; by whoſe aid, theſe oppoſites were forced to diſband, and fly back to their firſt place. This they did in great haſte and fear: and were with no leſs haſte, and folly purſued. Upon the Africans that ſtood behind them, they needed not to fall foul; both for that there was void room enough; and foraſmuch as the Rear, or Horns of this Moon, pointed into the ſafe retrait, where Hannibal with his Carthaginians was ready to re-enforce them, when time ſhould require. In this haſty retrait, or flight of the Gauls and Spaniards, it happned, as was neceſſary, that they who had ſtood in the limb or utter compaſs of the half Moon, made the innermoſt or concave ſurface thereof (diſordered and broken though it were) when it was forced to turn the inſide outward: the horns or points thereof, as yet, untouched, only turning round, and recoyling very little. So the Romans, in purſuing them, were incloſed in an half circle; which they ſhould not have needed greatly to regard, (for that the ſides of it were exceeding thin and broken; and the bottom of it, none other than a throng of men routed, and ſeeming unable to make reſiſtance) had all the enemies foot been caſt into this on great body, that was in a manner diſſolved. But whileſt the Legions, following their ſuppoſed victory, ruſhed on upon thoſe that ſtood before them, and thereby unwittingly engaged themſelves deeply within the principal ſtrength of the Enemies, hedging them in on both hands; the two African Battalions on either ſide advanced ſo far, that getting beyond the Rear of them, they encloſed them, in a manner, behind: and forward they could not paſs far, without removing Hannibal and Mago; which made that way the leaſt eaſie. Hereby it is apparent, That the great Creſcent, before ſpoken of, was of ſuch extent, as covered the Africans, who lay behind it undiſcerned, untill now. For it is agreed, that the Romans were thus empaled unawares; and that they behaved themſelves, as men that thought upon no other work, than what was found them by the Gauls. Neither is it credible, that they would have been ſo mad, as to run head-long, with the whole bulk of their Army, into the throat of ſlaughter; had they ſeen thoſe weapons bent againſt them at the firſt, which when they did ſee, they had little hope to eſcape. Much might be imputed to their heat of fight, and raſhneſs of inferiour Captains: but ſince the Conſul Paulus, a man ſo expert in war, being vanquiſhed in horſe, had put himſelf among the Legions; it cannot be ſuppoſed, that he and they did wilfully thus engage themſelves. Aſdrubal, having broken the troops of Roman horſe, that were led by the Conſul Paulus, followed upon them along the River ſide, beating down and killing, as many as he could, (which were almoſt all of them) without regard of takeing priſoners. The Conſul himſelf was either driven upon his own Legions, or willingly did caſt himſelf among them; as hoping by them to make good the day, notwithſtanding the defeat of his horſe. But he failed of this his expectation. Nevertheleſs he cheared up his men as well as he could, both with comfortable words, and with the example of his own ſtout behaviour: beating down and killing many of the enemies with his own hand. The like did Hannibal among his Carthaginians, in the ſame part of the battle; and with better ſucceſs. For the Conſul received a blow from a ſling, that did him great hurt: and though a troup of Roman Gentlemen, riding about him, did their beſt to ſave him from further harm; yet was he ſo hardly laid at, that he was compelled, by wounds and weakneſs, to forſake his horſe. Hereupon all his company alighted, thinking that the Conſul had given order ſo to do: as in many battels, the Roman men at arms had left their horſes, to help their foot in diſtreſs. When Hannibal (for he was near at hand) perceived this, and underſtood that the Conſul had willed his horſe-men to diſmount; He was very glad of it, and pleaſantly ſaid, I had rather he would have delivered them unto me, bound hand and foot: meaning that he had them now almoſt as ſafe, as if they were ſo bound. All this while C. Terentius Varro, with the horſe of his aſſociates, in the left wing, was marvelouſly troubled by Hanno (or Maharbal) and the Numidians: who beating up and down about that great ſandy Plain, raiſed a foul duſt; which a ſtrong South wind, blowing there accuſtomarily, drave into the eyes and mouths of the Romans. Theſe, uſing their advantage both of number and of lightneſs, wearied the Conſul and his followers exceedingly: neither giving, nor ſuſtaining any charge, but continually making offers, and wheeling about. Yet at the firſt they ſeemed to promiſe him an happy day of it. For when the battails were even ready to joyn; five hundred of theſe Numidians came pricking away from their fellows, with their ſhields caſt behind their backs, (as was the manner of thoſe which yielded) and throwing down their arms, rendred themſelves. This was good luck to begin withall, if there had been good meaning. Varro had not leiſure to examine them; but cauſed them, unweaponed as they were, to get them behind the Army, where he bade them reſt quietly till all was done. Theſe crafty adventurers did as he bade them, for a while; till they found opportunity to put in execution the purpoſe, for which they had thus yielded. Under their Jackets they had ſhort ſwords and poniards; beſides which, they found other ſcattered weapons about the field of ſuch as were ſlain, and therewithal flew upon the hindmoſt of the Romans, whileſt all eyes and thoughts were bent another way: ſo that they did great miſchief, and raiſed yet a greater terrour. Thus Hannibal, in a plain level ground, found means to lay an ambuſh at the back of his enemies. The laſt blow, that ended all fight and reſiſtance, was given by the ſame hand which gave the firſt. Aſdrubal (having in ſhort ſpace broken the Roman troups of horſe, and cut in pieces all, ſave the Company of Æmilius that ruſhed into the groſs of his foot, and a very few beſides, that recovered ſome narrow paſſage, between the River and their own Battalions) did not ſtay to charge upon the face of the Legions, but fell back back behind the Rear of his own, and fetching about, came up to the Numidians: with whom he joyned, and gave upon Terentius.

This fearful Cloud, as it ſhewed at the firſt appearance what weather it had left behind it, on the other ſide: ſo did it prognoſticate a diſmal ſtorm unto thoſe upon whom it was ready now to fall. Wherefore Terentius his followers, having wearied themſelves much in doing little, and ſeeing more work toward, than they could hope to ſuſtain; thought it the beſt way, to avoid the danger by preſent flight. The Conſul was no leſs wiſe than they, in apprehending the greatneſs of his own peril; nor more deſperate, in ſtriving to work impoſſibilities: it being impoſſible, when ſo many ſhrank from him, to ſuſtain the impreſſion alone, which he could not have indured with their aſſiſtance. Now he found that it was one thing to talk of Hannibal at Rome; and another, to incounter him. But of this, or of ought elſe, excepting haſty flight, his preſent leiſure would not ſerve him to conſider. Cloſe at the heels of him and his flying troops, followed the light Numidians, appointed by Aſdrubal unto the purſuit, as fitteſt for that ſervice. Aſdrubal himſelf, with the Gauls and Spaniſh horſe, compaſſing about, fell upon the backs of the Romans; that were ere this hardly diſtreſſed, and in a manner ſurrounded on all parts elſe: He brake them eaſily; who before made ill reſiſtance, being incloſed, and laid at on every ſide, not knowing which way to turn. Here began a pittiful ſlaughter: the vanquiſhed multitude thronging up and down, they knew not whither or which way, whileſt every one ſought to avoid thoſe enemies, whom he ſaw neareſt. Some of the Roman Gentlemen that were about Æmilius, got up to horſe, and ſaved themſelves: which though it is hardly underſtood how they could do; yet I will rather believe it, than ſuppoſe that Livie ſo reporteth, to grace thereby his Hiſtory with this following tale. Cn. Cornelius Lentulus, galloping along by a place where he ſaw the Conſul ſitting all bloddied upon a ſtone, intreated him to riſe and ſave himſelf; offering him his aſſiſtonce and horſe. But Paulus refuſed it; willing Lentulus to ſhift for himſelf, and not to loſe time: ſaying, That it was not his purpoſe to be brought again into judgement by the People, either as an accuſer of his Colleague, or as guilty himſelf of that dayes loſs. Further, he willed Lentulus to commend him to the Senate, and in particular to Fabius: willing them to fortifie Rome, as faſt as well they could; and telling Fabius, that he lived and died mindful of his wholeſome counſel. Theſe words (peradventure) or ſome to like purpoſe, the Conſul uttered to Lentulus, either when againſt his will he was drawn to that battel, or when he beheld the firſt defeat of his horſe; at what time he put himſelf in the head of his Legions. For I doubt not, but Hannibal knew what he ſaid a good while before this; when he thought the Conſul and his troup, in little better caſe than if they had been bound. The whole Groſs of the Romans, was incloſed indeed as within a ſack; whereof the African Battalions made the ſides; the Spaniards, Gauls, and Hannibal with his Carthaginians, the bottom; and Aſdrubal with his horſe, cloſed up the mouth: in which part, they firſt of all were ſhuffled together, and began the Rout, wherein all the reſt followed. Æmilius therefore, who could not ſit his horſe, whileſt the battel yet laſted, and whileſt the ſpaces were ſomewhat open, by which he might have withdrawn himſelf; was now (had he never ſo well been mounted) unable to fly, having in his way ſo cloſe a throng of his own miſerable followers, and ſo many heaps of bodies, as fell apace in that great Carnage. It ſufficeth unto his honour, That in the Battel he fought no leſs valiantly, than he had warily before, both abſtained himſelf, and diſſwaded his fellow-Conſul, from fighting at all. If, when the day was utterly loſt, it had lien in his power to ſave his own life unto the good of his Country, never more needing it; I ſhould think, that he either too much diſeſteemed himſelf; or being too faintly minded, was weary of the World, and his unthankfull Citizens. But if ſuch a reſolution were praiſe-worthy in Æmilius, as proceeding out of Roman valour; then was the Engliſh vertue of the Lord John Talbot, Viſcount Liſle, ſon to that famous Earl of Shrewsbury, who died in the Battel of Chaſtilion, more highly to be honoured. For Æmilius was old, grievouſly, if not mortally wounded, and accomptable for the overthrow received: Talbot was in the flowre of his youth, unhurt, eaſily able to have eſcaped, and not anſwerable for that dayes misfortune, when he refuſed to forſake his Father; who foreſeeing the loſs of the battel, and not meaning to ſtain his actions paſt by flying in his old age, exhorted this his noble ſon to be gone and leave him.

In this terrible overthrow died all the Roman foot, ſave two or three thouſand, who (as Livie ſaith) eſcaped into the leſſer Camp; whence the ſame night, about ſix hundred of them brake forth, and joyning with ſuch of those in the greater Camp, as were willing to try their fortune, conveyed themselves away ere morning, about four thousand foot, and two hundred horse, partly in whole troops, partly dispersed into Cannusium: the next day the Roman Camps, both less and greater, were yielded unto Hannibal by those that remained in them. Polybius hath no mention of this escape: only he reports, that the ten thousand, whom Æmilius had left on the West side of Aufidus (as was shewed before) to set upon the Camp of Hannibal, did as they were appointed; but ere they could effect their desire, which they had well near done, the battel was lost: and Hannibal, coming over the water to them, drave them into their own Camp; which they quickly yielded, having lost two thousand of their number. Like enough it is, that at the first sight of Hannibal, coming upon them with his victorious Army, a greater number of these did flye, and thereby escaped, whilest their fellows, making defence in vain, retired into their Camp, and held the enemy busied. For about two Legions they were (perhaps not half full, but made up by addition of others, whose fault or fortune was like) that having served at Cannæ, were afterwards extremely disgraced by the State of Rome, for that they had abandoned their companions fighting. Of the Roman horse what numbers escaped, it is uncertain: but very few they were that saved themselves in the first charge, by getting behind the River; and Terentius the Consul recovered Venusia, with threescore and ten at the most in his company. That he was so ill attended, it is no marvel: for Venusia lay many miles off to the Southward; so that his neerest way thither, had been thorow the midst of Hannibals Army, if the passage had been open. Therefore it must needs be, that when once he got out of sight, he turned up some by-way; so disappointing the Numidians that hunted contre. Of such as could not hold pace with the Consul, but took other wayes, and were scattered over the fields; two thousand, or thereabout, were gathered up by the Numidians, and made prisoners: the rest were slain, all save three hundred, who dispersed themselves in flight, as chance led them, and got into sundry Towns. There died in this great Battel of Cannæ, besides L. Emilius Paulus the Consul, two of the Roman Quæstors or Treasurers, and one and twenty Colonels or Tribunes of the Souldiers, fourscore Senators, or such as had born office, out of which they were to be chosen into the Senate. Many of these were of special mark, as having been Ædiles, Prætors or Consuls: among whom was Cn. Servilius, the last years Consul, and Minutius, late Master of the horse. The number of prisoners, taken in this battel, Livie makes no greater than three thousand foot, and three hundred horse: too few to have defended for the space of one half hour, both the Roman Camps, which yet the same Livie saith, to have been over-cowardly yielded up. We may therefore do better, to give credit unto one of the prisoners, whom the same Historian shortly after introduceth speaking in the Senate, and saying, That they were no less than eight thousand. It may therefore be, that these three thousand were only such as the Enemy spared, when the fury of Execution was past: but to these must be added about five thousand more, who yielded in the greater Camp, when their company were either slain or fled. So the reckoning falls out right: which the Romans, especially the Consul Varro, had before cast up (as we say) without their Host; nothing so chargeable, as now they find it. On the side of Hannibal there died some four thousand Gauls, fifteen hundred Spaniards and Africans, and two hundred Horse, or thereabouts: a loss not sensible, in the joy of so great a victory; which if he had pursued, as Maharbal advised him, and forthwith marched away towards Rome: it is little doubted, but that the war had presently been at an end. But he believed not so far in his own prosperity; and was therefore told, That he knew how to get, not how to use a victory.

Of things following the Battel at Cannæ.

NOT without good cause doth Polybius reprehend those two Historians, Fabius the Roman, and Philinus the Carthaginian; who, regarding more the pleasure of them unto whose honour they consecrated their travels, than the truth of things, and information of posterity, magnified indifferently, whether good or bad, all actions and proceedings, the one of his Carthaginians, the other of his Roman Quirites, and Fathers conscript. No man of sound judgement will condemn this liberty of censure, which Polybius hath used. For, to recompence his juniority (such as it was) he produceth substantial argumens, to justifie his own Relation; and confuteth the vanity of those former Authors, out of their own writings, by conference of places ill cohering: which pains is to be suspected, that he would not have taken, had he been born in either either of theſe two Cities, but have ſpared ſome part of his diligence, and been contented to have all men think better and more honourably than he deſerved, of his own Countrey. The like diſeaſe it is to be feared, that we ſhall hereafter find in others; and ſhall have ſome cauſe to wiſh, that either they were ſomewhat leſs Roman, or elſe, that ſome works of their oppoſite Writers were extant, that ſo we might at leaſt hear both ſides ſpeak: being henceforth deſtitute of Polybius his help, that was a man indifferent. But ſince this cannot be, we muſt be ſometimes bold, to obſerve the coherence of things; and believe ſo much only to be true, as dependeth upon good reaſon, or (at leaſt) fair probability. This attentive circumſpection is needful at the preſent: ſuch is the repugnancy, or forgetfulneſs, which we find in the beſt narration of things following the Battel of Cannæ. For it is ſaid, that four thouſand foot and horſe gathered together about the Conſul Terentius at Venuſia; that others to the number of ten thouſand got into Cannuſium, chuſing for their Captains, young P. Scipio, and Ap. Claudius; yet that the Conſul Terentius Varro, joyning his company unto thoſe of Scipio at Cannuſium, wrote unto the Senate, that he had now well near ten thouſand men about him; that theſe letters of the Conſul were brought to Rome, when the Senate was newly riſen, that had been taking order for pacifying thoſe tumults in the City, which grew upon the firſt bruit of the overthrow; and yet, that Embaſſadours from Capua (after ſome conſultation, whether it were meet to ſend any, or without further circumſtance, to ſide with Hannibal) were ſent unto Terentius, and found him at Venuſia, a pretty while before he wrote thoſe letters, which overtook (in a manner) at Rome the firſt news of the overthrow. Among ſuch incoherences, I hold it the beſt way, to omit ſo much as hath not ſome particular connexion with matter enſuing: mutual dependency in things of this nature, being no ſmall argument of truth.

When Hannibal had ſacked the Roman Camp, and truſſed up the ſpoils, forthwith he diſ-lodged, and marched away into Samnium; finding a diſpoſition in the Hirpines, and many other people thereabout, to forſake the Roman party, and make alliance with Carthage. The firſt Town that opened the gates unto him, was Coſſa, where he laid up his baggage: and leaving his Brother Mago to take in other places, he haſted into Campania. The general affection of the multitude, in all the Cities of Italy, was inclinable unto him; not only in regard of their grievous loſſes ſuſtained abroad in the fields, which the Romans themſelves, who could not hinder him from ſpoiling the Country, eſpecially the poorer ſort of them, did hardly indure; but in a loving reſpect unto that great courteſie (as it ſeemed) which he uſed unto ſuch of them as became his priſoners. For as at other times, ſo now after this great victory at Cannæ, he had lovingly diſmiſſed as many of the Italian Confederates of Rome, as fell into his hands; rebuking them gently for being ſo obſtinate againſt him that had ſought to deliver them from bondage. Neither ſpared he to win their love by gifts, pretending to admire their valour; but ſeeking indeed, by all wayes and means, to make them his, whileſt all other motives were concurrent. At this time alſo he began to deal kindly (though againſt his nature) with the Roman priſoners; telling them that he bore no mortal hatred unto their Eſtate; but being provoked by injuries, ſought to right himſelf and his Country; and fought with them, to try which of theſe two Cities, Rome or Carthage ſhould bear ſoveraign Rule, not which of them ſhould be deſtroyed. So he gave them leave to chuſe ten of their number, that ſhould be ſent home to treat with the Fathers about their ranſome: and together with theſe he ſent Carthalo a Nobleman of Carthage, and General of his Horſe, to feel the diſpoſition of the Senate, whether it were bowed as yet by ſo much adverſity, and could ſtoop unto deſire of peace. But with the Romans theſe Arts prevailed not, as ſhall be ſhewed in due place. The people of Italy, all, or moſt of them, ſave the Roman Colonies, or the Latines, were not only weary of their loſſes paſt, but entertained a deceivable hope, of changing their old Society for a better. Wherefore not only the Samnites, Lucans, Brutians, and Apulians, ancient enemies of Rome, and not untill the former Generation utterly ſubdued, began to re-aſſume their wonted ſpirits: but the Campans, a Nation of all in Italy moſt bound unto the State of Rome, and by many mutual affinities therewith as ſtraightly conjoyned, as were any ſave the Latines, changed on a ſudden their love into hatred, without any other cauſe found, than change of fortune.

Campania is the moſt goodly and fruitful Province of Italy, if not (as ſome then thought) of all the Earth: and the City of Capua, anſwerable unto the Country, whereof it was Head; ſo great, fair, and wealthy, that it ſeemed no leſs convenient a ſeat of the Empire, than was either Rome or Carthage.

But

But of all qualities, Bravery is the leaſt requiſite unto ſoveraign command. The Campans were luxurious, idle, and proud: and valuing themſelves like Jayes by their feathers, deſpiſed the unfortunate vertue of the Romans their Patrons and Benefactors. Yet were there ſome of the principal among them, as in other Cities, that bore eſpecial regard unto the Majeſty of Rome, and could not indure to hear of Innovation. But the Plebeian faction had lately ſo prevailed within Capua, that all was governed by the pleaſure of the Multitude; which wholly followed the direction of Pacuvius Calavius an ambitious Noble-man, whoſe credit grew, and was up-held by furthering all popular deſires; whereof, the conjunction with Hannibal was not the leaſt. Some of the Capuans had offered their City to the Carthaginians ſhortly after the battel of Thraſymene: whereupon chiefly it was, that Hannibal made his journey into Campania: the Dictator Fabius waiting upon him. At that time, either the nearneſs of the Roman Army, or ſome other fear of the Capuans, hindred them from breaking into actual rebellion. They had indeed no leiſure to treat about any article of new Confederacy: or, had leiſure ſerved, yet were the multitude (whoſe inconſtant love Hannibal had won from the Romans, by gentle uſage, and free diſmiſſing of ſome priſoners in good account among them) unable to hold any ſuch negotiation, without advice of the Senate, which mainly impugned it. So they that had promiſed to yield up their Town to Hannibal, and meet him on the way, with ſome of their Nobility that ſhould aſſure him of all faithful meaning, were driven to ſit ſtill in a great perplexity: as having failed to let in this their new friend, yet ſufficiently diſcovered themſelves to draw upon them the hatred of the Romans. In this caſe were no ſmall number of the Citizens; who thereupon grew the more incenſed againſt their Senate, on whom they caſt all the blame, eaſily pardoning their own cowardize. The people holding ſo tender a regard of liberty, that even the lawful government of Magiſtrates grieved them, with an imaginary oppreſſion; had now good cauſe to fear leſt the Senators would become the Lords indeed, and by help of the Romans bring them under a more ſtraight ſubjection, than ever they had endured. This fear being ready to break into ſome outrage, Pacuvius made uſe of, to ſerve his own ambition. He diſcourſed unto the Senate, as they ſate in Counſel, about thoſe motions troubling the City: and ſaid, That he himſelf had both married a Roman Lady, and given his Daughter in marriage to a Roman: but, that the danger of forſaking of the Roman party was not now the greateſt: for that the people were violently bent to murder all the Senate, and after to joyn themſelves with Hannibal, who ſhould countenance the fact, and ſave them harmleſs. This he ſpake, as a man well known to be beloved himſelf by the people, and privy unto their deſigns. Having throughly terrified the Senate, by laying open the danger hanging over them: He promiſed nevertheleſs to deliver them all, and to ſet things in quiet, if they would freely put themſelves into his hands; offering his oath, or any other aſſurance that they ſhould demand for his faithful meaning. They all agreed. Then ſhutting up the Court, and placing a guard of his own followers about it, that none might enter, nor iſſue forth, without his leave; he called the people to aſſembly: and ſpeaking as much ill of the Senate, as he knew they would be glad to hear, he told them, that theſe wicked Governours were ſurpriſed by his policy, and all faſt, ready to abide what ſentence they would lay upon them. Only thus much he adviſed them, as a thing which neceſſity required, That they ſhould chuſe a new Senate, before they ſatisfied their anger upon the old. So rehearſing unto them the names of one or two Senators; he aſked what their judgement was of thoſe. All cryed out, That they were worthy of death. Chuſe then (ſaid he) firſt of all ſome new ones into their places. Hereat the multitude, unprovided for ſuch an election, was ſilent, untill at laſt ſome one or other adventured to name whom he thought fit. The men ſo nominated, were utterly diſliked by the whole Aſſembly; either for ſome known fault, baſeneſs and inſufficiency; or elſe even becauſe they were unknown, and therefore held unworthy. This difficulty in the new Election appearing more and more, whileſt more were to be choſen; (the fitteſt man to be ſubſtituted, having been named among the firſt, and not thought fit enough) Pacuvius intreated, and eaſily prevailed with the people, that the preſent Senate might for this time be ſpared, in hope of amends hereafter; which (doubtleſs) they would make, having thus obtained pardon of all offences paſt. Henceforth, not only the people, as in former times, honoured Pacuvius, and eſteemed him their Patron; but the Senators alſo were governed by him, to whom they acknowledged themſelves indebted, for ſaving all their lives. Neither did the Senate fail after this by all obſequiouſneſs, to court the people, giving the the reines unto their lawleſs Will, who elſe were likely to caſt them down. All the City being thus of one mind; only fear of the Romans kept them from opening their gates to Hannibal. But after the Battel at Cannæ, this impediment was removed; and few there were that would open their mouths to ſpeak againſt the rebellion. Yet foraſmuch as three hundred principal Gentlemen of the Campans, did then ſerve the Romans in the Iſle of Sicil: the Parents and Kinſmen of theſe prevailed ſo far, that Embaſſadors were ſent unto Terentius the Conſul, to ſee his preſent caſe, and what it could miniſter of Hope or Fear. Theſe, whereſoever they found him, found him weakly attended, and as weak in ſpirit, as in followers. Yet they offered him formally the ſervice of their State; and deſired to know what he would command them. But he moſt baſely lamented unto them the greatneſs of the Roman misfortune: ſaying, That all was loſt; and that the Campans muſt now not help the Romans, who had nothing left wherewith to help themſelves, but make war in their defence againſt the Carthaginians; as the Romans had ſometimes done for the Campans againſt the Samnites. Hereunto he is ſaid to have added a fooliſh Invective againſt Hannibal and his Carthaginians: telling, how he had taught them to make bridges of ſlaughtered carkaſſes, and to feed upon mans fleſh, with ſuch other ſtuff, as only bewrayed his own fear. As for the Campans themſelves, he put them in mind of their preſent ſtrength: they having thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe; with money, and all proviſions, in abundance. Thus he diſmiſſed them prouder than they came, and filled them with conceit of getting a great Lordſhip; whereas before they were ſomewhat timorous in adventuring to ſeek their own liberty. Having reported this at Capua; the ſame Embaſſadors were diſpatched away to Hannibal, with whom they eaſily made alliance, upon theſe conditions, that the Campans ſhould be abſolutely free, and ruled by their own Laws; That no Citizens of theirs ſhould be ſubject unto any Carthaginian Magiſtrate, in what caſe ſoever, whether in War or Peace; and that Hannibal ſhould deliver unto the Campans three hundred Roman priſoners, ſuch as themſelves would chuſe, whom they might exchange for their Gentlemen which were in Sicil.

Againſt all this Negotiation, Decius Magius, an honourable Citizen, oppoſed himſelf earneſtly; uſing, in vain, many perſwaſions, to the wilful and head-ſtrong Multitude; whom he put in mind of Pyrrhus and the Tarentines, wiſhing them not to change old friends for new acquaintance. This did he, when they were ſending Embaſſadours unto Hannibal; and this alſo did he, when the new alliance was concluded; but moſt earneſtly, when a Carthaginian Garriſon was entring the Town: at which time he gave advice, either to keep it out, or to fall upon it, and to cut it in pieces, that by ſuch a notable piece of ſervice, they might make amends unto the Romans, whom they had forſaken.

Advertiſement hereof was given to Hannibal: who lying about Naples not far off, ſent for Magius to come ſpeak with him in the Camp. This Magius refuſed: alledging, that he was, by the late concluded Articles, free from ſubjection unto any Carthaginians; and therefore would not come. Hannibal thereupon haſted himſelf towards Capua; forbearing to attempt any further upon Naples, which he thought to have taken in his way by Scalado, but found the walls too high, and was not well provided to lay ſiege unto it. At Capua he was entertained with great ſolemnity and pomp: all the people iſſuing forth of the Town, to behold the great Commander, which had won ſo many noble victories. Having taken his pleaſure in the ſight of that goodly City, and paſſed over his firſt entertainments, he came into their Senate, where he commended their reſolution, in ſhaking off the Roman yoke; promiſing, that ere long all Italy and Rome it ſelf, ſhould be driven to acknowledge Capua as chief, and receive Law from thence. As for Decius Magius, who openly took part with the Romans their enemies; he prayed them, that they would not uſe him as a Campan, but a Traitor to the State, and uſe him accordingly, giving ſentence out of hand upon him, as he deſerved. This was granted: and Magius delivered unto Hannibal; who unwilling to offend the Capuans, at his firſt coming, by putting ſo geeat a man to death, yet fearing that they might ſue for his liberty, if he kept him alive, thought it beſt to ſend him away to Carthage. Thus Hannibal ſetled his friendſhip with the Campanes: among whom, only this Decius Magius had openly dared to ſpeak againſt him; being aſſiſted by Perolla the Son of Pacuvius. This Perolla would have murdered Hannibal, whileſt he was at ſupper, the firſt night of his coming, had not his Fathers authority kept him from attempting any ſuch attempt. All the Town (beſides) were ſo earneſt in the love of their new Society, that they are ſaid to have murdered all the Romans, upon whom at the preſent present they could lay hand; or (which is all one) to have smothered them to death in an hot Bath.

The same course of fortune, with those of Capua, ran some other Towns thereabouts which dependeth on this, as their Mother-City. Nola, Nuceria, Naples, Casiline, and Acerræ, were the Cities next adjoyning, that stood out for the Romans. Against these Hannibal went, thinking to find them weakly manned; as they were indeed, though stoutly defended.

The Romans at this time were not in case, to put Garrisons into all their walled Towns; but were fain to leave all places, except a few of the most suspected, unto the faith and courage of the inhabitants. Rome it self was in extream fear of Hannibals coming, at the first report of the overthrow at Cannæ: and the grief of that loss was so general, and immoderate, that it much disturbed the provision against apparent danger. It was hard to judge, whether the loss already received, or the fear of destruction presently threatning, were the more terrible. All the Senators found work enough, to stint the noise and lamentable bewailings, whereof the streets were full. Courrers were sent forth, to bring assured tidings how all went: whereof when Letters from the Consul Varro had throughly informed them, they were so amazed, that they ran into barbarous superstition; and taking direction (as was said) from their fatal books, buried alive two men and women, Gaules and Greeks, in their Oxe-market. If the books of Sibyl gave them such instructions; we may justly think that Sibyl her self was instructed by the Devil. Yet it is not improbable, that extremity of fear caused them to hearken to wicked South-sayers; whose detestable counsels they afterwards for their own honour (as ashamed of such Authors) imputed to the books of Sibyl. An Embassador was sent to Delphi, to consult with the oracle of Apollo; and enquire with what prayers and supplications they might pacifie the gods, and obtain an end of these calamities. This is enough to discover the greatness of their fear; though not serving to give remedy. At that time came Letters out of Sicil, from the Prætor of Otacilius; whom the Senate had appointed, if he found it meet, to pass over into Africk. In these were contained news of one Carthaginian fleet that wasted the kingdome of Hieron their good friend and confederate; and of another fleet, riding among the Isles Ægatcis, which was in readiness to set upon Lilybæum, and the rest of the Roman Province, if the Prætor stirred aside to the rescue of Hieron.

In the midst of these extremities, it was thought needful to call home Terentius the Consul, that he might name a Dictator, to take soverain charge of the Weal-publick, with absolute power, as necessity required. It must needs seem strange, that all sorts of people went forth to meet the Consul, and bid him welcome home, giving him thanks for that he had not despaired of the Weal-publick. But this was done (as may seem) by order from the Senate: which therein (doubtless) provided wisely for upholding the general reputation. If this coming into the City had renewed the lamentations and outcries of the people: what else would have followed, than a contempt of their wretchedness, among those that were subject unto their Dominion? Now in finding this occasion (though indeed he gave it not) of bestowing upon him their welcome, and thanks; they noised abroad a fame, which came perhaps unto the ears of Hannibal, of their Magnanimity and Confidence: that might seem grounded on their remaining strength. This therefore was wisely done. But whereas Livie would have us think, that it was done generously, and out of great spirit; let me be pardoned, if I believe him not. It was done fearfully, and to cover their grief: had they dared to shew their indignation, they would have struck off his head; as in few years after, Cn. Fulvius had his life brought into question, and was banished by them, being less blame-worthy, for a smaller offence. M. Junius, by appointment of the Senate, was nominated Dictator; and T. Sempronius, Master of the horse. These fell presently to mustering of Souldiers, of whom they raised four new Legions, and one thousand horse: though with much difficulty; as being fain to take up some that were very boyes. These four Legions are elsewhere forgotten in account of the forces levied by this Dictator; and two Legions only set down, that had been enrolled in the beginning of the year for the custody of the City. So it may be, that these two Legions being drawn into the field; four new ones of Prætextati, or striplings were left in their places. In such raw Souldiers, and so few, little confidence was to be reposed; for which reason they increased their number, by adding unto them eight thousand sturdy slaves, that were put in hope of liberty, if they should deserve it by manfull service. This not sufficing, the Dictator proclaimed, that whosoever ought mony and could not pay it, or had committed any capital offence, offence, ſhould forthwith be diſcharged of his debt or puniſhment, if he would ſerve in the War. To arm theſe Companies, they were fain to take down out of their Temples and Porches, the ſpoils of their enemies that had been there ſet up: among which, were 6000. Armours of the Gaules, that had been carried in the Triumph of C. Flaminius, a little before the beginning of this War. To ſuch mockery had God brought the pride of the Romans, as a due reward of their inſolent oppreſſions, that they were fain to iſſue forth of their own gates, in the habit of ſtrangers, when Hannibal was ready to encounter them with his Africans, armed Roman-like.

About the ſame time it was that Carthalo with the Agents of the priſoners taken at Cannæ, came to Rome. Carthalo was not admitted into the City, but commanded, whilſt he was on the way, to be gone ere night out of the Roman Territory. To the meſſengers of the captives audience was given by the Senate. They made earneſt Petition to be ranſomed at the publick charge; not only the tears and lamentation of their poor kinſfolk but the great need, wherein the City then ſtood, of able Souldiers, commending their ſuit; which yet they obtained not. Beſides the general cuſtom of the Romans (held by long Tradition, and ſtrengthened by a notable Precedent, when Regulus was overthrown, and taken priſoner in the former War) not to be too tender of ſuch as had yielded to the enemy, much was alleadged againſt thoſe who now craved ranſome: but the ſpecial point was, that they were wilfully loſt, ſince they might have ſaved themſelves, as others did. It ſufficed not unto theſe poor men, to ſay, that their offence was no greater than the Conſuls; they were told, that this was great preſumption. The truth was, the State wanted money; and therefore could not want excuſes; whereby to avoid the diſburſement: whether it were ſo, or not, that any ſuch Plea was held about this matter of redemption, as we find recorded. Neither muſt we regard it, that the ſlaves which were armed for the war, are ſaid to have coſt more, than the ſumm did amount unto, that would have ranſomed theſe priſoners. For this is but a tale, deviſed to countenance the Roman proceedings, as if they had been ſevere; when as indeed they were ſuitable to the preſent fortune, poor and ſomewhat beggarly. Hereof it is no little proof, That Hannibal valued thoſe Roman ſlaves, whom he had taken in the Camp among their Maſters, at no more, than every one the third part of a common Souldiers ranſome: and likely it is, that he offered them at the price, whereat he thought them current. But if we ſhould ſuppoſe, that by trading with Hannibal, a better bargain for ſlaves might have been made, than was by the State at home, in dealing with private men; yet muſt we withall conſider, that theſe private men did only lend theſe ſlaves for a while unto the Common-wealth, and were afterwards contented to forbear the price of them (when by order of the Senate they were enfranchiſed) untill the war ſhould be ended. If Hannibal would have given ſuch long day of payment, it is likely that the Romans would have been his Chapmen: but, ſeeing he dealt only for ready money, they choſe rather to ſay, We will not give, than, We cannot. The like auſterity, upon the ſame reaſon, but contrary pretence, was uſed toward the Souldiers that eſcaped from that great battel. Theſe were charged for having fled: as the priſoners were, for not flying, when they might have done ſo. True it is, that in ſuch caſes (if ever) that which they call Raggione del Stato, may ſerve for an excuſe: when the Common-wealth, being driven to a miſerable exigent, is fain to help it ſelf, by doing injuries to private men. And ſo dealt the Romans now: condemning all thoſe that had ſerved at Cannæ, to be tranſported into Sicil; and there to ſerve, not as others did, untill they had fulfilled twenty years in the Wars, or elſe were fifty years of age, but untill this War ſhould be ended, how long ſoever it laſted, and that without reward. The ſame thrifty cenſure was afterwards laid upon others, for their miſ-behaviour: but never upon any man of quality, ſave only (a good while after this, at better leiſure) upon Cecilius Metellus, and a few other hare-brain'd fools his companions; who, being frighted out of their wits, with the terrour of ſo great a loſs, were deviſing, after the battel, which way to run out of Italy, when Hannibal as yet had ſcarce one Town within it. The inequality of this rigour grew ſhortly diſtaſteful to the Commonalty: and was openly blamed by a Tribune of the people; nevertheleſs it was quietly digeſted, Liv. lib. 24. the excuſe being no leſs apparent than the fault.

M. Junius the Dictator, having diſpatched all needfull buſineſs within the City, took the field with five and twenty thouſand men. What he did with this Army, I cannot find: nor more of him than this, That he ſpent the time about Campania; where (as may be presumed) he was not idle. To him therefore perhaps it may be ascribed, that Hannibal did no greater evil: for of any evil done to Hannibal, by the Romans, in this their weak estate, only Marcellus had the honour. Marcellus, being then one of the Prætors, lay at Ostia, with a Fleet ready to set sail for Sicil, having one Legion aboord his ships; and fifteen hundred other Souldiers newly taken up: with which forces he was to defend that Island, and do what harm he could in Africk. But hearing of the overthrow at Cannæ, he sent these of his new Levy to Rome, for defence of the City; and marched hastily with his Legion toward Canusium: delivering the Fleet, empty of Souldiers, to P. Furius his Colleague. Thence was he called by the Magistrates and chief Citizens of Nola, to help them: who were like to be forced by the multitude (affected, as were the rest of the Campanes) to let in the Carthaginian; and knew not how to avoid this otherwise, than by seeming to deliberate about the articles of this new confederacy. Wherefore he made great journeys thitherward; and arrived even time enough to prevent the Enemy. Many idle walks Hannibal made betwixt Nola and Naples: assaying by fair words and terrible threats the one and the other City. Naples was strong, and not infected with any the least touch of disloyalty: had also a sure Haven, whereby it stood in the less fear of sustaining much inconvenience, by spoil of the Lands and Villages abroad in the Countrey. But at Nola it was thought a valuable consideration, That Hannibal was Master of the field: which if he laid waste, all the poor people were utterly undone. So thought the Multitude: and such talk used some, that had little fear of their own private want or poverty, but a great desire to gratifie the Carthaginian. Of these, one L. Bantius was chief; a stout young Gentleman, and Souldier of especial mark, well beloved in the City, and one that had done good service to the Romans; but was found by Hannibal half dead at Cannæ; and after much gentle usage, good attendance, and cure of his wounds, friendly dismissed with liberal gifts. He therefore thought, that it concerned him in honour, to return the greatest thanks he could unto so courteous an enemy. Marcellus perceiving this, wrought upon the same easie nature of the Gentleman: and taking notice of him, as if it had been by chance, seemed to wonder, why one that had so well deserved of the Roman State, had not repaired unto him the Prætor, who desired nothing more than such acquaintance. So with many commendations, gifts, and loving entertainment, being himself also a man highly reputed for his personal valour, he made this Bantius so far in love with him, that no thing could be attempted within Nola, against the Romans, whereof he had not presently advertisement. At the coming of Marcellus, Hannibal removed from about Nola; and assayed, as formerly he had done, the Neapolitans: but they had lately taken in a Roman Garrison; upon confidence whereof they gave him a peremptory answer, to his discontent. Thence went he to Nuceria, which he took by composition; and so returned back again to Nola. He was not ignorant, what good affection the common people of Nola bore unto him: who although they durst not stir in his quarrel, being over-awed by the Roman Garrison; yet if they saw Marcellus hardly bestead, and forced to turn his care from watching them within, to repelling the enemies assailing him without, like enough it seemed, that they would not be wanting unto the accomplishment of their own desires. He therefore brought his Army close to the Town, and skirmished often with Marcellus: not in hope thereby to do much good, but only to make shew of a meaning to force the Town; which he sought in the mean while to take by intelligence. In the night time there passed messages between him and the Citizens his partakers: whereby it was concluded, That if once Marcellus, with all his forces, could be trained into the field, the multitude within the Town should presently rise; and seizing upon the gates, exclude him as an Enemy. Of this Negotiation Marcellus was advertised: and fearing lest the Conspirators would shortly adventure, even to find him busied within the City, whilest the Carthaginians should scale the walls; he thought it the surest way, to cut off the Enemies hope, and send him away betimes. Wherefore ordering his men in three companies, within three several gates, looking towards the enemy: he gave a straight command, that all the Citizens should keep their houses. Thus he lay close a good part of the day, to the enemies great wonder, against whom he had customarily issued forth before more early, every day, to skirmish. But when it was further noted, that the walls were bare, and not a man appearing on them;

them; then thought Hannibal, that ſurely all was diſcovered, and Marcellus now buſied with the Citizens. Whereupon he bad his men bring ladders, and make ready for the aſſault: which was done in all haſte. But when the Carthaginians were at the very wals, and thought nothing leſs, than that the Romans would meet them in the field: ſuddenly the middle gate was opened, whereat Marcellus, with the beſt and oldeſt of his Souldiers, brake forth upon them, with a great noiſe, to make his unexpected ſally the more terrible. Whileſt the Carthaginians, much out of order, were ſome of them flying before Marcellus, the reſt making head againſt him: the other two gates opened, whereat in like ſort iſſued they of the new levied Companies, upon the enemies backs. The ſudden terrour was more available unto the Romans, than their force; yet the Execution was ſo great, that this was accounted as a victory, and reputed one of the braveſt Acts performed in all that War, foraſmuch as hereby it was firſt proved, that Hannibal might be overcome. After this, Marcellus being freed from his enemies that were departed, took a ſtrict account of the Citizens of Nola; condemning above threeſcore and ten of high Treaſon, whoſe heads he ſtruck off; and ſo leaving the Town in quiet obedience unto their Senate, went and incamped hard by about Sueſſula. Hannibal in the mean ſeaſon was gone to Acerræ: where being excluded, he thought it no wiſdom to loſe time in perſwaſions, but laid ſiege unto it, and began on all ſides to cloſe it up. This terrified the People, who knew themſelves unable to hold out. Therefore before his Works were finiſhed, and they quite ſurrounded; they ſtole out by night, and left him the Town empty: which he ſacked and burnt. Then hearing news of the Dictator, that he was about Caſiline, thither went Hannibal; as being unwilling that an enemy ſo near ſhould diſquiet him at Capua; where he meant to Winter. It ſeems, or rather indeed it is plain, that the late victory of Marcellus had nothing abated the ſpirit of the Carthaginian: who durſt with a ſmall part of his Army ſeek out the Dictator, that had with him the heart of the Roman ſtrength. Wherefore the joy of his Enemies, upon ſo ſlight an occaſion as the death of ſome two thouſand of his men, at the moſt, and thoſe not ſlain in plain battel, but by a ſudden eruption; witneſſeth chiefly, in what great fear they ſtood of Hannibal, and how Creſt-fallen they were: that having three years ſince demanded at Carthage the body of Hannibal, to be delivered unto their pleaſure, by his own Citizens; could now pleaſe themſelves, as with good news, to hear, That in a ſkirmiſh not far from Rome, he appeared to be a man, and not reſiſtleſs. At Caſilinum the Dictator was not: but many Companies of Italians, Confederates of Rome, were gotten into the Town, and held it. Five hundred of the Præneſtines there were, and about four hundred of Peruſia, with ſome of the Latines. All theſe had the good hap, to come too late to the battel at Cannæ, being ſent by their ſeveral States to the Camp: whither whileſt they were marching, the tidings of that great misfortune encountred them, and ſent them back ſorrowfull; for they loved well their Lords the Romans, under whoſe government they lived happily. So came they all, one after another to Caſiline, where they met and ſtayed. Neither had they ſtayed there long, ere they heard news from Capua, How that great City became the Ring-leader of all the Campanes into rebellion. The people of Caſiline were affected as they of Capua: and therefore ſought how to rid their hands of thoſe Præneſtines and their fellows; but the Souldiers were too hard for them, and after many trains laid one for another, at laſt they ſlew all the Townſmen in a night, and fortified the Weſtern part of the Town (for it was divided by the River Vulturnus) againſt the Enemy. If they had run away with the goods, and pretended, that theſe of Caſiline were as the reſt of the Campanes, all Traitors; they themſelves might have been reputed, as no better than the Mamertines. But their conſtancy in defence of the place witneſſeth, upon what honeſt reaſons they ſurpriſed it. Hannibal came thither, thinking to have encountred with greater forces: but theſe few found him more work than he expected. Divers aſſaults he gave, but was ſtill repelled with loſs: and many ſallies they made, with variable event. The Enemy mined; and they countermined: oppoſing ſo much induſtry to his force, that he was driven to cloſe them up, and ſeek to win them by famine. T. Sempronius Gracchus, that was Maſter of the Horſe, lay with the Roman Army higher up the River: who fain would have relieved Caſiline, but that the Dictator being gone to Rome about ſome matters of Religion, had given him an expreſs charge not to fight till his return. Marcellus from Sueſſula could not come: his way being ſtopped by the overflowings of Vulturnus; the Nolans alſo beſeeching him not to leave them, who were in danger of the Campanes, if he departed. Thus it is reported: but if the water ſtayed his journey, ſuch intreaties were needleſs. Neither is it like that the Dictator tarried at Rome ſo long, as till extrem famine had conſumed the Garriſon in Caſiline. Wherefore it may be thought, that the Town was loſt, becauſe the Romans durſt not adventure to raiſe the ſiege. Barrels of Corn were ſent by night, floting down the River; and when ſome of theſe, being carried awry by an Eddie of water, ſtuck among the Willows on the bank, whereby this manner of relief was diſcovered and prevented; Gracchus caſt a great quantity of Nuts into the ſtream, which faintly ſuſtained the poor beſieged men. At length when all food was ſpent, and whatſoever grew green under the Walls was gathered for Sallets, the Carthaginians ploughed up the ground; whereon the beſieged preſently ſowed Rape-ſeed. Hannibal ſeeing this, admired their patience; and ſaid, That he meant not to ſtay at Caſiline untill the Rapes were grown. Wherefore though hitherto he had refuſed to hearken unto any Compoſition, as intending to make them an example to all others, by puniſhing their obſtinacy; yet now he was content, to grant them their lives at an indifferent ranſome; which when they had paid, he quietly diſmiſſed them, according to his promiſe. Seven hundred Carthaginians he placed in Caſiline, as a Garriſon for defence of the Campanes; unto whom he reſtored it. To the Prænestine Souldiers great thanks were given, and loving rewards; among which they had offer, in regard of their vertue, to be made Citizens of Rome. But their preſent condition pleaſed them ſo well, that they choſe rather to continue, as they were in Prænestе: which is no weak proof, of the good eſtate wherein the Cities flouriſhed, that were ſubject to the Roman Government. This ſiege of Caſiline was not a little beneficial to the Romans; as having long detained Hannibal, and conſumed much of his time, that might otherwiſe have been better ſpent. For winter overtook him long before he could diſpatch the buſineſs: which how to quit with his honour he knew not, when he was once engaged. Therefore he wintered at Capua: where he refreſhed his Army, or rather corrupted it, as all Hiſtorians report, and made it effeminate; though effeminate as it was, He therewithall did often beat the Romans in following times, as ſhall appear hereafter.

Of the great ſupply that was decreed at Carthage, to be ſent to Hannibal into Italy. How by the malice of Hanno, and ſloth or parſimony of the Carthaginians, the ſupply was too long deferred. That the riches of the Carthaginians grew faſter, than of the Romans. Of Fabius and other old Romans Hiſtorians, how partial they were in their writings.

WHen Mago, the ſon of Amilcar had ſpent ſome time about the taking in ſuch Italians, as fell from the Romans after the battel at Cannæ; his brother Hannibal ſent for him to Capua, and thence diſpatched him away to Carthage, with the joyfull meſſage of Victory. He told the Carthaginian Senate with how many Roman Generals his brother had fought, what Conſuls he had chaſed, wounded or ſlain; how the ſtout Romans, that in the former war never ſhunned any occaſion of fight, were now grown ſo calm, that they thought their Dictator Fabius the only good Captain, becauſe he never durſt adventure to come to battel; That not without reaſon their ſpirits were thus abated, ſince Hannibal had ſlain of them above two hundred thouſand, and taken above fifty thouſand priſoners. He further told them of the Brutians, Apulians, Samnites, Lucans, and other people of Italy, that followed the fortune of thoſe great victories, had revolted unto the Carthaginians. Among the reſt he magnified Capua, as a goodly City, and fit to be not only (as already it was) Head of all the Capuans, but the chief ſeat of their Dominion in Italy: and there he informed them, how lovingly his brother had been entertained, where he meant to reſt that winter attending their ſupply. As for the war, He ſaid it was even at an end, if they would now purſue it cloſely, and not give the Romans any breathing time, wherein to re-collect themſelves, and repair their broken forces. He willed them to conſider, that the war far from home, in the Enemies Countrey: that ſo many battels had much diminiſhed his brothers Army: that the Souldiers, who had ſo well deſerved, ought to be conſidered with liberal rewards; and that it was not good to burden their new Italian friends, with exactions of money, corn, and other neceſſaries; but that theſe things muſt be ſent from Carthage; which the victory would requite with large amends. Finally, he cauſed the golden rings, taken from the fingers of the Roman Knights that were ſlain, to be poured out openly in the Court: which being measured, filled (as some say) three bushels; or (as others would rather have it) no more than one; adding, that by this might appear the greatness of the Roman calamity, forasmuch as none but the principal of that order, were accustomed to wear that ornament.

Who so considers the former Punick War, may easily find, that the State of Carthage never did receive, in all the durance thereof, any such hopefull advertisements from their Captains abroad. Wherefore it is no marvel, if the errand of Mago found extraordinary welcome. In the vehemency of this joy, Himilco, a Senator adverse to the faction of Hanno, is said to have demanded of that great perswader unto peace with Rome, Whether he were still of opinion, that Hannibal should be yielded up unto the Romans; or whether he would forbid them to give thanks unto the gods, for this their good success. Hereunto though it be not likely that Hanno made the same formal answer, which Livie puts into his mouth, calling the Carthaginian Senators Patres Conscripti, by a term proper to the Romans; and putting them in mind of his own shamefull overthrow received at the Islands Ægateis: yet the sum of his speech appears to have been no less malicious than is set down, forasmuch as Hannibal himself, at his departure out of Italy, exclaimed against the wickedness of this Hanno; saying, that his hatred against the Barchines, had oppressed their Family, when otherwise it could not, with the ruine of Carthage. Therefore it may well be, that he made such a jest of these victories, as is reported; saying, it ill beseemed him, who had vanquished the Romans to call for more help as if he had been beaten; or him, that had taken their Camp, filled forsooth with spoil, to make request for meat and money. To these cavils, if answer were needfull, it might be said, That other booty than of horses and slaves, little was to be found in the Roman Camp: the best of the Souldiers carrying no other wealth into the field, than a few * silver studs in the bridles and trappings of their horses. If Hannibal had taken any main convoy of money and provisions, going to supply all wants of a great Army in some other Province, (as the two Scipio's are afterwards said to have done, when they wan the Camp of Asdrubal, that carryed along with him all the wealth of Spain, in his journey towards Italy) then might such an objection more justly have been made unto his demand of a supply. But the most likely part of Hanno his Oration, and wherein he best might hope to prevail, contained a perswasion to use their fortune with moderation; and now to seek peace, whilest they had so much the better in war.

What would have been the issue of this counsel, if it had been followed, it were not easie to say. For though it be likely, that the Roman pride would have brooked much indignity, in freeing Italy from the danger of war; yet it is not likely that the faith, so often broken to the Carthaginians in former times, would have been kept entire, when any opinion of good advantage had called for revenge of so many shameful overthrows; since after this war ended, and a new league concluded, no submissive behaviour could preserve Carthage from ruine, longer, than untill such time as Rome was at leisure from all other wars. This counsel therefore of Hanno, though it might seem temperate, was indeed very pestilent; and served only to hinder the performance of a noble resolution. For it was concluded by a main consent of the Senate, that forty thousand Numidians, forty Elephants, and great abundance of silver, should be sent over to Hannibal: and that, besides these, twenty thousand foot, and four thousand horse, should be levied in Spain; not only to supply, as need should require, the Armies in their Province, but to be transported into Italy.

This great Aid, had it been as carefully sent, as it was readily decreed; the Roman Historians would not have found cause, to tax the retchless improvidence of Hannibal, in forbearing to march directly from Cannæ to Rome, or in refreshing his Army among the delights of Capua: the next years work would have finished the business, with less dangerous adventure; and the pleasures, which his men enjoyed among the Campanes, would have been commended, as rewards by him well thought upon, wherewith to animate both them and others, that were to be imployed in the following War. But either the too much carelessness of those, that were loth to make haste in laying out their money, before extreme necessity required it; or the crafty malice of Hanno, and his fellows, working upon the private humours of men, that had more feeling of their own commodity, than sense of the publick need; utterly perverted, and made unprofitable in the performance, the order that had been so well set down. The * Elephants were sent: and some money peradventure, uncertain it is how long after. But those great forces of threescore thousand foot, and four thousand horse, came not into Italy, till much was lost of that which already had been gotten, and a great part of the old Carthaginian Army, was first consumed by time, and sundry accidents of war. Only some small numbers, no way answering unto the proportion decreed, were sent into Spain; and the journey of Asdrubal thence through France into Italy much talked of, but he not enabled thereunto, till many years were past, and the Romans had recovered their strength.

Here we may note, what great riches the Carthaginians drew into their City, both by the Tributes received from their subjects, and by their wealthy Trade of Merchandize. For it is not long, since the War of the Mercenaries, and the perfidious tyranny of the Romans, extorting in time of greatest necessity twelve hundred talents; had exceedingly impoverished Carthage: which was before brought into great want, even by the expence of so much money, as was to be disbursed for redeeming of peace, after the loss of Ægates. Yet we see, what great Armies of Numidians, and Spaniards, besides those already on foot, are appointed to the service in Italy, and how little the Carthaginians fear the want of money in these chargeable undertakings: whereas the Romans on the other side, having three or four years together been forced to some extraordinary cost, are fain to go upon credit; even for the price of those slaves, which they bought of their own Citizens to arm for their defence. Such advantage in means to enrich their Treasury, had the wealthy Merchants of Carthage, trading in all parts of the Mediterranean Sea, even from Tyrus their Mother-City in the bottom of the straights unto the great Ocean, above the Romans: who lived on the fruits of their ground, and received their Tributes from people following the same course of life. When the time therefore was come, that the hatred of Rome found leisure to shew it self, in the destruction of Carthage; the impudence of Roman falshood, in seeking an honest colour wherewith to shadow the intended breach of Faith, discovered plainly whence the jealousie was bred, that this mighty City would again rebell. For the Carthaginians, having given up hostages, even before the Roman Army did set forth, to perform whatsoever should be enjoyned them, with condition, that their City might not be destroyed; and having accordingly, when they were so required, yielded up all their weapons, and engines of War; the Romans told them plainly, That the City of Carthage, which was the body of the Citizens, should be friendly dealt withall, but the Town must needs be demolished, and removed into some other place, that should be twelve miles distant from the Sea. For (said the Romans) This Trade of Merchandise, by which ye now live, is not fit for peaceable men, such as ye promise to become hereafter, as is the Trade of Husbandry; an wholesome kinde of life, and enduing men with many laudable qualities which enable their bodies, and make them very apt for conversation. This villanous dealing of the Romans, though sugred with glosing words, plainly shews, what good observation the elder Cato had made of the hasty growth of Carthage in riches. For, when being demanded his opinion in the Senate about any matter whatsoever it were, he added still this conclusion, Thus I think, and that Carthage should be destroyed; He may seem, not only to have had regard unto that present wealth, which at his being there he had found in the City, but much more unto these times, and the great height whereunto it rose, even suddenly as we see, out of many calamities, whilest the Romans thought, that it had not been in case to dare so terrible a War.

But as the Carthaginians, in gathering wealth, were more industrious and skilfull than the Romans; so came they far short of them in the honourable care of the publick good: having every one, or most of them, a more principal regard of his own private benefit. This made them (besides the negligence commonly found in victors) when the first heat of their affection (wherein they concluded to pursue the war strongly) was over-past, go more leisurely to work, than had been requisite in the execution. It was easie for Hanno to perswade covetous men, that they should first of all defend their own in Spain. This might be done with little charges. Afterwards, when that Province was secured, they might send an Army into Italy; so going to work orderly by degrees. For it were no wisdom to commit all the strength of the Common-wealth to one hazard of fortune, against the enemies, or (which perhaps were worse) to the government of an ambitious man, and his brethren; who having once (if they could so do) finished the war, might easily make * Hannibal a King, and subdue Carthage, with the forces that they had given him to the conquest of Rome.

By such malicious working of Hanno, and by their own slackness, incredulity, dull-

* Of such ambition Hanno directly accused Hannibal, saying, that he made war that so he might [illegible] compassed with Legions, as knowing no other way to make himself a King.

neſs, or niggardize, the Carthaginians were perſwaded rather to make ſmall diſburſments in Spain, than to ſet up all their reſt at once in Italy. Yet was it indeed impoſſible to hold a Countrey of ſo large extent, and ſo open a coaſt as that of Spain, free from all incurſion of the Enemy: eſpecially the affection of the Naturals being (as in a new conqueſt) ill eſtabliſhed. A better way therefore it had been, to make a running War, by which the Romans might have been found occupied, even with the ordinary Carthaginian Garriſons or ſome little addition thereunto. For if it were thought meet, to defer the proſecution of their main intendment againſt Rome it ſelf, untill ſuch time as every little thorn were pulled out of the ſides of ſo great a Province, then muſt Emporiæ have been beſieged and forced: which, by reaſon of alliance with the Maſſilians, gave unto the Romans, at all times when they pleaſed, a ready and ſecure Harbour. But the Town of Emporiæ, was too ſtrong to be won in haſte: it had long defended it ſelf againſt the Barbarians; having not above four hundred paces of wall to the main Land, and exceedingly well fortified: a great Spaniſh Town of the ſame name, lying without it, that was three miles in compaſs, very ſtrong likewiſe, and friend unto the Græcians, though not over much truſted. Wherefore to force this Town of Emporiæ, that was, beſides the proper ſtrength, like to be ſo well aſſiſted by the Maſſilians, Romans, and ſome Spaniards, would have been a work of little leſs difficulty, than was the Romans war (in appearance) after the battel at Cannæ: yea, it had been in effect none other, than to alter the ſeat of the war; which Hannibal had already fixed, with better judgement, near unto the gates of Rome. The difficulty of this attempt, being ſuch as cauſed it altogether to be forborn; great folly it was to be much troubled about expelling the Romans utterly out of Spain: whom they might more eaſily have diverted thence, and drawn home to their own doors, by making ſtrong war upon their City. For even ſo the Romans afterwards removed Hannibal into Africk, by ſending an Army to Carthage; and by takeing the like courſe, they now endeavoured to change the ſeat of the war transferring it out of Italy into Spain. But the private affections of men, regarding the common good no otherwiſe, than as it is acceſſary to their own purpoſes, did make them eaſily wink at opportunities, and hope that ſomewhat would fall out well of it ſelf, though they ſet not to their helping hands. Hanno was a malicious wretch: yet they that thought him ſo, were well enough contented to hearken unto his diſcourſes, as long as they were plauſible, and tended to keep the purſe full. In the mean while they ſuffered Hannibal, and all the noble houſe of Amilcar, to weary themſelves in travel for the Common-wealth: which all Carthage in general highly commended, but weakly aſſiſted; as if the induſtry of theſe Barchines had been ſomewhat more than needful. Surely the Carthaginians, in general, were far leſs honourable than the people of Rome: not only in government of their ſubject Provinces, but in adminiſtration of their own eſtate; few of them preferring the reſpect of the Weal-publick above their private intereſt. But as they thrived little in the end, by their parſimony uſed toward their own Mercenaries, when the former Roman war was finiſhed: ſo the concluſion of this war preſent, will make them complain, with feeling ſighs, of their negligence in ſupplying Hannibal, after the victory at Cannæ; when gladly they would give all their Treaſures, to redeem the opportunity, that now they let paſs, as if it were coſt enough to ſend a few handfuls into Spain.

That both the Spaniſh buſineſs, and the ſtate of Africk it ſelf, depended wholly, or for the moſt part, upon ſucceſs of things in Italy, the courſe of actions following will make manifeſt. Particularly, how matters were ordered in Spain by the Carthaginian Governours, it is very hard and almoſt impoſſible to ſet down. For, though we muſt not reprehend, in that worthy Hiſtorian Livy, the tender love of his own Countrey, which made him give credit unto Fabius and others; yet muſt we not, for his ſake, believe thoſe lyes, which the unpartial judgement of Polybius hath condemned, in the Writers that gave them original. It were needleſs to rehearſe all that may be found in Polybius, concerning the untruth of that Roman Hiſtorian Fabius. One example may ſuffice. He ſaith of Amilcar and his men at Eryx, in the former war, That, having clean ſpent their ſtrength, and being even broken with many miſeries, they were glad to ſubmit themſelves unto the Romans. Contrary hereunto we find in the life of Amilcar, ſet down by Æmilius Probus, That Eryx was in ſuch ſort held by the Carthaginians, that it ſeemed to be in as good condition, as if in thoſe parts there had not been any war. Theſe words, being referred to the brave reſolution of the Carthaginian ſouldiers, and the ſingular vertue of their General, infuſing ſuch ſpirit into them, may be taken as not over liberal. For in the treaty of peace between Amilcar and Catulus, when the Roman first of all required, that this Garrison of Eryx should lay down their arms and forsake Sicil, threatning, that otherwise he would not talk of any composition: Amilcar boldly bade him chuse, whether he would talk of it or no; for that the Arms which his Countrey had put into his hands to use against her enemies, it was not his purpose to yield up unto them. Now since the Romans, contrary to their custom upon like advantages, were content to let Amilcar have his will, and not to stand with him upon point of honour, whilest otherwise they might quietly rid their hands of him; plain enough it is, that they were far from thinking him a man consumed with miseries, as Fabius would have him seem. Hereunto agrees the relation of Polybius: who flatly, and by name, chargeth Fabius with untruth; saying, That howsoever Amilcar and his Souldiers had endured all extremity, yet they behaved themselves as men that had no sense thereof; and were as far from being either vanquished or tyred, as were their Enemies. Such being the difference between Fabius (as also perhaps between other old Writers of the Roman story) and those that had more regard of truth, than of flattering the mighty City of Rome: we must take it in good part, that howsoever Livie introduceth Hanno, in one place, joyning very foolishly his own shameful overthrow at the Islands * Ægateis, with the great services of Amilcar at Eryx, as if both of them had had a like event; yet † elsewhere he forbeareth not to put a more likely tale (though with as impudent a commemoration of his own unhappy conduct) into the same Hanno his mouth, making him say, That the affairs of Carthage went never better, than a little before the loss of their Fleet in that battel at Sea; wherein himself was General. Now, concerning the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, there is cause to wish, that this Fabius, with Val. Antias, and others of the like stamp, had either written (if they could not write more temperately) nothing at all; or that the tender affection of Livie to his Rome, had not caused him to think too well of their relations; which are such as follow.

§. XI.

Strange reports of the Roman victories in Spain, before Asdrubal the Son of Amilcar followed thence his Brother Hannibal into Italy.

IT hath been shewed already, how P. Cornelius Scipio the Consul returning from Gaul into Italy, to encounter with Hannibal at his descent from the Alps, sent before him his Brother Cneus, with part of his Fleet and Army, into Spain. Two Roman Legions, with fourteen thousand foot of the Confederates, and twelve hundred horse, had been allotted unto the Consul, therewith to make war in Spain against Hannibal; who, since he was marching into Italy with the strength of his Army, P. Scipio believed, that a good part of these his own forces might well be spared from the Spanish Expedition; and therefore made bold to carry some of the number back with him, sending on his Brother with the rest, as his Lieutenant. Publius himself remained in Italy all the time of his Consulship; which being expired, he was sent Proconsul into Spain by the Senate, with an Army of eight thousand men, and a Fleet of thirty Gallies.

The Acts of these two Brethren in their Province, were very great; and, as they are reported, somewhat marvellous. For they continually prevailed in Spain against the Carthaginians; whom they vanquished in so many battels, and withdrew from their Alliance so many of the Spaniards their Confederates, that we have cause to wonder how the enemy could so often find means to repair his forces, and return strong into the field. But as the Romans, by pretending to deliver the Countrey from the tyranny of Carthage, might easily win unto their Confederacy, as many as were galled with the African yoke, and durst adventure to break it: so the ancient reputation of the first Conquerors might serve to arm the Naturals against these Invaders, and to reclaim those that had revolted unto the Romans, were it only by the memory of such ill success, as the like rebellions in former times had found. Hereto may be added the Carthaginian Treasure; which easily raised Souldiers, among those valiant (but in that Age) poor, and gold-thirsty Nations. Neither was it of small importance, that so many of the Spaniards had their children, kinsmen, and friends, abroad with Hannibal in his Italian Wars; or serving the Carthaginians in Africk. And peradventure, if we durst be bold to say it; the victories of the Scipio's were neither so many, nor so great as they are set out by Livie. This we may be bold to say, that the great Captain Fabius, or Livie in his person, maketh an objection unto Scipio, which neither Scipio, nor Livie for him, doth answer. That if Asdrubal were vanquished, as Scipio would say by him in Spain: strange it was, and as little to his honour, as it had been extreamly dangerous to Rome, that the same vanquished man should invade Italy. And it is indeed an incredible narration, That Asdrubal, being enclosed on all sides, and not knowing how to escape out of battel, save only by the steep descent of Rocks, over a great River that lay at his back, ran away with all his mony, Elephants and broken troops, over Tagus, directly towards the Pyrenees, and so toward Italy; upon which he fell with more than threescore thousand armed Souldiers. Neither do I see, how it hangs well together. That he chose a piece of ground very defensible, but most incommodious for his retrait, if he should happen to be vanquished; and yet, that he sent all his mony and Elephants away before him, as not intending to abide the enemy: Or how it could be true, that these his Elephants being so sent before, could hinder the Romans (for so have they said to have done in the last battel between him and Scipio) from breaking into his Camp. Wherefore we can no more than be sorry, that all Carthaginian records of this War, and Spanish, (if there were any) being utterly lost, we can know no more thereof, than what it hath pleased the Romans to tell us; unto whom it were no wisdom to give too much credit. in this regard, I will summarily run over the doings of the Scipio's in Spain, not greatly insisting on particulars, whereof there is no great certainty.

Cn. Cornelius landed at Emporiæ, an Haven Town, not far within the Pyrenees, retaining still the same name with little inflexion. That by the flame of his clemency he allured many Nations to become subject unto Rome, as the story begins of him, I could easily believe, if I understood by what occasion they had need to use his clemency, or he to give such famous example thereof, being a meer stranger, and having no jurisdiction in the Country. Yet it is certain, that he was a man very courteous, and one that could well insinuate himself in to the love of the Barbarians, among whom, his dexterity in practice had the better success, for that he seemed to have none other errand than setting them at liberty. This pretext availed with some: others were to be hired with mony: and some he compelled to yield by force or fear; especially when he had won a battel against Hanno. Into all Treaties of Accord, made with these people, likely it is, that he remembred to insert this Article, which the Romans in their Alliances never forgat, unless in long times past, and when they dealt with the Carthaginians, or their Superiours; Majestatem Pop. Rom. comiter conservent, which is, as Tully interprets it, That they should gently (or kindly) uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome. This was in appearance nothing troublesome; yet implied it indeed an obscure covenant of subjection. And in this respect it may be true, That the Spaniards became Ditionis Romanæ, of the Roman jurisdiction; though hereafter they will say, they had no such meaning. That part of the Country wherein Scipio landed, was newly subdued by Hannibal in his passage toward Italy; and therefore the more easily shaken out of obedience. particularly in the Bargusians; Hannibal had found at his coming among them such an apprehension of the Roman greatness, as made him suspect, that any light occasion would make them start from the Carthaginians. Wherefore he not only appointed Hanno Governour over them, as over the rest of the Province between Iberus and the Pyrenees, but made him also their Lord; that is, (as I conceive it; for I do not think he gave the Principality of their Country unto Hanno and his Heirs) he made him not only Lieutenant-general over them, in matters of War, and things concerning the holding them in obedience to Carthage; but took from them all inferiour Officers of their own, leaving them to be governed by Hanno at his discretion. These therefore had good cause to rejoyce at the coming of Scipio; with whom, others also (no doubt) found reasons to joyn, it being the custom of all conquered Nations in hatred of their present Lords, to throw themselves indiscreetly into the protection of others, that many times prove worse than the former. So were the Neapolitans, and Milanois, in the age of our Grand-fathers, weary by turns of the Spaniards and French; as more sensible still of the present evil which they felt, than regardful of the greater mischief, whereinto they ran by seeking to avoid it. This bad affection of this Province, would not suffer Hanno to temporize. Ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, Hannibal had left unto him: besides which, it is like, that some forces he was able to raise out of his Province. Therefore he adventured a battel with Scipio, wherein he was overthrown and taken. Following this victory, Scipio besieged Stissum, a Town hard by, and won it. But Asdrubal having passed Iberus, and coming too late to the relief of Hanno, with eight thousand foot, and a thousand horse, fell upon the Roman Sea-forces, that lay not far from Tarracon, whom he found careless, as after a victory, roaving abroad in the Country; and with great slaughter drave them aboard their ships. This done, he ran up into the Country, where he withdrew the Ilergetes from the Roman party, though they had given Hostages to Scipio. Scipio in the mean season was gone to visit and aid his Fleet; where having set things in order, he returned back, and made toward Asdrubal; who durst not abide his coming, but withdrew himself again over Iberus. So the Ilergetes were compelled by force, having lost Athanagia their chief City, to pay a fine to the Romans, and increase the number of their Hostages. The Ausetani likewise, Confederates of the Carthaginians, were besieged in their chief Town; which they defended thirty dayes; hoping, in vain, that the sharp Winter, and great abundance of Snow that fell, would have made the Romans to dislodge. But they were fain at length to yield; and for this their obstinacy, they were amerced twenty talents of silver. During the siege, the Lacetani came to help their distressed neighbours; and were beaten home by Scipio, leaving twelve thousand of their Company dead behind them. I cannot but wonder how these Lacetani, that are said to be the first which embraced the friendship of Scipio, should, without any cause remembred, become Carthaginian on the sudden, in the next news that we hear of them. As also it is strange, that all the Sea-coast Northward of Iberus, having lately become voluntarily ditionis Romanæ, subject unto Rome, should, in continuance of the Story, after a few lines, hold war against Scipio, without any resistance of the Carthaginians. Neither can I believe, that Asdrubal, as it were by a charm, stirred up the Ilergetes, making them lay aside all care of their Hostages, and take Arms in his quarrel; whilst himself had not the daring to stand against Scipio, but ran away, and saved himself beyond Iberus. Philinus perhaps, or some Carthaginian Writer, would have told it thus: That Scipio adventuring too far into the Country, was beaten by Asdrubal back to his ships, whence he durst not stir until Winter came on: at what time the Carthaginian returned into the heart of his Province, leaving some few Garrisons to defend those places, that after Scipio won, by returning upon them, unlooked for through a deep Snow. As for the Lacetani, Ilergetes, and the rest, we may reasonably think, that they sought their own benefit; helping themselves one while by the Romans against the Carthaginians; and contrariwise, upon sense of injuries received, or apprehension of more grievous tyranny, under which they feared to be brought by these new Masters, hearkning again unto the comfortable promises of those that had ruled them before. For that it was their intent to live under their own Country Laws, and not under Governours sent from Rome or Carthage, their demeanour in all Ages following may testifie: even from henceforth unto the dayes of Augustus Cæsar, till when they were never thorowly conquered.

The year following this, Cn. Scipio had a victory against the Carthaginians in fight at Sea; or rather came upon them unlooked for, while they rode at Anchor, most of their men being on shore. All their ships that ran not too far on ground, he took; and thereby grew Master of the whole coast; landing at pleasure, and doing great hurt in all places that were not well defenced. After this victory, above one hundred and twenty Nations, or petty estates in Spain, are said to have submitted themselves unto the Romans, or given Hostages; whereby Asdrubal was compelled to flye into the uttermost corners of the Land, and hide himself in Lusitania. Yet it followes, that the Ilergetes did again rebel; that Asdrubal hereupon came over Iberus; and that Scipio (though having easily vanquished the Ilergetes) went not forth to meet him, but stirred up against him the Celtiberians, that lately were become his subjects, and had given him Hostages. These took from the Carthaginians three Towns, and vanquished him in two battels; wherein they slew fifteen thousand of his men, and took four thousand prisoners. Then arrived P. Scipio, with the supply before mentioned: and henceforward the two Brethren joyntly administred the business in Spain.

The Carthaginians being occupied in the Celtiberian War; the two Scipio's did haud cunctanter, without both fear or doubt, pass over Iberus, and besieged Saguntum. Little cause of doubt had they, if Cn. had already subdued many Nations beyond it; and, among many other, the same Celtiberians, that with their proper forces were able to vanquish Asdrubal. Bostar, the Governor of Saguntum, a simple man, suffered himself to be perswaded by one Acedux a Spaniard, that the only way to get the favour and hearty good will of the Country, was by freely restoring unto them their Hostages; as resting without any pledge, assured of their faith. But the crafty Spaniard, being trusted with this message and restitution of the Hostages, carried them all to the Roman General; perswaded them, as he had done Bostar, to make the Liberality their own. Hereby the Romans purchased much love, if the

if the tale were true; and if it were not rather true, as afterward, and ere this we find that all the Spaniſh Hoſtages were left in new Carthage. I am weary of rehearſing ſo many particularities, whereof I can believe ſo few. But ſince we find no better certainties, we muſt content our ſelves with theſe.

The year following was like unto this: Aſdrubal muſt be beaten again. The two Scipio's divide their forces: Cn. makes war by Land, P. by Sea. Aſdrubal, with much labour and entreaty, hath gotten four thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe out of Africk: He repairs his Fleet, and provides every way to make reſiſtance. But all his chief Sea-men, and Maſters of his Ships, revolt unto the Romans; becauſe they had been chidden the laſt year for their negligence, which had betrayed the Navy. The revolt of theſe ſhip-maſters animates to rebellion the Carpetians, or Carpetani, an Inland people about Toledo, in the very Center of Spain. Theſe do much miſchief, ſo that Aſdrubal is fain to make a journey to them. His ſudden coming cuts off ſome of them, that were found ſcattered abroad in the fields. But they, making a head, ſo valiantly aſſail him, that they drive him for very fear, to encamp himſelf ſtrongly on an high piece of ground; whence he dares not come forth to give them battel. So they take a Town by force, wherein he had laid up all his proviſions; and ſhortly make themſelves Maſters of the Country round about. This good ſucceſs breeds negligence; for which they dearly pay. Aſdrubal comes upon them, takes them unprepared, beats them, kills the moſt of them, and diſperſeth the reſt; ſo that the whole Nation yieldeth to him the next day. Then come directions from Carthage, that Aſdrubal ſhould lead his Army forth into Italy; which we may wonder why the Carthaginians would appoint him to do, if they had been informed by his letters in what hard caſe he was; and had ſo weakly ſupplyed him, as is ſhewed before. But thus we find it reported; and that upon the very rumour of this his journey, almoſt all Spain was ready to fall to the Romans. Aſdrubal therefore preſently ſends word to Carthage, That this muſt not be ſo: or, if they will needs have it ſo, that then they muſt ſend him a ſucceſſor, and well attended with a ſtrong Army, which to employ they ſhould find work more than enough; ſuch notable men were the Roman Generals. But the Senate of Carthage is not much moved with this excuſe; Aſdrubal muſt needs be gone: Himilco, with ſuch forces as are thought expedient for that ſervice, both by Land and Sea, is ſent to take the charge of Spain. Wherefore Aſdrubal hath now no more to do, than to furniſh himſelf with ſtore of mony, that he might have wherewithal to win the friendſhip of the Gauls; through whoſe Countries he muſt paſs, as Hannibal had done before him. The Carthaginians were greatly to blame, for not remembring to eaſe him of his care. But ſince it can be no better, he layes great Impoſitions upon all the Spaniards his ſubjects: and having gotten together as much treaſure as he could, onward he marcheth toward Iberus. The Scipio's hearing theſe news, are careful how to arreſt him on the way. They beſiege Ibera (ſo called of the Rivers name running by it) the richeſt Town in all thoſe quarters, that was confederate with Aſdrubal; who thereupon ſteps aſide to relieve it. The Romans meet him, and fight a battel with him; which they win the more eaſily, for that the Spaniards, his followers had rather be vanquiſhed at home, than get the victory, and afterwards be haled into Italy. Great numbers are ſlain; and few ſhould have eſcaped, but that the Spaniards ran away ere the battels were fully joyned. Their Camp the Romans take and ſpoil; whereby (queſtionleſs) they are marvellouſly enriched; all the mony that could be raked together in Spain being carried along in this Italian Expedition. This dayes event joyns all Spain to the Romans, if any part of the Country ſtood in doubt before; and puts Aſdrubal ſo far from all thought of travelling into Italy, that it leaves him ſmall hope of keeping himſelf ſafe in Spain. Of theſe exploits advertiſement is ſent to Rome, and Letters to the Senate, from P. and Cn. Scipio, whereof the Contents are, That they have neither mony, apparel, nor bread, wherewith to ſuſtain their Army and Fleet; that all is wanting: ſo as unleſs they may be ſupplied from Rome, they can neither hold their forces together, nor tarry any longer in the Province. Theſe Letters come to Rome in an evil ſeaſon; the State being ſcarcely able, after the loſs at Cannæ, to help it ſelf at home. Yet relief is ſent; how hardly, and how much to the commendations of that love and care, which the private Citizens of Rome bare unto the Common-wealth, ſhall be inſerted elſewhere into the relation of things, whereof the truth is leſs queſtionable. At the coming of this ſupply, the two Scipio's purſue Aſdrubal, and hunt him out of his lurking holes. What elſe can we think, that remember the laſt news of him, and how fearfully he miſtruſted his own ſafety? They find him, and Mago and Amilcar the Son of Bomilcar, with an Liv. lib. 23.

Army of threescore thousand men, besieging Illiturgi: (which the learned Ortelius, and others probably conjecture to have stood, where Carinnena is now in the Kingdom of Aragon; for there was Illiturgis, afterwards called Forum Julii, quite another way) a Town of the Illergetes their neareſt Neighbours, for having revolted unto the Romans. The Town is greatly distressed; but most of all, for want of victuals. The Romans therefore break through between the Enemies Camps, with terrible slaughter of all that resisted them: and haveing victualled the place, incourage Townsmen to defend their walls as stoutly, as they should anon behold them fighting manfully with the besiegers, in their behalf. So they issue forth, about sixteen thousand against threescore thousand: and killing more of the enemies, than themselves were in number, drave all the three Carthaginian Commanders, every one out of his quarter; and took that day, besides prisoners and other booty, fifty and eight Ensigns. Liv. lib. 23.

The Carthaginian Army, being thus beaten from Illiturgi, fall upon Incibili, that stood a little Southward from the mouth of Iberus. The Spaniards are blamed, as too greedy of earning money by war, for thus re-inforcing the broken Carthaginians. But it may be wondred, whence the Carthaginians had money to pay them: since Asdrubal was lately driven to poll the Country, wanting money of his own; and being beaten in his journey, had lost his wealthy carriages when his Camp was taken after the battel by Iberus. Howsoever it happens, the Carthaginians (according to their custom) are beaten again at Incibili: where there were of them above thirteen thousand slain, and above three thousand taken; besides two and forty Ensigns, and nine Elephants. After this, (in a manner) all the people of Spain fell from them unto the Romans. Thus could Fabius, Valerius, Antius, or some other Historian, to whom Livy gave credit, conquer all Spain twice in one year, by winning famous victories; whereof these good Captains, P. and Cn. Scipio, perhaps were not aware. Liv. ibid.

The Romans notwithstanding this large access of Dominion, winter on their own side of Iberus. In the beginning of the next year, great Armies of the Spaniards rise against Asdrubal; and are overthrown by him. P. Scipio, to help these his friends, is forced to make great haste over the River. At Castrum Altum, a place in the mid-way between new Carthage and Saguntum, famous by the death of the great Amilcar, Publius Scipio incampeth: and stores the place with victuals, being strong and defensible; as intending to make it his seat for a while. But the Country round about it is too full of Enemies: the Carthaginian horse have charged the Romans in their march, and are gone off clear; falling also upon some straglers, or such as lagged behind their fellows in march, they have cut off two thousand of them. Hereupon it is thought behoveful, to retire unto some place more assured. So Publius withdraws himself unto Mons victoriæ: that rising somewhat Eastward from Incibili, overlooketh the Southern Out-let of Iberus. Thither the Carthaginians pursue him: His brother Cn. repairs unto him; and Asdrubal the son of Gasco, with a full Army, arrives to help his Companions. As they lie thus near incamped together, P. Scipio with some light-armed, going closely to view the places thereabouts, is discovered by the enemies: who are like to take him, but that he withdraws himself to an high piece of ground; where they besiege him, until his brother Cn. fetcht him off. After this (but I know not why) Castulo, a great City of Spain, whence Hannibal had taken him a wife, joyneth with the Romans; though being far distant from them, and seated on the head of the River Bœtis. Nevertheless the Carthaginians pass over Iberus, to besiege Illiturgi again, wherein lodgeth a Roman garrison; hoping to win it by famine. We may justly wonder, what should move them to neglect the rebellion of Castulo, yea and the Roman Army lying so close by them, and to seek adventures further off, in that very place, wherein they had been so grievously beaten the year before. But thither they go: and thither follows them Cn. Scipio with one Legion: who enters the Town by force, breaks out upon them the next day, and in two battels kills above twelve thousand, and takes more than a thousand of them prisoners, with six and thirty Ensigns. This victory (doubtless) is remarkable: considering that the greatest Roman Legion at this time, consisted of no more than five thousand men. The vanquished Carthaginians besiege Bigarra: but that siege is also raised by Cn. Scipio. Thence the Carthaginians remove to Manda; where the Romans are soon at their heels. There is a great battel fought, that lasted four hours, wherein the Romans get a notable victory: and a more notable would have gotten, had not Cn. Scipio been wounded. Thirty nine Elephants are killed, and twelve thousand men; three thousand prisoners taken, and seven and fifty Ensigns. The Carthaginians flie to Auringes;

Auringes; and the Romans purſue them. Cn. Scipio in a Litter is carried into the field, and vanquiſhed the Carthaginians again; but kils not half ſo many of them, as before; good cauſe why, for there are fewer of them left to fight. Notwithſtanding all theſe overthrows, the Spaniards, a people framed even by nature to ſet war on foot, quickly fill up the broken troops of Aſdrubal, who having alſo hired ſome of the Gauls, adventures once more to try his fortune with the Romans. But he is beaten again: and loſeth eight thouſand of his men; beſides Priſoners, Elephants, Enſigns, and other appurtenances. After ſo many victories, the Romans are even aſhamed to leave Saguntum enthralled unto the Carthaginians; ſince, in behalf of that City, they had at firſt entred into this war. And well may we think it ſtrange, that they had not recovered it long before, ſince we may remember, that long before this they had won all the Country once and again. But it muſt not be forgotten, that they had ere now beſieged Saguntum; and were fain (as appears) to go their way without it: ſo as they need not to bluſh, for having ſo long forborn to do that which ere now they had attempted, but were unable to perform. At the preſent they won Saguntum: and reſtored the poſſeſſion thereof unto ſuch of the poor diſperſed Citizens as they can find out. They alſo waſte and deſtroy the Country of the Turdetani, that had miniſtred unto Hannibal matter of quarrel againſt the Saguntines. This laſt action (queſtionleſs) was much to their honour; and wherein we may be aſſured, that the Carthaginians would have diſturbed them if they had been able.

But overlooking now this long continuance of great victories, which the Romans have gotten in Spain, other print or token of all their brave exploits, we can perceive none, than this recovery of Saguntum: excepting the ſtopping of Aſdrubals journey; which was indeed of greateſt importance, but appertaining to their own defence. For they have landed at Emporiæ, an Haven Town, built and peopled by a Colony of the Phocæans, kin to the Maſſilians, friends to the Romans; They have eaſily won to their party, loſt, recovered, and loſt again, ſome petty bordering Nations of the Spaniards, that are carried one while by perſwaſion, other-whiles by force, and ſometimes by their own unſetled paſſions; and now finally they have won a Town, whereof the Carthaginians held entire poſſeſſion, who had rooted out the old inhabitants. Wherefore we may eaſily believe, that when they took Saguntum (if they took it not by ſurprize; which is to be ſuſpected, ſince in this Action we find no particulars remembred, as when the ſame place was taken by Hannibal) they had gotten the better of their Enemies in ſome notable fight. In like ſort alſo muſt we think, that all thoſe battels lately remembred, after every one of which Aſdrubal ſate down before ſome place, that had rebelled, or ſeemed ready to rebel, were proſperous unto the Carthaginians. For it is not the cuſtome of Armies vanquiſhed, to carry to war from Town to Town, and beleaguer Cities of their Enemies; but to fortifie themſelves within their own places of ſtrength, and therein to attend the levy and arrival of new ſupplies. And ſurely, if the Romans had been abſolute Maſters of the field, when they won Saguntum, they would not have conſumed a whole year following, in practiſing only with the Celtiberians the next adjoyning people. Yet made they this, little leſs than two years buſineſs. Of theſe Celtiberians we hear before, That they had yielded up themſelves unto the Romans; for ſecurity of their faith, given Hoſtages to Scipio; and, at his appointment, made war againſt the Carthaginians, with their proper forces. Wherefore it is ſtrange, that they are now thus hardly wrought; and not without expreſs condition of a great ſumm, hired to ſerve in the Roman Camp. How this may hold together I cannot perceive; unleſs perhaps in thoſe days it were the Roman cuſtome, or rather the cuſtome of ſome bad Author whom Livy follows, to call every meſſenger, or ſtragler, that entred that camp, an Hoſtage of that people from whom he came.

The Celtiberians at length, hired with great rewards, ſend an Army of thirty thouſand to help the Romans: out of which, 3000. of the fitteſt men are choſen, and carried into Italy, there to deal with their Country-men that follow Hannibal in his wars. But if any of theſe three hundred return back into Spain, it is to be feared, that he brings with him ſuch news of the riches and wellfare of Hannibals men, that all his fellows at home are the leſs unwilling to follow Aſdrubal, when he ſhall next have a deſire to lead them into Italy. Hereof we find more than probability, when theſe mercenary Celtiberians meet the Carthaginian Army in the field. The two Scipio's, preſuming on this acceſs of ſtrength, divide their forces, and ſeek out the Enemies, who lie not far off with three Armies. Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar, is neareſt at hand; even among the Celtiberians, at Anitorgis.

With

With him Cn. Scipio doubts not to take good order: but the fear is, that this one part of the Carthaginian forces being destroyed; Mago the Son of Gesco, hearing the news, will make use of their distance, which is five dayes march, and by running into the furthest part of the Country save themselves from being overtaken. Publius therefore must make the more haste, and take with him the better Souldiers, that is, two parts of the old Roman Army, leaving the third part, and all the Celtiberians, to his Brother. He that hath the longer journey to make, comes somewhat the sooner to his lives end. Mago and Asdrubal, the Son of Gesco, are not studying how to run away: they find no such necessity. They joyn their forces together, meet with Publius Scipio, and lay at him so hardly, that he is driven to keep himself close within his Trenches; wherein he thinks himself not will assured. Especially he is vexed by Masanissa, Prince of the Massæsyli, Numidians, bordering upon Mauritania, in the Region called now Tremizen: to whom the chief honour of this service is ascribed, for that he becomes afterward Confederate with the Romans. In this dangerous case, P. Scipio gets intelligence, that Indibilis a Spanish Prince, is coming with seven thousand and five hundred of the Suessetani, to joyn with his Enemies. Fearing therefore to be strait shut up, and besieged, he issues forth by night, to meet with Indibilis upon the way, leaving T. Fonteius his Lieutenant, with a small company to defend the Camp. He meets with Indibilis; but is not able, according to his hope, to defeat him at the first incounter. The fight continues so long, that the Numidian horse appear (whom he thought to have been ignorant of his departure) and fall upon the Romans on all sides: neither are the Carthaginians far behind; but come so fast upon him in a Rear, that P. Scipio, uncertain which way to turn, yet fighting and animating his men, where need most requireth, is struck thorow with a lance, and slain: very few of his Army escaping the same destiny, through benefit of the dark night. The like end hath Cn. Scipio within nine and twenty dayes after. At his meeting with Asdrubal, the Celtiberian Mercenaries all forsake him, pretending that they had war in their own Country. If Anitorgis, where Asdrubal then lay, were, as Ortelius following Bucterus takes it, a Celtiberian Town; this was no vain pretence, but an apparent truth. But we may justly believe, that they were won by Asdrubal, and easily perswaded to take as much mony for not fighting, as they should have had for hazarding their lives. C. Scipio therefore being unable to stay them, and no less unable, without their help either to resist the enemy, or to joyn with his Brother, maketh a very violent retrait; herein only differing from plain flight, that he keeps his men together. Asdrubal presseth hard upon him: and Mago, with Asdrubal the Son of Gesco, having made an end of Publius, hasten to dispatch his Brother after him. Scipio steals from them all by night, but is overtaken the next day by their horse, and arrested, in an open place of hard stony ground, where grows not so much as a shrub, unfit for defence of his Legions against such enemies. Yet a little Hill he finds of easie ascent on every side; which he takes for want of a more commodious place, and fortifies with pack-saddles, and other luggage, for default of a better Palisado. These weak defences the Carthaginians soon tear in sunder: and, breaking in on all hands, leave very few of them alive; that saving themselves, I know not how, within some woods adjoyning, escape unto T. Fonteius, whom Publius had left in his Camp, as is before said. It is a terrible overthrow, they say, out of which no man escapes. Yet, how they who were thus hemmed in on every side, in so bare a ground as afforded not a shrub to cover them, could break out, and shrowd themselves within woods adjoyning, I should much wonder; did not a greater miracle following call away mine attention. T. Fonteius is in P. Scipio's Camp, on the North side of Iberus, fearful (as may be supposed) of his own life; since his General, with two parts of the Roman Army, had little hope to remain long safe within it. Thither comes L. Martius, a young Roman Gentleman of a noble Spirit; who having gathered together the scattered Souldiers, and drawn some Companies out of their Garrisons, makes a pretty Army. The Souldiers, being to chuse a General by most voices, preferr this L. Martius before Fonteius the Lieutenant, as well they may. For Asdrubal the Son of Gesco, coming upon them; this L. Martius so encourageth his men (fondly weeping when he led them forth, upon remembrance of their more honourable Generals lately slain) and admonisheth them of their present necessity, that he beats the Carthaginians into their Trenches. A notable victory perhaps he might have gotten, but that he wisely sounds the retrait; reserving the fury of his Souldiers to a greater occasion. The Carthaginians are at first amazed, and wonder whence this new boldness grows, in enemies lately vanquished, vanquiſhed, and now again little better than taken: but when they ſee, that the Roman dares not follow his advantage, they return to their former ſecurity; and, utterly deſpiſing him, ſet neither Corps de garde nor Sentinel, but reſt ſecure, as if no enemy were near. Martius therefore animates his Souldiers with lively words; and tells them, That there is no adventure more ſafe, than that which is furtheſt from ſuſpicion of being undertaken. They are ſoon perſwaded to follow him, in any deſperate piece of ſervice. So he leads him forth by night, and ſteals upon the Camp of Aſdrubal; where, finding no guard, but the enemies faſt aſleep, or very drowſie, he enters without reſiſtance, fires their Cabbins, and gives a terrible alarm; ſo that all affrighted the Carthaginians run head-long one upon another, they know not which way. All paſſages out of their Camp, Martius hath prepoſſeſſed, ſo that there is no way to eſcape, ſave by leaping down the Rampart; which as many do, as can think upon it, and run away toward the Camp of Aſdrubal the Son of Amilcar, that lay ſix miles off. But Martius hath way-laid them. In a Valley between their two Camps he hath beſtowed a Roman cohort, and I know not what number of Horſe; ſo that into this Ambuſh they fall every one, and are cut in pieces. But, leſt perchance any ſhould have eſcaped, and give the alarm before his coming; Martius haſtens to be there as ſoon as they. By which diligent ſpeed, he comes early in the morning upon this further Camp; which with no great difficulty he enters, and partly by apprehenſion of danger which the Enemies conceived, when they beheld the Roman ſhields, foul, and bloodied with their former execution, he drives headlong into flight, all that can ſave themſelves from the fury of the ſword. Thirty ſeven thouſand of the enemies periſh in this nights work; beſides a thouſand eight hundred and thirty, taken priſoners. Hereunto Valerius Antius adds, that the Camp of Mago was alſo taken, and ſeven thouſand ſlain; and that in another battel with Aſdrubal, there were ſlain ten thouſand more; beſides four thouſand three hundred and thirty taken priſoners. Such is the power of ſome Hiſtorians. Livie therefore hath elſewhere well obſerved, That there is none ſo intemperate, as Valerius Antius, in multiplying the numbers that have fallen in battels. That, whilſt Martius was making an Oration to his Souldiers, a flame of fire ſhone about his head, Livie reports as a common tale, not giving thereto any credit: and temperately concludeth, That this Captain Martius got a great name, which he might well do, if with ſo ſmall forces, and in ſuch diſtreſs, he could clearly get off from the Enemies, and give them any parting blow, though it were far leſs than that which is here ſet down.

Of theſe occurrents L. Martius ſent word to Rome, not forgetting his own good ſervice, whatſoever it was, but ſetting it out in ſuch wiſe, as the Senate might judge him worthy to hold the place of their Vicegerent in Spain: which the better to intimate unto them, he ſtiled himſelf Propretor. The Fathers were no leſs moved with the tydings than the caſe required; and therefore took ſuch careful order, for ſupplying their forces in Spain, that although Hannibal came to the gates of Rome, ere the Companies levied to ſerve that Province, could be ſent away; yet could they not ſtay a tyde for defence of the City it ſelf, but ſhipped them in all haſte for Spain. As for the title of Propretor, which Martius had aſſumed, they thought it too great for him, and were offended at his preſumption in uſurping it: foreſeeing well, that it was matter of ill conſequence, to have the Souldiers abroad make choice among themſelves, of thoſe that ſhould command Armies and Provinces. Therefore Claudius Nero was diſpatched away with all convenient haſte, into Spain: carrying with him about ſix thouſand of the Roman foot, and as many of the Latines, with three hundred Roman horſe, and of the Latines eight hundred.

It happened well that about theſe times, the affairs of Rome began to proſper in Italy, and offered means of ſending abroad ſuch a ſtrong ſupply: otherwiſe the victories of Martius would ill have ſerved, either to keep footing in Spain, or to ſtop the Carthaginian Armies from marching towards the Alps. For when Claudius, landing with his new forces, took charge of that remainder of the Army, which was under Martius and Fonteius; he found ſurer tokens of the overthrows received, than of thoſe miraculous victories, whereof Martius had made his vaunts unto the Senate. The Roman party was forſaken by moſt of the Spaniſh friends; whom how to reclaim, it could not eaſily be deviſed. Yet Claudius advanced boldly towards Aſdrubal the Brother of Hannibal; whom he found among the Auſetani, near enough at hand, incamped in a place called Lapides atri; out of which there was no iſſue, but only through a ſtrait, whereon the Roman ſeized at the firſt coming. What ſhould have tempted any man of underſtanding to incamp in such a place, I do not find: and as little reason can I find in that which followed. For it is said, that Asdrubal seeing himself thus lockt up, made offer to depart forthwith out of all Spain, and quit the Province to the Romans, upon condition that he and his Army might be thence dismissed; That he spent many dayes, in entertaining parley with Claudius about his business; That night by night he conveyed his footmen (a few at a time) through very difficult passages, out of the danger; and that finally taking advantage of a misty day, he stole away with all his Horse and Elephants, leaving his Camp empty. If we consider, that there were at the same time, besides this Asdrubal, two other Carthaginian Generals in Spain; we shall find no less cause to wonder at the simplicity of Claudius, who hoped to conclude a bargain for so great a Country, with one of these three Chieftains, than at the strange nature of those passages, through which the footmen could hardly creep out by night; the Horse and Elephants easily following them in a dark misty day. Wherefore in giving belief to such a tale, it is needful that we suppose, both the danger wherein the Carthaginians were, and the conditions offered for their safe departure, to have been of far less vallue. Howsoever it was; neither this, nor ought else that the Romans could do, served to purchase any new friends in Spain, or to recover the old which they had lost. Like enough it is, that the old Souldiers, which had chosen Martius their Propretor, took it not well, that the Senate, regardless of their good deserts, had repealed their election, and sent a Propretor whom they fancied not so well. Some such occasion may have moved them to desire a Proconsul, and (perhaps) young Scipio by name: as if a title of greater dignity were needful to work regard in the Barbarians; and the beloved memory of Cn. and Publius likely to do good, were it revived in one of the same family. Whether upon these, or upon other reasons; C. Claudius was recalled out of the Province; and Publius the Son of P. Scipio sent proconsul into Spain.

This is that Scipio, who afterward transferred the war into Africk: where he happily ended it, to the great honour and benefit of his Country. He was a man of goodly presence, and singularly well conditioned; especially he excelled in Temperance, Continency, Bounty, and other vertues that purchase love; of which qualities what great use he made, shall appear in the tenour of his actions following. As for those things that are reported of him, savouring a little too much of the great Alexanders vanity; how he used to walk alone in the Capitol, as one that had some secret conference with Jupiter; how a Dragon (which must have been one of the gods; and, in likelihood, Jupiter himself) was thought to have conversed with his Mother, entring her Chamber often, and vanishing away at the coming in of any man; and how of these matters he nourished the rumour, by doubtful answers; I hold them no better than fables, devised by Historians, who thought thereby to add unto the glory of Rome: that this Noble City might seem not only to have surpassed other Nations in vertue of the generality, but also in great worth of one single man. To this end nothing is left out, that might serve to adorn this Roman Champion. For it is confidently written, as matter of unquestionable truth, That when a Proconsul was to be chosen for Spain, there durst not any Captain of the principal Citizens offer himself as Petitioner for that honourable, but dangerous charge; That the people of Rome were much astonished thereat; That when the day of Election came, all the Princes of the City stood looking one another in the face, not one of them having the heart to adventure himself in such a desperate service; and finally, that this P. Cornelius Scipio, being then about four and twenty years of age, getting up on a high place where he might be seen of all the multitude, requested and obtained, that the office might be conferred upon him. If this were true, then were all the victories of L. Martius no better than dreams: and either very unreasonable was the fear of all the Roman Captains, who durst not follow Claudius Nero, that not long before was gone into Spain Propretor; or very bad intelligence they had out of the Province, which Asdrubal the Carthaginian, as we heard even now, was ready to abandon. But upon these incoherences, which I find in the two partial Roman Historians, I do not willingly insist.

P. Scipio was sent Proconsul into Spain; and with him was joyned M. Junius Syllanus, as Propretor, and his Coadjutor. They carried with them ten thousand foot, and a thousand horse, in thirty Quinquereme-Gallies, with these they landed at Emporia; and marched from thence to Tarracon alongst the Sea-coast. At the fame of Scipio's arrival, it is said, that Embassages came to him apace from all quarters of the Province; which he entertained with such a Majesty, as bred a wonderful opinion of him. As for the enemies, they were greatly afraid of him; and so much the greater was their fear, by how how much the leſs they could give any reaſon of it. If we muſt believe this, then muſt we needs believe, that their fear was even as great as could be: for very little cauſe there was, to be terrified with the fame of ſo young a man, which had as yet performed nothing. All the Winter following (or, as ſome think, all the next Year) he did nothing: but ſpent the time perhaps, as his foregoers had done, intreating with the Spaniards. His firſt enterpriſe was againſt new Carthage: upon which he came unexpected, with five and twenty thouſand foot, and two thouſand five hundred horſe; his Seaforces coaſting him, and moderating their courſe in ſuch wiſe, that they arrived there together with him. He aſſailed the Town by Land and Sea; and won it by aſſault the firſt day. The Carthaginians loſt it, by their too much confidence upon the ſtrength of it: which cauſed them to man it more ſlenderly, than was requiſite. Yet it might have been well enough defended, if ſome Fiſhermen of Tarracon had not diſcovered unto Scipio, a ſecret paſſage unto the walls; whereof the Townſmen themſelves were either ignorant, or thought (at leaſt) that their enemies could have no notice. This City of new Carthage, reſembled the old and great Carthage in ſituation; ſtanding upon a demy-Iſland, between an Haven and a great Lake. All the Weſtern ſide of the walls, and ſomewhat of the North, was fenced with this Lake: which the Fiſher-men of Tarracon had ſounded; and finding ſome part thereof a ſhelf, whereon at low-water men might paſs knee-deep, or (at moſt) wading up to the Navil, Scipio thruſt thereinto ſome companies of his men; who recovered the top of the walls without reſiſtance: the place being left without guard; as able to defend it ſelf by the natural ſtrength. Theſe falling ſuddenly upon the backs of the Carthaginians within the City, eaſily forced a gate, and gave free entrance to the Roman Army. What booty was found within the Town, Livie himſelf cannot certainly affirm; but is fain to ſay, that ſome Roman Hiſtorians told lies without meaſure, in way of amplification. By that ſmall proportion of riches, which was afterward carried by Scipio into the Roman Treaſury, we may eaſily perceive how great a vanity it was to ſay, that all the wealth of Africk and Spain was heaped up in that one Town. But therein were beſtowed all the Spaniſh Hoſtages (or at leaſt of the adjoyning Provinces) whom Scipio intreated with ſingular courteſie: reſtoring them unto their kindred and friends, in ſuch gracious manner, as doubled the thanks due to ſo great a benefit. Hereupon a Prince of the Celtiberians, and two petty Kings of the Ilergetes and Lacetani, neareſt Neighbours to Tarracon, and dwelling on the North-ſide of Iberus, forſook the Carthaginian party, and joyned with the Romans. The ſpeech of Indibilis, King of the Ilergetes, is much commended; for that he did not vaunt himſelf, as commonly Fugitives uſe, of the pleaſure, which he did unto the Romans, in revolting from their enemies; but rather excuſed this his changing ſide, as being thereto compelled by injuries of the Carthaginians, and invited by the honourable dealing of Scipio. This temperate eſtimation of his new profeſſed friendſhip, was indeed no unſure token, that it ſhould be long-laſting. But if the Ilergetes had long ere this (as we have heard before) forſaken the Carthaginian party, and ſtoutly held themſelves as friends to Cn. Scipio: then could nothing have been deviſed more valn, than this Oration of Indibilis their King, excuſing, as new, his taking part with the ſame, when he ſhould have rather craved pardon for his breach of alliance, formerly contracted with the Father and the Uncle. Moſt likely therefore it is, that howſoever the two elder Scipio's had gotten ſome few places among theſe their Neighbours, and held them by ſtrength; yet were the Romans never maſters of the Country, till this worthy Commander, by recovering their Hoſtages from the Carthaginians, and by his great munificence in ſending them home, won unto himſelf the aſſured love and aſſiſtance of theſe Princes. The Carthaginian Generals, when they heard of this loſs, were very ſorry: yet nevertheleſs they ſet a good face on the matter; ſaying, that a young man, having ſtoln a Town by ſurpriſe, was too far tranſported, and over-joyed, but that ſhortly they would meet with him, and put him in mind of his Father and Uncle; which would alter his mood, and bring him to a more convenient temper.

Now if I ſhould here interpoſe mine own conjecture; I ſhould be bold to ſay, that the Carthaginians were at this time buſie, in ſetting forth towards Italy; and that Scipio, to divert them, undertook new Carthage, as his Father and Uncle, upon the like occaſion, ſate down before Iberа. And in this reſpect I would ſuppoſe, that it had not been much amiſs, if the paſſage over the Lake had been undiſcovered, and the Town held out ſome longer while. For howſoever that particular Action was the more fortunate, in coming to ſuch good iſſue upon the firſt day: yet in the generality of the buſineſs, between Rome and Carthage, it was more to be wished, that Asdrubal should be stayed from going into Italy, than that half of Spain should be taken from him. Whereas therefore he had nothing left to do, that should hinder his journey; Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, were thought sufficient to hold Scipio work, in that lingring War of taking and retaking Towns, whilst the main of the Carthaginian forces, under Asdrubal the son of Amilcar, went to a greater enterprise: even to fight in tryal of the Empire. But the Roman Historians tell this after another fashion; and say, That Asdrubal was beaten into Italy: whither he ran for fear, as thinking himself ill assured of the Spaniards, as long as they might but hear the name of Scipio. Scipio, say they, coming upon Asdrubal; his Vant-currers charged so lustily the Carthaginian horse, that they drave them into their Trenches: and made it apparent, even by that small piece of service, how full of spirit the Romans Army was, and how dejected the Enemy. Asdrubal therefore by night retired out of that even ground, and occupied an Hill, compassed on three sides with the River, very steep of ascent, and not easie of access on the foreside; by which himself got up, and was to be followed by the Romans. On the top of it there was a Plain, whereon he strongly encamped himself: and in the mid-way, between the top and root of the Hill, was also another Plain; into which he descended, more upon bravery, that he might not seem to hide himself within the Trenches, than for that he durst adventure his Army to the hazzard of a battail, for which this was no equal ground. But such advantage of place could not save him from the Romans. They climed up the Hill to him; they recovered even footing with him; drove him out of this lower Plain, up into his Camp on the Hill top: whither although the ascent were very difficult, and his Elephants bestowed in the smoothest places to hinder their approach; yet compassing about, and seeking passage where it was hardest to be found; but much more strongly breaking their way, where the Carthaginians had got up before them, they drave both men and Elephants head-long, I know not whither: for it is said, that there was no way to flye. Out of such a battel, wherein he had lost eight thousand men, Asdrubal is said to have escaped; and gathering together his dispersed troops, to have marched toward the Pyrenees, having sent away his Elephants ere the fight began. Nevertheless, Mago, and Asdrubal the son of Gesco, are reported after this to have consulted with him about this War; and finally to have concluded, that go he needs must, were it but to carry all the Spaniards as far as might be, from the name of Scipio. How likely this was to have been true, it shall appear at his coming into Italy; whence these incoherent relations of the Spanish affairs have too long detained us.

§. XII.

The great troubles that Hannibal raised in all quarters, to the City of Rome. Posthumius the Roman General, with his whole Army, is slain by the Gauls. Philip King of Macedon enters into a League with Hannibal, against the Romans. The Romans joyning with the Ætolians, make war upon Philip in Greece: and afterwards conclude a peace with him, the better to intend their business against the Carthaginians.

WE left Hannibal wintering at Capua: where he and his new Confederates rejoyced (as may be thought) not a little, to hear the good news from Carthage of such mighty aid, as was decreed to be sent thence unto him. In former times he had found work enough, to carry the Romans corn into his own barns, and to drive away their Cattle to Geryon: his victories affording him little other profit, than sustenance for his Army; by making him master of the open field. He might perhaps have forced some walled Towns in like sort as he did Geryon, and the Castle of Cannæ: but had he spent much time, about the getting of any one place well defended; the hunger, that his Army must have endured the Winter and Spring following, untill corn were ripe, would have grievously punished him for such imployment of the Summer. This may have been the reason, why he forbore to adventure upon Rome, after his victory at Cannæ. For had he failed (as it was a matter of no certainty) to carry the City at his first coming; want of victuals would have compelled him to quit the enterprise. Yea many of the people that opened so hastily their gates unto him, upon the fresh bruit of his glorious success, would have taken time of deliberation, and waited perhaps the event of another battel; if being, either for want of means to force the City, or of necessaries to continue a siege before it, repelled (as might seem) from the walls of Rome, he had presented himself unto them with a lessened reputation, somewhat later in the year; when time to force their obedience was wanting, unleſs they would freely yiel it. But this great part of the care and trave was paſt, when ſo many States of Italy were become his: the year following, the Samnites, and other old enemies of Rome, were like to receive a notable pleaſure of their new alliance with Carthage, by helping to lay ſiege unto that proud City, which ſo long had held them in ſubjection. Thus the winter was paſſed over joyfully, ſaving that there came not any tidings of the preparations, to ſecond the welcome report of thoſe mighty forces, that were decreed and expected. The Spring grew on: and of the promiſed ſupply there arrived no more, than only the Elephants. How late it was ere theſe came, I find not: only we find, that after this he had above thirty of them; whereas all, ſave one, that he brought over the Alps, had been loſt in his journy through the Mariſhes of Hetruria. Very bad excuſe of this exceeding negligence, they that brought the Elephants could make unto Hannibal. If they were his friends, they told him truly, what miſchiefs the perſwaſion of Hanno wrought among the too niggardly Carthaginians. Otherwiſe, they might perhaps inform him, that it was thought a ſafer, though a farther way about, to paſs along through Spain and Gaul, as he himſelf had done; and increaſe the Army, by hyring the Barbarians in the journey; than to commit the main ſtrength of their City, to the hazzard of the Seas: eſpecially wanting a commodious Haven, to receive the Fleet that ſhould carry ſuch a number of Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with all needful proviſions. With theſe allegations Hannibal muſt reſt content; and ſeek, as well as he can, to ſatisfie his Italian Confederates Therefore when time of the year ſerved, he took the field: and having finiſhed what reſted to be done at Caſilinum, ſought to make himſelf Maſter of ſome good Haven-town thereabout; that might ſerve to entertain the Carthaginian Fleet, or take from his Enemies at home all excuſe, which they might pretend by want thereof. To the ſame purpoſe, and to do what elſe was needful, he ſent Himilco unto the Locrians, and Hanno to the Lucans: not forgetting at once to aſſay all quarters of Italy, yea, the Iſles of Sicil and Sardinia, ſince the ſiege of Rome muſt needs be deferred unto another year. Hanno made an ill journey of it, being met, or overtaken, by T. Sempronius Longus: who ſlew above two thouſand of his men; with the loſs of fewer than three hundred Romans. But Himilco ſped far better. By help of the Brutians, his good friends, he won Petellia, or Petilia, by force; after it had held out ſome moneths. He won likewiſe Conſentia, and Croton, that was forſaken by the Inhabitants. Alſo the City of Locri, which was of great importance, yielded unto him: as did all other places thereabout; except only the Town of Rhegium, over againſt Sicil.

The great faith of the Petilians is worthy to be recorded, as a notable teſtimony of the good government, under which the Roman ſubjects lived. As for the Samnites, Campanes, and others, whoſe earneſtneſs in rebellion may ſeem to prove the contrary; we are to conſider, That they had lately contended with Rome for Soveraignty, and were now tranſported with ambition: which reaſon can hardly moderate, or benefits allay. The Petilians, in the very beginning of their danger, did ſend to Rome for help: where their meſſengers received anſwer from the Senate, That the publick misfortunes had not left means, to relieve their Aſſociates that were ſo far diſtant. The Petilian Meſſengers (Embaſſadours they are termed; as were all others, publickly ſent from Cities of the Roman ſubjection, that had a private juriſdiction within themſelves) fell down to the ground, and humbly beſought the Fathers, not to give them away: promiſing to do and ſuffer whatſoever was poſſible, in defence of their Town, againſt the Carthaginians. Hereupon the Senate fell to conſultation again: and having throughly conſidered all their forces remaining plainly confeſſed, that it was not in their power to give any relief. Wherefore theſe Embaſſadours were willed to return home, and to bid their Citizens provide hereafter for their own ſafety, as having already diſcharged their faith to the utmoſt. All this notwithſtanding, the Petilians (as was ſaid) held out ſome moneths: and having ſtriven in vain to defend themſelves, when there was no apparent poſſibility gave to the Carthaginians a bloody victory over them; being vanquiſhed as much by famine, as by any violence of the Aſſailants.

The Romans at this time were indeed in ſuch ill caſe, that Hannibal with a little help from Carthage, might have reduced them unto terms of great extremity. For whereas in a great bravery, before their loſs at Cannæ, they had ſhewed their high minds, by entertaining the care of things far off, notwithſtanding the great war that lay upon them ſo near at hand: it now fell out miſerably all at once, that their fortune abroad was no whit better than at home. L. Poſthumius Albinus their Prætor they had ſent, with an Army of five and twenty thousand, into Gaul: to the Illyrian King Pineus they had sent for their tribute due, whereof the pay-day was past; willing him, if he desired forbearance, to deliver Hostages for his performance of what was due; and to Philip King of Macedon they had sent, to require, that he should deliver up unto them Demetrius Pharius their Subject and Rebel, whom he had received. But now from all quarters they hear tydings, little suitable to their former glorious conceits. Posthumius with all his Army was cut in pieces by the Gauls, in such sort, that scarce ten men escaped. The manner of his overthrow was very strange. There was a great Wood, called by the Gauls, Litana; thorow which he was to pass. Against his coming, the Enemies had sawed the trees so far, that a little force would serve to cast them down. When therefore Posthumius, with his whole Army, was entred into this dangerous passage, the Gauls that lay about the Wood, began to cast down the trees; which falling one against another, bore all down so fast, that the Romans were overwhelmed, Men and Horses; in such wise, that no more escaped, than is said before. How this tedious work of sawing so many trees, could take desired effect, and neither be perceived, nor made frustrate, either by some wind that might have blown all down before the Romans entred, or by some other of those many accidents, whereto the device was subject; I do not well conceive. Yet some such thing may have been done, and what failed in the stratagem, supplied with the Enemies sword. It is not perhaps worthy to be omitted, as a monument of the savage condition, wherewith Lombardie, a Country now so civil, was infected in elder times, that of Posthumius his skull, being cleansed and trimmed up with gold, a drinking cup was made, and consecrated in their principal Temple, as an holy vessel for the use of the Priest in their solemnities. Of this great overthrow, when word was brought to Rome, the amazement was no less than the calamity. But sorrow could give no remedy to the mischief: and anger was vain, where there wanted forces to revenge. Tribute from the Illyrians there came none; neither do I find that any was a second time demanded; this we find, that with Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus, Illyrian Kings as also with Gentius, who raigned within a few years following, the Romans dealt upon even terms; entreating their assistance against Philip and Perseus; not commanding their duty, as Vassals. The Macedonian troubled them yet a little further. For having assured his affairs in Greece, and enjoying leisure to look into the doings abroad, he sent Embassadours to Hannibal; with whom he made a league, upon these conditions; That the King in person should come into Italy, and with all his forces, by Land and Sea, assist the Carthaginians in the Roman war, until it were finished; That Rome, and all Italy, together with all the spoil therein to be gotten, should be left intire unto the State of Carthage; and that afterwards Hannibal, with his Army, should pass into Greece, and there assist Philip, until he had subdued all his enemies (which were the Ætolians, Thracians, King Antiochus and others) leaving semblably unto him the full possession of that Country, and the Isles adjoyning. But such prediſposition of Kingdoms and Provinces, is lightly controlled by the divine providence, which therein shews it self; not (as Herodotus falsly terms it, and like an Atheist) envious or malicious, but very just and Majestical in upholding that unspeakable greatness of Soveraignty, by which It rules the whole World, and all that therein is.

The first Embassadours that Philip sent, fell into the Romans hands, in their journey towards Hannibal: and being examined what they were, adventured upon a bold lye, saying, That they were sent from the King of Macedon to Rome, there to make a League with the Senate and people, and offer his help in this time of great necessity. These news were so welcome, that the joy thereof took away all care of making better inquiry. So they were lovingly feasted, and freely dismissed with guides that should lead them the way, and shew them how to avoid the Carthaginians. But they being thus instructed concerning their journey, fell wilfully into the Camp of Hannibal; who entertained them after a better fashion, and concluded the business about which they came, upon the points before remembered. In their return homeward, they happened again unluckily to be descried by the Roman Fleet; which mistrusting them to be of the Carthaginian party, gave them chace. They did their best to have escaped: but being overtaken, they suffered the Romans to come aboord; and trusting to the lye that once had served them, said it again, That having been sent from King Philip to make a league with the people of Rome, they were not able by reason of the Carthaginians lying between, to get any further than to M. Valerius the Prætor, unto whom they had signified the good affection of the King their Master. The tale was now less credible than before:

before: and (which marred all) Geſco, Boſtar, and Mago, with their followers, Carthaginians that were ſent with them from Hannibal to ratifie the agreement, being preſently detected, made the matter apparent. Wherefore a little inquiſition ſerved to find all out: ſo that at length Hannibals own letters to King Philip were delivered up, and the whole buſineſs confected. The Embaſſadours and their followers were ſent cloſe priſoners to Rome; where the chief of them were caſt into priſon, and the reſt ſold for bond-ſlaves. Yet one of their ſhips that eſcaped, carried word into Macedon of all that had happened. Whereupon new Embaſſage was ſent, that went aud returned with better ſpeed; concluding, as was agreed before, only with ſome loſs of time.

The Romans were exceedingly perplexed; thinking with what heavy weight this Macedonian war, in an evil hour, was likely to fall upon them, when their ſhoulders were over-burdened with the load of the Carthaginian. Yet they took a noble reſolution, and ſuitable unto that, whereby they kept off the ſtorm, that elſe would have beaten upon them from Spain. They judged it more eaſie with ſmall force to detain Philip in Greece, than with all their ſtrength to reſiſt him in Italy. And herein they were in the right. For, that the very reputation of a King of Macedon, joyning with Hannibal in ſuch a time, would have ſufficed to ſhake the allegiance, not only of the Latines, and other, their moſt faithful Subjects, but even of the Roman Colonies, that held all priviledges of the City, it will appear by the following ſucceſs of things. M. Valerius the Prætor, with twenty Quinquereme Gallies, was appointed to attend upon the Macedonian, and to ſet on foot ſome commotion in Greece; or to nouriſh the troubles already therein begun. Philip was buſie about the Sea Towns, that looked towards Italy, ſetting upon Apollonia; and thence falling upon Oricum, which he won, and ſo returned to Apollonia again. The Epirots craved help of M. Valerius; or rather excepted his kind offers; who had none other buſineſs to do. The Garriſon that Philip had left in Oricum, was ſtrong enough to hold the Towns-men in good order, but not to keep out the Romans; of whoſe daring to attempt any thing againſt him, on that ſide the Sea, Philip as then had no ſuſpition. Valerius therefore eaſily regained the Town, and ſent thence a thouſand men, under Nævius Criſpus, an undertaking and expert Captain, which got by night into Apollonia. Theſe made a notable ſally, and brake into Philip's Trenches with ſo great ſlaughter, that they forced him to forſake his Camp, and raiſe the ſiege. The King purpoſed (as it is ſaid) to have departed thence by Sea: but Valerius, coming with his Fleet from Oricum, ſtopped up the mouth of the River, ſo that he was fain to burn his ſhips (which belike were no better than long boats) and depart ill furniſhed of carriages by Land. After this Valerius dealt with the Ætolians, a Nation alwaies enemy to the Crown of Macedon; and eaſily perſwaded them (being ſo affected, as hath elſe-where been ſhewed) to make ſtrong war on Philip; wherein he promiſed them great aſſiſtance from the Romans. That which moſt moved the troubleſome ſpirits of the Ætolians, was the hope of getting Acarnania; after which they had gaped long, and whereof the Roman was as liberal in making promiſe, as if already it had been his own. So a league was made between them; and afterward ſolemnly publiſhed at Olympia, by the Ætolians, and by the Romans in their Capitol. The conditions were, that from Ætolia to Corcyra, in which ſpace Acarnania was contained, all the Country ſhould be ſubdued, and left unto the Ætolians, the pillage only to be given to the Romans. And that if the Ætolians made peace with Philip, it ſhould be with Proviſion, to hold no longer than whilſt he abſtained from doing injury to the Romans, or their Aſſociates. This was indeed the only point whereat Valerius aimed, who promiſed as much on the Romans behalf, That they ſhould not make peace with the Macedonian, unleſs it were with like condition of including the Ætolians. Into this league was place reſerved for the Lacedæmonians and Eleans, as to thoſe that had made or favoured the ſide of Cleomenes againſt the Macedonian, to enter at their pleaſure. The like regard was had of Attalus, Pleuratus, and Scerdiletus: the firſt of which reigned at Pergamus in Aſia the leſs, a Prince hereafter much to be ſpoken of; the other two held ſome part of Illyria, about which the Romans were ſo far from contending with them, that gladly they ſought to get their friendly acquaintance. But the names of theſe Aſſociates are thruſt into the Treaty, rather to give it countenance, than for any readineſs which they diſcloſe to enter thereinto. The Ætolians alone, and chiefly Scopas their Prætor, with Dorymachus and others, are yet a while the only men, of whom the Roman Generals muſt make much; as the late French King, Henry the fourth, when he had only the title of Navarre, was ſaid to court the Majors of Rochel. Philip was not idle, when he heard whereunto whereunto the Ætolian tended. He repaired his Army, made a countenance of war upon the Illyrians, and other his borderers, that were wont in times of danger to infest the Kingdom of Macedon; wasted the Country about Oricum and Apollonia, and overrunning the Pelagonians, Dardanians, and others, whom he held suspected, came down into Thessaly, whence he made shew as if he would invade Ætolia. By the fame of this Expedition, he thought to stir up all the Greeks adjoyning, against the Ætolians; whom they generally detested as a nest of Robbers, troublesome to all the Country. To which purpose, and to hinder the Ætolians from breaking into Greece, he left Perseus, his Son and Heir, with four thousand men, upon their borders: with the rest of his Army, before greater business should overtake and intangle him, he made a long journey into Thrace, against a people called the Medes, that were wont to fall upon Macedon, whensoever the King was absent. The Ætolians hearing of his departure, armed as many as they could against the Acarnanians; in hope to subdue those their daily enemies, and win their little Country, ere he should be able to return. Hereto it much availed, that the Romans had already taken Oeniadæ and Naxos, Acarnanian Towns, conveniently situated to let in an Army; and consigned them unto the Ætolians, according to the tenour of the contract lately made with them. But the stout resolution of the Acarnanians to die (as we say) every Mothers Son of them, in defence of their Country; together with the great haste of the Macedonian (who laid aside all other business) to succour these his friends; caused the Ætolians to forsake their enterprise. When this Expedition was given over, the Romans and Ætolians fell upon Ancyræ, which they took: the Romans assailed by Sea, the Ætolians by Land. The Ætolians had the Town, and the Romans the spoil.

For these good services M. Valerius was chosen Consul at Rome; and P. Sulpitius sent in his stead, to keep the war on foot in Greece. But besides the Roman help, Attalus out of Asia came over to assist the Ætolians. He was chiefly moved by his own jealousie of Philips greatness; though somewhat also tickled with the vanity of being chosen by the Ætolians their principal Magistrate; which honour, though no better than titulary, he took in very loving part. Against the forces which Attalus and the Romans had sent, being joyned with the main power of Ætolia, Philip tried the fortune of two battels; and was victorious in each of them. Hereupon, these his troublesome neighbours desired peace of him, and used their best means to get it. And when the day appointed for the conclusion therefore, was come: their Embassadours, in stead of making submission, proposed unto him such intolerable conditions, as ill beseemed vanquished men to offer; and might therefore well testifie, that their minds were altered. It was not any love of peace, but fear of being besieged in their own Towns, that had made them desirous of composition. This fear being taken away, by the incouragements of Attalus and the Romans, they were as fierce as ever; and thrust a Garrison of their own, and some Roman friends into Elis; which threatned Achaia, wherein Philip then lay. The Romans, making a cut over the straight from Naupactus, wasted the Country in a terrible bravery; wherein Philip required him, coming upon them in great haste from the Nemæan Games (which he was then celebrating) and sending them faster away, but nothing richer than they came.

In the heat of this contention, Prusius King of Bithynia, fearing the growth of Attalus, no less than Attalus held suspected the power of Philip, sent a Navy into Greece, to assist the Macedonian party. The like did the Carthaginians; and upon greater reason, as being more interessed in the success of his affairs. Philip was too weak by Sea: and though he could man some two hundred ships, yet the vessels were such, as could not hold out against the Romans Quinqueremes. Wherefore it behoved him to use the help of his good friends the Carthaginians. But their aid came somewhat too late; which might better at first have kept those Enemies from fastening upon any part of Greece, than afterward it could serve to drive them out, when they had pierced into the bowels of that Country. Ere Philip could attempt any thing by Sea, it was needful that he should correct the Eleans, bad neighbours to the Achaians his principal Confederates. But in assailing their Town, he was encountred by the Ætolian and Roman Garrison, which drave him back with some loss. In such cases, especially where God intendeth a great conversion of Empire, Fame is very powerful in working. The King had received no great detriment in his retrait from Elis: rather he had given testimony of his personal valour, in fighting well on foot, when his horse was slain under him. He had also soon after taken a great multitude of the Eleans, to the number of four thousand, with some twenty thousand head of Cattel which they had brought together in a place of ſafety, as they thought, when their Country was invaded. But it had hapned, that in his purſuit of the Romans forragers about Sicyon, his horſe running haſtily under a low tree, had torn off one of the horns, which (after the faſhion of thoſe times) the King wore in his Creſt. This was gathered up by an Ætolian, who carried it home, and ſhewed it as a token of Philip's death. The horn was well known, and the tale believed. All Macedon therefore was in an uproar; and not only the borderers, ready to fall upon the Country, but ſome Captains of Philip eaſily corrupted; who thinking to make themſelves a fortune in that change of things, ran into ſuch treaſon, as they might better hope to make good, than to excuſe. Hereupon the King returned home, leaving not three thouſand men to aſſiſt his friends the Achæans. He alſo took order, to have beacons erected, that might give him notice of the enemies doings, upon whom he meant ſhortly to return. The affairs of Macedon, his preſence quikly eſtabliſhed. But in Greece all went ill-favouredly; eſpecially in the Iſle of Eubœa, where one Plator betrayed to Attalus and the Romans, the Town of Oreum, ere Philip could arrive to help it: where alſo the ſtrong City of Chalcis was likely to have been loſt, if he had not come the ſooner. He made ſuch haſty marches, that he had almoſt taken Attalus in the City of Opus: this City, lying over againſt Eubœa, Attalus had won more through the cowardize of the people, than any great force that he had uſed: now becauſe the Roman Souldiers had defrauded him in the ſack of Oreum, and taken all to themſelves; it was agreed, that Attalus ſhould make his beſt profit of the Opuntians, without admitting the Romans to be his ſharers. But whilſt he was buſie, in drawing as much mony as he could out of the Citizens: the ſudden tydings of Philip's arrival, made him leave all behind him, and run away to the Sea-ſide, where he got aboord his ſhips, finding the Romans gone before, upon the like fear. Either the indignity of this miſadventure, or tydings of Pruſias to Bithynian his invaſion upon the Kingdom of Pergamus; made Attalus return home, without ſtaying to take leave of his friends. So Philip recovered Opus, won Torone, Tritonos, Drymus and many ſmall Towns in thoſe parts; performing likewiſe ſome actions, of more bravery than importance, againſt the Ætolians. In the mean ſeaſon, Machanidas, the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, had been buſie in Peloponneſus; but hearing of Philip's arrival, was returned home.

The Lacedæmonians, hearing certain report of Cleomenes his death in Egypt, went about to chuſe two new Kings, and to conform themſelves to their old manner of government. But their eſtate was ſo far out of tune, that their hope of redreſſing things within the City, proved no leſs unfortunate, than had been their attempts of recovering a large dominion abroad. Lycurgus a Tyrant roſe up among them: upon whom ſucceeded this Machanidas, and ſhortly after came Nabis, that was worſe than both of them. They held on the Ætolian and Roman ſide, for fear of the Achæans, that were the chief Confederates of Philip, and hated extremely the name both of Tyrant and Lacedæmonian. But of theſe we ſhall ſpeak more hereafter.

Philip entring into Achaia, and ſeeing his preſence had brought the contentment of aſſurance to that Country; ſpake brave words to the Aſſembly of their States, ſaying, That he had to do with an Enemy that was very nimble, and made War by running away. He told how he had followed them to Chalcis, to Orecum, to Opus, and now into Achaia; but could no where find them, ſuch haſt they made, for fear of being overtaken. But flight, he ſaid, was not alwaies proſperous: he ſhould one day light upon them; as ere this he ſundry times had done, and ſtill to their loſs. The Achaians were glad to hear theſe words; and much the more glad, in regard of his good deeds accompanying them. For he reſtored unto their Nation ſome Towns that were in his hand, belonging to them of old. Likewiſe to the Megalopolitans their confederates, he rendred Aliphera. The Dymæans, that had been taken by the Romans, and ſold for ſlaves, he ſought out, ranſomed, and put in quiet poſſeſſion of their own City. Further, paſſing over the Corinthian Gulf, he fell upon the Ætolians; whom he drave into the mountains and woods, or other their ſtrongeſt holds, and waſted their Country. This done, he took leave of the Achæans, and returned home by Sea, viſited the people that were his ſubjects, or dependants; and animated them ſo well, that they reſted fearleſs of any threatning danger. Then had he leiſure to make war upon the Dardanians, ill neighbours to Macedon: with whom nevertheleſs he was not ſo far occupied, but that he could go in hand with preparing a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, whereby to make himſelf Maſter of the Sea; the Romans (ſince the departure of Attalus) having not dared to meet or purſue him, when he lately ran along the coaſt coast of Greece, fast by them where they lay.

This good success added much reputation to the Macedonian, and emboldened him to make strong war upon the Ætolians, at their own doors. As for the Romans either some displeasure, conceived against their Confederates, or some fear of danger at home, when Asdrubal was ready to fall upon Italy; caused them to give over the care of things in Greece, and leave their friends there to their own fortunes. The Ætolians therefore being driven to great extremity, were fain to sue for peace unto Philip; and accept it, upon what ever conditions it best pleased him. The agreement was no sooner made, than P. Sempronius with ten thousand foot, a thousand horse, and thirty five gallies, came over in great haste (though somewhat too late) to trouble it. Hearing how things went in Ætolia, he turned aside to Dyrrhacchium and Apolonia, making a great noise, as if with these his own forces he would work wonders. But it was not long ere Philip came to visit him, and found him tame enough. The King presented him battel, but he refused it: and suffering the Macedonians to waste the Country round about, before his eyes, kept himself close within the wals of Apollonia, making some overtures of peace: which caused Philip to return home quietly. The Romans had not so great cause to be displeased with the Ætolians, as had Philip to take in evil part the demeanor of the Carthaginians. For notwithstanding the royal offer that he made them, to serve their turn in Italy, and assist them, in getting their hearts desire, before he would expect any requital: they had not sent any fleet, as in reason they ought, and as (considering his want of sufficient ability by Sea) it is likely they were bound either to secure the transportation of his Army, or to free his coast from the Roman and Ætolian Piracies. Only once they came to his help, which was at his last journey into Achaia. But they were gone again before his arrival: having done nothing, and pretending fear of being taken by the Romans, even at such time as Philip with his own Navy, durst boldly pass by Sea, and found none that durst oppose him. This wretchless dealing of the Carthaginians, may therefore seem to have been one of Hanno his tricks, whereof Hannibal so bitterly complained. For it could not but grieve this malicious man exceedingly to hear that so great a King made offer to serve in person under Hannibal, and required the assistance of the same Hannibal, as of a man likely to make Monarchs, and alter the affairs of the world at pleasure. Therefore he had reason, such as envy could suggest, to perswade the Carthaginians unto a safe and thrifty course: which was, not to admit into the fellowship of their Italian wars so mighty a Prince; whom change of affection might make dangerous to their Empire; or his much affection unto Hannibal, more dangerous to their liberty. Rather they should do well to save charges, and feed the Macedonian with hopes; by making many promises of sending a fleet and some other succours. This would cost nothing, yet would it serve to terrifie the Romans, and compell them to send part of their forces from home, that might find this Enemy work abroad, So should the Roman Armies be lessened in Italy; and Philip, when once he was ingaged in the war, be urged unto the prosecution, by his own necessity: putting the Carthaginians to little or no charges: yea, scarce to the labour of giving him thanks. Now if it might come to pass, as Hannibal every day did promise, that Rome, and all Italy should within a while be at the devotion of Carthage: better it were, that the City should be free, so as the troublesome Greeks might address their complaints unto the Carthaginians, as competent Judges between them and the Macedonian, than that Hannibal, with the power of Africk, should wait upon Philip, as his Executioner, to fulfill his will and pleasure, in doing such injuries, as would both make the name of a Carthaginian hateful in Greece, and oblige Philip to be no less impudent, in fulfilling all requests of Hannibal. Whether the councel of Hanno and his fellows were such as this, or whether the Carthaginians, of their own disposition, without his advice, were too sparing, and careless, the matter (as far as concerned Philip) came to one reckoning. For they did him no manner of good, but rather dodged with him, even in their little courtesie which they most pretended. And this perhaps was part of the reason, why he began the building of an hundred Gallies, as if he would let them and others know, whereto his proper strength would have reached, had he not vainly given credit to faithless promises. When therefore the Ætolians had submitted themselves already: and when the Romans desired his friendship, as might be thought, for very fear of him, with reputation enough, and not as a forsaken Client of the Carthaginians, but a Prince able to have succoured them in their necessity, he might give over the war, and, without reprehension, leave them to themselves. For he had wilfully entred into trouble for their

ſakes but they deſpiſed him, as if the quarrel were meerly his own, and he unable to manage it.

The vanity of which their conceits would appear unto them, when they ſhould ſee, that with his proper ſtrength he had finiſhed the War, and concluded it highly to his honour. So the year following it was agreed, by the mediation of the Epirots, Acarnanians, and others, That the Romans ſhould retain three or four Towns of Illyri-, which they had recovered by this War, being part of their old Illyrian Conqueſt: Places no way belonging to the Macedinian; and therefore perhaps inſerted into the Covenants, that ſomewhat might ſeem to have been gotten. On the other ſide, the Atintanes were appointed to return under the obedience of Philip: who, if they were (as Ortelius problably conjectures) the people of the Country about Apollonia, then did the Romans abandon part of their gettings; whereby it appears, that they did not give peace, as they would ſeem to have done, but accepted it, upon conditions ſomewhat to their loſs.

The Confederates and Dependants of the Macedonian, comprehended in this Peace, were Pruſias King of Bithynia, the Achæans, Bœtians, Theſſalians, Acarnanians and Epirots. On the Roman ſide were named, firſt, the people of Ilium, as an honourable remembrance of the Romans deſcent from Troy; then, Attalus King of Pergamus; Plueratus an Illyrian Prince; and Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon; together with the Eleans, Meſſenians and Athenians. The Ætolians were omitted, belike, as having agreed for themſelves before. But the Eleans and Meſſenians, followers of the Ætolians, (and by them, as is moſt likely, compriſed in their league with Philip) were alſo inſerted by the Romans; that were never ſlow in offering their friendſhip to ſmall and feeble Nations. As for the Athenians; they ſtood much upon their old honour; and loved to bear a part, though they did nothing, in all great actions. Yet the ſetting down of their names in this Treaty, ſerved the Romans to good purpoſe: foraſmuch as they were a buſie people, and miniſtred occaſion to renew the War, when means did better ſerve to follow it.

§. XIII.

How the Romans began to recover their ſtrength by degrees. The noble affection of the Romans, in relieving the publick Neceſſities of their Common-weal.

IT was a great fault in the Carthaginians, that embracing ſo many enterpriſes at once, they followed all by the halves; and waſted more men and mony to no purpoſe, than would have ſerved (if good order had been taken) to finiſh the whole War, in far ſhorter ſpace; and make themſelves Lords of all that the Romans held. This error had become the leſs harmful, if their care of Italy had been ſought as it ought. But they ſuffered Hannibal to weary himſelf with expectation of their promiſed ſupplies; which being ſtill preferred from year to year, cauſed as great opportunities to be loſt, as a Conquerour could have deſired. The death of Poſthumius, and deſtruction of this whole Army in Gaul; the begun rebellion of the Sardinians; the death of Hiero their friend in Syracuſe; with great alterations much to their prejudice, in the whole Iſle of Sicil; as alſo that War, of which we laſt ſpake threatned from Macedon, happening all at one time; and that ſo nearly after their terrible overthrow at Cannæ, among ſo many revolts of their Italian Confederates; would utterly have ſunk the Roman State; had the Carthaginians, if not the firſt year, yet at leaſt the ſecond, ſent over to Hannibal the forces that was decreed. It is not to be doubted, that even this diverſity of great hopes, appearing from all parts, adminiſtred matter unto Hanno, or ſuch as Hanno was, whereupon to work. For though it were in the power of Carthage, to perform all that was decreed for Italy; yet could not that prohibition hold, when ſo many new occurrences brought each along with thim their new care; and required their ſeveral Armies. This had not been a very bad excuſe, if any one of the many occaſions offered had been throughly proſecuted: though it ſtood with beſt reaſon, that the foundation of all other hopes and comforts, which was the proſperity of Hannibal in his Italian war, ſhould have been ſtrengthned; whatſoever had become of the reſt. But the ſlender Troops, wherewith the Carthaginians fed the War in Spain; the lingring aid which they ſent to uphold the Sardinian rebellion, when it was already well-near beaten down; their trifling with Philip; and (amongſt all theſe their attempts) their haſty catching at Sicil: little deſerved to be thought good reaſons of neglecting cting the main point, whereto all the reſt had reference. Rather every one of theſe Actions, conſidered a part by it ſelf, was no otherwiſe to be allowed, as diſcreetly undertaken, or ſubſtantially followed; than by making ſuppoſition, That the care of Italy made the Carthaginians more negligent in all things elſe. Yet if theſe allegations would not ſerve to content Hannibal, then muſt he patiently endure to know, that his own Citizens were jealous of his Greatneſs, and durſt not truſt him with ſo much power, as ſhould enable him to wrong the ſtate at home.

Whatſoever he heard or thought, Hannibal was glad to apply himſelf to Neceſſity; to feed his Italian friends with hopes; and to trifle away the time about Nola, Naples, Cumæ, and other places: being loth to ſpend his Army in an hard ſiege, that was to be reſerved for a work of more importance. Many offers he made upon Nola, but alwayes with bad ſucceſs. Once Marcellus fought a battel with him there, yet under the very walls of the Town; having the aſſiſtance of the Citizens, that were grown better affected to the Roman ſide, ſince the Heads that inclined them to rebellion, were cut off. About a thouſand men Hannibal in that fight loſt: which was no great marvel; his forces being then divided, and imployed in ſundry parts of Italy at once. Naples was even in thoſe dayes, a ſtrong City; and required a years work to have taken it by force. Wherfore the earneſt deſire of Hannibal to get it, was alwayes fruſtrate. Upon the Town of Cumæ they of Capua had their plot, and were in hope to take it by cunning. They ſent to the chief Mageſtrates of the Cumans, deſiring them (as being alſo Campans) to be preſent at a ſolemn ſacrifice of the Nation, where they would conſult about their general good: promiſing to bring thither a ſufficient guard, to aſſure the whole Aſſembly from any danger that might come by the Romans. This motion the Cumans made ſhew to entertain; but privily ſent word of all to T. Sempronius Gracchus, the Roman Conſul.

Gracchus was a very good man of war, and happily choſen Conſul in ſo dangerous a time. His Colleague ſhould have been Poſthumus Albinus, that was lately ſlain by the Gauls: after whoſe death Marcellus was choſen, as being judged the fitteſt man to encounter with Hannibal. But the Roman Augures either found ſome religious impediment that nullified the election of Marcellus; or at leaſt they fained ſo to have done, becauſe this was the firſt time, that ever two Plebeian Conſuls were choſen together. Marcellus therefore gave over the place; and Q. Fabius Maximus, the late famous Dictator, was ſubſtituted in his room. But Fabius was detained in the City, about matters of religion or ſuperſtition: wherewith Rome was commonly, eſpecially in times of danger, very much troubled. So Gracchus alone, with a Conſular Army, waited upon Hannibal among the Campans: not able to meet the enemy in field; yet intentive to all occaſions, that ſhould be preſented. The Volones, or Slaves, that lately had been armed, were no ſmall part of his followers. Theſe, and the reſt of his men, he continually trained; and had not a greater care to make his Army ſkilful in the exerciſes of war, than to keep it from quarrels that might ariſe by upbraiding one another with their baſe conditions.

Whilſt the Conſul was thus buſied at Liternum, the Senators of Cumæ ſent him word of all that had paſſed between them and the Capuans. It was a good occaſion to fleſh his men, and make them confident againſt the Enemy; of whom hitherto they had bad experience. Gracchus therefore put himſelf into Cumæ: whence he iſſued at ſuch time, as the Magiſtrates of that City were expected by the Campans. The Sacrifice was to be performed by night, at a place called Hamæ: three miles from Cumæ. There lay Marius Alfius the chief Magiſtrate of Capua, with fourteen thouſand men; not wholly intent either to the Sacrifice, or to any danger that might interrupt it; but rather deviſing how to ſurprize others, than fearing himſelf to be aſſailed. The Conſul therefore, ſuffering none to go forth of Cumæ, that might bear word of him to the enemies, iſſued out of the Town when it grew dark: his men being well refreſhed with meat and ſleep, the day before, that they might hold out the better in this nights ſervice. So he came upon the Capuans unawares, and ſlew more than two thouſand of them, together with their Commander, loſing not above a hundred of his own men. Their Camp he took; but tarried not long to riſle it, for fear of Hannibal, who lay not far off. By this his providence, he eſcaped a greater loſs, than he had brought upon the Enemies. For when Hannibal was informed how things went at Hamæ, forthwith he marched thither, hoping to find thoſe young ſouldiers, and ſlaves, buſied in making ſpoil, and loading themſelves with the booty. But they were all gotten ſafe within Cumæ; which partly for anger, partly for deſire of gaining it, and partly at the urgent entreaty of the Capuans, Hannibal aſſailed the

the next day. Much labour, and with ill ſucceſs, the Carthaginians and their fellows ſpent about this town. They raiſed a wooden Tower againſt it; which they brought cloſe unto the walls; thinking thereby to force an Entry. But the Defendants, on the inſide of the wall, raiſed againſt this an high Tower; whence they made reſiſtance, and found means at length to conſume with fire the work of their Enemies. While the Carthaginians were buſie in quenching the fire, the Romans, ſallying out of the Town at two gates, charged them valiantly, and drave them to their Trenches, with the ſlaughter of about fourteen hundred. The Conſul wiſely ſounded the Retreat, ere his men were too far engaged, and Hannibal in a readineſs to requite their ſervice. Neither would he in the pride of his good ſucceſs, adventure forth againſt the Enemy; who preſented him battle the day following, near unto the wals. Hannibal therefore ſeeing no likelihood to prevail in that which he had taken in hand, brake up the ſiege, and returned to his old camp at Tifata. About theſe times, and ſhortly after, when Fabius the other Conſul had taken the field; ſome ſmall Towns were recovered by the Romans, and the people ſeverely puniſhed for their revolt.

The Carthaginian Army was too ſmall, to fill with garriſons all places that had yielded; and withall to abide (as it muſt do) ſtrong in the field. Wherefore Hannibal, attending the ſupply from home, that ſhould enable him to ſtrike at Rome it ſelf, was driven in the mean time to alter his courſe of war: and inſtead of making (as formerly he had done) a general invaſion upon the whole Countrey, to paſs from place to place; and wait upon occaſions, that grew daily more commodious to the enemy, than to him. The Countrey of the Hirpines and Samnites was grievouſly waſted by Marcellus, in the abſence of Hannibal; as alſo was Campania, by Fabius the Conſul; when Hannibal having followed Marcellus to Nola, and received there the loſs before mentioned, was gone to winter in Apulia. Theſe people ſhewed not the like ſpirit in defending their lands, and fighting for the Carthaginian Empire, as in former times they had done, when they contended with the Romans, in their own behalf, to get the Soveraignty. They held it reaſon, that they ſhould be protected by ſuch as thought to have dominion over them: whereby at once they overburdened their new Lords; and gave unto their old, the more eaſie means to take revenge of their defection.

The people of Rome were very intentive as neceſſity conſtrained them, to the work that they had in hand. They continued Fabius in his Conſulſhip: and joyned with him Marcus Claudius Marcellus; whom they had appointed unto that honour the year before. Of theſe two, Fabius was called the Shield: and Marcellus, the Roman Sword. In Fabius it was highly, and upon juſt reaſon, commended, That being himſelf Conſul, and holding the Election, he did not ſtand upon nice points of formality, or regard what men might think of his ambition, but cauſed himſelf to be choſen with Marcellus; knowing in what need the City ſtood of able Commanders. The great name of theſe Conſuls, and the great preparations which the Romans made, ſerved to put the Campans in fear, that Capua it ſelf ſhould be beſieged. To prevent this, Hannibal, at their earneſt entreaty, came from Arpi (where he lay, hearkening after news from Tarentum) and having with his preſence comforted theſe his friends, fell on the ſudden upon Puteoli, a Sea-town of Campania; about which he ſpent three dayes in vain, hoping to have won it. The garriſon in Puteoli was ſix thouſand ſtrong: and did their duty ſo well, that the Carthaginian, finding no hope of good ſucceſs, could only ſhew his anger upon the fields there and about Naples; which having done, and once more (with as ill ſucceſs as before) aſſailed Nola, he bent his courſe to Tarentum: wherein he had very great intelligence. Whileſt he was in his progreſs thither; Hanno made a journey againſt Beneventum: and T. Graccus, the laſt years Conſul, haſting from Nuceria, met him there; and fought with him a battel. Hanno had with him about ſeventeen thouſand foot, Brutians and Lucans for the moſt part: beſides twelve hundred horſe; very few of which were Italians, all the reſt Numidians and Moors. He held the Romans work four hours, ere it could be perceived to which ſide the victory would incline. But Gracchus his ſouldiers, which were all (in a manner) the late-armed ſlaves, had received from their General a peremptory denunciation, That this day or never they muſt purchaſe their liberty, bringing every man for price thereof, an enemies head. The ſweet reward of liberty was ſo greatly deſired, that none of them feared any danger in earning it: howbeit that vain labour impoſed by their General, of cutting off the ſlain enemies heads, troubled them exceedingly; and hindred the ſervice by imployment of ſo many hands in a work ſo little concerning the victory. Gracchus therefore finding his own error, wisely corrected it: proclaiming aloud, That they should cast away the heads, and spare the trouble of cutting off any more; for that all should have liberty immediately after the battel, if they won the day. This encouragement made them run head-long upon the Enemy; whom their desperate fury had soon overthrown, if the Roman-horse could have made their part good against the Numidian. But though Hanno did what he could, and pressed so hard upon the Romans battel, that four thousand of the slaves, (for fear either of them, or of the punishment which Gracchus had threatned before the battel unto those that should not valiantly behave themselves) retired unto a ground of strength; yet was he glad at length to save himself by flight, when the Gross of his Army was broken; being unable to remedy the loss. Leaving the field, he was accompanied by no more than two thousand, most of which were horse; all the rest were either slain or taken. The Roman General gave unto all his souldiers that reward of liberty which he had promised: but unto those four thousand, which had recoyled unto the Hill, he added this light punishment; That as long as they served in the wars, they should neither eat nor drink otherwise than standing, unless sickness forced them to break his order. So the victorious Army returned to Beneventum: where the newly enfranchised Souldiers were feasted in publick by the Townsmen; some sitting some standing, and all of them having their heads covered (as was the custom of slaves manumised) with caps of white wooll. The picture of this Feast (as a thing worthy of remembrance) was afterwards hung up in a Table by Gracchus, in the Temple of Liberty; which his Father had built and dedicated. This was indeed the first battel, worthy of great note, which the Carthaginians had lost since the coming of Hannibal into Italy: the victories of Marcellus at Nola, and of this Gracchus before at Hamæ, being things of small importance.

Thus the Romans, through industry, by little and little, repaired the great Breach in their Estate, which Hannibal had made at Cannæ. But all this while, and long after this, their Treasury was so poor, that no industry nor art could serve to help it. The fruits of their grounds did only (and perhaps hardly) serve to feed their Towns and Armies, without any surplusage, that might be exchanged for other needful commodities. Few they were in Italy that continued to pay them tribute: which also they could worse do than before; as living upon the same trade, and subject to the same inconveniencies, which enfeeble Rome it self. Sicil and Sardinia, that were wont to yield great profit, hardly now maintaining the Roman Armies, that lay in those Provinces, to hold them safe, and in good order. As for the Citizens of Rome, every one of them suffered his part of the detriment, which the Common-wealth sustained, and could now do least for his Country, when most need was: as also the number of them was much decreased; so as if money should be raised upon them by the Poll, yet must it be far less than in former times. The Senate therefore diligently considering the greatness of the war within the bowels of Italy, that could not be thence expelled, without the exceeding charge of many good Armies; the peril, wherein Sicil and Sardinia stood, both of the Carthaginians, and of many among the Naturals, declining from the friendship or subjection of Rome; the threats of the Macedonian, ready to land in the Eastern parts of Italy, if they were not at the cost to find him work at home; the greater threats of Asdrubal, to follow his Brother over the Alps, as soon as he could rid himself of the Scipio's in Spain; and the poverty of the Common-wealth, which had not mony for any one of these mortal dangers; were driven almost even to extream want of counsel. But being urged by the violence of swift necessity, signified in the letters of the two Scipio's from Spain; they resolved upon the only course, without the which the City could not have subsisted.

They called the people to assembly; Wherein Quintus Fulvius the Prætor laid open the publick wants; and plainly said, That in this exigent, there must be no taking of mony for victuals, weapons, apparel, or the like things needful to the Souldiers; but that such as had stuff, or were Artificers; must trust the Common-wealth with the Loan of their commodities and labors, until the war were ended. Hereunto he so effectually exhorted all men, especially the Publicans or Customers, and those which in former times had lived upon their dealing in the common Revenues, that the charge was undertaken by private men; and the Army in Spain, as well supplied, as if the Treasury had been full. Shortly after this, Marcus Attilius Regulus, and Publius Furius Philus, the Roman Censors; taking in hand the redress of disorders within the City, were chiefly intentive to the correction of those, that had mis-behaved themselves in this present war. They began with L. Cecilius Metellus;

Metellus: who after the battel at Cannæ, had held discourse with some of his Companions, about flying beyond the Seas; as if Rome, and all Italy, had been no better than lost. After him they took in hand those, that having brought to Rome the message of their fellows made prisoners at Cannæ, returned not back to Hannibal, as they were bound by oath; but thought themselves thereof sufficiently discharged, in that they had stepped once back into his Camp, with pretence of taking better notice of the Captives names. All these were now pronounced infamous by the Censors: as also were a great many more; even whosoever had not served in the wars, after the term which the Laws appointed: Neither was the note of the Censors at this time (as otherwise it had used to be) hurtful only in reputation: but greater weight was added thereunto, by this Decree of the Senate, following; That all such as were noted with infamy by these Censors, should be transported into Sicil, there to serve until the end of the War, under the same hard conditions, that were imposed upon the Remainder of the Army beaten at Cannæ. The office of the Censors was, to take the List and account of the Citizens; to chuse or displace the Senators; and to set notes of disgrace (without further punishment) upon those whose unhoneſt or unseemly behaviour fell not within the compass of the Law. They took also an account of the Roman Gentlemen: amongst whom they distributed the publick Horses of service, unto such as they thought meet; or took them away for their mis-behaviour. Generally, they had the oversight of mens lives and manners: and their censure was much reverenced and feared; though it extended no further, than to putting men out of rank; or making them change their Tribe; or (which was the most that they could do) causing them to pay some Duties to the Treasury, from which others were exempted. But, besides the care of this general Tax, and matters of Morality, they had the charge of all publick Works; as mending of High-wayes, Bridges, and Water-courses; the reparations of Temples, Porches, and such other buildings. If any man incroached upon the Streets, High-wayes, or other places that ought to be common; the Censors compelled him to make amends. They had also the letting out of Lands, Customs, and other publick Revenues to farm: so that most of the Citizens of Rome were beholding unto this office; as maintaining themselves by some of the Trades thereto belonging. And this was no small help to conserve the dignity of the Senate: the commonalty being obnoxious unto the Censors; which were alwayes of that Order, and careful to uphold the reputation thereof. But the Common-weal being now impoverished by War, and having small store of Lands to lett, or of Customs that were worth the farming; Regulus and Philus troubled not themselves much with perusing the Temples, or other decayed places, that needed reparations: or, if they took a view of what was requisite to be done in this kind; yet forbore they to set any thing in hand, because they had not wherewith to pay. Herein again appeared a notable generosity of the Romans. They that had been accustomed in more happy times, to undertake such pieces of work, offered now themselves as willingly as the Censors, as if there had been no such want: promising liberally their cost and travel; without expectation of any payment, before the end of the War. In like sort, the Masters of those slaves, that lately had been infranchised by Gracchus, were very well contented to forbear the price of them, until the City were in better case to pay. In this general inclination of the Multitude, to relieve, as far forth as every one was able, the common necessity; all the goods of Orphans, and of Widows living under Patronate, were brought into the Treasury; and there the Questor kept a Book of all that was laid out for the sustenance of these Widows and Orphans: whilst the whole stock was used by the City. This good example of those which remained in the Town, prevailed with the Souldiers abroad: so that (the poorer sort excepted) they refused to take pay; and called those Mercenaries, that did accept it, when their Country was in so great want.

The twelve hundred Talents wrongfully extorted from the Carthaginians; nor any injuries following, done by the Romans in the height of their pride, yielded half so much commodity, as might be laid in ballance against these miseries, whereinto their Estate was now reduced. Nevertheless if we consider things aright, the calamities of this War did rather inable Rome to deal with those Enemies, whom she forthwith undertook, than abate or slacked the growth of that large Dominion, whereto she attained, ere the youngest of those men was dead, whose names we have already mentioned. For by this hammering, the Roman metal grew more hard and solid: and by paring the branches of private fortunes, the Root and Heart of the Common-wealth was corroborated. So grew the City of Athens, when when Xerxes had burnt the Town to ashes, and taken from every particular Citizen, all hope of other felicity, than that which rested in the common happiness of the universality. Certain it is, (as Sir Francis Bacon hath judiciously observed) That a State, whose dimension or stem is small, may aptly serve to be foundation of a great Monarchy, which chiefly comes to pass, where all regard of domestical prosperity is laid aside; and every mans care addressed to the benefit of his Country. Hereof I might say that our Age hath been a great example, in the united Provinces in the Netherlands; whose present riches and strength grew chiefly from that ill assurance, which each of their Towns, or almost of their Families, perceived it self to hold, whilst the generality was oppressed by the Duke of Alva; were it so, that the people had thereby grown as warlike, as, by extreme industry, and straining themselves to fill their publick Treasury, they are all grown wealthy, strong at Sea, and able to wage great Armies for their services by Land. Wherefore if we value at such a rate as we ought, the patient resolution, conformity to good Order, obedience to Magistrates, with many other Vertues, and above all other, the great love of the Commonweal, which was found in Rome in these dangerous times: we may truly say, That the City was never in greater likelihood to prosper. Neither can it be deemed otherwise, than that if the same affections of the people had lasted, when their Empire, being grown more large and beautiful, should in all reason have been more dear unto them; if the riches and delicacies of Asia had not infected them with sensuality, and carryed their appetites mainly to those pleasures, wherein they thought their well-being to consist; if all the Citizens and subjects of Rome could have believed their own interest to be as great, in those wars which these latter Emperours made for their defence, as in these which were managed by the Consuls: the Empire, founded upon so great vertue, could not have been thrown down by the hands of rude Barbarians, were they never so many. But unto all Dominions God hath set their periods: Who, though he hath given unto Man the knowledge of those wayes, by which Kingdoms rise and fall; yet hath left him subject unto the affections, which draw on these fatal changes, in their times appointed.

§. XIV.

The Romans win some Towns back from Hannibal. Hannibal wins Tarentum. The siege of Capua. Two Victories of Hannibal. The journey of Hannibal to the gates of Rome. Capua taken by the Romans.

AS the people of Rome strained themselves to the utmost, for maintaining the War: so their Generals abroad omitted no part of industry, in seeking to recover what had been lost. The Town of Casiline, Fabius besieged. It was well defended by the Carthaginian Garrison; and likely to have been relieved by those of Capua, if Marcellus from Nola, had not come to the assistance of his Colleague. Nevertheless, the place held out so obstinately, that Fabius was purposed to give it over: saying, that the enterprise was not great; yet as difficult, as a thing of more importance. But Marcellus was of a contrary opinion. He said, that many such things, as were not at first to have been undertaken by great Commanders, ought yet, when once they were taken in hand, to be prosecuted unto the best effect. So the siege held on: and the Town was pressed so hard, that the Campans dwelling therein, grew fearful, and craved parley; offering to give it up, so as all might have leave to depart in safety, whither they pleased. Whilst they were thus treating of conditions: or whilst they were issuing forth, according to the composition already made; (for it is diversly reported) Marcellus seizing upon a Gate, entred with his Army, and put all to sword that came in their way. Fifty of those that were first gotten out, ran to Fabius the Consul, who saved them, and sent them to Capua in safety; all the rest were either slain, or made prisoners. If Fabius deserved Commendations, by holding his word good unto these fifty; I know not how the slaughter of the rest, or imprisonment afterward of such as escaped the heat of execution, could be excused by Marcellus. It may be that he helped himself after the Roman fashion, with some æquivocation, but he shall pay for it hereafter. In like sort was Mount Marsans in Gascoin taken by the Marshall Monluc, when I was a young man in France. For whilst he entertained parley about composition; the besieged ran all from their several guards, upon hasty desire of being acquainted with the conditions proposed. The Marshall therefore discovering a part of the Walls unguarded, entred by Scalado, and put all save the Governour unto the sword. Herein that the Governour of Mount Marſian committed two groſs errors; the one, in that he gave no order for the Captains and Companies, to hold themſelves in their places; the other, in that he was content to parlee without Pledges for aſſurance given and received. Some ſuch overſight the Governour of Caſilinе ſeemeth to have committed; yet neither the advantage taken by Marcellus, or by Monluc, was very honourable. When this Work was ended, many ſmall Towns of the Samnites, and ſome of the Lucans and Apulians, were recovered: wherein were taken or ſlain, about five and twenty thouſand of the Enemies; and the Country grievouſly waſted by Fabius, Marcellus lying ſick at Nola.

Hannibal in the mean while was about Tarentum, waiting to hear from thoſe, that had promiſed to give up the Town. But M. Valerius the Roman Propretor had thruſt ſo many men into it, that the Traitors durſt not ſtir. Wherefore the Carthaginian was fain to depart, having wearied himſelf in vain with expectation. Yet he waſted not the Country, but contented himſelf with hope, that they would pleaſe him better in time following. So he departed thence toward Salapia, which he choſe for his wintring-place; and began to victual it when Summer was but half paſt. It is ſaid, that he was in love with a young Wench in that Town, in which regard if he began his Winter more timely than otherwiſe he required, he did not like the Romans; whom neceſſity inforced, to make their Summer laſt as long as they were able to travel up and down the Country.

About this time began great troubles in Sicil, whither Marcellus the Conſul was ſent, to take ſuch order for the Province, as need ſhould require. Of the doings there, which wore out more time than the Conſulſhip, we will ſpeak hereafter.

The new Conſuls choſen at Rome, were Q. Fabius the Son of the preſent Conſul, and T. Sempronius Gracchus the ſecond time. The Romans found it needful for the publick ſervice, to imploy oftentimes their beſt able men: and therefore made it lawful, during the war, to recontinue their Officers, and chuſe ſuch as had lately held their places before; without regarding any diſtance of time, which was otherwiſe required. The old Fabius became Lieutenant unto his Son: which was perhaps the reſpect, that moſt commended his Son unto the place. It is noted, That when the old man came into the Camp, and his Son rode forth to meet him: eleven of the twelve Lictors, which carried an Axe with a bundle of Rods before the Conſul, ſuffered him, in regard of due reverence, to paſs by them on horſe-back, which was againſt the cuſtom. But the Son perceiving this, commanded the laſt of his Lictors to note it: who thereupon bade the old Fabius alight, and come to the Conſul on his feet. The Father chearfully did ſo; ſaying, It was my mind, Son, to make tryal, whether thou didſt underſtand thy ſelf to be Conſul. Caſſius Altinius a wealthy Citizen of Arpi, who after the battel at Canna, had holpen the Carthaginian into that Town, ſeeing now the fortune of the Romans to amend, came privily to this Conſul Fabius, and offered to render it back unto him, if he might be therefore well rewarded. The Conſul purpoſed to follow old examples; and to make this Altinius a pattern to all Traitors; uſing him as Camillus and Fabricius had done thoſe that offered their faithful ſervice againſt the Faliſci, and King Pyrrhus. But Q. Fabius the Father, was of another opinion: and ſaid, it was a matter of dangerous conſequence, That it ſhould be thought more ſafe to revolt from the Romans, than to turn unto them. Wherefore it was concluded, that he ſhould be ſent to the Town of Cales, and there kept as priſoner; until they could better reſolve, what to do with him, or what uſe to make of him. Hannibal underſtanding that Altinius was gone, and among the Romans, took it not ſorrowfully; but thought this a good occaſion to ſeize upon all the mans riches, which were great. Yet that he might ſeem rather ſevere, than covetous, he ſent for the wife and children of Altinius into his Camp: where having examined them by torment, partly concerning the departure and intentions of this fugitive, partly, and more ſtrictly, about his riches, what they were, and where they lay, he condemned them as partakers of the treaſon, to be burnt alive; and took all their goods unto himſelf. Fabius the Conſul ſhortly after came to Arpi: which he won by Scalado, in a ſtormy and rainy night. Five thouſand of Hannibal's Souldiers lay in the Town; and of the Arpines themſelves, there were about three thouſand. Theſe were thruſt formoſt by the Carthaginian Garriſon; when it was underſtood, that the Romans had gotten over the Wall, and broken open a Gate. For the Souldiers held the Townſ-men ſuſpected; and therefore thought it no wiſdom to truſt them at their backs. But after ſome little reſiſtance, the Arpines gave over fight, and entertained parley with the Romans: proteſting, they had been betrayed by their Princes; and were become ſubject to the Carthaginians, againſt their wills. In proceſs of this diſcourſe, the Arpine Prætor went unto the Roman Conſul: and receiving his faith for ſecurity of the Town, preſently made head againſt the Garriſon. This notwithſtanding, like it is that Hannibal's men continued to make good reſiſtance. For when almoſt a thouſand of them that were Spaniards, offered to leave their companions, and ſerve on the Romans ſide, it was yet covenanted, that the Carthaginians ſhould be ſuffered to paſs forth quietly, and return to Hannibal. This was performed: and ſo Arpi became Roman again, with little other loſs, than of him that had betrayed it. About the ſame time Cliternum was taken by Sempronius Tuditanus one of the Prætors: and unto Cneus Fulvius, another of the Prætors, an hundred and twelve Gentlemen of Capua offered their ſervice; upon no other condition, than to have their goods reſtored unto them, when their City ſhould be recovered by the Romans. This was a thing of ſmall importance: but conſidering the general hatred of the Campans towards Rome, it ſerved to diſcover the inclination of the Italians in thoſe times; and how their affections recoyled from Hannibal, when there was no appearance of thoſe mighty ſuccours, that had been promiſed from Carthage. The Conſentines alſo, and the Thurines, people of the Brutians, which had yielded themſelves to Hannibal, returned again to their old allegiance. Others would have followed their example, but that one L. Pomponius, who of a Publican had made himſelf a Captain, and gotten reputation by ſome petty exploits in forraging the Country, was ſlain by Hanno; with a great multitude of thoſe that followed him. Hannibal in the mean while had all his care bent upon Tarentum; which if he could take, it ſeemed that it would ſtand him in good ſtead, for drawing over that help out of Macedon, which his Carthiginians failed to ſend. Long he waited ere he could bring his deſire to paſs: and being loth to hazard his forces, where he hoped to prevail by intelligence; he contented himſelf with taking in ſome poor Towns of the Salentines. At length, his Agents within Tarentum, found means to accompliſh their purpoſe, and his wiſh. One Phileas, that was of their conſpiracy, who lay at Rome as Embaſſadour, practiſing with the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, and ſuch as had the keeping of them, conveyed them by night out of the City. But he and his company the next day were ſo cloſely purſued, that all of them were taken, and brought back to Rome, where they ſuffered death as Traytors. By reaſon of this cruelty, or ſeverity, the people of Tarentum grew to hate the Romans more generally and earneſtly than before. As for the Conſpirators, they followed their buſineſs the more diligently, as knowing what reward they were to expect, if their intention ſhould happen to be diſcovered. Wherefore they ſent again to Hannibal; and acquainting him with the manner of their plot, made the ſame compoſition with him for the Tarentines, which they of Capua had made before. Nico, and Philomenes, two of the chief among them, uſed much to go forth of the Town on hunting by night; as if they durſt not take their pleaſure by day, for fear of the Carthaginians. Seldom or never they miſſed of their game: for the Carthaginians prepared it ready for their hands, that they might not ſeem to have been abroad upon other occaſion: From the Camp of Hannibal it was about three dayes journey to Tarentum, if he ſhould have marched thither with his whole Army. This cauſed his long abode in one place the leſs to be ſuſpected: as alſo, to make his enemies the more ſecure, he cauſed it to be given out, that he was ſick. But when the Romans within Tarentum, were grown careleſs of ſuch his neighbourhood, and the Conſpirators had ſet their buſineſs in order; he took with him ten thouſand the moſt expedite of his horſe and foot; and long before break of day, made all ſpeed thitherward. Fourſcore light horſe of the Numideans ran a great way before him, beating all the wayes, and killing any that they met, for fear leſt he, and his troop following him, ſhould be diſcovered. It had been often the manner of ſome few Numidian horſe, to do the like in former times. Wherefore the Roman Governour, when he heard tell in the evening, that ſome Numidians were abroad in the fields, took it for a ſign, that Hannibal was not as yet diſlodged; and gave order, that ſome companies ſhould be ſent out the next morning, to ſtrip them of their booty, and ſend them gone. But when it grew dark night; Hannibal, guided by Philomenes, came cloſe to the Town: where, according to the tokens agreed upon, making a light to ſhew his arrival; Nico, that was within the Town, anſwered him with another light, in ſign that he was ready. Preſently Nico began to ſet upon one of the Gates, and to kill the watch-men. Philomenes went toward another gate: and whiſtling (as was his manner) called up the Porter; bidding him make haſte, for that he had killed a great Bore, ſo heavy, that ſcarce two men could ſtand under under it. So the Porter opened the wicket: and forthwith entred two young men, loaden with the Bore; which Hannibal had prepared large enough, to be worthy the looking on. While the Porter ſtood wondring at the largeneſs of the beaſt, Philomenes ran him through with his Bore-ſpear: and letting in ſome thirty armed men, fell upon all the watch; whom when he had ſlain, he entred the great gate. So the Army of Hannibal entring Tarentum at two Gates, went directly toward the Market place, where both parts met. Thence they were diſtributed by their General, and ſent into all quarters of the City, with Tarentines to be their guides. They were commanded to kill all the Romans, and not to hurt the Citizens. For better performance hereof, Hannibal willed the Conſpirators, that when any of their friends appeared in ſight, they ſhould bid him be quiet, and of good chear. All the Town was in an uproar: but few could tell what the matter meant. A Roman trumpet was unſkilfully ſounded by a Greek in the Theater: which helped the ſuſpition, both of the Tarentines, that the Romans were about to ſpoil the Town; and of the Romans, that the Citizens were in commotion. The Governour fled into the Port: and taking boat, got into the Citadel, that ſtood in the mouth of the Haven; whence he might eaſily perceive the next morning, how all had paſſed. Hannibal aſſembling the Tarentines, gave them to underſtand, what good affection he bore them; inveighed bitterly againſt the Romans, as tyrannous oppreſſours; and ſpake what elſe he thought fit for the preſent. This done, and having gotten ſuch ſpoil as was to be had of the Souldiers goods in the Town, he addreſſed himſelf againſt the Citadel; hoping that if the Garriſon would ſally out, he might give them ſuch a blow, as ſhould make them unable to defend the Piece. According to his expectation it partly fell out. For when he began to make his approaches, the Romans in a bravery ſallying forth, gave charge upon his men: who fell back of purpoſe according to direction, till they had drawn on as many as they could, and ſo far from their ſtrength, as they durſt adventure. Then gave Hannibal a ſign to his Carthaginians, who lay prepared ready for the purpoſe: and fiercely ſetting upon the Enemy, drave him back with great ſlaughter, as faſt as he could run; ſo that afterwards he durſt not iſſue forth. The Citadel ſtood upon a Demi-Iſland, that was plain ground; and fortified only with a Ditch and Wall againſt the Town, whereunto it was joyned by a cawſey. This cawſey Hannibal intended to fortifie in like ſort againſt the Citadel; to the end that the Tarentines might be able, without his help, to keep themſelves from all danger thence. His work in few dayes went ſo well forward, without impediment from the beſieged, that he conceived hope of winning the piece it ſelf, by taking a little more pains. Wherefore he made ready all ſorts of engines, to force the place. But whilſt he was buſied in his works, there came by Sea a ſtrong ſupply from Metapontum: which took away all hope of prevailing; and made him return to his former counſel. Now foraſmuch as the Tarentine fleet lay within the haven, and could not paſs forth, whileſt the Romans held the Citadel: it ſeemed likely that the Town would ſuffer want, being debarred of accuſtomed trade and proviſions by Sea: whileſt the Roman garriſon by help of their ſhipping, might eaſily be relieved, and enabled to hold out. Againſt this inconvenience, it was rather wiſhed by the Tarentines, than any way hoped, that their fleet could get out of the haven; to guard the mouth of it, and cut of all ſupply from the Enemy. Hannibal told them, that this might well be done: for that their Town ſtanding in plain ground, and their ſtreets being fair and broad, it would be no hard matter to draw the Gallies over land, and lanch them into the Sea without. This he undertook, and effected: whereby the Roman garriſon was reduced into great neceſſity; though with much patience it held out, and found Hannibal oftentimes otherwiſe buſied, than his affairs required.

Thus with mutual loſs on both ſides, the time paſſed: and the Roman forces, growing daily ſtronger, Q. Fulvius Flaccus, with Appius Claudius, lately choſen Conſuls, prepared to beſiege the great City of Capua. Three and twenty Legions the Romans had now armed. This was a great and haſty growth from that want of men, and of all neceſſaries, whereinto the loſs at Cannæ had reduced them. But to fill up theſe Legions, they were fain to take up young Boyes that were under ſeventeen years of age: and to ſend Commiſſioners above fifty miles round, for the ſeeking out of ſuch Lads as might appear ſerviceable, and preſſing them to the Wars; making yet a Law, that their years of ſervice, whereinto they were bound by order of the City, ſhould be reckoned, for their benefit, from this their beginning ſo young, as if they had been of lawful age. Before the Roman Army drew near, the Campans felt great want of victual, as if they had already been beſieged. This happened partly by ſloth of the Nation, partly by the great waſte and ſpoil, which the Romans had in foregoing years made upon their grounds. They ſent therefore Embaſſadors to Hannibal; deſiring him to ſuccour them ere they were cloſed up, as they feared to be ſhortly. He gave them comfortable words, and ſent Hanno with an Army to ſupply their wants. Hanno appointed them a day; againſt which they ſhould be ready with all manner of carriages, to ſtore themſelves with victuals, that he would provide. Neither did he promiſe more than he performed. For he cauſed great quantity of grain, that had been laid up in Cities round about, to be brought into his Camp, three miles from Beneventum. Thither at the time appointed, came no more than forty Carts or Wagons, with a few pack-horſes, as if this had been enough to victual Capua. Such was the retchleſneſs of the Campans. Hanno was exceeding angry hereat: and told them they were worſe than very beaſts; ſince hunger could not teach them to have greater care. Wherefore he gave them a longer day; againſt which he made proviſion to ſtore them throughly. Of all theſe doings word was ſent to the Roman Conſuls, from the Citizens of Beneventum. Therefore Q. Fulvius the Conſul, taking with him ſuch ſtrength as he thought needful for the ſervice, came into Beneventum by night; where with diligence he made inquiry into the behaviour of the Enemy. He learned, that Hanno with part of his Army was gone abroad to make proviſions; that ſome two thouſand Wagons, with a great rabble of Carters and other Varlets, lay among the Carthaginians in their camp; ſo that little good order was kept: all thought being ſet upon a great harveſt. Hereupon the Conſul bade his men prepare themſelves to aſſail the enemies Camp: and leaving all his impediments within Beneventum, he marched thitherward ſo early in the morning, that he was there with the firſt break of day. By coming ſo unexpected, he had well near forced the Camp on the ſudden. But it was very ſtrong, and very well defended: ſo that the longer the fight continued, the leſs deſire had Fulvius to loſe more of his men in the attempt; ſeeing many of them caſt away, and yet little hope of doing good. Therefore he ſaid, that it were better to go more leiſurely and ſubſtantially to work; to ſend for his fellow-Conſul, with the reſt of their Army; and to lye between Hanno and home; that neither the Campans ſhould depart thence, nor the Carthaginians be able to relieve them. Being thus diſcourſing, and about to ſound the retrait; he ſaw that ſome of his men had gotten over the enemies Rampart. There was great booty; or (which was all one to the Souldiers) an opinion of much that might be gotten in that Camp. Wherefore ſome Enſign-bearers threw their Enſignes over the Rampart, willing their men to fetch them out, unleſs they would endure the ſhame and diſhonour following ſuch a loſs. Fear of ſuch ignominy (than which nothing could be greater) made the Souldiers adventure ſo deſperately, that Fulvius, perceiving the heat of his men, changed his purpoſe, and encouraged thoſe that were ſomewhat backward, to follow the example of them that had already gotten over the Trenches. Thus the Camp was won: in which were ſlain above ſix thouſand; and taken above ſeven thouſand, beſides all the ſtore of victuals, and carriages, with abundance of booty, that Hanno had lately gotten from the Roman Confederates. This miſadventure, and the nearer approach of both the Conſuls, made them of Capua ſend a pittiful Embaſſage to Hannibal: putting him in mind of all the love that he was wont to proteſt unto their City; and how he had made ſhew to affect it no leſs than Carthage. But now, they ſaid it would be loſt, as Arpi was lately, if he gave not ſtrong and ſpeedy ſuccour. Hannibal anſwered with comfortable words: and ſent away two thouſand horſe, to keep their grounds from ſpoil, whileſt he himſelf was detained about Tarentum, partly by hope of winning the Citadel, partly by the diſpoſition, which he ſaw in many Towns adjoyning, to yield unto him. Among the Hoſtages of the Tarentines, that lately had fled out of Rome, and being overtaken, ſuffered death for their attempt; were ſome of the Metapontines, and other Cities of the Greeks, inhabiting that Eaſtern part of Italy, which was called of old, Magna Græcia. Theſe people took to heart the death of their Hoſtages, and thought the puniſhment greater than the offence. Wherefore the Metapontines, as ſoon as the Roman garriſon was taken from them to defend the Citadel of Tarentum, made no more ado, but opened their gates to Hannibal. The Thurines would have done the like, upon the like reaſon, had not ſome companies layn in their Town; which they feared that they ſhould not be able to maſter. Nevertheleſs, they helped themſelves by cunning: inviting to their gates Hanno and Mago, that were near at hand: againſt whom whileſt they proffered their ſervice to Atinius the Roman Captain, they drew him forth to fight, and recoyling from him, cloſed up their gates. A little for-formality they uſed in pretending fear, leſt the enemy ſhould break in together with the Romans, in ſaving Atinius himſelf, and ſending him away by Sea; as alſo in conſulting a ſmall while (becauſe perhaps many of their chief men were unacquainted with the practice) whether they ſhould yield to the Carthaginian or no. But this diſputation laſted not long: for they that had removed the chief impediment, eaſily prevailed in the reſt; and delivered up the Town to Hanno and Mago. This good ſucceſs, and hope of the like, detained Hannibal in thoſe quarters, whileſt the Conſuls fortifying Beneventum to ſecure their backs, addreſſed themſelves to the ſiege of Capua.

Many diſaſters befell the Romans, in the beginning of this great enterpriſe. T. Sempronius Gracchus, a very good man of War, that had of late been twice Conſul, was ſlain, either by treachery of ſome Lucans, that drew him into ambuſh, or by ſome Carthaginian ſtragglers, among whom he fell unawares. His body, or his head, was very honourably interred, either by Hannibal himſelf, or (for the reports agree not) by the Romans; to whom Hannibal ſent it. He was appointed to lie in Beneventum, there to ſecure the back of the Army that ſhould beſiege Capua. But his death hapned in an ill time, to the great hinderance of that buſineſs. The Volones or Slaves lately manumiſed, forſook their Enſigns, and went every one whither he thought good, as if they had been diſcharged by the deceaſe of their Leader; ſo that it aſked ſome labour to ſeek them out, and bring them back into their Camp. Nevertheleſs, the Conſuls went forward with their work, and drawing near to Capua, did all acts of hoſtility, which they could. Mago the Carthaginian, and the Citizens of Capua gave them an hard welcome, wherein above fifteen hundred Romans were loſt. Neither was it long ere Hannibal came thither, who fought with the Conſuls, and had the better; inſomuch that it cauſed them to diſlodge. They removed by night, and went ſeveral waies: Fulvius towards Cannæ, Claudius into Lucania. Hannibal followed after Claudius, who having led him a great walk, fetcht a compaſs about, and returned to Capua. It ſo fell out, that one Marcus Centenius Penula, a ſtout man, and one that with good commendations had diſcharged the place of a Centurion, lay with an Army not far from thence, where Hannibal reſted, when he was weary of hunting after Claudius. This Penula had made great vaunts to the Roman Senate, of wonders which he would work, if he might be truſted with the leading of five thouſand men. The Fathers were unwilling in ſuch a time, to reject the vertue of any good Souldier, how mean ſoever his condition were. Wherefore they gave him the charge of eight thouſand: and he himſelf being a proper man, and talking bravely, gathered up ſo many voluntaries, as almoſt doubled his number. But meeting thus with Hannibal, he gave proof of the difference between a ſtout Centurion, and one able to command in chief. He and his fellows were all (in a manner) ſlain, ſcarce a thouſand of them eſcaping. Soon after this, Hannibal had word, that Cneus Fulvius a Roman Prætor with eighteen thouſand men was in Apulia, very careleſs and a man inſufficient for the charge which he held. Thither therefore he haſted to viſit him: hoping to deal the better with the main ſtrength of Rome, which pointed at Capua, when he ſhould have cut off thoſe forces that lay in the Provinces about, under men of ſmall ability. Coming upon Fulvius, he found him and his men ſo jolly, that needs they would have fought the firſt night. Wherefore it was not to be doubted, what would happen the day following. So he beſtowed Mago with three thouſand of his lighteſt armed, in places thereabout moſt fit for ambuſh. Then offered battel to Fulvius, he ſoon had him in the trap: whence he made him glad to eſcape alive; leaving all, ſave two thouſand of his followers, dead behind him.

Theſe two great blows, received the one preſently after the other, much aſtoniſhed the Romans. Nevertheleſs, all care was taken, to gather up the ſmall reliques of the broken Armies: and that the Conſuls ſhould go ſubſtantially forwards with the ſiege of Capua: which was of great conſequence, both in matter of reputation, and in many other reſpects. The two Conſuls ſate down before the Town, and C. Claudius Nero, one of the Prætors, came with his Army from Sueſſula, to their aſſiſtance. They made Proclamation, That whoſoever would iſſue out of Capua before a certain day prefixed, ſhould have his pardon, and be ſuffered to enjoy all that unto him belonged: which day being paſt, there ſhould be no grace expected. This offer was contumeliouſly rejected; the Capuans relying on their own ſtrength, and the ſuccours attended from Hannibal. Before the City was cloſed up, they ſent meſſengers to the Carthaginian; which found him at Brunduſium. He had made a long journey in hope of gaining the Tarentine Citadel: of which expectation failing, he turned to Brunduſium, upon advertiſement that he ſhould be let in. There the Capuans met him, told him of their danger with earneſt words; and were with words as bravely re-comforted. He bade them conſider, how, a few dayes ſince he had chaſed the Conſuls out of their fields; and told them, that he would preſently come thither again, and ſend the Romans going as faſt as before. With this good anſwer the Meſſengers returned, and hardly could get back into the City; which the Romans had almoſt intrenched round. As for Hannibal himſelf, he was of opinion, that Capua, being very well manned, and heartily devoted unto his friendſhip, would hold out a long time, and thereby give him leiſure to do what he thought requiſite among the Tarentines, and in thoſe Eaſtern parts of Italy; whilſt the Roman Army ſpent it ſelf in a tedious ſiege. Thus he lingred, and thereby gave the Conſuls time both to fortifie themſelves at Capua, and to diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates in Rome; whilſt he himſelf purſued hopes that never found ſucceſs.

Claudius and Fulvius, when their term of office was expired, were appointed to continue the ſiege at Capua; retaining the ſame Armies, as Proconſuls. The Towns-men often ſallied out, rather in a bravery, than likelihood to work any matter of effect; the Enemy lying cloſe within his Trenches, as intending without other violence, to ſubdue them by famine. Yet againſt the Campan horſe (for their foot was eaſily beaten) the Romans uſed to thruſt out ſome troops, that ſhould hold them ſkirmiſh. In theſe exerciſes the Campans uſually had the better, to the great grief of their proud Enemy; who ſcorned to take foil at the hands of ſuch Rebels. It was therefore, deviſed that ſome active and couragious young men ſhould learn to ride behind the Roman men at arms; leaping up, and again diſmounting lightly, as occaſion ſerved. Theſe were furniſhed like the Velites, having each of them three or four ſmall darts: which alighting in time of conflict, they diſcharged thick upon the Enemies horſe; whom vanquiſhing in this kind of ſervice, they much diſheartned in the main. The time thus paſſing, and famine daily increaſing within the City, Hannibal came at length, not expected by the Romans: and taking a Fort of theirs, called Galatia, fell upon their Camp. At the ſame time the Capuans iſſued with their whole power, in as terrible manner as they could deviſe: ſetting all their multitude of unſerviceable people by the walls, which with a loud noiſe of Pans and Baſons, troubled thoſe that were occupied in fight. Appius Claudius oppoſing himſelf to the Campans, eaſily defended his Trenches againſt them; and ſo well repreſſed them, that he drave them at length back into their City. Nevertheleſs, in purſuing them to their gates, he received a wound that accompanied him in ſhort ſpace after to his grave. Q. Fulvius was held harder to this taſk by Hannibal, and the Carthaginian Army. The Roman Camp was even at point to have been loſt; and Hannibal his Elephants, of which he brought three and thirty, were either gotten within the rampart, or elſe (for the report varies) being ſome of them ſlain upon it, fell into the ditch, and filled it up in ſuch ſort, that their bodies ſerved as a bridge to the Aſſailants. It is ſaid, that Hannibal in this tumult cauſed ſome fugitives that could ſpeak Latin well, to proclaim aloud as it were in the Conſuls name, That every one of the Souldiers ſhould ſhift for himſelf, and fly betimes unto the next hills, for as much as the Camp was already loſt. But all would not ſerve. The fraud was detected; and the Army having ſitten there ſo long, had at good leiſure ſtrongly intrenched it ſelf, ſo as little hope there was to raiſe the ſiege by force.

This did extremely perplex the Carthaginian. The purchaſe of Capua had (as was thought) with-held him from taking Rome it ſelf: and now his deſire of winning the Tarentine Citadel, had well-near loſt Capua; in reſpect of which, neither the Citadel, nor the City of Tarentum were to have been much regarded. Falling therefore into a deſperate anger with himſelf and his hard fortune, that of ſo many great victories he had made no greater uſe: on the ſudden he entertained an haughty reſolution, even to ſet upon Rome; and carry to the walls of that proud City, the danger of War that threatned Capua. This, he thought, would be a mean, to draw the Roman Generals, or one of them at leaſt, unto the defence of their own home. If they roſe from the ſiege with their whole Army, then had he his deſire: if they divided their forces, then was it likely, that either he or the Campans, ſhould well enough deal with them apart. Neither did he deſpair, that the terrour of his coming might ſo aſtoniſh the multitude within Rome, as he might enter ſome part or other of the City. His only fear was, leſt the Campans, being ignorant of his purpoſe, ſhould think he had forſaken them; and thereupon forthwith yield themſelves to the Enemy. To prevent this danger, he ſent letters to Capua by a ſubtle Numidian; who running as a fugitive into the Roman Camp, conveyed himſelf thence over the innermoſt Trenches

into the City. The Journey to Rome was to be performed with great celerity: no ſmall hope of good ſucceſs reſting in the ſuddenneſs of his arrival there. Wherefore he cauſed his men to have in a readineſs ten dayes victuals; and prepared as many boats, as might in one night tranſport his Army over the River Vulturnus. This could not be done ſo cloſely, but that the Roman Generals, by ſome fugitives, had notice of his purpoſe. With this danger therefore they acquainted the Senate; which was therewith affected, according to the diverſity of mens opinions, in a caſe of ſuch importance. Some gave counſel to let alone Capua, yea, and all places elſe, rather than to put the Town of Rome into peril of being taken by the enemy. Others were ſo far from allowing of this, as they wondred how any man could think, that Hannibal, being unable to relieve Capua, ſhould judge himſelf ſtrong enough to win Rome; and therefore ſtoutly ſaid, That thoſe Legions, which were kept at home for defence of the City, would ſerve the turn well enough, to keep him out and ſend him thence, if he were ſo unwiſe as to come thither. But it was finally concluded, that Letters ſhould be ſent to Fulvius and Claudius, acquainting them perfectly with the forces, that at the preſent were in Rome: who, ſince they knew beſt what the ſtrength was which Hannibal could bring along with him, were beſt able to judge, what was needful to oppoſe him. So it was referred unto the diſcretion of theſe Generals at Capua, to do as they thought behoveful: and if it might conveniently be, neither to raiſe their ſiege, nor yet to put the City of Rome into much adventure. According to this Decree of the Senate, Q. Fulvius took fifteen thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, the choice of his whole Army; with which he haſted toward Rome; leaving App. Claudius, who could not travel by reaſon of his wound, to continue the ſiege at Capua.

Hannibal having paſſed over Vulturnus, burnt up all his boats, and left nothing that might tranſport the Enemy, in caſe he ſhould offer to purſue or coaſt him. Then haſted he away toward Rome, ſtaying no longer in any one place, than he needs muſt. Yet found he the Bridges over Liris broken down by the people of Fregellæ: which, as it ſtopped him a little on his way; ſo it made him the more grievouſly to ſpoil their Lands, while the Bridges were in mending. The nearer that he drew to Rome, the greater waſte he made: his Numidians running before him; driving the Country, and killing or taking multitudes of all ſorts and ages, that fled out of all parts round about. The Meſſengers of theſe news came apace, one after another into the City; ſome few bringing true advertiſements; but the moſt of them reporting the conceits of their own fear. All the Streets and Temples in Rome were peſtred with women, crying, and praying, and rubbing the Altars with their hair, becauſe they could do none other good. The Senators were all in the great Market, or place of Aſſembly; ready to give their advice, if it were aſked, or to take directions given by the Magiſtrates. All places of moſt importance were ſtuffed with ſouldiers: it being uncertain, upon which part Hannibal would fall. In the midſt of this trepidation, there came news that Quintus Fulvius, with part of the Army from Capua, was haſting to the defence of the City. The Office of a Proconſul did expire, at his return home, and entring into the Gates of Rome. Wherefore, that Fulvius might loſe nothing by coming into the City, in time of ſuch need, an Act was paſſed, That he ſhould have equal power with the Conſuls during his abode there. He and Hannibal arrived at Rome, one ſoon after another: Fulvius having been long held occupied in paſſing over Vulturnus; and Hannibal receiving impediment in his journey, as much as the Country was able to give. The Conſuls, and Fulvius incamped without the Gates of Rome, attending the Carthaginian. Thither they called the Senate: and as the danger grew nearer and greater; ſo took they more careful & eſpecial order againſt all occurrences. Hannibal came to the River Anio, or Anien, three miles from the Town; whence he advanced with two thouſand horſe, and rode along a great way under the Walls, viewing the ſight thereof, and conſidering how he might beſt approach it. But he either went, or (as the Roman Story ſaith) was driven away, without doing or receiving any hurt. Many tumults roſe in this while among the people; but were ſuppreſſed by the care and diligence of the Senators. Above the reſt, one accident was both troubleſome, and not without peril. Of Numidians that had ſhifted aſide, and fallen (upon ſome diſpleaſures) from Hannibal to the Romans, there were ſome twelve hundred then in Rome; which were appointed by the Conſuls, to paſs thorow the Town, from the Mount Aventine, to the Gate Colliatna, where it was thought that their ſervice might be uſeful; among broken wayes, and Garden-walls lying in the ſuburbs. The faces of theſe men, and their furniture, wherein they differed not from the followers of Hannibal; bred

ſuch miſtaking, as cauſed a great uproar among the people: all crying out that Aventine was taken, and the Enemy gotten within the walls. The noiſe was ſuch, that men could not be informed of the truth: and the ſtreets were ſo full of cattel, and husbandmen, which were fled thither out of the Villages adjoyning, that the paſſage was ſtopt up: and the poor Numidians pitifully beaten from the houſe tops, with ſtones and other weapons that came next to hand, by the deſperate multitude, that would have run out at the Gates, had it not been certain who lay under the Walls. To remedy the like inconveniences, it was ordained, That all which had been dictators, Conſuls, or Cenſors, ſhould have authority as Magiſtrates, till the Enemy departed. The day following Hannibal paſſed over Anien, and preſented battel to the Romans, who did not wiſely if they undertook it. It is ſaid, that a terrible ſhowre of rain, cauſed both Romans and Carthaginians to return into their ſeveral Camps, and that this happened two dayes together, the weather breaking up and clearing as ſoon as they were departed aſunder: certain it is, that Hannibal, who had brought along with him no more than ten dayes proviſion, could not endure to ſtay there, until his victuals were all ſpent. In which regard the Romans, if they ſuffered him to waſte his time and proviſions, knowing that he could not abide there long, did as became well adviſed men: if they offered to fight with him, and either had the better, or were parted (as is ſaid) by ſome accident of weather, the commendations muſt be given to their fortune. The terror of Hannibals coming to the City, how great ſoever it was at the firſt, yet after ſome leiſure, and better notice taken of their forces, which appeared leſs than the firſt apprehenſion had formed them, was much and ſoon abated. Hereupon it helped well, that at the ſame time the Supply appointed for Spain, after the death of the two Scipio's, were ſent out of the Town, and went forth at the Gate, whilſt one Carthaginian lay before another. In all Pinck terrours, as they are called, whereof there is either no cauſe known, or no cauſe anſwerable to the greatneſs of the ſudden conſternation; it is a good remedy to do ſomewhat quite contrary to that which the danger would require, were it ſuch as men have faſhioned it in their amazed conceits. Thus did Alexander cauſe his ſouldiers to diſarm themſelves, when they were all on a ſudden in a great fear of they wiſt not what. And thus did Clearchus pacifie a fooliſh uproar in his Army, by proclaiming a reward unto him that could tell who had ſent the Aſs into the Camp. But in this preſent example of the Romans, appears withall a great magnanimity; whereby they ſuſtained their reputation, and augmented it no leſs, than by this bold attempt of Hannibal it might ſeem to have been diminiſhed. Neither could they more finely have checked the glorious conceits of their enemy, and taken away the diſgrace of that fear, which clouded their valour at his firſt coming; than by making ſuch demonſtrations, when once they had recovered ſpirit, how little they eſteemed him. To this purpoſe therefore that very piece of ground, on which the Carthaginian lay encamped, was ſold in Rome: and ſold it was nothing under the value, but at as good a rate, as if it had been in time of peace. This dignity coming to his ear, incenſed Hannibal ſo much, that he made port-ſale of the Silver-ſmiths ſhops, which were near about the Market or Common place in Rome; as if his own title to the houſes within the Town were no whit worſe, than any Roman Citizens could be unto that piece of ground, whereon he raiſed his Tent. But this counter-practice was nothing worth. The Romans did ſeek to manifeſt that aſſurance which they juſtly had conceived; Hannibal, to make ſhew of continuing in an hope, which was already paſt. His victuals were almoſt ſpent: and of thoſe ends, that he had propoſed unto himſelf, this Journey had brought forth none other, than the fame of his much daring. Wherefore he brake up his Camp: and doing what ſpoil he could to the Roman Territory, without ſparing religious places, wherein wealth was to be gotten, he paſſed like a tempeſt over the Country, and ran toward the Eaſtern Sea ſo faſt, that he had almoſt taken the City of Rhegium before his arrival was feared or ſuſpected. As for Capua, he gave it loſt: and is likely to have curſed the whole faction of Hanno, which thus diſabled him to relieve that fair City, ſince he had no other way to vent his grief.

2. Fabius returning back to Capua, made Proclamation anew, that whoſo would yield before a certain day, might ſafely do it. This, and the very return of Fulvius, without any more appearance of Hannibal, gave the Capuans to underſtand, that they were abandoned, and their caſe deſperate. To truſt the Roman pardon proclaimed, every mans conſcience of his own evil deſerts, told him, that it was a vanity: and ſome faint hope was given, by Hanno and Boſtar, Captains of the Carthaginian Garriſon within the Town, that Hannibal ſhould come again, if means could only be found, how to convey ſuch Letters unto him as they would write. The carriage of the Letters was undertaken by ſome Numidians; who running as fugitives, out of the Town into the Roman Camp, waited fit opportunity to make an eſcape thence with their packets. But it happened ere they could convey themſelves away, that one of them was detected by an harlot following him out of the Town; and the Letters of Boſtar and Hanno were taken and opened, containing a vehement entreaty unto Hannibal, that he would not thus forſake the Capuans and them. For (ſaid they) we came not hither to make War againſt Rhegium and Tarentum, but againſt the Romans: whoſe Legions, whereſoever they lye, there alſo ſhould the Carthaginian Army be ready to attend them; and by taking ſuch a courſe, have we gotten thoſe victories at Trebia, Thraſymene, and Cannæ. In fine, they beſought him, that he would not diſhonour himſelf, and betray them to their enemies, by turning another away; as if it were his only care, that the City ſhould not be taken in his full view; promiſing to make a deſperate ſally, if he would once more adventure to ſet upon the Roman Camp. Such were the hopes of Boſtar and his fellow.

But Hannibal had already done his beſt; and now began to faint under the burden of that War, wherein as afterward he proteſted he was vanquiſhed by Hanno and his Perſians, in the Carthaginian Senate, rather than by any force of Rome. It may well be, as a thing incident in like caſes, that ſome of thoſe which were beſieged in Capua, had been ſent over by the Hannonians, to obſerve the doings of Hannibal, and to check his proceedings. If this were ſo, juſtly might they curſe their own malice, which had caſt them into this remedileſs neceſſity. Howſoever it were, the Letters directed unto Hannibal, fell (as is ſhewed) unto the Roman Proconſuls hands; who cutting off the hands of all ſuch counterfeit fugitives, as carried ſuch meſſages, whipt them back into the Town. This miſerable ſpectacle brake the hearts of the Campans, ſo that the multitude crying out upon the Senate, with menacing terms, cauſed them to aſſemble and conſult, about the yielding up of Capua unto the Romans. The braveſt of the Senators and ſuch as a few years ſince, had been moſt forward in joyning with Hannibal, underſtood well enough whereunto the matter tended. Wherefore one of them invited the reſt home to ſupper; telling them, that when they had made good chear, he would drink to them ſuch an health, as ſhould ſet them free from that cruel revenge, which the Enemies ſought upon their bodies. About ſeven and twenty of the Senators there were, that liking well of his motion, ended their lives together by drinking poyſon. All the reſt hoping for more mercy than they had deſerved, yielded ſimply to diſcretion. So one of the Town-gates was ſet open; whereat a Roman Legion, with ſome other Companies, entring, diſarmed the Citizens; apprehended the Carthaginian Garriſon; and commanded all the Senators of Capua to go forth into the Roman Camp. At their coming thither, the Proconſuls laid Irons upon them all, and commanding them to tell what ſtore of gold and ſilver they had at home, ſent them into ſafe cuſtody; ſome to Cales, others to Theanum. Touching the general multitude, they were reſerved unto the diſcretion of the Senate, yet ſo hardly uſed by Fulvius in the mean while, that they had little cauſe of hope or comfort in this adverſity. Ap. Claudius was brought even to the point of death, by the wound which he had lately received; yet was he not inexorable to the Campans; as having loved them well in former times, and having giving his Daughter in marriage to that Pacuvius, of whom he ſpake before. But this facility of his Colleague, made Fulvius the more haſty in taking vengeance; for fear, leſt upon the like reſpects, the Roman Senate might prove more gentle, than he thought behoveful to the common ſafety, and honour of their ſtate. Wherefore he took the pains to ride by night unto Theanum, and from thence to Cales; where he cauſed all the Campan priſoners to ſuffer death; binding them to ſtakes, and ſcourging them firſt a good while with rods; after which he ſtruck off their heads.

This terrible example of vengeance, which the Carthaginians could not hinder, made all Towns of Italy the leſs apt to follow the vain hope of the Campans; and bred a general inclination, to return upon good conditions to the Roman ſide. The Atellans, Calatines and Sabatines, people of the Campans, that in the former change had followed the fortune of Capua, made alſo now the like ſubmiſſion, for very fear and want of ability to reſiſt. They were therefore uſed with the like rigour, by Fulvius; who dealt ſo extremely with them all, that he brought them into deſperation. Wherefore ſome of their young Gentlemen burning with fire of revenge got into Rome; where they found means by night-time, to ſet on fire many houſes, that a great part of the City was like to have been conſumed. The beginning of the fire in divers places at once, argued that it was no casualty. Wherefore liberty was proclaimed unto any slave, and other sufficient reward to any free-man, that should discover who those Incendiaries were. Thus all came out; and the Campans being detected by a slave of their own (to whom, above his liberty promised, was given about the summ of an hundred marks) had the punishment answerable to their deserts. Fulvius hereby being more and more incensed against this wretched people, held them in a manner as prisoners within their Walls: and this extreme severity caused them at length to become suppliants unto the Roman Senate; that some period might be set unto their miseries. That whereupon the Senators resolved in the end, was worse than all that which they had suffered before. Only two poor women in Capua (of which one had been an harlot) were found not guilty of the late rebellion. The rest were, some of them, with their wives and children sold for slaves, and their goods confiscated; others laid in prison, and reserved to further deliberation: but the generality of them, commanded to depart out of Campania by a certain day, and confined unto several places, as best liked the angry victors. As for the Town of Capua, it was suffered to stand, in regard of the beauty and commodious sight: but no corporation or form of polity was allowed to be therein; only a Roman Provost was every year sent to govern over those that should inhabit it, and to do justice. This was the greatest act, and most important, hitherto done by the people of Rome, after many great losses in the present War. After this, the glory of Hannibal began to shine with a more dim light than before: his oyl being far spent and that which should have revived his flame, being unfortunately shed; as shall be told in place convenient.

§. XV.

How the Carthaginians, making a party in Sardinia and Sicil, held War against the Romans in those Islands, and were overcome.

WHilst things passed thus in Italy, the commotions raised in Sardinia and Sicil by the Carthaginians and their friends, were brought to a quiet and happy end by the industrious valour of the Romans. The Sardinian rebellion was great and sudden: above thirty thousand being up in arms, ere the Roman forces could arrive there to suppress it. One Harsicoras with his Son Hyostus, mighty men in that Island, were the Ring-leaders; being incited by Hanno a Carthaginian, that promised the assistance of his Country. Neither were the Carthaginians in this enterprise so careless, as in the rest of their main undertakings, about the same time. Yet it had been better if their care had been directed unto the prosecution of that main business in Italy; whereon this and all other hopes depended. For it would have sufficed, if they could have hindred the Romans from sending an Army into Sardinia. Harsicoras with his followers might well enough have served to drive out Quintus Mutius the Prætor; who lay sick in the Province; and not more weak in his own body, than in his train. But whilst they sought revenge of that particular injury, whereof the sense was most grievous; they neglected the opportunity of requiting those that had done them wrong, and of the securing themselves from all injuries in the future. Their fortune also in this enterprise was such, as may seem to have encouraged them from being at the like charge, in cases of more importance. For, whereas they sent over Asdrubal, surnamed the Bald, with a competent Fleet and Army, assisted in this expedition by Hanno the Author of the rebellion, and by Mago a Gentleman of the Barchine house, and near kinsman to Hannibal: it so fell out, that the whole Fleet, by extremity of foul weather, was cast upon the Balcares; so beaten, and in such evil plight, that the Sardinians had even spent their hearts, and were in a manner quite vanquished, ere these their friends could arrive to succour them.

Titus Manlius was sent from Rome with two and twenty thousand foot, and twelve hundred horse, to settle the estate of that Island, which he had taken in, and annexed unto the Roman Dominion, long before this, in his Consulship. It was a laudable custom of the Romans, to preserve and uphold in their several Provinces, the greatness and reputation of those men, and their families, by whom each Province had been first subdued unto their Empire. If any injury were done unto the Provincials, if any grace were to be obtained from the Senate, or whatsoever accident required the assistance of a Patron; the first Conqueror, and his race after him, were the most ready and best approved means, to procure the benefit of the people subdued. Hereby the Romans held very sure intelligence in every Province, and had alwayes in readiness fit men to reclaim their subjects, if they fell into any such disorder, as would otherwise have required required a greater charge and trouble. The coming of Manlius retained in obedience all that were not already broken too far out. Yet was Harſicoras ſo ſtrong in field, that Manlius was compelled to arm his Mariners: without whom he could not have made up that number of two and twenty thouſand, whereof we have ſpoken before: he landed at Calaris, or Carallis, where mooring his ſhips, he paſſed up into the Country, and ſought out the enemy. Hyoſtus, the Son of Harſicoras, had then the command of the Sardinian Army left unto him by his Father, who was gon abroad into the Country, to draw in more friends to their ſide. This young Gentleman would needs adventure to get honour, by giving battle to the Romans at his own diſcretion. So he raſhly adventured to fight with an old Souldier; by whom he received a terrible overthrow; and loſt in one day above thirty thouſand of his followers. Hyoſtus himſelf, with the reſt of his broken troops, got into Cornus, the chief Town of the Iſland; whither Manlius purſued them. Very ſoon after this defeature came Aſdrubal with his Carthaginians; too late to win all Sardinia in ſuch haſt as he might have done, if the tempeſt had not hindred his voyage; yet ſoon enough, and ſtrong enough to ſave the Town of Cornus, and put a new ſpirit into the Rebels. Manlius hereupon withdrew himſelf back to Calaris; where he had not ſtayed long, ere the Sardinians (ſuch of them as adhered to the Roman party) craved his aſſiſtance; their Country being waſted by the Carthaginians, and the rebels, with whom they had refuſed to joyn. This drew Manlius forth of Calaris; where, if he had ſtayed a little longer, Aſdrubal would have ſought him out with ſome blemiſh to his reputation. But the fame of Aſdrubal and his company, appears to have been greater than was their ſtrength. For after ſome trial made of them in few ſkirmiſhes, Manlius adventred all to the hazard of a battle; wherein he ſlew twelve thouſand of the enemies; and took of the Sardinians and Carthaginians three thouſand. Four hours the battle laſted; and victory at length fell to the Romans, by the flight of the Iſlanders, whoſe courages had been broken in their unproſperous fight, not many dayes before. The death of young Hyoſtus, and of his Father Harſicoras, that ſlew himſelf for grief, together with the captivity of Aſdrubal himſelf with Mago and Hanno the Carthaginians, made the victory the more famous. The vanquiſhed Army fled into Cornus, whither Manlius followed them, and in ſhort ſpace wonn the Town. All other Cities of the Iſle that had rebelled, following the example of Cornus, and yielded unto the Roman; who, impoſing upon them ſuch increaſe of tribute, or other puniſhment, as beſt ſorted with the nature of their ſeveral offences, or their ability to pay, returned back to Calaris with a great booty, and from thence to Rome leaving Sardinia in quiet.

The war in Sicil was of greater length, and every way more burdenſome to Rome: as alſo the victory brought more honour and profit, for that the Romans became thereby, not only ſavers of their own, as in Sardinia, but Lords of the whole Country, by annexing the City and dominion of Syracuſe, to that which they enjoyed before. Soon after the battle at Cannæ, the old King of Syracuſe died; who had continued long a ſtedfaſt friend unto the Romans, and greatly relieved them in this preſent war. He left his Kingdom to Hieronymus his grand-child, that was about fifteen years of age; Gelo his Son, that ſhould have been his heir, being dead before. To this young King his ſucceſſor, Hiero appointed fifteen tutors; of which the principal were Andronodorus, Zoilus, and Themiſtius; who had married his daughters, or the daughters of Gelo. The reſt were ſuch, as he judged moſt likely to preſerve the Kingdom, by the ſame Art, whereby himſelf had gotten, and ſo long kept it. But within a little while, Andronodorus waxing weary of ſo many coadjutors, began to commend the ſufficiency of the young Prince, as extraordinary in one of his years; and ſaid, that he was able to rule the Kingdom without help of any Protector. Thus by giving over his own charge, he cauſed others to do the like; hoping thereby to get the King wholly into his hands; which came to paſs in a ſort, as he deſired. For Hieronymus, laying aſide all care of government, gave himſelf wholly over to his pleaſures: or, if he had any regard of his Royal dignity, it was only in matter of exterior ſhew; as wearing a Diadem, with ornaments of purple, and being attended by an armed guard. Hereby he offended the eyes of his people, that had never ſeen the like in Hiero, or in Gelo his Son. But much more he offended them, when by his inſolent behaviour, ſuitable to his outward pomp, he gave proof, that in courſe of life, he would revive the memery of Tyrants dead long ſince, from whom he took the pattern of his habit. He grew proud, luſtful, cruel, and dangerous to all that were about him; ſo that ſuch of his late tutors as could eſcape him by flight, were glad to live in baniſhment: the reſt, being moſt of them put to death by the Tyrant; many of them dying by their own hands, to avoid the danger of his diſpleaſure, that ſeemed worſe than death it ſelf. Only Andronodorus, Zoilus, and one Thraſo, continued in grace with him, and were his Counſellours, but not of his Cabinet. Theſe, howſoever they agreed in other points, were at ſome diſſention about the main point of adhering, either to the Romans, or to the Carthaginians. The two former of them were wholly for the Kings pleaſure, which was ſet on change: but Thraſo, having more regard of his honour and profit, was very earneſt to continue the amity with Rome. Whilſt as yet it remained ſomewhat doubtful which way the King would incline, a conſpiracy againſt his perſon was detected by a Groom of his; to whom one Theodorus had broken the matter. Theodorus hereupon was apprehended, and tormented; thereby to wring out of him the whole practice, and the names of the undertakers. Long it was ere he would ſpeak any thing: but yielding (as it ſeemed) in the end, unto the extremity of the torture, he confeſſed, that he had been ſet on by Thraſo; whom he appeached of the treaſon, together with many more, that were near in love or peace unto Hieronymus. All theſe therefore were put to death, being innocent of the crime wherewith they were charged. But they that were indeed the Conſpirators, walked boldly in the ſtreets, and never ſhrunk for the matter: aſſuring themſelves, that the reſolution of Theodorus would yield to no extremity. Thus they all eſcaped, and ſoon after found means to execute their purpoſe. The King himſelf, when Thraſo was taken out of the way, quickly reſolved upon ſiding with the Carthaginians, whereto he was very inclinable before. Young men, when firſt they grow Maſters of themſelves, love to ſeem wiſer than their Fathers, by taking different courſes. And the Liberality of Hiero to the Romans, in their great neceſſity, had of late been ſuch, as might have been termed exceſſive, were it not in regard of his providence; wherein he took order for his own eſtate, that depended upon theirs. But the young Nephew taking little heed of dangers far off, regarded only the things preſent; the weakneſs of Rome, the prevalent fortunes of Carthage, and the much money that his Grand-father had laid out in vain, to ſhoulder up a falling houſe. Wherefore he dealt with Hannibal; who readily entred into good correſpondence with him, that was maintained by Hippocrates and Epicides, Carthaginians born, but Grand-children of a baniſhed Syracuſian. Theſe grew into ſuch favour with Hieronymus, that they drew him whither they liſted. So that when App. Claudius the Roman Prætor, hearing what was towards, made a motion of renewing the Confederacy, between the people of Rome, and the King of Syracuſe; his meſſengers were diſmiſſed with an open ſcoff. For Hieronymus would needs have them tell him the order of the fight at Cannæ, that he might thereby learn how to accommodate himſelf, ſaying, that he could hardly believe the Carthaginians; ſo wonderful was the victory, as they reported it. Having thus diſmiſſed the Romans, he ſent Embaſſadours to Carthage, where he concluded a league: with condition, at firſt, that a great part of the Iſland ſhould be annexed to his Dominion; but afterward, that he ſhould reign over all Sicil; and the Carthaginians reſt ſatisfied with what they could get in Italy. At theſe doings Appius Claudius did not greatly ſtir; partly for the indignities that were offered; partly for that it behoved not the Romans to entertain more quarrels than were enforced upon them by neceſſity; and partly (as may ſeem) for that the reputation, both of himſelf, and of his City, had received ſuch blemiſh, by that which happened unto him in his journey, as much diſcountenanced him when he came into Sicil, and forbade him to look big. The money that Hiero had beſtowed formerly upon the Romans, wherewith to relieve them in their neceſſity, this Appius was to carry back unto him; it being refuſed by the Roman Senate, with greater bravery than their preſent fortune would allow. But inſtead of returning the mony with thanks, as he had been directed, and as it had been noiſed abroad that he ſhould do; the war againſt Philip King of Macedon (whereof we have ſpoken before) compelled the Romans to lay aſide vain-glory, and ſend word after him, that he ſhould conſign that mony over to Marcus Valerius; of whoſe voyage into Greece, the City had not otherwiſe wherewith to bear the charge. This was done accordingly, and hereby Claudius (which name in the whole continuance of that Family is taxed with pride) his errand was changed, from a glorious oſtentation of the Roman magnanimity, into ſuch a pitiful tune of thanks-giving, as muſt needs have bred ſorrow and commiſeration in ſo true a friend as Hiero; or, if it were delivered after his death, matter of paſtime and ſcorn, in Hieronymus the new King.

But whilſt Hieronymus was more deſirous of war, than well reſolved how to begin it;

it; his own death changed the form of things, and bred a great innovation in the State of Syracuſe; which thereby might have proſpered more than ever, had it been wiſely governed. Hippocrates and Epicides, of whom we ſpake before, were ſent about the Country with two thouſand men, to ſolicite the Towns, and perſwade them to ſhake off their obedience to the Romans. The King himſelf with an Army of fifteen thouſand horſe and foot, went to Leontium a City of his own Dominion: hoping that the fame of his preparation, would make the whole Iſland fall to him in all haſte; and accept him for Soveraign. There the Conſpirators took him on the ſudden, as he was paſſing thorow a narrow ſtreet: and ruſhing between him and his guard, ſtruck him dead. Forthwith liberty was proclaimed; and the ſound of that word ſo joyfully anſwered by the Leontines, that the guard of Hieronimus had little courage to revenge their Maſters death. Yet, for fear of the worſt, a great largeſs was promiſed unto the Souldiers, with rewards unto their Captains; which wrought ſo effectually, that when many wicked acts of the murdered King were reckoned up, the Army as in deteſtation of his bad life, ſuffered his carkaſs to lye unburied. This news ran quickly to Syracuſe; whither ſome of the Conſpirators, taking alſo of the Kings horſes, poſted away; to ſignifie all that had paſſed, to ſtir up the people to liberty, and to prevent Andronodorus, if he or his followers would make offer to uſurp a tyranny. The Syracuſians hereupon preſently took arms, and made themſelves Maſters of their own City. Andronodorus on the other ſide fortified the Palace, and the Iſland; being yet uncertain what to do: between deſire of making himſelf a ſoveraign Lord, and fear of ſuffering puniſhment as a Tyrant, if his enterpriſe miſcarried. His wife Demarata, that was the daughter of Hiero, cheriſhed him in his hopes; putting him in mind of that well-known Proverb, which Dionyſius had uſed; That a Tyrant ſhould keep his place, till he were haled out of it by the heels, and not ride away from it on horſe-back. But fear, and better counſel, prevailed ſo far, that Andronodorus, having ſlept upon the matter, diſſembled his affections, and deferred his hope unto better opportunity. The next day he came forth, and made a ſpeech unto the people; telling them that he was glad to ſee, how prudently they behaved themſelves in ſo great a change; that he had ſtood in fear, leſt they would not have contianed themſelves within the bounds of diſcretion; but rather have ſought to murder all without difference, that any way belonged to the Tyrant; and that, ſince he beheld their orderly proceeding, and their care, not to raviſh their liberty perforce, but to wed it unto them for ever; he was willingly come to them forth of his ſtrength, and ſurrendered up the charge committed unto him, by one that had been an evil Maſter both to him and them. Hereupon great joy was made, and Prætors choſen (as in former times) to govern the City, of which Andronodorus was one, and the chief. But ſuch was his deſire of Soveraignty, and ſo vehement were the inſtigations of his wife, that ſhortly he began to practiſe with Hippocrates, Epicides, and other Captains of the Mercenaries; hoping to make himſelf ſtrong by their help, that were leaſt pleaſed with the change. Hippocrates and Epicides had been with the Syracuſian Prætors, and told them, that being ſent from Hannibal to Hieronymus, they, according to inſtructions of their Captain, had done him, whilſt he lived, what ſervice they could; and that now they were deſirous to return home. They requeſted therefore that they might be friendly diſmiſſed, and with a convoy, that might keep them from falling into the hands of the Romans, and ſet them ſafe at Locri. This was eaſily granted; both for that the Syracuſian Magiſtrates were well contented to earn thanks of Hannibal, with ſuch a little courteſie; and for that they thought it expedient, to rid their Town quickly of this troubleſome couple, which were good Souldiers, and gracious with the Army, but otherwiſe lewd men. It was not the deſire of theſe two Sicilians, to be gone ſo haſtily as they made ſhew; they were more mindful of the buſineſs for which Hannibal had ſent them. Wherefore they inſinuated themſelves into the boſomes of ſuch as were moſt likely to fill the Army with tumult, eſpecially of the Roman fugitives, and thoſe that had cauſe to miſtruſt what ſhould become of themſelves, when the Romans and Syracuſians were come to agreement. Such inſtruments as theſe, Andronodorus had great need of: as alſo of many other, to help him in his dangerous attempt. He found Themiſtius, that had married Harmonia, the Siſter of Hieronymus, ready to take his part; as being carried with the like paſſions of his own, and of his wife. But ſeeking to increaſe the number of his adherents, he revealed the matter to one, that revealed all to the reſt of the Prætors. Hereupon it followed, that he, & Themiſtius, entring into the Senate, were ſlain out of hand: and afterward accuſed to the people, of all the evil which they had done, whileſt Hieronymus lived, as by his authority; and now ſince attempted, in ſeeking to uſurp the tyranny themſelves. It was alſo declared, that the daughters of Hiero and Gelo were acceſſary to this dangerous treaſon: and that the unquiet ſpirits of theſe women would never ceaſe to work, until they had recovered thoſe royal ornaments and Soveraign power, whereof their family was now diſpoſſeſſed. Theſe daughters therefore of Hiero and Gelo were alſo condemned to dye, and executioners preſently ſent by the enraged people, to take away their lives. Demarata and Harmonia had perhaps deſerved this heavy ſentence: but Heraclea, the daughter of Hiero, and wife of Soſippus, being altogether innocent, was murdered, together with her two young daughters, in the haſty execution of this raſh judgment. Her huſband Soſippus was a lover of the Common-wealth; and in that reſpect ſo hated by Hieromymus, that being ſent Embaſſadour to King Ptolomy, &c. he durſt not return home, but ſtayed in Egypt as a baniſhed man. This conſideration when it was too late, together with ſome pitiful accidents accompanying the ſlaughter, ſo affected the multitude, that (pardoning themſelves) all cryed out upon the Authors of ſo foul a butchery. Being thus incenſed againſt the Senate; and knowing not otherwiſe how to ſatisfie their anger, they called for an election of new Prætors, in the room of Andronodorus and Themiſtius, that were lately ſlain: meaning to ſubſtitute ſuch in their places, as the Senators ſhould have little cauſe to like. At the election were preſent a great rout, not only of the poorer Citizens, but of ſouldiers that preſſed into the throng. One of theſe named Epicides Prætor; another named Hippocrates: and the leſs that the old Prætors and Senators approved this nomination, the more eager was the multitude; and by a general cry forced them to be accepted. Theſe being made Prætors did what they could to hinder the agreement that was in hand, between the Syracuſians and the Romans. But having ſtriven in vain, and ſeeing that the people ſtood in fear of Ap. Claudius, and of Marcellus that was lately come into Sicil; they gave way unto the time, and ſuffered the old league of Hiero to be re-confirmed, which afterward they purpoſed to diſſolve by practice. The Leontines had ſome need of a garriſon; and to them was ſent Hippocrates the Prætor, attended by ſuch fugitives, and mercenary ſouldiers, as were moſt burdenſome to Syracuſe. Thither when he came, he began to do many acts of hoſtility againſt the Romans: firſt in ſecret, afterward more openly and boldly. Marcellus, rightly underſtanding the purpoſe of theſe two brethren, ſent word unto the Syracuſians, that they had already broken the league; and that the peace would never be kept ſincerely, untill this turbulent pair of brethren were expelled the Iſland. Epicides, fearing to ſuſtain the blame of his brothers proceedings, and more deſirous to ſet forward the war, than to excuſe any breach of peace; went himſelf unto the Leontines, whom he perſwaded to rebel againſt the Syracuſians. For he ſaid, that ſince they had all of late ſerved one Maſter, there was little reaſon why the Leontines ſhould not be enfranchiſed by his death, as well as the Syracuſians; yea or much rather, all things conſidered; ſince in their ſtreets the Tyrant was ſlain, and liberty firſt proclaimed. Wherefore, ſince they of Syracuſe were not contented to enjoy the Freedom purchaſed among the Leontines; but thought it good reaſon, that they ſhould bear Dominion over thoſe that had broken the Chain, wherewith both the one and the other were bound: his advice was, that ſuch their arrogancy ſhould be checked betimes, ere it could get any colour of right by preſcription. Hereunto occaſion was given by one article of the League, made of late by the Romans and Syracuſians. For it was agreed, That all which had been ſubject to Hiero and Hieronymus, ſhould henceforth be Vaſſals unto the State of Syracuſe. Againſt this article, if the Leontines would take exception, and thereby challenge their own due; Epicides told them, that in this novelty of change, they had fit opportunity to recover the freedom, which their fathers had loſt not many ages before. Neither was it unreaſonable, which this crafty Carthaginian propounded; if the Leontines had been ſubdued by the ſame hand, which took liberty from the Syracuſians. But ſeeing they had long ſince yielded unto Syracuſe, and been ſubject unto that City, by what form ſoever it was grounded; this claim of liberty was rather ſeaſonable, than juſt. Nevertheleſs, the motion of Epicides was highly approved: inſomuch that when meſſengers came ſoon after from Syracuſe, to rebuke the Leontines, for that which they had done againſt the Romans; and to denounce unto Hippocrates and Epicides, that they ſhould get them gone, either to Locri, or whither elſe they liſted, ſo that they ſtayed not in Sicil: word was returned, That they of Leontium had not requeſted the Syracuſians, to make any bargains for them with the

Romans,

Romans, nor thought themſelves bound to obſerve the covenants, which others without warrant had made in their names. This peremptory anſwer was forthwith reported unto Marcellus by the Syracuſians; who offered him their aſſiſtance in doing juſtice upon the Leontines their Rebels; with condition, That when the Town was taken, it might be theirs again. Marcellus required no better ſatisfaction: but forth-with took the buſineſs in hand, which he diſpatched in one day. At the firſt aſſault Leontium was taken, all ſave the Caſtle; whereinto Hippocrates and Epicides fled: and ſtealing thence away by night, coveighed themſelves into the Town of Herbeſus. The firſt thing that Marcellus did, when he had won the Town, was the ſame, which other Roman Captains uſed after victory, to ſeek out the fugitive Roman ſlaves and renegado's, whom he cauſed all to die: the reſt both of the Townſmen and Souldiers, he took to mercy, forbearing alſo to ſtrip or ſpoyl them. But the fame of his doings was bruited after a contrary ſort. It was ſaid, that he had ſlain Man, Woman and Child, and put the Town to ſack. Theſe news met the Syracuſian Army upon the way, as it was going to joyn with Marcellus, who had ended his buſines before. About eight thouſand Mercenaries there were, that had been ſent forth of Syracuſe, under Soſis and Dinomines, two of the Prætors; to ſerve againſt the Leontines and other rebels. Theſe Captains were honeſt men, and well affected to their Country: but the Souldiers that followed them, had thoſe diſeaſes, with which all mercenaries are commonly infected. They took the matter deeply to heart, that their fellow ſouldiers (as now they termed thoſe againſt whom they went) had been ſo cruelly butchered: and hereupon they fell to mutiny; though what to demand, or with whom to be angry, they could not tell. The Prætors therefore thought it beſt, to turn their unquiet thoughts another way, and ſet them awork in ſome place elſe: for as much as at Leontium there was no need of their ſervice. So towards Herbeſus they marched; where lay Hippocrates and Epicides, the architects of all this miſchief, deviſing what further harm they might do; but now ſo weakly accompanied, that they ſeemed unable to eſcape the puniſhments belonging to their offences paſt. Hereof the two brethren were no leſs well aware: and therefore adventured upon a remedy little leſs deſperate than their preſent caſe. They iſſued forth of Herbeſus unarmed, with Olive branches in their hands, in manner of Suppliants; and ſo preſented themſelves to the Army. Six hundred men of Crete were in the vantguard; that had been well uſed by Hieronymus: and ſome of them greatly bound unto Hannibal, who had taken them priſoners in the Italian war, and lovingly diſmiſſed them. Theſe Cretians therefore welcomed the two brethren, and bade them be of good chear, ſaying, That no man ſhould do them harm, as long as they could uſe their weapons. Herewithall the Army was at a ſtand; and the rumour of this accident ran ſwiftly from man to man, with general approbation. The Prætors thought to help the matter by ſeverity, which would not ſerve. For when they commanded theſe two traitors to be laid in Irons, the exclamation was ſo violent againſt them, that fain they were to let all alone, and return, uncertain what courſe to take, unto Megara, where they were lodged the night before. Thither when they came, Hippocrates deviſed a trick, whereby to help himſelf, and better the uncertain caſe wherein he ſtood. He cauſed Letters of his own penning, to be intercepted by ſome of his moſt truſty Cretans, directed (as they made ſhew) from the Syracuſian Prætors to Marcellus. The contents hereof were, That Marcellus had well done, in committing all to the ſword among the Leontines: but that it further behoved him, to make the like diſpatch of all the mercenaries belonging to Syracuſe; which were offenſive, all of them in general, to the liberty of the City, and the peace with Rome. When this counterfeit Epiſtle was openly rehearſed, the uproar was ſuch, that Soſis and his fellow Prætor, were glad to forſake the Camp, and fly for their lives. All the Syracuſians remaining behind, had been cut in pieces by the enraged Souldiers, if the two Artificers of the ſedition had not ſaved their lives; rather to keep them as pledges, and by them, to win their friends within the Town, than for any good will. They perſwaded alſo a miſchievous knave, that had ſerved amongſt the Leontines, to juſtifie the bruit of Marcellus cruelty, and to carry home the news to Syracuſe, as an eye-witneſs. This incenſed not only the multitude, but ſome of the Senate; and filled the whole Town with cauſeleſs indignation. In good time (ſaid ſome) was the avarice and cruelty of the Romans detected: who had they in like ſort gotten into Syracuſe, would have dealt much worſe, where their greedy appetites might have been tempted with a far greater booty. Whilſt they were thus diſcourſing, and deviſing how to keep out the wicked Romans, Hippocrates with his Army came to the gates, gates, exhorting the Citizens to let him in, unleſs for want of help, they would be betrayed to their enemies. The Prætors, with the beſt and wiſeſt of the Senate, would fain have kept him out: but the violence of the ſouldiers to force a gate, was no whit greater, than the head-ſtrong fury of thoſe within the Town, that laboured to break it open. So he entred, and immediately fell upon the Prætors, whom (being forſaken by all men) he put to the ſword, and made ſlaughter of them and their followers till night. The next day he went openly to work: and, after the common example of Tyrants, gave liberty unto all ſlaves and priſoners; and being fortified with adherents of the worſt and baſeſt ſort, made himſelf and his brother Prætors, in Title, but in effect, Lords of Syracuſe.

When Marcellus was advertiſed of this great alteration, he thought it no time for him to ſit ſtill, and attend the further iſſue. He ſent Embaſſadors to Syracuſe, that were not admitted into the Haven, but chaſed out as enemies. Then drew he near with his Army: and lodging within a mile and a half of the Town, ſent before him, ſome to require a parlee. Theſe were entertained without the walls by the two new Prætors: to whom they declared, That the Romans were come thither, not with purpoſe to do hurt, but in favour of the Syracuſians, which were oppreſſed by Tyrants; and to puniſh thoſe that had murdered and baniſhed ſo many of the principal Citizens. Wherefore they required that thoſe worthy men, their Confederates, which were chaſed out of the Town, might be ſuffered to return and enjoy their own; as alſo that the Authors of the great ſlaughter lately committed, might be delivered up. Hereto Epicides briefly anſwered, that if their errand had been to him, he could have told what to ſay to them: but ſince it was directed unto others, they ſhould do well to return, when thoſe to whom they were ſent, had the government in their hands. As for the War which they threatned, he told them, they ſhould find by experience, That to beſiege Syracuſe was another manner of work, than to take Leontium. Thus he ſent them gone; and returned back into the City. Immediately began the ſiege, which endured longer than the Romans had expected, the quick and eaſie winning of Leontium, did put Marcellus in hope, that ſo long a circuit of walls as compaſſed Syracuſe, being manned with no better kind of Souldiers, than thoſe with whom he had lately dealt, would in ſome part or other, be taken at the firſt aſſault. Wherefore he omitted no violence or terrour in the very beginning; but did his beſt both by Land and Sea. Nevertheleſs all his labour was diſappointed, and his hope of prevailing by open force, taken from him by the ill ſucceſs of two or three of the firſt aſſaults. Yet was it not the vertue of the Defendants, or any ſtrength of the City, that bred ſuch deſpair of haſty victory. But there lived at that time in Syracuſe Archimedes the noble Mathematician: who at the requeſt of Hiero the late King, that was his kinſman, had framed ſuch engines of war, as being in this extremity put in uſe, did more miſchief to the Romans than could have been wrought by the Canon, or any inſtruments of Gun-powder; had they in that age been known. This Archimedes diſcourſing once with Hiero, maintained that it were poſſible to remove the whole earth out of the place wherein it is, if there were ſome other earth, or place of ſure footing, whereon a man might ſtand. For proof of this bold aſſertion, he performed ſome ſtrange works; which made the King entreat him to convert his ſtudy unto things of uſe: that might preſerve the City from danger of enemies. To ſuch Mechanical works, Archimedes, and the Philoſophers of thoſe times, had little affection. They held it an injury done unto the liberal ſciences, to ſubmit learned Propoſitions, unto the workmanſhip, and gain, of baſe handy-crafts men. And of this opinion Plato was an Authour: who greatly blamed ſome Geometricians, that ſeemed unto him to prophane their ſcience, by making it vulgar. Neither muſt we raſhly taſk a man ſo wiſe as Plato, with the imputation of ſupercillious auſterity, or affected ſingularity in his reprehenſion. For it hath been the unhappy fate of great inventions to be vilified, as idle fancies, or dreams, before they were publiſhed: and being once made known, to be undervalued; as falling within compaſs of the meaneſt wit; and things that every one could well have performed. Hereof (to omit that memorable example of Columbus his diſcovery, with the much different ſorts of neglect, which he under-went before and after it) in a familiar and moſt homely example we may ſee moſt apparent proof. He that looks upon our Engliſh Brewers, and their ſervants, that are daily exerciſed in the Trade; will think it ridiculous to hear one ſay, that the making of Malt was an invention, proceeding from ſome of an extraordinary knowledge in natural Philoſophy. Yet is not the ſkill of the inventors any whit the leſs, for that the labour of workmanſhip grows to be the trade trade of ignorant men. The like may be ſaid of many handy-crafts: and particularly in the Printing of Books; which being deviſed and bettered by great ſcholars and wiſe men, grew afterward corrupted by thoſe, to whom the practice fell; that is, by ſuch as could ſlubber things eaſily over, and feed their workmen at the cheapeſt rate. In this reſpect therefore, the Alchymiſts, and all others that have, or would ſeem to have any ſecret ſkill, whereof the publication might do good unto mankind; are not without excuſe of their cloſe concealing. For it is a kind of injuſtice, that the long travels of an underſtanding brain, beſide the loſs of time, and other expence, ſhould be caſt away upon men of no worth; yield leſs benefit unto the Author of a great work, than to meer ſtrangers; and perhaps his enemies. And ſurely, if the paſſion of Envy have in it any thing allowable and natural, as having Anger, Fear, and other like Affections: it is in ſome ſuch caſe as this; and ſerveth againſt thoſe, which would uſurp the knowledge, wherewith God hath denied to indue them. Nevertheleſs, if we have regard unto common charity, and the great affection that every one ought to bear unto the generallity of mankind, after the example of him that ſuffereth his Sun to ſhine upon the juſt, and unjuſt: it will appear more commendable in wiſe men, to enlarge themſelves, and to publiſh unto the world, thoſe good things that lay buried in their own boſoms. This ought ſpecially to be done, when a profitable knowledge hath not annexed to it ſome dangerous cunning, that may be perverted by evil men to a miſchievous uſe. For if the ſecret of any rare Antidote, contained in it the ſkill of giving ſome deadly and irrecoverable poiſon: much better it were, that ſuch a Jewel remain cloſe in the hands of a wiſe and honeſt man, than being made common, bind all men to uſe the remedy, by teaching the worſt men how to do miſchief. But the works which Archimedes publiſhed, were ſuch attended unto very commendable ends. They were Engines, ſerving unto the defence of Syracuſe; not fit for the Syracuſians to carry abroad, to the hurt and oppreſſion of others. Neither did he altogether publiſh the knowledge, how to uſe them, but reſerved ſo much to his own direction; that after his death more of the ſame kind were not made, nor thoſe of his own making were employed by the Romans. It ſufficed unto this worthy man, that he had approved unto the vulgar, the dignity of his Science; and done eſpecial benefit to his Country. For to enrich a Mechanical trade, or teach the Art of murdering men, it was beſides his purpoſe.

Marcellus had cauſed certain of his Quinquereme Gallies to be faſtened together, and Towers erected on them to beat the defendants from the wall. Againſt theſe Archimedes had ſundry devices; of which any one ſort might have repelled the aſſailants: but all of them together ſhewed the multiplicity of his great wit. He ſhot heavy ſtones, and long pieces of timber, like unto the yeards of ſhips; which brake ſome of the Gallies by their force and weight. Theſe afflicted ſuch as lay far off. They that were come nearer the walls, lay open to a continual volly of ſhot, which they could not endure. Some with an Iron grapple were taken by the prow, and hoyſted up, ſhaking out all the men, and afterwards falling down into the water. Some by ſtrange Engines were lifted up into the Air, where turning round a while, they were broken againſt the walls or caſt upon the rocks: and all of them were ſo beaten, that they durſt never come to any ſecond aſſault. In the like ſort was the Land-Army handled. Stones and timber, falling upon it like hail, did not only over-whelm the men, but brake down the Roman Engines of battery; and forced Marcellus to give over the aſſault. For the remedy hereof it was conceived, that if the Romans could early before day get near unto the walls, they ſhould be (as it were) under the point-blank, and receive no hurt by theſe terrible Inſtruments; which were woond up hard to ſhoot a great compaſs. But this vain hope coſt many of the aſſailants lives: For the ſhot came down right upon them; and beating them from all parts of the wall, made a great ſlaughter of them, all the way as they fled (for they were unable to tarry by it) even till they were gotten very far off. This did ſo terrifie the Romans, that if they perceived any piece of timber, or a ropes end, upon the wall, they ran away, crying out, That Archimedes his Engines were ready to diſcharge. Neither knew Marcellus how to overcome theſe difficulties, or to take away from his men, that fear, againſt the cauſe whereof he knew no remedy. If the Engines had ſtood upon the walls, ſubject to firing, or any ſuch annoyance from without; he might have holpen it by ſome device, to make them unſerviceable. But all, or the moſt of them were out of ſight, being erected in the ſtreets behind the walls; where Archimedes gave directions how to uſe them. Wherefore the Romans had no other way left, than to cut off from the Town all proviſion of victuals, both by Land and by Sea.

This

This was a very desperate piece of work. For the enemies having so goodly an Haven; the Sea in a manner free; and the Carthaginians that were strong by Sea, willing to supply them: were not likely so soon to be consumed with famine, as the besiegers to be wearied out, by lying in Leaguer before so strong a City, having no probability to carry it. Yet, for want of better counsel to follow, this was thought the best, and most honourable course.

In the mean while, Himilco, Admiral of a Carthaginian Fleet, that had waited long about Sicil, being by Hippocrates advertised of these passages, went home to Carthage, and there so dealt with the Senate, that five and twenty thousand Foot, three thousand Horses and twelve Elephants, were committed unto his charge, wherewith to make war upon the Romans in Sicil by Land. He took many Towns; and many that had anciently belonged unto the Carthaginians did yield unto him. To remedy this mischief and to stay the inclination of men, which following the current of Fortune, began to turn unto the Carthaginians; Marcellus with a great part of his Army, rose from Syracuse, and went from place to place about the Island. He took Telorus and Herbesus, which yielded unto him. He took also Megara by force and sackt it: either to terrifie others that were obstinate, especially the Syracusians, or else becaus Rome was at this time poor, and his Army must have somewhat to keep it in heart. His especial desire was to have saved Agrigentum: whither he came too late; for Himilco had gotten it before. Therefore he returned back toward Syracuse; carefully, and in as good order as he could, for fear of the Carthaginian that was too strong for him. The circumspection that he used, in regard of Himilco, stood him in good stead against a danger that he had nor mistrusted. For Hippocrates, leaving the charge of Syracuse unto his brother, had lately issued out of the City, with ten thousand foot, and five hundred horse, intending to joyn his forces with Himilco. Marcellus fell upon him, ere either was aware of the other: and the Romans, being in good order, got an easie victory against the dispersed and half unarmed Syracusians. The reputation hereof helped a little to keep the Sicilians from rebellion. Yet it was not long, ere Himilco, joyning with Hippocrates, ran over all the Island at his pleasure, and presented battail to Marcellus, even at his Trenches; but the Roman wisely refused it. Bomilcar also a Carthaginian, entred with a great fleet into the Haven of Syracuse, and victualled the City. After this, the disposition of the Islanders changed so again, that although another Legion was come from Rome, which escaped from Himilco, and safely arrived at Marcellus his Camp: yet many places revolted unto the Carthaginians, and slew or betrayed the Roman Garrisons.

In the midst of these troubles, Winter enforced both parts to take breath a while: and Marcellus, leaving some of his Army before Syracuse, that he might not seem to have given over the siege, went unto Leontium, where he lay intentive to all occasions. In the beginning of the Spring he stood in doubt, whether it were better to continue the laborious work of besieging Syracuse, or to turn all his forces to Agrigentum, against Himilco and Hippocrates. But it would greatly have impaired his reputation, if he had gone from Syracuse: as unable to prevail; and he himself was of an eager disposition, ever unwilling to give ground, or to quit, as not feisible, an enterprise that he had once taken in hand. He came therefore to Syracuse: where though he found all the difficulties remaining as before; and no likelihood to take the City by force or famine; yet was he not without hope, that continuance of time would bring forth somewhat, which might fulfull his desire. Especially he assayed to prevail by treason; against which no place can hold out. And to this end he dealt with the Syracusian Gentlemen that were in his Camp; exhorting them to practice with their friends that remained in the City. This was not easie for them to do, becaus the Town would hearken to no parlee. At length a slave unto one of these banished men, making shew to run away from his Master, got into Syracuse; where he talked in private with some few, as he had been instructed. Thus began Marcellus to have intelligence within the City: whence the Conspirators used to send him advertisement of their proceedings, by a fisher-boat that passed forth in the night: but when they were grown to the number of fourscore, and thought themselves able to effect somewhat of importance, all was discovered; and they like Traitors put to death. In the mean while, one Damasippus a Lacedæmonian, that had been sent out of the Town as an Embassador to Philip King of Macedon, was fallen into the hands of Marcellus. Epicides was very desirous to ransome him: and many meetings were appointed for that purpose, not far from the walls. There, one of the Romans looking upon the wall, and wanting the more compendious Art of Geometry, fell to numbring numbring the ſtones: and making an eſtimate of the height, judged it leſs than it had been formerly deemed. Herewith he acquainted Marcellus: who cauſing better notice to be taken of the place; and finding that ladders of no extraordinary length would reach it, made all things ready, and waited a convenient time. It was the weakeſt part of the Town, and therefore the moſt ſtrongly guarded: neither was there hope to prevail by force againſt Archimedes, if they failed to take it by ſurpriſe. But a fugitive out of the Town brought word, that a great feaſt was to be held unto Diana, which was to laſt three dayes: and that, becauſe other good chear was not ſo plentiful within the City, as in former times, Epicides, to gratifie the people, had made the more large diſtribution of wine. A better opportunity could not be wiſhed. Wherefore Marcellus in the dead of the Feſtival night, came unto the walls, which he took by Scalado. Syracuſe was divided into four parts (or five, if Epipolæ were reckoned as one) each of which were fortified as diſtinct Cities. When therefore Marcellus had gotten ſome pieces, he had the commodity of a better and ſafe longing, with good ſtore of booty; and better opportunity than before, to deal with the reſt. For there were now a great many, as well of thoſe in Acradinia and the Iſland, inner parts of the Town, as of thoſe that were already in the hands of Marcellus, that began to hearken unto compoſition, as being much terrified by the loſs of thoſe parts, which the Romans had taken and ſackt. As for the weapons of Archimedes, little harm, or none they did, unto thoſe that were ſheltred under ſtrong houſes: although it may ſeem, that the inner walls were not altogether unfurniſhed of his help; ſince they held out a good while, and were not taken by force. The Roman fugitives and Renegadoes, were more careful than ever to defend the reſt of the City: being ſure to be rewarded with cruel death, if Marcellus could prevail. Hippocrates and Himilco, were daily expected; and Bomilcar was ſent away to Carthage, to bring help from thence. It was not long ere Hippocrates and Himilco came: who fell upon the old Camp of the Romans, whilſt Epicides ſallied out of Acradinia upon Marcellus. But the Romans made ſuch defence in each part, that the Aſſailants were repelled. Nevertheleſs they continued to beſet Marcellus: whom they held in a manner as ſtraightly beſieged, as he himſelf did beſiege the Town. But the peſtilence at length conſumed, together with the two Captains, a great part of the Army, and cauſed the reſt to diſlodge. The Romans were (though ſomewhat leſs) afflicted with the ſame peſtilence, inſomuch that Bomilcar did put the City of Carthage in hope, that he might be taken where he lay, if any great forces were ſent thither. This Bomilcar wanted no deſire to do his Country ſervice: but his courage was not anſwerable to his good will. He arrived at Pachinus with a ſtrong fleet: where he ſtayed; being loth to double the Cape; for that the winds did better ſerve the enemy than him. Thither ſailed Epicides out of Syracuſe: to acquaint him with the neceſſities of the City; and to draw him on. With much intreaty, at length he came forward: but meeting with the Roman fleet, that was ready for him, he ſtood off into the deep; and ſailed away to Tarentum, bidding Sicil farewell. Then durſt not Epicides return into Syracuſe, but went to Agrigentum: where he expected the iſſue; with a very faint hope of hearing any good news.

The Sicilian Souldiers that remained alive of Hippocrates his Army, lay as near as they could ſafely, unto Marcellus, and ſome of them, in a ſtrong Town three miles off. Theſe had done what good they could to Syracuſe, by doing what hurt they could unto the Romans. But when they were informed, that the State of Sicil was given as deſperate by the Carthaginians: they ſent Embaſſadours to treat of peace; and made offer to compound, both for themſelves, and for the Town. Hereunto Marcellus willingly gave ear: for he had ſtayed there long enough; and had cauſe to fear, that after a little while, the Carthaginians might come thither ſtrong again. He therefore agreed both with the Citizens, and with the Souldiers that lay abroad; that they ſhould be Maſters of their own, enjoying their liberty and proper laws; yet ſuffering the Romans to poſſeſs whatſoever had belonged unto the Kings. Hereupon they, to whom Epicides had left his charge, were put to death, new Prætors choſen; and the gates even ready to be opened unto Marcellus: when ſuddenly the Roman fugitives diſturbed all. Theſe perceiving their own condition to be deſperate, perſwading the other Mercenary Souldiers, That the Citizens had bargained only for themſelves, and betrayed the Army to the Romans. Wherefore they preſently took Arms, and fell upon the new choſen Prætors; whom they ſlew, and made election of ſix Captains that ſhould command over all. But ſhortly it was found out, that there was no danger at all to the Souldiers; excepting only the fugitives. The Treaty was therefore again ſet on foot, and wanted little of concluſion: which yet was delayed; either by ſome fear of the Citizens, that had ſeen (as they thought) proof of the Roman avarice in the ſack of Epipolæ Tyche, and Neapolis, the parts already taken; or by ſome deſire of Marcellus to get the Town by force, that he might uſe the liberty of a Conqueror, and make it wholly ſubject to Rome. Mericus a Spaniard was one of the ſix Captains that had been choſen in the laſt commotion: a man of ſuch faith, as uſualy is found in Mercenaries; holding his own particular benefit above all other reſpects. With this Captain, Marcellus dealt ſecretly: having a fit inſtrument, of the ſame Nation, one Belligenes, that went in company with the Roman Embaſſadors, daily paſſing to and fro. This craſty Agent perſwaded Mericus, That the Romans had already gotten all Spain: and that if ever he purpoſed to make his own fortune good, either at home in Spain, or any where elſe; it was now the only time to do it; by conforming himſelf to the will of the Roman General. By ſuch hopes the Spaniſh Captain was eaſily won, and ſent forth his own brother among the Syracuſian Embaſſadours to ratifie the covenant with Marcellus.

This under-hand dealing of Marcellus againſt the Syracuſians, cannot well be commended as honeſt: neither was it afterwards throughly approved at his coming to Rome. For the benefits of Hiero to the Romans had been ſuch, as deſerved not to be requited with the ruine of his Country: much leſs, that the miſeries of his people, oppreſſed (though partly through their own folly) by an Army of Mercenaries, ſhould miniſter unto the people of Rome, advantage againſt them. The poor Citizens could not make good their parts againſt the hired Souldiers; and therefore were fain to yield unto the time, and obey thoſe Miniſters of Hannibal, that ruled the Army. But as long as they were free after the death Hieronymus; and now of late, when they had gathered courage by the flight of Epicides: it had been their chief care to maintain amity with the people of Rome. They had lately ſlain many the principal of Epicides his followers; and many of themſelves had alſo been ſlain, both lately and in former times, becauſe of this their deſire unto the peace. What though it were true, that the Raſcality, and ſome ill adviſed perſons; joyned with the ſouldiers in hatred of the Romans, by occaſion of the ſlaughter which they heard to be done at Leontium, and afterward beheld in thoſe parts of their own City which was taken? Ought therefore the Roman General, in a treaty of peace held with the Syracuſians, to make a bargain under-hand againſt them, with a Captain of the Mercenaries? Theſe things were objected againſt Marcellus, at his return home: but the Senators thought it a great deal better, to comfort the Syracuſians with gentle words, and promiſe of good uſage in time to come; than to reſtore the booty, and give over the Dominion of a City, ſo great, wealthy, ſtrong, and many wayes important. Nevertheleſs if we conſider the many inconvenienes and great miſchiefs whereunto Syracuſe was obnoxious; both by evil neighbours, and by that very form of policy, after which it was governed we may truly affirm, that it received no ſmall benefit, by becoming ſubject unto Rome. For thereby it was not only aſſured againſt all forraign enemies, domeſtical conſpiracies, and ſuch Tyrants as of old had reigned therein: but freed from the neceſſity of baniſhing, or murdering, the moſt worthy Citizens; as alſo from all factions, inteſtine ſeditions, and a thouſand the like miſeries, that were wont to grow out of the jealouſie, wherein they held their liberty in vain. Neither enjoyed that City, from her firſt foundotion, any ſuch long time of happineſs, as that wherein it flowriſhed, when it reſted ſecure under the protection of Rome; and was no more moleſted, by the diſeaſe of ambition; wherewith by Marcellus his victory it was throughly cured. But ſuch benefit, ariſing from wrongs done, ſerves not to make injuſtice the more excuſable: unleſs we ſhould approve the anſwer of that thief, who being found to have ſtollen a ſilver cup from ſick man, ſaid, He never leaves drinking.

By the reaſon of Marcius, the Roman Army was let into poſſeſſion of all Syracuſe: wherein, the booty that it found, was ſaid to have been no leſs, than could be hoped for, if they had taken Carthage it ſelf; that maintained war by Land and Sea againſt them. All the goodly works and Imageries, wherewith Syracuſe was marvellouſly adorned, were carried away to Rome; and nothing left untouched; ſave only the houſes of thoſe baniſhed men, that had eſcaped from Hippocrates and Epicides, into the Roman Camp. Among other pitiful accidents; the death of Archimedes was greatly lamented, even by Marcellus himſelf. He was ſo buſie about his Geometry, in drawing figures, that he hearkened not to the noiſe, and uproar in the City; no, nor greatly attended the rude Souldier that was about to kill him. Marcellus took heavily the death of him; and cauſed his body to be hourourably buried. Upon on his Tomb (as he had ordained in his life-time) was placed a Cylinder and a Sphere, with an inſcription of the proportion between them; which he firſt found out. An invention of ſo little uſe, as this may ſeem, pleaſed that great Artiſt better, than the deviſing of all thoſe Engines, that made him ſo famous. Such difference is in the judgement of learned men, and of the vulgar ſort. For many an one would think the money loſt, that had been ſpent upon a Son, whoſe ſtudies in the Univerſity had brought forth ſuch fruit, as the proportion between a Sphere and a Cylinder.

After the taking of Syracuſe, all the Towns in Sicil yielded unto the Romans, except Agrigentum and a few places thereabout. At Agrigentum lay Epicides with one Hanno a Carthaginian, and Mutines an African, that was lately ſent from Hannibal. This Mutines by many good pieces of ſervice, had added ſome credit to the beaten Carthaginian ſide; and withall made his own name great. By his perſwaſions, Hanno and Epicides adventured to meet Marcellus without the Town, and not behave themſelves as men expecting to be beſieged. Neither was he more valiant in counſel, than in execution. Once and again he ſet upon the Romans, where they lay encamped, and drove them fearfully into their Trenches. This bred envy in Epicides and Hanno; eſpecially in Hanno, that having been lately ſent from Carthage, with commiſſion and authority from the State, thought himſelf wronged greatly by Hannibal; in that he had ſent unto him this Mutines, to be his companion, and to take upon him, like as good a man as himſelf. The indignity ſeemed the greater, when Mutines being to ſtep aſide into Heraclea, for the pacifying ſome troubles there among the Numidians; adviſed (as directing Hanno and Epicides) not to meddle with the enemy, until his return. So much therefore the rather would Hanno fight; and offered battel unto Marcellus, before he ſought it. It is like, that a great part of the Roman Army was left behind in Syracuſe, as need required; which made the Carthaginians the better able to deal with thoſe that came againſt them. But whatſoever diſproportion was between the two Armies; far greater were the odds between the Captains. For howſoever the people of Carthage would give authority by favour; yet could they not give worth and ability, in matter of war. The Numidians, having before conceived ſome diſpleaſure againſt their Captains; and being therefore ſome of them gone away to Heraclea, were much more offended, when they ſaw that the vain-glorious envy of Hanno carried him unto the fight, upon a fooliſh deſire to get victory, without the help of Mutines their Country-man. Wherefore they ſent unto the Roman General, and bade him be confident; for that it was not their purpoſe to ſhew themſelves his enemies that day, but only look on, and ſee the proud Carthaginians well beaten by whom they had been miſuſed. They made good their promiſe, and had their deſire. For Marcellus, finding likelihood of truth in their meſſage, did ſo luſtily ſet upon the enemies, that he brake them at the firſt charge; and with the ſlaughter of many thouſands, drove them back into Agrigentum.

If Hanno could have been contented, to follow the directions of one, that was a better man of War than himſelf, and not to have hazarded a battel without need; the Romans would ſhortly have been reduced into terms of great difficulty in their Sicilian War. For Marcellus was ſhortly after to leave the Province; and ſoon upon his departure, there landed in the Iſland a ſupply of eight thouſand foot, and three thouſand Numidian horſe, that were ſent from Carthage. The fame of this new Army drew many of the Sicilians into rebellion. The Roman Army conſiſting (for the moſt part) of the Legions of Cannæ, took it very hainouſly, that no good ſervice done, could bring them into the favour of the Senate; but that, as baniſhed men, they were ſent far from home, and not ſuffered to return back to Rome with their General. Mutines had pacified his Countrey-men the Numidians, and like an honeſt man, did what he could for thoſe whom he ſerved, without contending againſt the fooliſh pride of Hanno; finding that there was a great alteration; and a greater might have been, if the Army lately overthrown had been entire. M. Cornelius the Roman Prætor, uſed all diligence, both to pacifie his own men, and to hinder the Carthaginians. He recovered thoſe Inland towns that had rebelled: and though he could not hinder Mutines from over-running all the Country; yet he hindred the Country from revolting unto Mutines. Above threeſcore Towns, great and ſmall, the Carthaginians held in Sicil: of which Agrigentum was the principal, and far bigger than any of the reſt. Thence iſſued Mutines as often as he pleaſed, in deſpight of the Romans: not only to the ſuccour of his own adherents, but to the great waſte of thoſe that followed the contrary part. But Hanno, inſtead of being pleaſed with all theſe good ſervices, was filled more and more with envy, againſt the man that performed them. He had (belike) received inſtruction from old Hanno at Carthage, not to ſuffer Hannibal, or any Hannibalian, to have a ſhare in the honour of theſe Sicilian Wars: which were therefore perhaps the more diligently ſupplied; whilſt Italy was neglected, that ſhould have been regarded more than all the reſt Wherefore to ſhew his authority, and that it was not in the power of Hannibal, to appoint unto him an Aſſiſtant, or Director: He took away from Mutines his charge, and gave it to his own Son; thinking thereby to diſcountenance the man, and make him little eſteemed, as one out of Office, among the Numidians. But it fell out quite contrary: and this ſpightful dealing occaſioned the loſs of whatſoever the Carthaginians held in Sicil. For the Numidians were ſo incenſed by the indignity offered unto their Country-man, being ſuch a brave Commander, that they offered him their ſervice to requite the wrong; and were thenceforth abſolutely at his own diſpoſition. M. Valerius Lævinus, the Roman Conſul, was newly come into the Province, when this fell out: and with him did Mutines enter into intelligence. For he could no longer brook theſe indignities; but being neither a Carthaginian, nor favoured by thoſe that bore all the ſway in Carthage: He thought it the wiſeſt way, to play the beſt of his own game, and forſake that City, which was likely to periſh by the evil counſel that governed it. He did not therefore, as his Country-men had lately done, content himſelf to ſee his Adverſaries reap the bitter fruits of his own malicious over-weening: and to ſuffer that harm, in doing whereof he would not bear a part; but conſpired againſt them to deliver up Agrigentum, and to help to expel them utterly out of Sicil. The Conſul was glad of his friendſhip; and carefully followed his advertiſements. Neither was there much cunning needful, to the performance of that which Mutines had undertaken: For he with his Numidians did forcibly ſeize upon a gate; whereat they let in ſome Roman Companies, that lay near in a readineſs for the purpoſe. Hanno, when firſt he heard the noiſe, thought it had been no worſe matter, than ſome ſuch tumult of the Numidians, as he had been well acquainted with of late. But when, making haſte to pacifie the trouble, he ſaw and heard, the Romans intermixed, among thoſe diſcontented followers of Mutines, forthwith he betook himſelf to flight: and ſaving himſelf, with Epicides, in a ſmall Bark, ſet ſail for Africk; leaving all his Army and Adherents in Sicil, to the mercy of the Romans, that henceforward continued Maſters of the whole Iſland.

Lævinus the Conſul having taken Agrigentum, did ſharp execution of juſtice upon all the Citizens. The principal of them he ſcourged with rods, and afterwards beheaded, as was the manner of the Romans: all the reſt of them he ſold for ſlaves, and confiſcated their goods; ſending home to Rome the mony that was raiſed of the booty. This was indeed a time, wherein Rome ſtood in no leſs neceſſity of gold, than of ſteel: which may have been the reaſon, why Lævinus dealt ſo cruelly with the Agrigentines. Nevertheleſs, the fame of ſuch ſeverity bred a terror among all the Dependants of the Carthaginians, ſo that in great haſte they ſought to make their peace. About forty Towns yielded themſelves quickly unto the Romans; twenty were delivered up by Treaſon; and ſix only ſtayed to be wonn by force. Theſe things done, Lævinus returned home to Rome; carrying with him about four thouſand men from Agatirna; that were a company of out-laws, bankrouts, and baniſhed men accuſtomed to live by ſpoil of others in theſe troubleſome times. He beſtowed them about Rhegium in Italy, where they might exerciſe their own occupation againſt the Brutians; a thieviſh kind of people, that were enemies unto thoſe of Rhegium, and to the Romans. As for Mutines, he was well rewarded, and made Citizen of Rome: where he lived in good accompt; accompanying the two Scipio's in their journey againſt Antiochus, and therein doing (as it is ſaid) very eſpecial ſervice. So by this enterpriſe of Sicil, the Carthaginians waſted much of their forces, that with greater profit might have been employed in Italy: leaving yet unto the Romans, in the end of this war, the entire poſſeſſion of this Iſland; which they wanted when it began.

§. XVI.

How the War paſſed between the Romans and Hannibal in Italy, from the taking of Capua to the great victory of Metaurus.

SHortly after the winning of Capua, Marcellus came to Rome: where for his good ſervices done in the Iſland of Sicil, he had granted unto him the honour of the leſſer Triumph, which was called Ovation. The greater Triumph was denyed him: becauſe he had not finiſhed the war, but was fain to leave his Army behind him in the Province. He ſtayed not long in Rome, before he was again choſen Conſul together with M. Valerius Lævinus, who ſucceeded ceeded him in the Government of Sicil, and was, at the time of his election, making war againſt King Philip in Greece. Great Complaint was made againſt the Conſul Marcellus, by the Syracuſians, for that which he had done unto them: they alledging their great friendſhip to the people of Rome, in the time of their late King Hiero; and affirming, that their City did never willingly break the alliance; excepting when it was oppreſſed by ſuch Tyrants, as were not greater enemies to Rome, than to all good men that lived in Syracuſe. The Conſul, on the other ſide, reckoned the labours & dangers whereunto they had put him: willing them to bemoan themſelves to the Carthaginians that had holpen them in their neceſſity; and not unto the Romans, whom they had kept out. Thus each part having ſome good matter to alledge, the Senate made ſuch an end of the controverſie, as beſt agreed with the benefit of their own Common-wealth: blaming the too much rigour of Marcellus; yet not reſtoring the booty that he had taken, nor making the Syracuſians free from their ſubjection, but comforting them with gentle words, and hopeful promiſes, as hath been ſhewed before. The two new Conſuls Marcellus and Lævinus, were appointed to make war, as their lots ſhould fall out; the one in Italy, the other in Sicil. The Iſle of Sicil fell unto Marcellus; which Province he willingly changed with his Colleague; to the end that the Syracuſians (whoſe cauſe had not as yet been heard in the Senate) might not ſeem hindred by fear, from uttering their grievances freely. Afterwards, when his buſineſs with them was diſpatcht, he gently undertook the patronage of them: which remained long in his Family, to the great benefit of their Country in times following. So Valerius, the other Conſul, was ſent into Sicil, whoſe doings there have been already rehearſed: but Marcellus was employed againſt Hannibal.

Before the Conſuls departed out of Rome, they were much troubled with preſſing of Souldiers to the war, and moſt of all, with getting Mariners for their Navy. They were all of the poorer ſort, that uſed to be employed in Sea-ſervices, eſpecially in rowing. Theſe could not live without preſent wages: neither was there mony enough in the Treaſury to give them pay. Wherefore it was ordained, that they ſhould be ſet out at the expence of private men; who in this neceſſity of the State, were driven to ſuſtain all publick charges. Hereat the people murmured, and were ready to fall into ſedition; had not the Conſuls deferred the matter unto further conſideration. The Senate could ill tell, what to determine or do, in a caſe of ſuch extremity. For manifeſt it was, that the multitude had already indured ſo much, as well it could undergo; and ſomewhat more, than could with honeſty have been impoſed upon it. Nevertheleſs it was impoſſible to maintain the war againſt the Carthaginians; or to keep the Macedonian out of Italy without a ſtrong fleet. Wherefore, ſome were of opinion; That ſince the common Treaſure was ſo empty, the people muſt be forced, by right or wrong, to take the burden upon them. At laſt the Conſuls began to ſay, That no perſwaſions would be ſo effectual with the people, as good examples: and that if the Senators would follow the Conſuls, like it was that the people alſo would follow the Senate. Wherefore they propounded, and it was immediately concluded, that every one of them ſhould bring forth, and put into the Treaſury, all the mony that he had; and that no Senator ſhould keep any veſſel of gold, or plate whatſoever; excepting one Salt-ſeller, and a Bowl wherewith to make their offerings unto the gods; as alſo a Ring for himſelf, with ſuch other tokens of ingenuity for his wife and children, as every one did uſe, and thoſe of as ſmall value as might be. This advice of the Conſuls was not more thankfully accepted by the Senate, than the ready performance thereof by the Senate was highly applauded, and haſtily followed by the Gentlemen of Rome. Neither did the Commonalty refuſe to do that, which their betters had openly done before them. For ſince the publick neceſſity could no otherwiſe be holpen; every one was contented, that his private eſtate ſhould run the ſame fortune with the Common-wealth, which if it ſuffered wrack, in vain could any particular man hope to enjoy the benefit of his proper ſubſtance. This magnanimity deſerved well that greatneſs of Empire, whereof it was the foundation.

Convenient order being thus taken for an Army and Fleet: Marcellus went forth of the City againſt Hannibal; and Lævinus toward Sicil. The Army of Hannibal was greatly diminiſhed by long and hard ſervice: neither did his Carthaginians ſeem to remember him, and think upon ſending the promiſed ſupply, or any ſuch proportion as he needed. His credit alſo among his Italian friends, was much wakened, by the loſs of Capua: which gave them cauſe to look unto themſelves; as if in his help there were little truſt to be repoſed, when they ſhould ſtand in need. This he well perceived; yet could not tell how to remedy. Either he muſt thruſt Garriſons into to all the Towns that he ſuſpected, and thereby ſo diminiſh his Army, that he ſhould not be able to keep the field; or elſe he muſt leave them to their own fidelity, which now began to waver. At length his jealouſie grew ſo outragious, that he ſacked and waſted thoſe places that he was unable to defend: thinking that the beſt way to enrich himſelf; and make unprofitable to his enemies, the purchaſe from which he could not hinder them. But by this example, many were quite alienated from him: and ſome of thoſe, whom before he had leaſt cauſe to doubt. The Town of Salapia yielded unto Marcellus; and betrayed unto him a gallant Regiment of Numidian horſe, the beſt of all that ſerved under Hannibal; which was a greater loſs, than the Town it ſelf. Blaſius the author of this rebellion, could not bring his deſire to effect; without getting the conſent of one Daſius, that was his bitter enemy. Wherefore he brake the matter to this Daſius in private, and was by him accuſed unto Hannibal. But when he was convented and charged of Treaſon, he ſo ſtoutly denyed it, and by way of recrimination, ſo vehemently preſſed his accuſer with the ſame fault: that Hannibal thought it a matter deviſed out of meer malice; knowing wel what enemies they were; and ſeeing that neither of them could bring any proof of what he affirmed. This notwithſtanding, Blaſius did not ceaſe to preſs his adverſary anew, and urge him from time to time, with ſuch lively reaſon; that he who could not be believed by Hannibal, was contented at length to win the favour of Marcellus. Preſently after this, the Conſul took by force, Maronæa and Meles, Towns of the Samnites; wherein he ſlew above three thouſand of Hannibal his men.

Hannibal could not look to all at once; but was fain to catch advantages, where he might get them; the Romans now being grown ſtronger in the field than he. The beſt was, that his Carthaginians, having wearied themſelves with ill ſpeed in many petty enterpriſes, and laid aſide all this while the care of Italy, to follow buſineſs of far leſs importance; had now at length reſolved, to ſend preſently the great ſupply, that had been ſo long promiſed and expected. This, if they had done in better ſeaſon; Rome it ſelf might have been ſtrucken down, the next year after that great blow received at Cannæ. But ſince that which is paſt cannot be amended; Hannibal muſt force himſelf to make a good countenance; and tell his followers; that this mighty ſuccour would come time enough. For Maſaniſſa was at Carthage with five thouſand Numidians, ready to ſet ſail for Spain; whither, when he came, it was appointed that Aſdrubal ſhould forthwith take his journey into Italy, of which there had been ſo much talk. Theſe news did not more comfort Hannibal and his followers, than terrifie the Romans. Wherefore each did their beſt; and the Romans, to prevent the threatning miſchief, and win as much as they could upon Hannibal, before the coming of his Brother; Hannibal, on the contrary, to hold his own, and weaken the Romans as much as he was able. He had intelligence, that Cn. Fulvius, a Roman Prætor, lay near unto Herdonea, to get the Town by practice. It was not long ſince, near unto the ſame place, another Cn. Fulvius had loſt his Army. Therefore Hannibal made great marches thitherward; and came to Herdonea ere Fulvius heard news of his approach. As ſoon as he came, he offered battel to the Roman Prætor; who accepted it with more haſte than good ſpeed. The Roman Legions made good reſiſtance a while, till they were compaſſed round with the Carthaginian horſe. Then fell they to rout, and great ſlaughter was made of them. Fulvius himſelf, with twelve Tribunes or Coronels, were loſt: of the common Souldiers, that were ſlain, the number is uncertain; ſome reporting ſeven, others thirteen thouſand. The Town of Herdonea, becauſe it was at point to have yielded unto Fulvius, Hannibal did ſet on fire: and putting thoſe to death that had practiſed with the Enemy, carried away the multitude; whom he beſtowed among the Thurians and Metapontines. The Conſul Marcellus hearing of this, wrote unto the Senate: and exhorted them to be of good chear; for that he would ſhortly abate the enemies pride. He followed the Carthaginian apace; and overtaking him at Numiſtro in the Countrey of the Lucans, fought with him a battel: which beginning at nine of the clock in the morning, laſted until night, and ended, by reaſon of the darkneſs, with uncertain victory. Afterward Hannibal departed thence into Apulia, whither Marcellus followed him. At Venuſia they met, and had many ſkirmiſhes; but none of importance. Hannibal removed often; and ſought to bring the enemy within danger of ſome ambuſh. But Marcellus, though he was very eager of battel, would yet adventure nothing, but by open day-light, and upon fair ground.

Thus paſſed the time away, until Q. Fabius Maximus, and Q. Fulvius, he that lately had taken Capua, were choſen Conſuls. Fabius conſidering how much the Roman affairs were bettered by the taking of Capua, purpoſed purpoſed that year to beſiege Tarantum: which if he could win; like it was, that ſcarce one good City would afterwards remain true to Hannibal. Wherefore he vehemently exhorted his Colleague, and Marcellus, (to whom was continued them command of thoſe Legions that ſerved under him the year before) to preſs the Carthaginian ſo hard, as he might have no leiſure to help Tarentum. Marcellus was very glad of this charge: for he thought no Roman fitter than himſelf, to deal with Hannibal in open field. He followed him therefore to Cannuſium, and thence from place to place: deſiring ever to come to battail, but upon equal terms. The Carthaginian had not mind to hazzard much in fight: but thought it enough to entertain his enemy with ſkirmiſh; as being deſirous to keep his Army ſtrong until the coming of Aſdrubal. Yet could he not avoid the importunity of Marcellus, nor brook the indignity of being daily braved. He therefore bade his men to be luſty, and to beat ſoundly this hot-ſpirited Roman Captain, that would never ſuffer them to be at quiet; until they once had cooled well his courage, by letting him blood. Hereupon followed a battail; wherein Hannibal had the victory; took ſix Enſigns; and ſlew of the Romans almoſt three thouſand, among which were ſome of mark. Marcellus was ſo impatient of his diſhonour, that he rated his men, as Peſants, and baſe cowards: telling them, that they were the firſt of the Roman Legions; which had been beaten by Hannibal, by plain force and manhood, without being circumvented by any ſtratagem. with theſe and many other the like words, which they were aſhamed to hear, he did ſo vex them; that thinking themſelves better able to endure any violence of the enemy, than ſuch diſpleaſure of their General; they beſought him to pardon them, and lead them forth once again to fight. He did ſo: and placing thoſe Companies formoſt, that had loſt their Enſigns the day before, bade them be careful to win a victory; whereof the news might be at Rome, before the report of their ſhameful overthrow. Hannibal was angry, to ſee that nothing could make this Enemy quite: and therefore was ready to fight again; ſince all other motives, continued the ſame, and his men had been heartned by the late victory. But the Romans were ſtirred up with deſire of revenge, and of repairing their honour loſt, which affections gave a ſharp edge unto their valour: whereas the Carthaginians were grown dull, and weary by ſeeing themſelves diſappointed of their hope; and the enemy, notwithſtanding their late victory, as ready to moleſt them as before. In this ſecond battail Marcellus got the victory: which he purchaſed at ſo dear a rate; that neither he, nor Hannibal, had great cauſe to vaunt, the ſecond night. For if eight thouſand of the Carthagians were ſlain, and three thouſand of the Roman ſide, in this next battail, the difference was no greater, than even to recompence the late received overthrow: eſpecially ſince the number of the Romans that were wounded, was ſo great, as diſabled Marcellus from purſuing Hannibal; who diſlodged by night. Nevertheleſs it ſufficed, that Fabius the Conſul hereby got leiſure, to follow his buſineſs at Tarentum without any diſturbance. Fulvius the other Conſul about the ſame time, took in many of the Hirpines, Lucans, and Volcentes, that willingly yielded themſelves, and betrayed the Garriſons of Hannibal that lay in their Towns: whom Fulvius entertained in loving ſort; gently rebuking them for their errours paſt, without puniſhing thoſe that had been authors, or buſide doers in the rebellion. That rabble of Sicilian thieves, which Lævinus had lately brought from Agaterna, was then alſo ſet on work to beſiege Caulonia, a Town of the Brutians: and nothing was omitted, that might ſerve to divert Hannibal, from the ſuccour of Tarentum.

Q. Fabius the Conſul, having taken Manduria a Town of the Salentines, ſate down before Tarentum: making all preparation that ſeemed needfull to carry it either by aſſault or long ſiege. Of the Garriſons in the Town, a good part were Brutians, placed there by Hannibal, under a Captain of their own Nation. This Captain fell in love with a Tarentine wench; whoſe brother ſerved under Fabius. Hereof ſhe gave notice by letters to her brother, as thinking belike to draw him from the Roman ſide; by telling him how rich, and of what great account her lover was. But her brother made the Conſul acquainted with theſe news: and ſaid, that if the Brutian were far in love, he might perhaps be won, by intreaty of his Miſtris, to do what ſhe would have him. The Conſul hearing this, and finding likelihood in the matter, willed his ſouldier to convey himſelf into the Town as a fugitive, and try what good might be done. It fell out according to his deſire. The Souldier grew acquainted with this Brutian Captain: and partly by his own perſwaſions, partly by the flattering intreaty of his ſiſter; wan him to betray the Town to the Romans. When they had agreed upon the buſineſs, and and resolved how to order it; the same Souldier got out of the Town by night, and acquainted the Consul with his proceedings: telling him in which part that Brutian kept watch, and what might conveniently be done. So in the night time, Fabius gave an alarm to the City; especially about those parts of the wall, which were farthest from the place where he meant to enter. The Captains in the Town, prepared to make resistance in those places, where the noise did threaten them with greatest likelihood of danger. But Fabius himself with the choice of his men, came in great silence to the quarter of the Brutians: who being wrought by their Captain, helped the Romans to get up, and break open the next gate, whereat the Army was let in. The Tarentines and Carthaginian Souldiers, made head against Fabius in the Market place: but (as hapneth in like cases, where the main confidence is already taken away) not very obstinately. Nico, Democrates and Philomenes, with those that before had let in Hannibal, used now the last of their courage in dying against the Romans. Carthalo, who commanded the Garrison within the Town, offered himself prisoner: hoping to be well used, because of his hospitality that had passed between his Father and the Consul. But he was slain by the way, ere he could come at Fabius. The Romans did put all indifferently to the sword, in such sort, that they spared few of the Brutians. This slaughter of the Brutian, was thought to have been made by appointment of the Consul, to the end that he might seem to have won the Town by force and not by treason: though he thereby failed of his purpose; and neither had the glory which he expected, nor preserved his reputation of faithful dealing, and keeping his word. The booty found in Tarentum was very great: wherefore the Roman Treasury, whither it was carried, had great need. As for the Imageries, and other curiosities that were in the City, Fabius was contented to let them alone: and being told of some Idols that seemed worthy to be carried away, being very goodly pieces, in such habit and posture as if they were fighting: he said, Let us leave unto the Tarentines their angry gods.

Hannibal being gotten clear from Marcellus, fell upon those that besieged Caulonia. They fled at his coming: but he was so near, that they were fain to betake them to a hill, which served to no other purpose, than to bear off the first burnt. There they defended themselves a little while, and then they yielded. When this business was done, he hasted away to relieve Tarentum. But when he came within five miles of the City, he had news that it was lost, This grieved him: yet he said no more than this, The Romans have also their Hannibal; we have lost Tarentum in such sort as we got it. That he might not seem to turn back amazed, or in any fear of the victorious Consul; he incamped a few dayes together, so near as he was unto Tarentum: and thence departed to Metapontum, bethought himself how to take Fabius in a trap. He caused the chief of the Metapontines to write unto Fabius, and offer to betray into his hands, the Carthaginian Garrison; with condition, that he should in that respect, forgive them all offences past. These letters were sent by two young men of the same City; who did their errand so well, that the Consul wrote back by them unto the Metapontines, and appointed the day, when they should expect him. Hereof Hannibal was exceeding glad: and at good leisure made ready his ambushes for the wary Fabius. But whether some secret notice of the plot were given; or whether indeed (as it is related) some tokens in sacrificing, terrified the superstitious Roman; the journy to Metapontum was deferred. Hereupon the same two Messengers were employed again: but being apprehended, and threatned with torture, they discovered all.

This year was happy to the Romans, in all their wars: for they got every where, save only at Caulonia; where they had lost a company of such lewd fellows, that it may seem good fortune, to have been so rid of them. But their common poverty, and disability to maintain their charge, continued, and grew greater than it was before. Thirty Roman Colonies were then in Italy: of which, twelve refused to contribute any longer to the Wars. For it was considered; that the Legions of Cannæ, and those unhappy Companies that had been beaten under the one and the other Cn. Fulvius, were transported into Sicil; where they lived, in a sort, as banished men. This grieved their friends at home, and made them reckon up the more diligently those other miseries which they daily felt. Ten years together they had been exhausted with levies of men, and impositions of money: in every of which years they had received some notable overthrow. In this case the least that they could fear; or rather the best that they could hope; was to fall into the hands of the enemy to be made prisoners. For Hannibal did gently send home their people that was taken by him: whereas the Romans did banish from their homes, those that had escaped. It was therefore likely to come to paſs within a while, that they ſhould be all conſumed: ſince new ſouldiers were daily preſſed forth of their Towns; and the old ones never returned. Such talk was frequent among thoſe of the Colonies: eſpecially where they that were tranſported into Sicil, had moſt compaſſionate friends. Wherefore it was concluded by the people of Ardea, Sutrium, Alba, and other good Towns, to the number of twelve, That they ſhould boldly deny unto the Romans their farther help. This was thought the likelieſt way to obtain peace: whereof otherwiſe they ſaw little hope, as long as Hannibal lived. When the Conſuls heard the Embaſſadors of theſe Towns make ſuch declaration, and proteſt their diſability of giving any further help; they were much amazed. They willed the Embaſſadors to return home, and bring a better anſwer, foraſmuch as this was none other than treaſon: they bade them to conſider, that the people were not Campans or Tarentines, but the off-ſpring of the Romans; and no leſs partakers of the Empire, than they that inhabited the Mother-City. But all would not ſerve, the Embaſſadors continuing to proteſt, that they had already done what they could; and that they had remaining, neither men, nor mony. It was well for the Romans, that the other eighteen Colonies, did not imitate theſe twelve; but ſhewed themſelves willing to undergo whatſoever ſhould be laid upon them, without ſhrinking under the burden. This their offer was ſo highly pleaſing to the Conſuls; that the Embaſſadours of thoſe faithful Colonies, were brought unto the Senate, and produced into the Aſſembly of the people: where, with commemoration of all their former good ſervices, this their preſent love unto the State was magnified, and thanks accordingly beſtowed upon them; with promiſe, that it ſhould not be forgotten. As for the Embaſſadours of thoſe twelve Colonies, that refuſed to contribute; it was thought beſt, neither to detain them in the City, nor yet to diſmiſs them, nor take any notice of them at all; but leave them to their own conſideration of their ill deſerving.

It may greatly be doubted, what the example of theſe twelve people would have wrought in thoſe that were ſo willing to help the State, if Aſdrubal had been then coming into Italy. For then muſt the Romans have betaken themſelves wholly to their own defence; whereas now, to the great comfort of their ſubjects, they employed their forces in the conqueſt of Italy, with hopeful and fortunate ſucceſs. Nevertheleſs, they were fain to open their moſt private treaſury; and thence take out the gold that had been laid up to ſerve them in caſes of greateſt extremity. Of the mony thus extracted, one quarter was delivered to Fabius the Conſul, to ſet him well out againſt the Tarentines; all the reſt was ſent into Spain to Scipio, for the maintenance of his Army; and to provide that Aſdrubal might not paſs from thence into Italy. It is likely that Fabius did not ſpend all his mony; finding ſuch eaſie ſucceſs at Tarentum, as was ſhewed before. But to ſtop the journey of Aſdrubal; neither the mony ſent into Spain, nor any victories won by Scipio could ſuffice. Nevertheleſs, it fell out happily for the people of Rome, that this year, and the next were ſpent, before his coming; and they better prepared, than at leſs warning they could have been, to entertain him. Here it were not amiſs to note, that ſince the Romans, being in ſo great a neceſſity of mony, were driven to furniſh the Army in Spain, with the greateſt part of all their ſtock that was left: it muſt needs be, that either the booty taken in new Carthage, was far leſs than fame had reported it; or elſe that Scipio had not as yet won it: howſoever Livie rather inclines to thoſe, who ſay that he got it ſoon after his arrival.

M. Claudius Marcellus, and T. Quintus Criſpinus, were choſen Conſuls after Fabius and Fulvius. In their year it was, that Aſdrubal took his journey out of Spain, though he came not into Italy until the year following. after the great battle at Cannæ, Hannibal had loſt much time about Cumæ and Naples, in ſeeking to make himſelf Maſter of a good haven; for the landing of thoſe ſuccours that were promiſed from Carthage. The hope that he repoſed in Philip, cauſed him to turn his principal care to the Eaſtern parts of Italy; where he made ready a fair entrance for the Macedonian, if he had been ready to come; but ſince his hope was vaniſhed, and the long promiſed ſuccour of Aſdrubal was (though far later than had been expedient) ready to arrive: he began to deal with the people of Hetruria, through whoſe Countries his Brother was to paſs, that therein he might make a party againſt the Romans. The loſs of Capua, Tarentum, and many other Towns, might have terrified all other of the Italian Towns, from harkning to any ſolicitation of the Carthaginians. Yet the poverty of the Romans, and the wearineſs of their adherents, together with the fame of a greater Army coming than that which Hannibal brought into Italy; did imbolden many of the Hetrurians, eſpecially the Are- times, to take such counsel as they thought most expedient for themselves, without regard of their fidelity to Rome. The Roman Senate, hearing the rumour of this conspiracy, sent Marcellus the new chosen Consul into Hetruria: whose coming did so terrefie them, that they rested quiet for a while. All the year following they were devising how to break out: as contrarywise the Roman Propretors, partly by terrour of severe judgments and inquisitions; and partly by the force of two or three Legions, with which they visited all suspected places, kept them honest against their wills, and took many Hostages for better assurance. The two Consuls had an earnest desire, to make strong War upon Hannibal without more temporising: perswading themselves, that in battel they should be too strong for him. Crispinus had further his particular desire, to make his Consulship notable by the winning of some good Town: as Fulvius and Fabius had gotten honour by Capua and Tarentum. Therefore he went about the siege of Locri; one of the best Cities which the Carthaginian then held in Italy: and brought thither all sorts of Engines; sending for a Fleet out of Sicil to help him. But Hannibal was not slow to relieve the City: the fame of whose approach, made Crispinus desist from his enterprise, and retire unto his Colleague, that lay at Venusia. Thither followed Hannibal; to whom the Consuls daily offered battel. This great man of War had no need to stand upon his reputation: which was already so confirmed, that his refusing to fight, was not likely to be ascribed unto fear; but rather deemed as part of his wisdom. He entertained the Consuls with many light skirmishes, and sought to take them at some advantage; reserving his own numbers as full as he could, unto a time of greater imployment. In this lingring manner of War, Marcellus took no pleasure: but sought to compell the Enemy to battel, whether he would or no. The Admiral of the Roman Fleet about Sicil, L. Cincius, was commanded again to assail the Town of Locri: which might well enough be forced, if Hannibal continued as he began, to trifle away the time at Venusia. To the same purpose a part of the Garrison that lay in Tarentum, was appointed to go by land to the assistance of Cincius. But Hannibal had an eye behind him. He laid an ambush in the way, between Tarentum and Locri, whereinto the Romans fell: and having lost above three thousand of their Company, were well glad, the rest of them, to quit their enterprise, and save their own lives within Tarentum. As for the Consuls, it was the desire of Hannibal to waste their Army by little and little: which to do, he neglected no advantage. There lay between him and them an Hillock, overgrown with wood, that seemed fit to cover a number of men: who lying there undiscerned, might fall upon such as should straggle from the Roman camp; and cut them off. Therefore he sent thither by night some companies of Numidians: whom he willed to keep themselves close, and attend their best advantage. To this piece of ground the Consuls thought it fit to remove their camp: Marcellus thinking that he never lay near enough unto Hannibal. Thither therefore both of them rode to view the place, accompanied with the son of Marcellus, a few Colonels, and other principal men: and not many more than two hundred horse, most of them Hetrurians. The Numidian Centinel gave warning of their approach to his fellows who discovered not themselves, until they had surrounded the Consuls and their train. The Consuls, as necessity compelled them, defended themselves: hoping to be quickly relieved from their camp that was near at hand. But the Hetrurians ran away from them, at the first: and left them in that great danger, to the weak assistance of no more than forty horsemen, that were of the Colonie of Fregellæ. These Fregellans abode by the Consuls, and did what they could to have brought them safe off. But when Marcellus was stricken thorow with a Lance, and fell down dead; then began every one to shift for himself, and escape as they might, Crispinus the other Consul, had his deaths wound, being stricken with two Darts; and young Marcellus was likewise wounded; yet these two recovered their camp: The rest of the Colonels and Officers, together with the Lictors that carried the bundle of Rods and Axes before the Consuls, were all slain or taken. To the dead body of the Consul Marcellus, Hannibal gave honourable Funeral, according to the custom of those times: and bestowing his ashes in a silver pot, covered it with a crown of gold; and so sent them to young Marcellus, to be by him interred, where he thought good.

Presently after this, Crispinus bethought himself, how that the signet Ring of Marcellus was faln into the custody of Hannibal; who might use it to his own purposes, ere that which had hapned were well known abroad. Wherefore he sent word unto all the Towns about; that his Colleague was slain, and that Hannibal had gotten his Ring: wishing them in that regard, to give no credit unto any letters therewithal signed. This providence of Crispinus was not more than requisite.

requiſite. For his meſſenger was but a little before come to Salapia, when another Meſſenger arrived there ſent from Hannibal, bringing letters in the name of Marcellus, and ſealed with the captive Ring; whereof the contents were: That it was his purpoſe to come the ſame night unto Salapia; where he willed, that the Souldiers of the Garriſon ſhould be in a readineſs, for ſuch imployment as he ſhould think needful. The device was plain, and no leſs plain was the revengeful mind which he bare againſt that City; becauſe of his brave Numidian companies that had therein been betrayed. The Salapians hereupon bethought themſelves, how to take their enemy in his own ſnare. They ſent back the Meſſenger, which was a Roman fugitive, without letting him perceive any ſign of diſtruſt in them. This done, they prepared all things in a readineſs, for the entertainment of ſuch a friend. Late in the night he came thither; with a troop of Roman fugitives armed Roman-like, leading the way. Theſe all talking Latine together, called unto the Watch, and bade open the gate; for the Conſul was there. The gate was opened fair and leiſurely, and the Port-cullis drawn up no higher than needs it muſt be, to let them enter. But when ſix hundred of them were gotten in, down fell the Port-cullis again: and they that thought to have taken others, were taken themſelves; being laid at on all hands by the Salapines, that quickly made an end with them.

Hannibal being thus over-reached with this ſtratagem, haſted away to Locri; whereunto Cincius the Admiral of the Roman fleet about Cicil, did lay hard ſiege. The firſt appearance of the Numidians, Hannibal his Vantcurrors, made the Romans in all confuſed haſte, run to their ſhips: leaving all their engines, and whatſoever was in ther Camp, to the enemies diſpoſition.

The Roman Senate hearing of theſe accidents, ſent unto Criſpinus the ſurviving Conſul, and requeſted him to name a Dictator that might take charge of the Commonwealth, and diſpatch the election of new Magiſtrates, with other buſineſs; whereunto himſelf was diſabled by his hurts. He did ſo: and ſoon after died. Then was it thought needful, that new Conſuls ſhould be choſen out of hand: foraſmuch as two Roman Armies lay ſo near unto the Enemy, without any General. Eſpecially it was deſired, that Election ſhould be made of ſuch men as were not only valiant, but well adviſed: ſince the beſt, and moſt fortunate of their great Darers, M. Marcellus, by loſing himſelf ſo ſtrangely, had given them a fair warning, not to commit their Army unto raſh heads. Among thoſe that ſtood for the Conſulſhip, C. Claudius Nero, was the moſt eminent. He was of great Nobility, a good Souldier, and one, whoſe many ſervices in this preſent War, did forcibly commend unto the place. Yet he ſeemed a little too violent; and one, whoſe temper needed the allay of a more ſtaid wit. The Fathers therefore endeavoured to joyn unto him in the Conſulſhip, M. Livius: one that had born the ſame office long before. This M. Livius had been Conſul with L. Æmilius Paulus, in the year foregoing the beginning of this War. After their Conſulſhip, wherein they did good ſervice, they had both of them been called into judgement by the people: and this Livius condemned; Æmilius hardly eſcaping. Though it hath been once already noted; yet I cannot forbear to remember it again: how it pleaſed God to upbraid the unthankful Romans, with the malicious judgement, given by their multitude upon honourable men. For in the battel at Cannæ, it was apparent what lamentable effects the memory of their injuſtice wrought: when L. Æmilius rather choſe to yield to the froward ignorance of his Colleague; and afterward to die in the greateſt overthrow that ever fell upon the State of Rome, than by reſiſting the pernicious courſes of Terentius Varro, to caſt himſelf anew upon the danger of the popular fury. As for M. Livius, he is even now ready, and will ſo continue, to tell the people of their faults in a divers manner. Eight years together after his condemnation, had he been abſent out of the City, and lived in his Country Grange ſtill vexing himſelf with the indignity of his condemnation. Marcellus and Lævinus, being Conſuls two or three years ago, had brought him into Rome: where he lived private in diſcontented ſort, as might appear, both by his careleſneſs in apparel, and by the wearing of his long hair and beard; which in that time were the badges of men afflicted. Very lately he was compelled by the Cenſors, to poll his hair, and come into the Senate: where he uſed to ſit ſilent, and ſignifie his aſſent or diſlike to what was propoſed, either in ſhort formal words, or in paſſing from ſide to ſide, when the houſe was divided. At length it hapned, that in ſome buſineſs weightily concerning one that was his kinſman; he ſtood up and made a ſet ſpeech: whereby he drew all the Fathers to attention; and bade them enquire of him, and take better notice, what he was, and what he had been. The Senate was much altered ſince he had left it; many brave men were loſt; new ones were choſen; ſuch as rather ſerved to fill up the number, than to anſwer to the dignity of the place: and they that were left of ancient ſtanding, had even ſpent their Vertues to no great effect. Wherefore all began to ſay; that it was great pitty, ſo worthy and able a man as this Livius, had been all this while forgotten; one of whom the Common-wealth ſtood in great need, yet had not uſed in this dangerous war. Now ſeeing that the Conſuls ought, one of them, to be choſen a Patrician, the other of neceſſity a Plebeian: and ſince neither Fabius, nor Valerius Lævinus, being both of them Patricians, could be joyned with Claudius Nero: every one was of opinion, that there could not be choſen and coupled together, two fitter men than C. Claudius, and this Marcus Livius. But Livie would not endure to hear of this. He ſaid it was unreaſonable, that one condemned as a diſhoneſt man, ſhould afterwards be choſen Ruler of the City. If they had done ill to truſt him with one Conſulſhip, what meant they then to offer him another? With theſe and the like phraſes he reſiſted their deſires: till by perſwaſions and examples rehearſed, of ſuch as had patiently digeſted injuries done by the people, and repayed good for evil; he was contented to accept the honour.

Here we may behold a true figure of that Emblem, with which Themiſtocles checked the ingratitude of the Athenians: reſembling himſelf to a Plane-tree, the branches and boughs whereof men break in fair weather; but run under it for ſhelter in a ſtorm. Such unthankfulneſs to well deſerving men, is not rarely found in the outragious multitude. Neither was the late example hereto much unlike, of Philip the ſecond King of Spain his dealing with the Duke of Alva. For although he had committed the Duke to priſon, upon ſome ſmall offence conceived, without all regard of his former deſerts: yet when his intended Conqueſt of Portugal, required the ſervice of a man, more than ordinarily ſufficient; he ſtood no longer upon the ſcanning of late diſpleaſures; but employed the ſame Duke, whom he had newly diſgraced. This is wiſdom often taught by neceſſity.

It was a dangerous year toward, when C. Claudius Nero, and M. Levius were choſen Conſuls. Aſdrubal was already come into France, and waited only, to have the wayes of the Alps thawed by warm weather, for his paſſage into Italy. The Romans uſed at this time the ſervice of three and twenty Legions: and wanted not employment for many more, if they had known how to levy and maintain them. Of theſe which they had, four ſerved in Spain, two in Sicil, and two in Sardinia: the reſt were ſo diſpoſed, in ſeveral parts of Italy, where need ſeemed to require, that only two Legions were left to each of the Conſuls. But the Conſuls were men of execution; and would not be tyed to the punctual obſervance of what the Senate thought fit. M. Livius would not ſtir out of Rome, againſt ſo mighty a power as followed Aſdrubal, untill he had firſt obtained, that he might carry with him as many as could well be ſpared from other imployments; and thoſe, or the moſt of them, choſen Companies. It was true, that two Legions appointed to ſerve under Lucius Portius a Prætor of that year, among the Ciſalpine Gauls, might be reckoned as an additament to the forces of Livius; to whom the War againſt Aſdrubal was allotted. So might alſo two other Legions, that were among the Salentines, near unto Tarentum, unto another of the Prætors, be accounted a part of Claudius his Army, thar was ſent againſt Hannibal. Nevertheleſs, the Conſuls, by the eſpecial inſtance of Livie, did obtain, that all might be left to their own diſcretion. For news came that Aſdrubal was already paſſing the Alps; the Ligurians, who dwelt in the Country about Genua, with their neighbour people, were in readineſs to joyn with him; and L. Portius ſent word, that he would adventure no further, than he ſafely might. When all was ordered as themſelves thought beſt, the two Conſuls went forth of the City; each his ſeveral way. The people of Rome were now quite otherwiſe affected, than they had been, when L. Æmilius Paulus, and C. Terentius Varro, were ſent againſt Hannibal. They did no longer take upon them, to direct their Generals, or bid them diſpatch, and win the victory betimes: but rather they ſtood in fear, leſt all diligence, wiſdom and valour ſhould prove too little. For ſince few years had paſſed, wherein ſome one of their Generals had not been ſlain; and ſince it was manifeſt, that if either of theſe preſent Conſuls were defeated, or put to the worſt; the two Carthaginians would forthwith joyn, and make ſhort work with the other: it ſeemed a greater happineſs than could be expected, that each of them ſhould return home Victor; and come off with honour, from ſuch mighty oppoſition, as he was like to find. With extream difficulty had Rome held up her head, ever ſince the battle of Cannæ: though it were ſo, that Hannibal alone, with little help from Carthage, had continued the War in Italy. But there was now arrived another Son of Amilcar;

Amilcar; and one, that in his preſent Expedition, had ſeemed a man of more ſufficiency than Hannibal himſelf. For whereas in that long and dangerous march, thorow barbarous Nations, over great Rivers and Mountains, that were thought unpaſſable, Hannibal had loſt a great part of his Army: this Aſdrubal in the ſame places, had multiplied his numbers; and gathering the people, that he found in the way, deſcended from the Alps like a rowling Snow-ball, far greater than he came over the Pyrenees at his firſt ſetting out of Spain. Theſe conſiderations, and the like, of which fear preſented many unto them; cauſed the people of Rome, to wait upon their Conſuls out of the Town, like a penſive train of Mourners: thinking upon Marcellus and Criſpinus; upon whom in the like ſort they had given attendance the laſt year; but ſaw neither of them return alive, from a leſs dangerous War. Particularly, old Q. Fabius gave his accuſtomed advice to M. Livius, that he ſhould abſtain from giving or taking battel, untill he well underſtood the Enemies condition. But the Conſul made him a froward anſwer, and ſaid, that he would fight the very firſt day: for that he thought it long, till he ſhould either recover his honour by victory; or by ſeeing the overthrow of his own unjuſt Citizens, ſatisfie himſelf with the joy of a great, though not an honeſt revenge. But his meaning was better than his words.

Of the overthrow that Aſdrubal received in Spain by Scipio, a little before he took his Journey into Italy; ſuch mention hath already been made, as agreed with the report of that noble Hiſtorian Livie. Yet I think it not amiſs to add in this place, what may be be gathered out of the remaining fragments of Polybius his Hiſtory concerning that accident: Aſdrubal had wreſtled with many difficulties in Spain; by reaſon of thoſe Captains that were ſent from the City of Carthage, to joyn with him in the adminiſtration of that Province: they being, as it may ſeem, of the Hannonian faction; which is to ſay, thus far forth Traytors, that they preferred the advantage of their own ſide, before the good of their Common-wealth. In what particulars they wronged this worthy Son of Amilcar, and how they hindred his courſes undertaken, it cannot be known; ſince of thoſe Books, wherein Polybius hath exactly handled theſe matters, there are to us remaining only a few broken pieces. But by the ſpightful dealing of Hanno in Sicil with Mutines, a better man of War than himſelf, whom Hannibal had ſent into the Iſland: we may conceive, that againſt the Brother of Hannibal it was thought needful, by theſe miſchievous Partizans of Hanno, to uſe the violent oppoſition of more earneſt malice. Nevertheleſs, Aſdrubal was a good Patriot; and therefore endured patiently ſuch indignities, as Mutines could not long digeſt. His Journey into Italy being reſolved upon: he lay with part of the Army at Betula, not far from the Mines of Silver; whence he was to furniſh his Expeditions. Thither came Scipio; and drave him out of his Camp; though he were ſtrongly lodged, before the other Carthaginian Captains could or would come to his aſſiſtance. The overthrow ſeems not to have been ſo great, as it muſt have been ſuppoſed, if no way lay open to thoſe that fled. Rather it appears, that Aſdrubal dealt like a provident man, and ſeeing that his Camp was likely to be forced, ſent away all his mony with the Elephants before him: but ſtayed behind himſelf to ſuſtain the Romans a while, until his carriages might be out of danger. Herein he had his deſire, afterwards he gathered his broken troops together; and retired in ſuch ſort, that Scipio thought it not good to purſue him, and ſo paſſed over Tagus. Then taking unto him the forces aſſigned for his expedition, he marched away toward the Pyrenees: leaving the care of Spain unto his Brother Mago, and to Aſdrubal the Son of Geſco; that thought himſelf the fitteſt man for the adminiſtration thereof. Fain would Scipio have ſtopped him in his Journey, by ſending to defend againſt him the ordinary way of the Mountains. But whether Aſdrubal took another way, or whether he forced the guards that Scipio had ſent to keep the Pyrenees (as the defence of hard paſſages commonly ſorts to no good effect) he was not letted in his voyage by any ſuch impediment. Coming into Gaul, and following the ſteps of his Brother Hannibal: he found the Nations that lay in his way, ſo well affected, either to him or to his mony, that no paſſages were defended againſt him, nor any ſort of reſiſtance made; but he, and his Army well entertained, and their number much increaſed, by acceſs of ſuch as were deſirous to take his pay. Of theſe he had the better choice: for that he was driven to winter in their Country; whilſt that the paſſages of the Alps were cloſed up with Ice and Snow. The Mountainers likewiſe, that had ſo greatly moleſted Hannibal in his Journey over the Alps, were eaſily won to take part with Aſdrubal, when he travelled thorow their Country. For theſe poor men, at the firſt coming of Hannibal, were verily perſwaded, that it was his purpoſe to rob them of their their cattel; and to make ſpoil of that little wealth which they had painfully ſcraped together out of the deſolate rocks. But now in proceſs of time, they were better informed. Therefore, underſtanding that there were two mighty Cities far diſjoyned aſunder, which made War upon each other, by Land and Sea; and that the Alps did only lye in the way: they gladly condeſcended to take their part in the fortune of the invaders. The like affection upon greater cauſe, was afterward found in the Ciſalpine Gauls. The Ligurians alſo joyned with Aſdrubal: and ſo would the Hetrurians have done, if he had arrived in their Country. There was no other Roman Army near, than L. Portius with his two Legions; of whom there was no great fear. Therefore did Aſdrubal: ſet upon Placentia, a Roman Colony: in hope to make his coming the more terrible, by the deſtruction of that Town. But there he loſt a great deal of time, and finally was driven to quit the enterpriſe: by undertaking which, he gave the Roman Conſuls leaſure to make ready for him; and cauſed his Brother Hannibal (who upon the firſt bruit of Aſdrubal he ſo timely, and eaſily paſſing the Alps, was about to leave his wintring Camps, and go forth to meet with him) to ſit ſtill a while, as well aware, that Placentia would not be taken in haſte.

C. Claudius Nero the Roman Conſul, made what ſpeed he could to meet with Hannibal, and ſtop him from joyning with his Brother. He had about forty thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe: with which he dayly offered battel to the Carthaginians; and had of him the better in many ſkirmiſhes. Hannibal was once driven to make a tedious march from the borders of the Salentines and Apulians, unto the Country of the Brutians, there to encreaſe his forces; which were otherwiſe too weak for the Journey intended. Afterward coming to Grumentum, a Town of the Lucans; he there fought unproſperouſly with Nero the Conſul. Nevertheleſs, he got off, and marched away to Venuſia. But Nero followed him, and had there again the better of him. Wherefore he was driven to return to Metapontum: where joyning with Hanno, that had made ready a good Army, he aſſayed again, to make way by force to his Brother. So he paſſed onward, and came again to Venuſia, having Nero ſtill at his heels. Thence went he over the River Aufidus, to Canuſium, where he ſate down, not far from the place, in which he had obtained his moſt memorable victory. There alſo did Nero ſit down by him: and both of them reſted, without making offer to fight. It ſeemed perhaps unto Hannibal, who knew the Country very well; that his Brother might with little impediment, overcome the way to Canuſium: where, if he could once again deal with both the Conſuls, and all the Roman forces together, he had reaſon to hope for ſuch another victory, as once he had gotten in the ſame open Country. If this had ſo faln out; Rome would have been undone for ever. But the Carthaginians ſhould not have need to wiſh any ſecond victory, in the naked Campans about Cannæ; If ſuch an Army as this which Aſdrubal now brings, had come to ſecond Hannibal, when he was in full ſtrength; and the Romans not able to keep the field. Wherefore this worthy General had good reaſon afterward to ſay that Hanno was the man, who by delaying the ſupply, did beat him out of Italy; which elſe no power of the Romans could have done.

Whilſt Nero waited upon the Carthaginians, and thought it enough to hinder them from meeting with the Army that was coming to their ſuccour: he was advertiſed of Aſdrubal his approach; by Letters and Meſſengers intercepted, as they were going to Hannibal. Theſe gave notice, that Aſdrubal had left the ſiege of Placentia, and drew onwards apace: being already come within two hundred miles of his Brother; notwithſtanding all oppoſition that could be made by Livie the Conſul. Of theſe news Claudius Nero was nothing joyful. For if Hannibal could once be joyned as head, unto that great body of an Army, which Aſdrubal brought with him: it was moſt apparent, that howſoever the fortune of Rome ſhould avoid, for the preſent, any great calamity; yet the very continuance of ſo ſtrong a war at home, would enforce the Latines, and other faithful Aſſociates, to faint under the burden; as twelve of the thirty Roman Colonies had already done. Wherefore he reſolved, that it were better to make any deſperate adventure, than to ſuffer the conjunction of two ſuch malevolent Planets: whoſe peſtilent influence, if not on the ſudden, yet within few years, was like to work moſt lamentable effects. It ſeemed apparent, that his Colleague was unable to ſtay the progreſs of Aſdrubal: neither were there any good Legions in a readineſs, that could do ſervice in ſuch a needful caſe; excepting thoſe, that were already imployed under the two Conſuls. Hereupon he concluded, that it was not expedient for him to tye himſelf to his own charge, which was the war againſt Hannibal: but rather that it behoved him, to help where where more neceſſity required; and to carry part of his forces unto his Colleague. This could not be without much danger. Yet ſince the meeting of the two Carthaginian Brethren, was far more dangerous to the Roman Common-wealth: it ſeemed the beſt way to put Fortune in truſt, with that which was of the leſs importance. Six thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe he therefore took, that were the very choice of his Army: and making ſhew, as if he would only ſtep aſide, to do ſome ſmall piece of ſervice near at hand; away he poſted as faſt as he could, to aſſiſt his fellow-Conſul. His Meſſengers ran before him, to give warning to all Towns by which he was to paſs, that they ſhould be ready to meet him with victuals, and all other neceſſaries for his Army. Livius the other Conſul, at that time, lay encamped near unto Sena Gallica; and Aſdrubal, within half a mile of him. In ſix dayes Nero had finiſhed his Journey thither; and when he drew near, ſent Meſſengers before him, to give notice of his coming. Livie thought it fitteſt that he ſhould ſtay in ſome place of covert until dark night, and then enter ſecretly into the Camp: leſt the Enemy, perceiving this acceſs of ſtrength, ſhould accordingly frame his counſels. This was done; and a token given, that the Colonels, Captains, and all Souldiers, as well horſe as foot, that Nero had brought with him, ſhould be lodged and entertained by men of their own ſort. Their Company was ſomewhat increaſed by Voluntaries that joyned with him on the way. Nevertheleſs it was not needful that the Quarter which received them, ſhould be enlarged; ſince they had brought with them nothing but their arms. The next day they held a Counſel of war: wherein ſome were of opinion, that it were beſt for theſe new arrived Companies to refreſh themſelves a few days after their weary Journey, before they ſhould be drawn forth to battel. But againſt this, Nero was very earneſt: and beſought his Colleague, to make uſe of him out of hand; that he might betimes return to his own Camp, ere Hannibal ſhould have notice of his abſence. The Souldiers alſo of Nero were full of ſpirit; perceiving that the honour of the victory was like to be theirs: foraſmuch as the battel would not have been undertaken, without this their coming to help. Finally, it was agreed when the Counſel brake up, that the ſign of battel ſhould be hung out; which was commonly a Purple Coat over the Generals Pavilion.

Aſdrubal was no leſs willing than the Romans to come to battle, having long deſired it, and hitherto not found occaſion before. But when he had put his men in order, and was riding before the head of his Army, to behold the Enemies countenance: it ſeemed to him, that they were more than they had been; and ſome of their arms and horſes looked as though they had wanted dreſſing, after a long Journey. Hereupon he began to withdraw his Army back into the Camp: and gave order, that if no priſoners could be taken, by whom he might be certified of the truth; yet ſhould there good obſervation be made, whether the Enemies Camp were enlarged, or no; or what other alteration could be noted, that might ſhew their forces to be encreaſed. The Camp, as hath been ſaid, was not extended: but the trumpet, that ſounded only once in the Quarter of L. Portius the Prætor, did now, contrary to former cuſtom, ſound twice in the Quarter of Livius the Conſul. Hereat Aſdrubal greatly muſed: and being well acquainted with the Roman orders, held this for a ſure token, that the other Conſul was there arrived. How this might be, if Hannibal were alive, and in good caſe, he was not able to conjecture: but thought it the beſt way, to go leiſurely to work, till he might be better informed. Upon confidence in his own forces, he had not cared hitherto, how near he lay to the Romans; nor troubled himſelf perhaps with over-ſtrongly fortifying his own Camp. Yet when he now perceived, that ſomewhat was fallen out beſide his expectation, he changed his reſolution; and held it no diſhonour to remove a little further off. So he diſlodged ſecretly by night, intending to get over the River Metaurus; whereby to keep himſelf as long as he could, from neceſſity of battel. But whether it were ſo, that his guides did ſteal away from him in the dark, ſo that he could not find the way to the Foords; or whether his carriages were too heavy, and hindred his ſpeed: far he had not gone, ere the Conſul Nero was at his heels with all the Roman horſe, and ſtayed him from paſſing any further. Soon after came L. Portius with the light armature: whom the other Conſul followed anon with all the Legions; in good order, and ready for battel. Aſdrubal, ſeeing himſelf overtaken with neceſſity to fight, omitted no care and circumſpection. His Gauls, in whom he repoſed leaſt confidence, he placed in his left wing upon a Hill, which the Enemy ſhould not, without much difficulty, be able to climb: in the right wing he ſtood himſelf with his Africans and Spaniards; his Ligurians he placed placed in the midſt; and his Elephants he beſtowed in the front of his battels. On the Roman ſide, Nero had the leading of the right wing, Livius of the left, and Porcius of the battel. Both Romans and Carthaginians well underſtood, how much depended upon the fortune of this day; and how little hope of ſafety there was unto the vanquiſhed. Only the Romans herein ſeemed to have had the better in conceit and opinion; that they were to fight with men deſirous to have fled from them. And, according to this preſumption, came Livius the Conſul with a proud bravery, to give charge on the Africans, by whom he was ſo ſharply entertained, that the victory ſeemed very doubtful. The Africans and Spaniards were ſtout Souldiers, and well acquainted with the manner of the Roman fight. The Ligurians alſo were a hardy Nation, and not accuſtomed to give ground; which they needed the leſs, or were able now to do, being placed in the midſt. Livius therefore, and Porcius found ſtrong oppoſition: and with great ſlaughter on both ſides, prevailed little or nothing. Beſides other difficulties, they were exceedingly troubled by the Elephants that brake their firſt ranks; and put them in ſuch diſorder, as the Roman Enſigns were driven to fall back. All this while Claudius Nero, labouring much in vain againſt a ſteep Hill, was unable to come to blowes with the Gauls, that ſtood oppoſite unto him, but out of danger. This made Aſdrubal the more confident; who, ſeeing his own left wing ſafe, did the more boldly and fiercely make impreſſion on the other ſide, upon the left wing of the Romans. But Nero perceiving that the place wherein he ſtood, was ſuch as would compel him to remain idle till the fight were ended; took a part of his forces and led them round behind the forces of Porcius and Livius: which having compaſſed, he fell upon Aſdrubal, and charged him in the flanck. Here began the victory to be manifeſt on the Roman ſide. For Nero, finding none to reſiſt him in front, ran all along the depth of Aſdrubal his battle: and falling upon the ſkirts thereof, diſordered the Enemies, and put all to rout. Of the Spaniards therefore and Africans, that were laid at on every ſide, the greateſt part was ſlain. The Ligurians and Gauls eſcaped as they could; and ſaved themſelves by timely flight. Of the Elephants, four were taken alive: the reſt were ſlain: ſome by the Enemies weapons, others by their own guides that rode them. For when any of them, being ſore wounded, began to wax unruly, and ruſh back upon their own battels following them, the guide had in readineſs a Mallet and a Chizzel, wherewith he gave them a ſtroke between the ears, in the joynt of the neck, next unto the head, wherewith he killed the beaſts upon a ſudden. This ſpeedy way of preventing ſuch harm as the Elephants, being hurt, were wont to do to the ſquadrons following them, is ſaid to have been the device of Aſdrubal himſelf, who died in this battel.

Great commendations are given to Aſdrubal, both by Polybius, and by Livie. He is ſaid at all times to have ſhewed himſelf worthy of Amilcar his Father, and Hannibal his Brother; to have ſtriven with great patience againſt many difficulties, whereinto he fell by the means of thoſe Captains that were ſent from Carthage into Spain; to have performed in this laſt battel all duties of a worthy General; and finally, when he ſaw the loſs irrepairable, to have ridden manfully into the thickeſt of his Enemies; where, fighting bravely, he was ſlain. Of the number that died with him in this battel, the report of Livie and Polybius do very much diſagree. For Livie ſaith, that the Carthaginians had no leſs an overthrow, than was that which they gave to the Roman at Cannæ: that fifty ſix thouſand of them were ſlain, five thouſand and four hundred taken priſoners, and above four thouſand Roman Citizens, whom they had captives with them, delivered and ſet at liberty. He ſaith alſo, that of the Romans and their Aſſociates there were ſlain eight thouſand: and of the booty, that it was exceeding great; not only in other kinds, but in gold and ſilver. Concerning the booty, Polybius hath no mention of it. Likely it is to have been as rich as Livie reporteth it; for Aſdrubal came well ſtored with mony. But Polybius (who had no deſire to make this battel of Metaurus, a parallel unto that of Cannæ) reports no more than about ten thouſand of the Carthaginian ſide; and two thouſand of the Roman, to have been ſlain. The number of the priſoners he doth not mention: but only ſaith, That ſome of the Carthaginian Princes were taken alive; and that all the reſt died in the battell. Whereby it may ſeem that they were all Barchines: foraſmuch as they preferred the honour of themſelves, and of their Country, above their lives.

The joy of this victory was no leſs in Rome, than had been the fear of the event. For ever ſince it were known in what ſort Nero had left his Army, the whole City was troubled, as much as lately at Hannibal his coming thither. Men thought it ſtrange, that the Conſul ſhould make ſuch a great adventure, as thus to put the one half of all the Roman forces unto hazzard of the Dice. For what if Hannibal ſhould chance to have notice of this his departure, and either purſue him, or ſet upon the Army that ſtaid behind, much weakned, and without a General? Thus did they talk; yet reſerving their cenſure unto the ſucceſs; with liberty to approve or condemn, according to the iſſue. In the mean time the people filled the Market-place, the Women ran to the Tumples with Vows and Prayers; and the Senators were daily in councel, waiting ſtill ready at hand upon the Magiſtrates; as if ſome great matter were likely to fall out, that would aſk every ones help. In brief, they were all ſo full of melancholy, that when the firſt news of victory came, there were not many that would believe it. Afterwards, when Meſſengers arrived from the Conſuls, with Letters contained all that had paſſed, there was not only great and joyful concourſe of all ſorts of men unto the Temples, but the very face of the City was altered; and men from thenceforth began to follow their private buſineſs; making contracts one with another (which they had long forborn to do) & attending their own affairs in ſuch wiſe, as if Hannibal were already driven out of Italy.

Nero returning to his Camp, threw forth openly the head of Aſdrubal before the Carthaginians: and producing his African priſoners bound, ſent two of them looſe to give Hannibal notice of what had hapned. Theſe two priſoners might have ſerved well enough to certifie Hannibal of the miſad venture, without doing wrong to the dead body of Aſdrubal: eſpecially ſince Hannibal, in honourable, and far different manner, had given burial to Gracchus and Marcellus; yea, to all the Roman Generals, whoſe carkaſſes fell into his hands. But it may ſeem, that howſoever the People of Carthage wanted much of the generous diſpoſition, which was found among the Romans, in their love unto the Common-weal: yet in dealing with enemies, they were far more civil, and leſs prone to the inſolency of revenge. The beſt excuſe of this outrage done by Nero, is that he hoped much more by the ſudden terrour of ſuch a ſpectacle, than by the ſimple relation of that which paſſed, to make a deep impreſſion of fear into the Carthaginians. It may alſo be ſaid, That he forgot himſelf, being over-joyed with the greatneſs of his proſperity. For it was the battel of Metaurus that weighed down the ballance, and turned the Tide of the Roman fortune: which being then at the loweſt Ebbe, ceaſed not afterwards to flow, till it could not be contained within any banks. Hannibal having loſt in this unhappy fight (beſides the worthy Gentleman his brother) all the hope that ſo long ſuſtained him in Italy, withdrew himſelf into the Country of the Brutians: and thither he cauſed all the Lucans, that were of his party, to remove; as likewiſe all that dwelt in Metapontum. For he wanted men to defend ſo many places, as he held at the preſent, becauſe they lay too far aſunder. Wherefore he drew them all into a leſſer compaſs, in the utmoſt corner of Italy, it being a country of much faſtneſs, and the people exceedingly devoted to his ſervice. In this buſineſs Nero gave him no memorable impediment: either becauſe Hannibal was too ſtrong for him, having all his forces united; or becauſe it is likely that this remove of the Lucans and Metapontines, was not before the end of Summer, when their harveſt was gathered in: at what time the Senate called him home to Rome. M. Livius the other Conſul tarried among the Ciſalpine Gaules untill the end of ſummer; there to ſet things in ſuch order, as he thought requiſite: which done, he wrote unto the Senate, that there was no more need of him and his Army in that Province, but that L. Porcius, with the two Legions that were there before, might very well diſcharge the place. For this cauſe he deſired leave to return home; and that he might bring his Army with him. The Senate well underſtood his meaning: which was to have the honour of triumph as he well deſerved. But foraſmuch as it was well known, what intereſt Nero had in the late victory: order was ſo given, that not only Livie with his Army ſhould come home; but likewiſe Nero, though leaving his Army behind him, to confront Hannibal. So the honour of triumph was granted to them both: in the pomp whereof, Livie made the greater ſhew, as riding in a Chariot, and followed by his Souldiers; becauſe in his Province, and upon his day of command, the victory was gotten: his Army alſo being preſent at the triumph. But Nero that rode on horſe-back, and without ſuch attendance, was the more extolled by the People and Souldiers; by whom, the victory was in a manner wholly aſcribed unto his great worth. Neither wanted L. Veturius Philo, and Q. Cecilius Metellus, Lieutenants to the Generals, the due acknowledgement of their good ſervice. For they were commended unto the People, as men worthy to be choſen Conſuls: and Conſuls they were choſen for the year following. But nothing was done by them, worthy of memory in their Conſulſhip. Neither indeed from this year, which was the thirteenth of the preſent war, until the eighteenth year wherein it ended, was there any matter of importance wrought in Italy; ſave only the taking of Locri from the Carthaginians by ſurpriſe. For Hannibal wanted ſtrength, wherewith to make any great offer: and the Romans had little mind to provoke him; but thought it well that he was quiet. Such opinion had they conceived of him, that though all about him went to ruine, yet in him alone, they thought there was force enough to hold himſelf upright. And ſurely, very notable are the commendations given unto him by Polybius, whom Livie therein follows. That making war upon a People, of all other the moſt war-like, he obtained ſo many victories by his own good conduct: and that leading an Army, compounded of ſo many ſundry Nations, Africans, Spaniards, Gaules, Carthaginians, Italians and Greeks, which were neither in Language, Laws, Conditions, or any other thing, one like to another; he held them all in ſuch good order, that they never fell to ſedition among themſelves, or againſt their General. But that which Livie adds hereto, is yet perhaps of greater admiration: That he ſuſtained his Army, without help from other places, from this time forward, upon the hungry ſoil of the Brutians: which when it was beſt manured in time of peace, could hardly ſuffice to nouriſh the Inhabitants. It's therefore apparent, that by his proper worth and vertue, he kept his Army in ſuch order and obedience, rather than by any greatneſs of reward and booty; ſince after the death of Aſdrubal, he made no invaſion upon the wealthier parts of Italy; but held himſelf ſtill among the poor Brutians. Where we muſt leave him; until he be drawn into Africk by Scipio; whoſe doing will henceforth entertain, and lead us unto the end of this War.

§. XVII.

How P. Cornelius Scipio the Roman made entire conqueſt of Spain.

†. I.

How the Carthaginians were driven by Scipio from the Continent into the Iſle of Gades.

MAgo and Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, took upon them the charge of Spain, when Aſdrubal the ſon of Amilcar departed thence into Italy. Theſe agreed together, that Mago ſhould make a voyage to the Baleares; there to levy a ſupply of men; and Aſdrubal withdraw himſelf into Luſitania (which is now Portugal) whither the Romans had ill means to follow; being altogether unacquainted in thoſe parts. Mago had ſoon ended his buſineſs, and returned into Spain: where he met with one Hanno (the ſame perhaps that had lately been imployed in Sicil) who brought new forces out of Africk; and came to ſucceed in place of Aſdrubal the Barchine. It is not unlikely that Spain was now the better, and more readily furniſhed with men and all things needfull from Carthage: when that ſon of Amilcar, whoſe authority had been greateſt, was thence departed. For hereby might the factious diligence of old Hanno approve it ſelf, againſt that noble race of Warriors; when it ſhould appear, that things did proſper much the better by being left unto the handling of other men. Whether it were upon deſire to make good ſome ſuch opinion raiſed of him at home, or whether upon confidence in the forces that he brought over: Hanno took the field, and led Mago with him; as purpoſing afreſh to ſet upon the Romans. So he entered into the country of the Celtiberians, not very far from new Carthage: where, by money and over perſwaſions, he levied above nine thouſand men.

P. Scipio in the mean while contained himſelf in the Eaſtern parts of Spain: attentive, as it may ſeem to the proceedings of Aſdrubal, the ſon of Amilcar; againſt whom he is reported by ſome Writers to have ſent part of his forces into Italy, to the aſſiſtance of C. Claudius Nero, and M. Livius the Conſuls. But hearing of the levy made by Hanno and Mago among the Celtiberians, he ſent M. Syllanus the Propretor, with ten thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe. Syllanus got intelligence by ſome fugitive Celtiberians, who became his guides, that their Country-men incamped apart from the Carthaginians in great diſorder: as men fearing no danger, becauſe they were at home. Wherefore as cloſely as he was able, he drew neer to theſe Celtiberians: and falling upon them on the ſudden, gave them ſuch an overthrow, that Hanno and Mago coming to their ſuccour, inſtead of heartning and re-inforcing them, became partakers of the loſs. Mago ſaved himſelf with all the horſe, and old Companies of foot, which were about two thouſand: and in ten daies journey brought them ſafe to Aſdrubal. The reſt of the Africans were either ſlain or taken: among whom, Hanno had the ill luck to be taken priſoner; though he kept himſelf out of the fight until all was loſt. As for the Celtiberians, they knew better how to make ſhift; and and ſaved moſt of themſelves by running into the woods.

It could not otherwiſe be, but that Scipio was much troubled with the danger wherein Italy ſtood, by the coming thither of Aſdrubal. Ten thouſand foot, and eighteen hundred horſe he did therefore ſend out of Spain (as it is reported by ſome Authors to the defence of his own Country; or was perhaps, about to ſend them: and thereupon remained at new Carthage, intentive to the neceſſity and ſucceſs of his Country-men at home. But when he had word of the great victory at Metaurus, which fell out long before the end of the Summer, then might he well adventure, to take in hand the entire conqueſt of Spain; which muſt needs be much alienated from the Carthagininas, by the report of ſuch an overthrow. The Spaniſh Souldierds that ſerved under Hannibal, & thoſe that had been ſent over into Africk, were as pledges heretofore, by whom their Country was held obnoxious to the Carthaginians. But when it was noiſed abroad, that all which hath followed Aſdrubal into Italy, were fallen into the hands of the Romans; and that Hannibal with his Army was cloſed up in a ſtraight, whence he could not get out: then did it greatly behove the Spaniards to conform themſelves unto the will of the Vectors. That it was the ſucceſs of things in Italy, which gave ſuch confidence unto Scipio; it was the more probable, becauſe he took not this great enterpriſe in hand, untill the Summer was almoſt ſpent. Aſdrubal therefore uſed the benefit of the ſeaſon; and by diſpoſing his Army into many garriſons, hindred the Enemy from doing any great exploit before winter. So the very length of way, and the time of the year, cauſed Scipio to return back: without any other matter performed, than that his Brother L. Scipio took by aſſault the Town of Oringis.

Againſt the next years danger, Aſdrubal prepared a great Army: and ſpared not coſt, nor travel, in ſtrengthening himſelf, for the tryal of his laſt fortune in Spain. With ſeventy thouſand foot, four thouſand horſe, and two and thirty Elephants, he took the field: which number I believe, that he could hardly have raiſed, without boldly denying the truth of thoſe reports that came from Italy. Scipio thought his Roman Legions too weak to encounter with ſuch a multitude. Wherefore he judged it needful to uſe the help of his Spaniſh friends. But the death of his Father and Uncle, that were caſt away by the treaſon of ſuch falſe Auxiliaries, made him on the other ſide very doubtful of relying upon thoſe, that might perhaps betray him in his greateſt need. Yet ſince one Colchus, that was Lord of eight and twenty Towns, had promiſed him the laſt Winter, to raiſe three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe for his ſervice: he reſolved to make uſe of thoſe, and ſome few others, that might help to make a ſhew; and yet not be able to do any great harm, if they would revolt. So with five and forty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe, he ſought out the Enemy; near unto whom he incamped. At his firſt coming, Mago and Maſaniſſa fell upon him; with hope to take him unprepared, whilſt he was making his lodgings. But he laid certain troops of horſe in covert: which, breaking upon them unexpected, cauſed them to fall off. They made at firſt an orderly retreat: but being more hardly preſſed, they ſhortly betook themſelves to plain flight. After this incounter, which added ſome courage to the Romans, and abated the preſumption of the Carthaginians, there were daily ſkirmiſhes between the horſe and light armature, on both ſides; wherein was nothing done of importance. Aſdrubal drew forth his Army, and arranged it before his Trenches: the like did Scipio; each of them to ſhew that he durſt fight, yet not proceeding any farther. Thus they continued many dayes: Aſdrubal being ſtill the firſt that iſſued forth in the morning; and the firſt that, in the evening, withdrew himſelf into his Trenches. The Spaniſh Auxiliaries were placed on both ſides in the wings; the Carthaginians were in the midſt, with their Elephants before them; and oppoſite to theſe on the other ſide were the Roman Legions. When they had in this order confronted one another, though at far diſtance, many dayes together: it grew to be the common opinion; that they ſhould ſhortly meet in the ſame form, and be matched on each part, with the enemies long before deſigned. But Scipio, when he purpoſed indeed to fight, altered the form of his Army; and withall, came forth earlier than he had been wont. He cauſed his men and horſes to be well fed betimes in the morning before day: and then ſent forth his horſe and light armature, to train out the Carthaginians with their bellies empty: uſing herein the ſame trick, whereby he might remember that Hannibal had beaten his Father in the battel of Trebia. His Roman Legions he beſtowed in the wings; his Spaniards in the battel. Aſdrubal ſent forth his horſe in all haſte, to entertain the Romans; whilſt he himſelf arranged his men, in their wonted order at the Hill foot, upon which he incamped. In the ſkirmiſhes of the horſe it could not be diſcerned which part had the better: ſince, being over-prelied on either ſide, they had a ſafe retrait unto their foot; and one troop ſeconding another by courſe, returned to charge. This fight was protracted by Scipio to a great length: becauſe his men, having well fed themſelves, were like to hold out better than the enemy. But about noon he cauſed his wings to advance a good pace; leaving their battel of Spaniards far behind them, that came on leiſurely, according to direction. The Spaniſh Mercenaries that ſtood in Aſdrubal his wings, were no way comparable, ſave only in number, to the Latine and Roman Souldiers that came againſt them; for they were freſh Souldiers, levied in haſte; and fighting only in reſpect of their pay. Being therefore charged in front by the Legions, and in flank, at the ſame time, by the Roman Velites, and by ſome cohorts, that were appointed to wheel about for the ſame purpoſe, they were ſorely preſſed, and with much difficulty made reſiſtance. The Carthaginians would fain have ſuccoured them; but that they durſt not ſtir out of their places, becauſe of the Spaniſh battel which was coming againſt them; though it were as yet far off. Thus the beſt part of Aſdrubal his Army ſtood idle, until the wings were broken. For, had he adventured to meet with the Spaniards, he muſt have caſt himſelf into the open ſpace that lay before him between the Roman wings: to the depth whereof when he had arrived, he ſhould have found himſelf incloſed in ſuch ſort, as was the Conſul Paulus at the battel of Cannæ. Wherefore he did only imploy his Elephants; which did, according to their manner, no greater harm to his Enemies, than to his friends. When they were chafed with wounds, they could no longer be ruled as their guides: but ran, as chance led them, and troubled both parts; or thoſe perhaps the more, that were the more unwilling to kill them. In proceſs of the fight, the Romans who had well refreſhed their bodies in the morning, endured luſty; when the others began to faint with travel and heat of the day. Wherefore perceiving their advantage, they followed it the more hotly; and gave not over, till they had forc't the enemy to change his place, and run from him. Aſdrubal did his beſt to have made an orderly retreat; and afterward again to have cauſed his men to turn head at the Hill foot. But the Romans would not ſuffer the victory to be ſo extorted from them: neither was it eaſie to put freſh courage into the vanquiſhed, led by the obſtinate paſſion of fear, which hearkens to no perſwaſion. The Camp of Aſdrubal had that day been taken, if a ſtorm of rain, which fell violently on the ſudden, and bred ſome ſuperſtition in the Romans, had not cauſed them to give over.

The ſame night Aſdrubal gave no reſt to his men; but cauſed them, hungry, and over-laboured as they were, to take pains in fortifying the Camp; wherein he feared to be aſſaulted. But little aſſurance could he have in the ſtrength of his Trenches, when he had loſt the hearts of his Spaniſh ſouldiers. One Attanes, that was Lord of the Turdetani, fled from him to the Romans, with a great Band of his ſubjects: many followed this example; and ſoon after two ſtrong Towns were yielded up to Scipio, and the Garriſons betrayed. It ſeems that the perverſe fortune of this late battel, whereupon Aſdrubal had ſet his reſt, bred in the Spaniards a diſpoſition, to believe the more eaſily thoſe reports which they heard from Italy. For henceforward, they never did good office to the Carthaginians. Aſdrubal, perceiving this, withdrew himſelf, and marched away faſter than ordinary pace, toward the Ocean Sea. Scipio followed the next morning, and overtaking the Carthagnians with his horſe, cauſed them ſo often to make ſtand, that they were at length attatched by the Roman Legions. Here began a cruel ſlaughter: for there was no reſiſtance made, but all fell to rout, ſave only ſeven thouſand that with Aſdrubal himſelf recovered a very ſtrong piece of ground, which they fortified in haſte. The place he made ſhift a while to defend: but wanting there neceſſaries to ſuſtain himſelf long, he was forſaken by ſome of thoſe few, that continued hitherto partakers of his fortune. Wherefore he reſolved to make ſhift for one; and ſtealing from his Company by night away to the Sea ſide, that was not far thence, he took ſhipping; and ſet ſail for Gades. When Scipio underſtood that Aſdrubal was thus gone, he left Syllanus with ten thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe, to beſiege their (Camp, which was not taken in haſte, for Mago and Maſaniſſa ſtaid in it) whileſt he with the reſt of the Army did what was needfull in the Country abroad. It was not long ere Mago and Maſaniſſa followed Aſdrubal to Gades: and their Army diſperſed it ſelf; ſome flying over to the Romans, others taking what way they like. So upon all the Continent of Spain, there were only three Towns left, Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, that made continuance of war againſt the Romans: of which only Caſtulo had a Carthaginian Garriſon, conſiſting of, of ſuch as had ſaved themſelves by flight in the late overthrows. Hereby it ſeems that the report of thoſe Hiſtorians was ill grounded, who ſaid, that Caſtulo yielded long ſince unto the Romans; though Hannibal took a wife in that City. For this was one of the laſt three towns that held out on the Carthaginian ſide. Illiturgi had ſometimes been inclinable to the Romans; if not altogether at their devotion. Yet after the death of the two elder Scipio's, following too earneſtly the Carthaginian fortune, it not only rebelled, but with great cruelty betrayed and ſlew the poor men that eſcaped thither from the overthrows. Aſtapa was a Town that ſtill adhered to the Carthaginians; and, which was worſe, had thriven by the ſpoil of the Romans and their Confederates. Wherefore (though not until the next year) Scipio went againſt theſe, and took himſelf Illiturgi, and Caſtulo: Illiturgi by aſſault, and with a general ſlaughter of the Inhabitants; Caſtulo, by treaſon of one Cerdubellus. Aſtapa was taken by Lucius Marcius; or rather deſtroyed by the Inhabitants. For a great pile of wood was raiſed in the Market place: whereinto was thrown all the gold, and ſilver, with whatſoever elſe was precious; the women and children ſtanding by it under a ſure guard, that ſhould kill and burn them if the Romans got into the Town. This proviſion being made, all the Inhabitants that could bear Arms, ruſhed forth deſperately, and fell upon the Roman Camp; where ſtriving beyond their power, they were every one ſlain. Then was the Town forthwith ſet on fire, by thoſe that had taken charge to do it: and many of the Romans conſumed with the flame; whilſt they ruſhed over-haſtily to catch the gold and ſilver, which they ſaw lying on the pile ready to melt.

Aſdrubal being beaten into the Iſland of Gades, found no cauſe of long ſtay there: but returned home to Carthage, with ſeven Gallies: leaving Mago behind him, to wait upon occaſion, if any ſhould be offered. He viſited in his way home, Syphax, King of the Maſæſili, a people of the Numidians; hoping to win him to the friendſhip of the Carthaginians. But he met with Scipio, as it were with his evil Angel, in the Kings port: who landing at the ſame time, carried Syphax quite another way. For Scipio having driven the Carthaginians out of Spain, did forthwith bethink himſelf, how to finiſh the war, by putting them to the like diſtreſs in Africk. Hereunto it ſeemed that the help of Syphax would be much available: a King that had many times fallen out with the Carthaginians, and ſuſtained much hurt by their procurement; of which in all likelihood he might eaſily be moved to ſeek revenge. He had alſo been beholding to P. and Cn. Scipio, that ſent him over a Captain into Africk; who inſtructed him ſo well in marſhalling his forces, as he thereby often became victorious. Upon theſe reaſons, the Numidian King ſent Embaſſadors to Rome, and made league with the City in time of great extremity. So that hereby P. Scipio conceived hope of laying a good foundation to the War, which he intended in Africk, upon the friendſhip of this ill neighbour to the Carthaginians. For which cauſe he ſent over C. Lælius his Embaſſador, to deal with Syphax: who declaring that the Carthaginians did very ill in Italy, and had nothing now at all to do in Spain, eaſily perſwaded the King to take part with thoſe that had the better, and were without queſtion his better friends. Only Syphax requeſted that the Roman General ſhould viſit him in perſon, to conclude the League; by which he was to enter into conditions of more importance, than in any former Treaty. Hereto Scipio condeſcended; thinking the friendſhip of ſo great a King, that was neighbour to Carthage, and not far diſtant from Spain, well worthy of the adventure. So with two Quinquereme Gallies he took Sea, and arrived in the Kings Port, at the ſame time with Aſdrubal. This would have been very dangerous unto him, had he been deſcryed by his enemies further at Sea: but in the Haven they forbear to make offer one upon the other. Syphax might well be proud; ſeeing at one time, two ſuch Captains of two moſt powerful Cities, came to deſire his friendſhip. He would have brought them to treat of peace: But the Roman excuſed himſelf, by want of ſuch Commiſſion from the Senate. He feaſted them together: and ſhortly diſmiſſed Scipio, with whom he readily entred into Covenant; which in time of performance, he as readily brake.

Funeral games held by Scipio. A Duel between two Spaniſh Princes. A digreſſion concerning Duels.

Scipio returning into Spain, and reſting that Winter, took vengeance the next year, upon thoſe of Illiturgi, Caſtulo, and Aſtapa, as hath been ſaid before. The conqueſt of the Country being then in a manner at an end; he performed at new Carthage, with great ſolemnity, ſome Vows that he had made, and honoured the memory of his Father and Uncle, with funeral games, eſpecially ly of those that fought at sharp, according to the manner of the times. Neither was it needful that he should trouble himself with preparing slaves for that spectacle, to hazard their lives, as was used in the City of Rome: for there were enow, that either offered, themselves as Voluntaries, or were sent from their Princes, to give proof in single combat, of the valour that was in their several Countries. Some also there were, that being in contention, which they could not, or would not otherwise end, agreed to deferr the decision of their Controversies, to tryal of the sword, in single fight. Among these, the most eminent, were Corbis and Orsua; Cosen-germans: that contended for the principality of a Town called Ilea. Corbis was the elder, and the elder brothers son: wherefore he claimed the Lordship, as eldest of the house, after the manner of our Irish Tampstry. But the father of Orsua stood lately seized of the principality: which though himself received by the death of his elder brother, yet this his Son would not let it go back, but claimed to hold it as heir unto his father, and old enough to rule. Fain would Scipio have compounded the matter. But they answered peremptorily, that all their friends and kindred had already laboured in vain, to take up their quarrel; and that neither God nor Man, but only Mars, their god of battel, should be Umpire between them. So they had their wills: and the elder, who was also the stronger, and more skilful at his weapon, easily vanquished the fool-hardiness of the younger.

Such combates have been very ancient; and perhaps more ancient, than any other kind of fight. We read of many performed before the War of Troy; by Theseus, Hercules, Pollux, and others: as also of two more at the War of Troy, the one between Paris and Menelaus; the other between Hector and Ajax. Neither want their examples of them among the Hebrews: whereof that between David and Goliah; and others performed by some of Davids Worthies, against those that challenged them, are greatly celebrated. Unto the same kind appertains the fight between twelve of the Tribes of Juda, and as many of the Benjamites. The Romans had many of them: whereof that was principal, in which they ventured their Dominion upon the heads of three brethren the Horatii, against the three brethren, Curatii, that were Albans. The combat of Manlius Torquatus; and shortly after: of Valerius Corvinus, with two Champions of the Gauls, which challenged any Roman; were of less importance, as having only reference to bravery. In England there was a great Combat fought between Edmond Ironside, and Canutus the Dane, for no less matter than the Kingdom. The use of them was very frequent in the Saxon times; almost upon every occasion, great or small. In the reign of Edward the third, who sustained the party of Mountfort, against the Earl of Bloys, contending for the Dutchy of Britain; there was a fight for honour of the Nations, between thirty of the Britons, and thirty English: two of which English, were Calverlie, a brave Captain; and that Sir Robert Knolles is, who afterwards became a renowned Commander in the French wars, and did highly honour his blood, whereof the Lord Knolles is descended. It were infinite to reckon the examples of the like, found in English French and Italian Histories. Most of them have been combats of bravery, and of gayeté de cœur, as the French term it; for honour of several Nations; for love of Mistresses; or whatsoever else gave occasion unto men, desirous to set out themselves. But besides those of this sort, there are two other natures of combats; which are, either upon accusation for life, or upon trial of Title and Inheritance, as in Writ of right. And of this latter kind, was that, of which we speak even now, between Corbis and Orsua. Unto these (me thinks) may be added, as of different condition from the rest, the combat upon Wager; such as were that between David and Goliah, or that between the Horatii and Curatii, in which without regard of Title, the Dominion of Nations, one over the other, is adventured upon the head of Champions. Upon an accusation for life, there was a combat appointed between the Lord Henry of Boulinbrook Duke of Hereford, and Moubray Duke of Norfolk. There was a combat performed by Sir John Ansley and one Cattrington: whom Ansley charged with treason: and proved it upon him, by being victorious. The like was fought between Robert of Mountfort, and Henry of Essex. The like also, between a Navarrois, and one Welsh of Grimsby, whom the Navarrois accused of treason: but, being beaten in fight, confessed that he had belyed him, and was therefore drawn and hanged. Whether our tryal by battel do determine, that the false accuser, if he be vanquished, shall suffer the punishment which had been due to the offender, if the accusation had been proved; I cannot affirm. But we every where find, That if he which is accused of treason, or according to the customs of Normandy, of Murder, Rape, or burning of places (offences punished by death) be overcome, He ſhall ſuffer the pains appointed for thoſe crimes. In combats for tryal of right, it is not ſo: neither is the Appellant or Defendant bound to fight in perſon, but he may try it by his Champion, as did Paramour and Low, or offered to do, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. And in this caſe, he that is beaten or yieldeth, loſeth only his cauſe, not his life. Neither are the combats upon accuſation, or tryal of right, fought in open field, as are thoſe of bravery; but in Camp cloſe, that is, within rails. Now this trial by combat was ſo ordinary in France, before the time of S. Lewis and Philip the fair his grand-child, as every Lord of Fee, Eccleſiaſtical or Temporal, had power to grant it within his own Juriſdiction. And it ſeemeth, that the French Kings, and other Lords, made their profit hereby. For in the * Memorials of the Chamber of Accounts, is found an Article to this effect; That if a Combat were once accepted, and after, by conſent of the Lord, were taken up, each of the parties ſhould pay two ſhillings ſix pence; but if it were performed, then ſhould the party vanquiſhed forfeit an hundred and twelve ſhillings. And upon this cuſtom grew the French Proverb, which they uſe when as any man hath had an hard and unjuſt judgement; ſaying, That He was tryed by the Law of Loray, or Berne; ou le battu oaye l' amende, where he that is beaten gives the recompence. Of theſe frequent trials by battel that great learned man Ivo, Biſhop of Chartres did often complain, and ſpecially againſt the French Church-men: as appears by * his Letters to the Biſhop of Orleans, to the Arch-deacon of Paris, to Rembert Archbiſhop of Sens, and to others; wherein he rebukes the judgement of their Churches, that had ratified ſuch challenges of combat. But this liberty and kind of tryal, was retrencht by S. Lewis, and Philip the fair; ſo that no man could decree or grant it, ſave the King himſelf. It hath ſince been granted, though more ſparingly, by the French King, as to the Lord of Carogues, againſt Jaques le Gris; and to Julian Romero the Spaniard, againſt Moro his countryman; wherein Sir Henry Knevet, Father to the Lord Knevet now living, was Patron to Romero that had the victory; and laſtly to the Lord of Chaſt. Now in thoſe challenges, upon accuſation of Treaſon, Murder, or other offence deſerving death (and in thoſe only) the rule held, That le defendeur eſtoit tenu de propoſer ces deffences par un dementir; The defendant was bound to plead not guilty, by giving the accuſer the Lye: otherwiſe it was concluded, that the defendant did taiſible-ment confeſſer le crime; ſilently confeſs the crime. But after ſuch time as Francis the French King, upon ſome diſpute about breach of Faith, had ſent the Lye unto the Emperor Charles the fifth, thereby to draw him to a perſonal combat; every petty companion in France, in imitation of their Maſter, made giving of the Lye mortality it ſelf; holding it a matter of no ſmall glory, to have it ſaid, That the meaneſt Gentleman in France would not put up, what the great Emperor Charles the fifth had patiently endured.

From this beginning is derived a challenge of combat, grounded upon none of thoſe occaſions that were known to the Ancient. For, the Honour of Nations, the Tryal of Right, the Wager upon Champions, or the Objection and Refutation of capital offences, are none of them, nor all of them together, the argument of half ſo many Duels, as are founded upon meer private Anger, yea, or upon matter ſeeming worthy of anger in the opinion of the Duelliſts. So that in theſe daies, wherein every man takes unto himſelf a Kingly liberty, to offer, accept, and appoint perſonal combats, the giving of the Lye, which ought to be the Negation only in accuſations for life, is become the moſt fruitful root of deadly quarrels. This is held a word ſo terrible, and a wrong ſo unpardonable, as will admit no other recompence, than the blood of him that gives it. Thus the faſhion, taken up in haſt by the French Gentlemen, after the pattern of their King, is grown to be a cuſtome: whence we have derived a kind of Art and Philoſophy of quarrel; with certain grounds and rules, from whence the points of honour, and the dependencies thereof, are reduced. Yea, there are (among many no leſs ridiculous) ſome ſo myſtical curioſities herein, as that it is held a far greater diſhonour, to receive from an enemy a ſlight touch with a Cane, than a ſound blow with a Sword; the one having relation to a ſlave, the other to a ſouldier. I confeſs that the difference is pretty: though for my own part, if I had had any ſuch ſtalianated enemy in former times, I ſhould willingly have made with him ſuch an exchange; and have given him the point of honour to boot,

But let us examine indifferently the offence of this terrible word, the Lye; with their conditions who are commonly of all other the moſt tender in receiving it. I ſay, that the moſt of theſe, who preſent death on the points of their ſwords to all that give it them; uſe nothing ſo much in their converſation and courſe of life, as to ſpeak and ſwear falſly. Yea, it is thereby, that they ſhift and ſhuffle ſhuffle in the World, and abuſe it. For how few are there among them, which, having aſſumed and ſworn to pay the moneys and other things they borrow, do not break their word and promiſe, as often as they ingage it? Nay, how few are there among them, that are not Lyars by Record, by being ſued in ſome Court or other of Juſtice, upon breach of word or bond? For he which hath promiſed that he will pay money by a day, or promiſed any thing elſe, wherein he faileth; hath directly lied to him to whom the promiſe hath been made. Nay, what is the profeſſion of love that men make now-adaies? What is the vowing of their ſervice, and of all they have, uſed in their ordinary complements, and (in effect) to every man whom they bid not good morrow, or ſalute, other than a courteous and Court-like kind of lying? It is (ſaith a wiſe French man, deriding therein the Apiſh cuſtome of his Country) un marché & complot fait enſemble, ſe mocquer, mentir, & piper les un les autres; A kind of merchandiſe, and complot made among them, to mock, lelye, and deride each other: and ſo far now-adaies in faſhion, and in uſe; as he that uſeth it not, is accounted either dull or Cynical. True it is notwithſtanding (omitting the old diſtinction) that there is great difference between theſe mannerly and complemental lyes, with thoſe which are ſometime perſwaded by neceſſity upon breach of promiſe; and thoſe which men uſe out of cowardize and fear; the latter confeſſing themſelves to be in greater awe of men, than of God; a vice of all other ſtiled the moſt villanous. But now for the Lye it ſelf, as it is made the ſubject of all our deadly quarrels in effect, to it I ſay, That whoſoever giveth another man the Lye, when it is manifeſt that he hath lyed, doth him no wrong at all; neither ought it to be more hainouſly taken, than to tell him, he hath broken any promiſe which he hath otherwiſe made. For he that promiſeth any thing, tells him, to whom he hath promiſed, that he will perform it; and, in not performing it, he had made himſelf a Lyar. On the other ſide, He that gives any man the Lye, when he himſelf knowes that he, to whom it is given, hath not lyed; doth therein give the Lye directly to himſelf. And what cauſe have I, if I ſay that the Sun ſhines when it doth ſhine, and that another fellow tels me I lye, for it's midnight; to proſecute ſuch an one to death, for making himſelf a fooliſh Ruffian and a lyar in his own knowledge? For he that gives the Lye in any other diſpute, than in defence of his Loyalty, or Life; gives it impertinently, and Ruffian-like. I will not deny but it is an extream rudeneſs to tax any man in publick with an untruth (if it be not pernicious, and to his prejudice againſt whom the untruth is uttered:) But all that is rude, ought not to be civillized with death. That were more to admire and imitate a French cuſtome, and a wicked one, than to admire and to follow the councel of God. But you will ſay, that theſe diſcourſes ſavour of cowardize. It is true; if you call it cowardize to fear God or hell: whereas he that is truly wiſe, and truly valiant, knowes that there is nothing elſe to be feared. For againſt an Enemies ſword, we ſhall find ten thouſand ſeven-penny-men (waged at that price in the wars) that fear it as little, or perchance leſs, than any profeſt Sword-man in the world. Diligentiſſima in tutela ſui Fortitudo; Fortitude is a diligent preſerver of it ſelf. It is (ſaith Ariſtotle) a mediocrity between doubting and daring. Sicut non Martyrem pœna; ſic nec fortem pugna, ſed cauſa: As it is not the puniſhment that makes the Martyr: ſo it is not fighting that declares a valiant man: but fighting in a good cauſe. In which, whoſoever ſhall reſolvedly end his life, reſolvedly in reſpect of the cauſe, to wit, in defence of his Prince, Religion, or Countrey: as he may juſtly be numbred among the Martyrs of God; ſo may thoſe that die with malicious hearts, in private combats, be called the Martyrs of the Devil. Neither do we indeed take our own revenge, or puniſh the injuries offered us, by the death of the injurious. For the true conqueſt of revenge is, to give him, of whom we would be revenged, cauſe to repent him: and not to lay the repentance of another mans death upon our own conſcences; Animaſq; in vulnere ponere; And to drown our ſouls in the wounds and blood of our enemies. Hereupon you will again aſk me, if I condemn, in generous and noble ſpirits, the defence of their honours, being preſt with injuries? I ſay that I do not, if the injuries be violent. For the Law of Nature, which is a branch of the Eternal Law: and the Laws of all Chriſtian Kings and States; do favour him that is aſſailed, in the ſlaughter of the aſſailant. You will ſecondly aſk me, Whether a Noble-man, or a Gentleman, being challenged by Cartel by one of like quality, be not bound in point of honour to ſatisfie the challenger in private combat? I anſwer, that he is not: becauſe (omitting the greateſt, which is the point of Religion) the point of the Law is directly contrary and oppoſite to that, which they call the point of honour; The Law which hath dominion over it, which can judge it, which can deſtroy it; except you will ſtile thoſe Acts honourable, where the Hang-man gives the Garland. For, ſeeing the Laws of this Land have appointed the Hang-man to ſecond the Conqueror, and the Laws of God appointed the Devil to ſecond the Conquered, dying in malice: I ſay, that he is both baſe and a fool, that accepts of any Cartel ſo accompanied. To this, perchance it will be anſwered, That the Kings of England, and other Chriſtian Kings, have ſeldome taken any ſuch advantage over men of quality, who upon even terms have ſlain their private enemies. It is true, that as in times of trouble and combuſtion they have not often done it; ſo did our Noble-men and Gentlemen in former ages, in all important injuries, ſue unto the King, to approve themſelves by battel and publick combat. For as they dared not to brave the Law; ſo did they diſdain to ſubmit themſelves unto the ſhameful revenge thereof; the ſame revenge (becauſe it deteſteth murder) that hath declared againſt a common Cut-purſe or other Thieves: Nay let it be granted that a pardon be procured for ſuch offenders: yet it is not the man-ſlayer freed from his pardon. For theſe two remedies hath the party grieved notwithſtanding; that is, to require juſtice by Grand Aſſize, or by battel, upon his appeal, which (ſaith Sir Thomas Smith) is not denyed; and he further ſaith (for I uſe his own words) That if the Defendant (to wit, the man-ſlayer) be convinced either by great Aſſize or by Battel, upon that appeal; the man-ſlayer ſhall die notwithſtanding the Princes pardon. So favourable (ſaith the ſame learned Gentleman) are our Princes, and the Law of our Realm, to juſtice & to the puniſhment of blood violently ſhed. It may further be demanded, how our Noblemen and Gentlemen ſhall be repaired in honour, where an enemy, taking the ſtart either in words or blows ſhall lay on them an infamy unſufferable: I ſay, that a Marſhals Court will eaſily give ſatisfaction in both. And if we hold it no diſgrace to ſubmit our ſelves for the recovery of our Debts, Goods, and Lands; and for all things elſe by which the lives of our ſelves our wives, and children, are ſuſtained, to the Judges of the Law; becauſe it may be felony to take by violence even that which is our own: why ſhould we not ſubmit our ſelves unto the Judges of honour in caſes of honour; becauſe to recover our reputation by ſtrong hand, may be murder? But yet again, it may be objected, that the loſs of honour ought to be much more fearful unto us, than either the loſs of our goods, of our lands, or of our lives; and I ſay ſo too. But what is this honour, I mean honour indeed, and that which ought to be ſo dear unto us: other than a kind of Hiſtory, or fame following actions of vertue, actions accompanied with difficulty or danger, and undertaken for the publick good? In theſe he that is imployed and truſted, if he fail in the performance, either through cowardize, or any other baſe affection; it is true that he loſeth his honour. But the acting of a private combat, for a private reſpect, and moſt commonly a frivolous one, is not an action of vertue, becauſe it is contrary to the Law of God, and of all Chriſtian Kings: neither is it difficult, becauſe even and equal in perſons and arms: neither for a publick good, but tending to the contrary; becauſe the loſs or mutilation of an able man, is alſo a loſs to the Common-weal.

Sir Thomas Smith in his Common-wealth of England.

Now that a Marſhall of England hath power to ſave every mans fame and reputation, as far as reputation may ſuſtain injury by words, I think no man doubteth. For to repent us of any evil words that we have given, and to confeſs that we have done him wrong, unto whom we have given them, is a ſufficient ſatisfaction; and as may fall out, more than ſufficient. For he that gives ill words in choler, and ſuddenly denyes them, or repents himſelf of them upon adviſement hath the diſadvantage in point of reputation. Concerning blows, which are indeed not to be given but to thoſe that are ſervile, whether ſufficient recompence will be made for them, it ſhall appear by a notable example of a moſt worthy Gentleman Monſier de Pleſſis, that was ſtricken in France not long ſince by a Baron of the ſame nation. The ſatisfaction which was given him by a judgement of the Conſtable and Marſhals of France, was this. In the open Court, wherein the Conſtable gave judgement, M. de Pleſſis was ſet in a chair under the degrees where the Conſtable and Marſhals ſate: the Baron, who had given him the blow, did kneel before him on both his knees, holding in his right hand a ſword with the point towards himſelf, and in his left hand the like cudgel or baſtinado, wherewith he had ſtricken M. de Pleſſis, both which weapons he delivered into Pleſſis hands, ſubmitting himſelf to ſuch revenge, as it ſhould pleaſe him to take with either of thoſe weapons; the Conſtable and Marſhals having formerly left it to the will of Pleſſis, to uſe his own diſcretion in the revenge of his own wrongs. Now whether the Baron had reaſon to pleaſe himſelf, as one beforehand in point of honour, (who ſtruck M. de Pleſſis like a Ruffian coming behind him, and having the advantage of company, and his horſes ready, ſhifted himſelf away on the ſudden; but being afterwards taken, was taught to repent himſelf in this ſhameful manner:) or whether Monſter de Pleſſis (of whoſe valour no man doubted) had not far juſter cauſe to reſt ſatisfied, ſince he might at his pleaſure have beaten or wounded his enemy, but forgave him: let any wiſe man judge. To this if it be ſaid, That the Baron was conſtrained to make his ſubmiſſion that his repentance was enforced, and not voluntary; and therefore no diſgrace unto him: I anſwer, that one may ſay as well, that it is no diſgrace to a Thief, when he is brought to the Gallows, to repent him of the Robberies by him committed, becauſe his repentance alſo is conſtrained. And it is true, that enforced repentance is no grace in reſpect of a force, but in reſpect of the fact: which (but for our ſins to God) makes all repentance ſhameful: becauſe all forced repentance is inflicted upon us for ſomewhat unworthy of a Gentleman, and of an honeſt man. Nay, voluntary repentance it ſelf, as it hath relation to men, ariſeth either out of the fear of the ill that may befall us, or out of the acknowledgement of our own weakneſs. Certainly as wiſe men, and valiant men do rather deride petty injuries or ſudden injuries, that are not offered from malice fore-thought, than revenge them: ſo men, apt to quarrel, do commonly ſuſpect their own valour; and rather deſire, that thereby the world ſhould believe them to be of great daring, than know any ſuch reſolution in themſelves. For he that knows himſelf indeed to be an honeſt man ſcorns to hunt after opinion.

Now the ſame power which the Conſtable and Marſhals of France have, hath alſo a Marſhal of England, or his Deputies: by whoſe judgement in all diſputes of honour, every mans reputation may be preſerved; we may therefore as well ſubmit our ſelves to the Judge of honour in all diſputes of honor, as we do ſubmit our ſelves in all controverſies of livelihood and life, to the Judges of the Law. And, out of doubt, the inſtitution of this Court of Chevalrie in England, in France, and elſewhere: was no leſs charitable than politick. For the blood of man, violently ſpilt, doth not bring forth hony bees as that of Bulls doth, which ſting but the fingers, or the face: but it produceth that monſtrous beaſt, Revenge, which hath ſtung to death, and eaten up, of ſeveral nations, ſo many noble perſonages; as there is nothing more lamentable, nor more threatning the wrath of God upon ſupream Governours, than the permiſſion.

His Majeſty therefore (which Henry the IV. of France alſo endeavoured) hath done a moſt Kingly and Chriſtian-like deed in Scotland, which the moſt renowned of all his Prædeceſſors could never do: in beating down and extinguiſhing that hereditary proſecution of malice, called the deadly feud; a conqueſt, which ſhall give him the honour of Prudence and Kingly power for evermore. And we have cauſe to hope, that his royal care ſhall be no leſs happy in præventing the like miſchief, which threatens England, by the audacious, common, and brave, yet outragious vanity of Dueliſts.

Unto this that I have ſpoken of lying, and of man-ſlaughter, it muſt be added, That each of theſe are of great Latitude, and worthy of reproof and vengeance proportionably, more or leſs, in their ſeveral degrees. There is much difference between Lies of neceſſity upon breach of promiſe, or complemental lies; and ſuch pernicious lies, as proceed from fear and cowardize, or are uttered by falſe witneſſes: the former ſort being excuſable by weakneſs or levity; the latter being altogether deteſtable. No leſs, if not more, difference there is, between killing of a man in open field, with even weapons; and that killing, which the Scriptures call killing by guile, dolo or per inſidias; though our Laws do not much diſtinguiſh them in puniſhment. For in the latter, God, forſaking his own priviledge, commandeth that the guilful murderer be drawn by force, from the protection of his Altar. Neither Exod. 21. is every guilefull murder performed by the ſword, nor by overt violence: but there is a guilfull murder alſo, by poyſoning: and by the pen, or by practice. For ſuch diſtinction is found, between coming preſumptuouſly upon a man, to ſlay him with guile; and lying in wait for blood, privily, for the innocent, without a cauſe, upon hope of ſpoil, after ſuch manner as the net is ſpread before the eyes of the Birds. Francis the firſt, Queen Mary of England, and the Kings Majeſty now reigning, have given notable teſtimony of their juſtice, upon three Noble men, who committed guilful murder. Of the firſt kind, King Francis upon the Lord of Talard: who being (ſaith the French Hiſtorian) de haute & ancienne lignee, & ſupport de pluſieurs grandes alliances; who being of high and ancient linage, and ſupported by divers great alliances, of which the Cardinal of Bellay (in eſpecial favour with the King) was one; was notwithſtanding delivered over into the hands of the Hangman. Q. Mary, upon a Noble

Exod. 21. 14. Prov. 1. 11.

Noble man of her own Religion, and in many other reſpects very dear unto her, His Majeſty, upon a Baron of Scotland; whoſe houſe was no leſs ancient and faithful, than himſelf valiant, and greatly friended both at home and abroad. Of killing guilfully by poyſon, and of puniſhment following ſuch wicked Artiſans, every age hath had too many examples. Of killing guilfully by the pen (that I may not ſpeak of any Engliſh Judge) the Author of the French Recherches gives unto us two notable inſtances: the one of des Eſſars, who (ſaith Paſquier) fit mourir Montaigu grand Maiſtre de France, pour contenter l'opinion celuy dont il eſtoit lors idolaſtre; & Dieu permit que depuis il fut pendu & eſtrangle; Who cauſed Montaigu great Maſter of France to die to content his mind (to wit, the Duke of Burgoyne) whom at that time Eſſars worſhipped as his Idol; but God permitted, that he himſelf was ſoon after hanged and ſtrangled. The other was of the Great Francis the firſt, upon his Chancellor Poyet: who to ſatisfie the Kings paſſion, practiſed the deſtruction of the Admiral Chabot; a man moſt nobly deſcended, and of great ſervice. For as in other men, ſo in Kings the paſſion of love grows old, and wears out by time. So the Kings affection being changed towards the Admiral, he charged him with ſome offences, which he had formerly committed: The Admiral preſuming upon the great good ſervice which he had done the King in Piemont, and in the defence of Marſeilles againſt the Emperour, gave the King other language than became him; and deſired nothing ſo much, as a publick trial. Hereupon the King (it being eaſie to provoke an ill diſpoſition) gave commiſſion to the Chancellor, as Præſident, and other Judges, upon an information of the Kings Advocate, to queſtion the Admirals life; The Chancellor, an ambitious man, and of a large conſcience, (which is not rare in men towards the law) hoping highly to content the King; wrought with ſome of the Judges with ſo great cunning; with others with ſo ſharp threats; and with the reſt, with ſo fair promiſes; as albeit nothing could be proved againſt the Admiral, worthy of the Kings diſpleaſure, yet the Chancellor ſubſcribed, and got others to ſubſcribe, to the forfeiture of his Eſtate, Offices, and Liberty, though not able to prevail againſt his life. But what was the Chancellors reward (the King hating falſhood in ſo great a Magiſtrate) other than his own degradation, arraignment and condemnation? Belle les on certes (ſaith Paſquier) a tout Juge pur de-meurer touſiours en ſoy, & ne laiſſer fluctuer ſa conſcience debans les vagues d'une imaginare faveur, qui pour fin de jeu le ſubmerge; A fair leſſon to all Judges, to dwell alwayes in themſelves, and not to ſuffer their conſciences to float upon the waves of imaginary favour, which in the end overwhelms them. And as for the Admiral, though it might have been anſwered unto his friends, if any bewail his calamity as undeſerved, That he was tryed, according to his own deſire, by the Laws of his Country, and by the Judges of Parliament; yet the Kings juſtice, ſurmounting all other his paſſions, gave back unto him his Honour, his Offices, his Liberty, and his Eſtate.

§. III.

The laſt Acts of Scipio in Spain, His return to Rome, where he is choſen Conſul.

THe laſt buſineſs that troubled Scipio in Spain, grew by the rebellion of the people, and mutiny of his Souldiers. He fell dangerouſly ſick, in ſuch ſort that the rumour of his death ran current throughout Spain. This encouraged Mandonius and Indibilis, petty Kings, that had forſaken the Carthaginians, and followed Scipio a while before, to take arms againſt the Romans. They were vainly perſwaded, that after the Carthaginians were driven out; they themſelves ſhould become the mightieſt in all Spain. But ſeeing now, that things were no way anſwerable to the greatneſs of their hopes; they thought it beſt, to take the preſent advantage, and hammer out their own fortunes. So they raſhly fell upon the Sueſſetani and Sedetani, confederates of the Romans; and waſted their Country. Part of the Roman Army lying at Sucro, inſtead of making head againſt theſe Rebels, grew to be affected with the like diſtemper. They had not reped ſuch profit of the Roman conqueſts, as might ſatisfie their deſires; or as they thought eaſie to be gotten if they might be their own Carvers. Wherefore, when the death of Scipio was reported, they thought that the time ſerved very well, to enrich themſelves with the ſpoil of the Country. Many outrages they committed: and, which was greateſt of all, driving away their Colonels, that ſhould have bridled their fury; they choſe out of their own number two baſe fellows, Albinus Calenus, and Atrius Umber, to their Commanders. Theſe took upon them all the Enſigns of Pro-conſuls, or Pro-pretors; as if this their election had been like to that, wherein Lucius Marcius was choſen by the Souldiers after the death of the two Scipio's: But whileſt they were deviſing what exploits they might do, for the enriching of themſelves, in a time of ſuch combuſtion as was expected, there arrived more certain news, that Scipio was both alive, and in good health. There came alſo new Colonels, ſent unto them from their General: who mildly rebuking their want of conſideration, and ſeeming to be glad that they had no further over-ſhot themſelves; led them to Carthagena, there to receive their pay. Before their coming, Scipio had reſolved to do exemplary juſtice on the principal offenders; and to put the whole multitude of them in fear of what they had deſerved. Therefore he cauſed Syllanus to make ready their Companies which lay before in the Town, as it were to make an Expedition againſt Mandonius and Indibilis: he cauſed Albius and Atrius with ſome thirty other of their Complices, to be ſecretly apprehended in their lodgings: he called the Mutiners to aſſembly; and having them unarmed as they were, encircled round by Syllanus and his companies, prepared for the purpoſe; he bitterly inveighed againſt them all as Traitors. This done, Albius and Atrius, with the other priſoners were haled to the ſtake, where they were whipt and beheaded, as was the Roman cuſtome toward ſuch offenders. The reſt of the Souldiers, to the number of eight thouſand, were cauſed to take their oath of obedience anew; and received every man his pay when he was ſworn.

Mandonius and Indibilis continued in arms: notwithſtanding that they had certain word of Scipio his life and health. Well they could have been contented to be quiet: but by the ſeverity uſed to the Roman Souldiers, they ſtood in fear, as being Spaniards, and greater offenders, of harder meaſure. Scipio went againſt them, and found them in a valley, that was ſcarce large enough to hold all their Army. In the entrance thereof he fought with them: and ſending Lælius with all his horſe, to fetch a compaſs about the hills, and charge them in rear, he overthrew them. Indibilis and Mandonius had after this, no hope remaining to preſerve themſelves and their eſtates, otherwiſe than by making ſubmiſſion. Mandonius therefore came to Scipio: and humbly craving pardon, both for himſelf and for his brother Indibilis, obtained his requeſt; yet ſo, that they were taught to acknowledge themſelves leſs free Princes than formerly they had been.

Afterwards Scipio went toward Gades: and was met on the way by Maſaniſſa; who ſecretly promiſed to do him all ſervice, if the people of Rome would ſend him to make war in Africk. Unto Mago that lay in Gades, came directions from Carthage, that letting all care of Spain alone, he ſhould thence depart from his fleet into Italy; and there wage an Army of Gauls and Ligurians, to joyn with Hannibal. For this purpoſe, was mony ſent unto him from Carthage; and he himſelf laid hold upon all that he could find in the Town of Gades; without ſparing either private men, the common treaſury, or the Temples. In this voyage thence, he landed at Carthagena; hoping to have taken it by ſurpriſe. But he failed in the attempt, and was ſo beaten to his ſhips, that he returned back to repoſe himſelf a while at Gades. The Gaditanes, offended with the robberies and ſpoil that he had made at his taking leave of them, would not ſuffer him again to enter into their City. By this he foreſaw, that it would not be long ere they became Roman. Wherefore ſending Meſſengers into the Town, to complain of this uncourteous dealing, he allured their Magiſtrates forth unto him; whom, notwithſtanding all the excuſe that they could make, he whipt and crucified. This done, he followed his former intended voyage; bidding Spain farewell for ever.

The Iſle and City of Gades, was yielded to the Romans, preſently after the departure of Mago. Then did Scipio deliver up the Province, to thoſe that were ſent from Rome to ſucceed him therein: & himſelf with ten ſhips returned home. At his coming to Rome, he made ſuit for the honour of a triumph. But it was denied him: for that it had as yet been granted unto no Proconſul, excepting to ſuch, as received that dignity after a Conſulſhip, as it were by prorogation. But to make amends for this repulſe, the election of new Conſuls being then in hand, by general voice of the City, P. Cornelius Scipio was choſen Conſul, and P. Licinius Craſſus joyned with him. This Craſſus, being high-Prieſt, or Biſhop of the Romans, might not by the cuſtome of thoſe times, go far from the City; as being to intend the matters of their ſuperſtition: though Cæſar, and others, who in ages following held the ſame office, were ſtayed by no ſuch religious impediment, from being far and long abſent. Hereby it came to paſs, that Scipio, deſiring to have the war transferred into Africk, was in no danger to loſe that honourable charge, by any miſchance of lot, in the diviſion of Provinces; for that his Colleague was not capable of employment ſo far off.

§. XVIII.

§. XVIII.

Scipio obtains leave to make war in Africk. His preparations. Of Maſaniſſa who was joyned with Scipio. The victories againſt Aſdrubal and Syphax.

PUb. Cornelius Scipio, and P. Licinius Craſſus, entring into their Conſulſhip, held a meeting of the Senate in the Capitol: where it was decreed, that Scipio ſhould be allowed, to beſtow part of the money which he had brought out of Spain into the treaſury; upon the ſetting forth of ſolemn plays, that he had vowed to make whilſt he was buſied in his Spaniſh wars. This helped well to revive the memory of his victories already gotten; and to give hope unto the People of greater victories in the war, which he intended to make in Africk. To the ſame purpoſe, did the Spaniſh Embaſſages avail much in the Senate; eſpecially that of the Saguntines: who magnified his actions highly and deſervedly; ſaying, that they were the moſt happy of all their countrymen, ſince they being preſent, had ſeen him choſen Conſul, and ſhould carry home ſuch joyful news. The Saguntine Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained by the Senate: as their faith to Rome (though coſtly it were both to them and to the Romans) had well deſerved. Nevertheleſs, when Scipio propoſed, that Africk might be decreed unto him for his Province, there wanted not many, even of the principal men, that vehemently gainſaid him. Of theſe was Q. Fabius Maximus the chief: who ſeems to have been troubled with that diſeaſe, which too often cauſed men, renowned for long approved vertue, to look aſquint upon the actions of thoſe, that follow them in the ſame kind. He alledged many reaſons againſt the purpoſe of the Conſul; whereof the chief were, that the Treaſury was unable to ſuſtain the charges of a war in Africk; and that it was extreamly perilous to hazzard ſo great forces, where they could not at pleaſure be recalled unto the defence of Rome it ſelf, if need required. Hereunto he added many words concerning the danger wherein Italy ſtood, not only of Hannibal, but of Mago his brother, that was arming the Ligurians: as alſo concerning the honour of the Conſul; which would (he ſaid) be greater in ſetting Italy free from enemies, than it could be in doing any harm to Africk. Neither did he forget, both to elevate the Spaniſh wars, as of leſs moment than the intended voyage againſt Carthage, nor withall to lay great blame upon Scipio, for having ſuffered Aſdrubal to paſs into Italy: ſhewing, that it was greatly to be feared, leſt the like might happen again; and that a new Army, notwithſtanding the good ſucceſs of Scipio, (if it hapned to be good) might be ſent from Carthage, to the utter endangering of Rome, whileſt the Roman forces were employed abroad. But the main point which he urged, was, that neither the Senate had ordained, nor the People commanded, Africk to be that year a Province; which the Conſul nevertheleſs propounded in ſuch wiſe, as if it were a matter already concluded, and no longer to be argued. Scipio on the other ſide, inſiſted upon this one point; that it was better to make an offenſive, than a defenſive war, eſpecially againſt ſuch as the Carthaginians, who being ill provided of able men at home, did furniſh themſelves, by help of mony, with levies made abroad. As for the care of Italy, he doubted not, but P. Licinius his Colleague would be as well able to diſcharge it now, as others had done in times of greater danger. So promiſing to draw Hannibal into Africk, for defence of his own home; and taxing as civilly as he could, the envy of Fabius, which withſtood ſuch a gallant enterpriſe, he propoſed the matter again to the Senate. Much altercation there was about the manner of his proceeding: foraſmuch as it was noiſed abroad, that if he could not bring the Senate to his mind, he would carry it by the people. This offended many of the ancients: who reſented in this honourable man, a little ſpice of that arrogancy, which in following ages grew to be much hotter, in thoſe that had commanded long abroad. But in concluſion, Scipio referred himſelf wholly to the Senates good will and pleaſure; whereby he obtained thus much, That the Iſle of Sicil might be appointed unto him for his Province; with leave to paſs over into Africk, if he found it expedient.

Want of money, and no great liking to his voyage, made the Roman Senate have little care to furniſh out Scipio to the war, by him intended upon Africk. Herewithall it fell out, that Mago, coming on the ſudden from the Baleares to Genua, and winning the Town, bred a fear of no leſs terrible invaſion upon Italy, than that which Aſdrubal had lately made. He could not indeed raiſe any great Army of the Ligurians; for that he found them diſtracted with civil wars. Therefore he was driven to make choice of his party; and to help thoſe whom he thought fitteſt for his turn, againſt the others. This troubleſome buſineſs, though it occupied more of his time than he could willingly have ſpared: yet it got him reputation by his victories; and made the unſteady Gauls ready dy to enter into his pay. Hereupon the disperſed Legions of the Romans, that under Proconſuls, and Prætors, lay ready to be employed where need ſhould require; were directed unto the borders of Lombardy and Liguria, there to make head againſt Mago. But all his menaces paſſed away in vapour. For a fleet, either coming to his aid from Carthage, or by him ſent thither (the report is uncertain) loaden with the booty that he had taken, fell into the hands of the Roman Prætor, that governed in Sardinia. This did much diſable him: and though after a while, there came letters from Carthage, together with ſtore of money, heartning him in his proceedings; yet ſome impediments which he found, and that fatal voyage of Scipio into Africk diſturbed all; and made him be re-called home.

Againſt Hannibal was nothing done this year. Neither was any thing done by him, of which the Roman Hiſtorians have been pleaſed to take notice. Only it is ſaid, that he ſpent his Summer by the Temple of Juno Lacinia, where he raiſed an Altar, with a huge Title of all that he had performed, graven in Punick and Greek letters. Such account of winnings paſt, is commonly in Gameſters that are at the height of their fortune, a cauſe of remiſſion and careleſneſs; in thoſe that are upon the loſing hand, a cauſe both of the ſame for the preſent, and ſhortly after of dejection, when they find a notable change. A great peſtilence infeſting both the Carthaginian and the Roman Camp, is ſaid to have been the occaſion of this years idleneſs; which fell out not much amiſs for the City of Rome, that was marvelouſly impoveriſhed by this war; and had already tryed the utmoſt way to defray the charges, which grew inſupportable. To relieve the preſent neceſſity, it was well thought upon, that a great part of Campania (not many years ſince confiſcated) ſhould be ſold, or let out: in which bargain, that the City might receive no loſs, the tenth part of the fine was ordained, as a reward unto the detectors of lands concealed.

Of this, or other mony, none was given to Scipio. Neither was he allowed to make preſs of Souldiers for his African voyage; neither did he over-much labour to obtain it. That which the Senate refuſed, the people did for him: or rather they did it for themſelves; that were therein wiſer than the Senate. It is uſually found in Councels of eſtate, that the buſie, or obſtinate heads of a few do carry all the reſt. And many times men make a ſurrender of their own judgements, to the wiſdom, that hath gotten it ſelf a name, by giving happy direction in troubles forepaſt. Therefore, he that repoſeth himſelf upon the advice of many, ſhall often find himſelf deceived: the counſel of thoſe many being wholly directed by the Empire of a few, that over-ſway the reſt. Q. Fabius was accounted the Oracle of his time: for his wary nature ſorted well with the buſineſs, that fell out in the chief of his employment. Unto him therefore Q. Fulvius adhered; with other of the Senators, that were grown old in following one courſe; from which they could not ſhift, as the change of time required. But the People (who though they could not well adviſe, and deliberate, yet could well apprehend) embraced the needful reſolution of Scipio: in ſuch ſort, that beſides his Roman forces, he had from divers parts of Italy about ſeven thouſand Voluntaries. He had alſo proviſion from the ſeveral Towns: Corn, Iron, Canvas for ſails, Axes, Beed-hooks, Hand-mils, and the like implements; Firre for building of ſhips, many thouſands of Targets, Helmets and Spears of all kinds: every place furniſhed him with that commodity, which it beſt could afford.

Unto this willingneſs of the people, the diligence of Scipio was correſpondent. In the compaſs of five and forty dayes he had both fell'd his Timber, built, and lanched twenty Trireme, and ten Quinquereme Gallies; wherewith he tranſported his Army into Sicil. In Sicil he found, beſides other forces, two Legions, that had ſerved at Cannæ: which were old Souldiers, and (as he himſelf well knew) not guilty of the overthrow; for which they had long undergone a heavy cenſure. They had ſerved under Marcellus and Lævinus, at the taking of many Cities and ſtrong pieces: in which regard, they were like to be of good uſe to him in Africk, where would be ſtore of ſuch employment. For increaſing the number of his horſe, he preſſed three hundred Sicilians, all wealthy young men, and ſuch as loved well their eaſe. Theſe he afterward diſcharged from the War, highly to their contentment: but with condition, that they ſhould deliver their Horſe and Arms, to as many Roman Gentlemen, which he brought over with him for the purpoſe. Whileſt he was providing to have things in a readineſs for Africk, the baniſhed Locrians, that followed the Roman ſide, made him acquainted with an intelligence, whereby they hoped to recover their City. Some handicrafts-men, that wrought for the Carthaginians in one of the Citadels of Locri, (for there were two in the Town) being taken priſoners by the Romans, promiſed to betray the place, if they might be ranſomed and rewarded.

Scipio

Scipio being advertiſed of this gave order to have the attempt made by night: which happily ſucceeded, and that Citadel was ſurpriſed. The other Citadel was ſtrongly defended by the Carthaginian Garriſon, which ſent to Hannibal for aid. The Romans in like ſort, fearing leſt that their paucity ſhould make them too weak for Hannibal, craved help of the Conſul Scipio. The Townſ-men were doubtfully affected: but the beſt, and moſt of them inclining to the Romans, kept Hannibal out; whom the comming of Scipio cauſed thence to depart; and cauſed likewiſe the Carthaginian Garriſon to abandon the other Citadel. Many outrages were committed by the Roman Souldiers, that were left by Scipio in cuſtody of the Town. Wherefore a vehement complaint was made by the Locrians unto the Roman Senate; not only againſt thoſe of the Garriſon: but much more againſt Pleminius the Captain, who gave bad example, and was worſe than all the reſt. Beſides many Murders, Robberies, Rapes, and other villanies, the Temple of Proſerpina, that had a great fame of ſanctity, was ſpoyled by theſe barbarous Thieves. The Locrians therefore adviſed the Senate to make preſent amends to the goddeſs for this ſacriledge: ſaying that the like had never been committed, without notorious revenge by her taken upon the Authors. The Senate gave good ear to this complaint, comforted the Locrians, and redreſſed the injuries done unto them; ſent for Pleminius, with other principal offenders; whom they caſt into priſon, and uſed according to their deſerts: as alſo they reſtored unto Proſerpina her money twice told. But old Q. Fabius was not herewithal contented. He laid much of the blame upon Scipio, that had placed ſuch a man in Locri; and had not carefully hearkned to the complaints made againſt him, but ſuffered him to run on in theſe his wicked courſes. By the ſharp invective that Fabius made, others took courage to ſpeak what they pleaſed, as well againſt the demeanour of Scipio, as againſt the diſſoluteneſs of his Army; which lay, as they ſaid, idle in Sicil, neither mindful of any ſervice toward, nor fit for it if need ſhould require. Finally, things were ſo far urged, that ten Legates were ſent over into Sicil, together with the Prætor appointed for that Iſland; two of the Tribunes, and one of the Ædiles; who ſhould examine theſe matters; and either cauſe the General to return into Italy, or continue him in his charge, as they thought fit. The end of all was, they found him ſo well prepared againſt Carthage, as that they haſtened him on his journey, and gave him high commendations at their return.

Scipio had already employed Lælius in Africk; rather to make diſcovery, than to work any other great effect of war. He took a great booty: and ſtruck no little terror into the Carthaginians; who ſaw their affairs to be upon terms of change. But the greateſt fruit of his journey was, That ſpeaking with Maſaniſſa, he well informed himſelf of the ſtate of Africk; and knew what was to be expected of thoſe two Kings, that had promiſed to joyn with the Romans at their landing.

Concerning Maſaniſſa his revolt from the Carthaginians, and his compact made underhand with the Romans, Livie doth profeſs, That there was no ſuch evident cauſe thereof at the preſent; but that the long continuance of his faith and conſtancy, in following times, muſt help to prove; that this his change, was not without ſome good cauſe. But Appianus (an Hiſtorian far inferiour to Livie, both in worth and time) gives one reaſon ſo probable of this, and many accidents thereto belonging, as that it carryes with it a great appearance of neceſſary truth. Only the doubt is, How it could any way come to paſs, that the knowledge of ſuch a matter ſhould have eſcaped the diligence of Livie, if it had been true: unleſs we ſhould believe, that he wilfully forbear to rehearſe a Tragedy; the ſorrow whereof would cauſe men to think amiſs of Scipio. Howſoever it was thus * Appian tells it: and many circumſtances of things done, confirm it. Aſdrubal, the Son of Geſco, had a fair daughter, whom both King Syphax and Maſaniſſa loved. Maſaniſſa, being brought up at Carthage, and being withall a goodly Gentleman of perſon, and excellent in qualities, was choſen by Aſdrubal to be his ſon-in-law. When the Virgin was betrothed unto him, he went into Spain, and there did great ſervice. But afterwards, the Carthaginian Senate thought the marriage of Aſdrubals daughter to be a matter of State: and beſtowed her upon Syphax, without ſtanding to acquaint her father or Maſaniſſa therewithall: This they did, for that Syphax was the more mighty Prince; and for that the indignity of the repulſe, had made him become their enemy. Hereof Maſaniſſa was advertiſed; and forthwith entred into intelligence with Scipio, ſecretly as he thought; yet not ſo ſecretly, but ſome notice was taken of it: which would have coſt him his life, had he not with great circumſpection conveighed himſelf home, into his fathers Kingdom. Thus far forth we may believe Appianus: all the narration well cohering with things paſt, and following.

ing. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their courtesie proceeded from fear, he thought it wisdom to continue and increase the same their fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masanissa was the son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desalces the brother, not unto Masanissa the son. But this Uncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder son, who took possession of the kingdom, was vanquished, and slain in battel by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himself against Masanissa, whose return he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilest his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheless Masanissa, still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distress, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians, and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lælius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aid and succour was reposed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masanissa, sent an Embassage into Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuse but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. Nevertheless he promised to remain a Neuter, so long as the Romans and Carthaginians held war abroad, far enough from Africk, as hitherto they had done. This message hastened Scipio in his expedition, much more than any perswasion could have done. For, the promised assistance of Syphax had not a little advanced his enterprise; in procuring both the assent of the Senate, and the forwardness of many adventurers. Lest therefore the failing of this hope, should work too great a change in common opinion, He thought it the best way to prevent all discourse, and set the war undertaken immediately on foot. The Embassadors he dismissed in haste, with letters to their King: wherein he willed him to consider, that what he had promised, he had also sworn; and therefore should do well to make it good. Having sent them away, He called his Souldiers together; and bade them make ready for the voyage, which he intended no longer to defer. For, said he, Masanissa hath been with Lælius: and Syphax hath newly sent to me; greatly wondring upon what I should thus stay; and saying, That they will provide for themselves, if I fail their expectation by tarrying any longer. This fine tale prevented all further inquisition, that might else have been made concerning the message of these Embassadors: whose followers had been seen walking up and down Syracuse. And lest any thing should afterwards break out, that might hinder the business, Scipio immediately sent about his fleet unto Lylibæum: and requesting by letters M. Pomponius, that was Prætor in Sicil, to meet him there; hasted thither with his Army. At Lylibæum he agreed with the Prætor, about the division of the Legions between them, which to leave behind for defence of the Island; and which to carry with him into Africk. What numbers he transported, it is not certain: some Historians reckoning only ten thousand foot, and two and twenty hundred horse; others increasing them to five and thirty thousand, horse and foot. Concerning his directions for embarquing, and other matters belonging to their course, I hold it needless to set them down: since they were points of ordinary care, and which it is like that neither he, when he took took his voyage into Spain, nor others upon like occaſions, have omitted; they being alſo word for word ſet down by an Hiſtorian, who borrowed them from Livie, and fitted them to a Prince of later age.

This Roman Army landed in Africk, near to a fore-land then called the fair Promontorie: which how far it was from Carthage, or toward what point of the Compaſs, I cannot preciſely affirm; becauſe it is uncertain, whether it were that Cape or Head-land which bore the name of Mercury, and lay to the North-eaſt of Carthage; or whether that of Apollo, which lay Northerly from Carthage, and by Weſt. The coming of Maſaniſſa unto Scipio at his firſt arrival, helpt to confirm the opinion of Xylander, who thinks the fair Promontory to have been the ſame, that was alſo called Mercuries Cape, ſince with little difficulty Maſaniſſa might come thither from the leſſer Syrtis, whereabout was his common abiding. But foraſmuch as without any memorable impediment ſoon after his arrival, Scipio encamped before Utica, that ſtood Weſtward from Carthage beyond the River Bagradas: it may rather ſeem, that he landed within the Promontory of Apollo; whence the way to Utica was not long. This is alſo ſtrongly proved; for that out of Carthage were ſent, the next day, five hundred horſe to trouble him in his diſ-embarking, Neither was it ſo hard for Maſaniſſa, that roved about the Contry with a troop of horſe, to find out the Romans, though they landed far from the place to the which he uſually reſorted, like as before he had met with Lælius at Hippo that was farther off; as it would have been for Scipio, with his Army & Carriages, to overcome the trouble of a long journey, and fetch a great compaſs to Utica, by Land; when he might have diſembarqued nearer unto it. Nevertheleſs it may paſs as a conjecture, That Scipio came firſt of all to Emporia, a plentiful Region about the leſſer Syrtis; ſince he gave charge to the Maſters of his ſhips, at the ſetting forth from Lilybæum, to ſhape their courſe for that coaſt. The Countrey thereabout was very rich, and fit for ſuſtenance of an Army: neither were the Inhabitants warlike, or well provided to make reſiſtance. Thus much perhaps Maſaniſſa had ſignified unto Lælius, when he ſpake with him at Hippo: thinking that the Romans, howſoever they made brave promiſes, would not come ſtrong enough to fight at head. But when he ſaw their Fleet and Army to be ſuch, as not only ſerved to invade the lands of Carthage, but threatned a conqueſt of the City and whole Eſtate: then might he better adviſe them to ſet ſail for Uti[illegible] make war upon the Enemies at their [illegible] doors.

The Carthaginians had at time neither any Captain of great worth at home, nor better Army than of raw Souldiers; that were levied, or to be levied in haſte. Aſdrubal the ſon Geſco, the ſame that had lately been chaſed out of Spain by Scipio, was their beſt man of war. And good enough perhaps he was thought by Hanno and his fellows, of whoſe faction he was: or if ought were wanting in him, yet his Riches and Nobility, together with the affinity of King Syphax, made him paſſable. He was then with the King his ſon-in-law, working him no doubt againſt the Romans: when letters were brought from Carthage both to Syphax and to him, informing them of the Invaſion: entreating the one of them to give aſſiſtance, and commanding the other to make his repair unto the City, where he was choſen General. But ere theſe could be ready, Scipio had beaten the troop of Carthaginian horſe, that were ſent out of the City to diſturb his landing; and ſlain Hanno a young Gentleman, that was their Leader. He had alſo taken and ſacked a Town of the Carthaginians: wherein, beſides other booty, he took eight thouſand priſoners; all which he conveighed aboord his Hulks or Ships of burden, and ſent them back loaden into Sicil. He took likewiſe a Town called Salera, which he held and fortified. In Salera lay another Hanno, with four thouſand Numidian horſe: whoſe ſervice being fitter, for the field, than for defence of walled places, made Scipio to perceive the unſkilfulneſs of their Leader, that had thus houſed them. Wherefore he ſent Maſaniſſa before him: who rode up to the gates; and, by making a bravado, trained out the improvident Hanno ſo far, that he drew him unto a place, where the Romans lay in wait for him. The victory was eaſily gotten, and Hanno either taken or ſlain. With thoſe that fled, the Romans entered pell-mell into the Town, which preſently they made their own. Thence went Scipio to Utica, a City of great importance, of which mention hath been formerly made, and ſate down before it. Forty dayes he ſpent about it, aſſailing it both by Land and Sea, and uſing all his engines of battery, whereof he had plenty, yet was in no likelihood of prevailing. And now the Summer was quite ſpent: ſo that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-Camp, which muſt be well ſtored againſt the year following. Whileſt thus neceſſity urged him to leave Utica: and

ing. Only it seems, that howsoever Sophonisba, the daughter of Asdrubal, was promised by the Carthaginians unto Syphax: yet since this their courtesie proceeded from fear, he thought it wisdom to continue and increase the same their fear, by making fair promises to the Romans, untill Asdrubal had sent for his daughter from Carthage, and the marriage was consummated. In other matters concerning the war it self, wherein Appian differs much from Livie, and from Polybius, whom (as appears by the broken pieces of his works remaining) Livie did follow; it will be no offence, to take little heed unto his reports.

Masanissa was the son of Gala, a King of the Numidians: whose father dying, the Crown descended, by order of the Country, unto Desalces the brother, not unto Masanissa the son. But this Uncle of Masanissa shortly dyed: and his elder son, who took possession of the kingdom, was vanquished, and slain in battel by a Rebel, that made himself Protector over the younger which was a child. The Traitor fortified himself against Masanissa, whose return he feared, by Alliances with the Carthaginians and Syphax. But all would not serve: He and his Pupill, were dispossessed of their Estates by Masanissa; that was a skilfull Warriour, and well beloved for the memory of his father Gala. The Carthaginians in reason would have been glad, that Masanissa, who had done them notable service, was thus confirmed in his Estate, had they not been guilty of the injury by them done unto him; whilest his Uncle or Cousin reigned, and he seemed unlikely to stand them in any stead. But Syphax, by their procurement, and perhaps by his own malice, towards his Corrival, warred upon him; and over-charging him with numbers, drave him out of his Kingdom. Nevertheless Masanissa, still retained the hearts of his people; and thereby remained strong enough, to infest both Syphax and the Carthaginians; though he was often put in distress, by great forces that were sent against him. He therefore keeping much about the lesser Syrtis, between the borders of the Carthaginians, and the Nation of the Garamants, expected the coming of the Romans: yet so, as he made long roads over all the Country, even as far as Hippo; and when Lælius arrived thereabouts, exhorted and encouraged him to hasten on Scipio to the invasion of Africk.

But Syphax, in whose great aid and succour was reposed more hope of good success, than could be expected from the good will of poor Masanissa, sent an Embassage into Sicil about the same time, which was little pleasing unto Scipio. He excused himself of his promise lately made: and signified his alliance with the Carthaginians; adding, That he could not chuse but fight for the defence of Africk, wherein he was born and reigned; and for the defence of his beloved wives Country, if it were invaded. And now the Summer was quite ſpent: ſo that it was time for him to chooſe a place, and fortifie his Winter-Camp, which muſt be well ſtored againſt the year following. Whileſt thus neceſſity urged him to leave Utica: and ſh ame of taking the repulſe in his firſt great enterpriſe, rather than any hope of better ſucceſs, cauſed him to ſtay there: Aſdrubal and Syphax gave him the honour of a fair pretence to leave the ſiege. Aſdrubal had made a levy of thirty thouſand foot, and three thouſand horſe: yet adventured not with this ill-trained Army to draw near unto the Romans, before the coming of Syphax. Syphax brought with him unto Carthage fifty thouſand foot, and ten thouſand horſe: which joyning unto the forces of Aſdrubal, they marched bravely toward Scipio; who thereby took occaſion to diſlodge. He choſe for his Winter-Camp the banks of an In-let, that had good harbour for his Navy. His foot-men he lodged on a Promontory, joyning to the Continent by an arm of Land: his horſe-men he beſtowed upon lower ground, on the other ſhoar: in the bottom of the Creek he mored his ſhips; and there he quartered the Mariners, with all that belonged unto the Fleet. The whole camp he ſtrongly fortified, and ſo attended the ſeaſon of the year, when it ſhould ſerve him again to fight. Of cattel and other booty Maſaniſſa had brought in great ſtore, by driving the Country, before the coming of Aſdrubal and Syphax. Corn alſo he had gotten ſome: and great ſtore was ſent him from Scicil and Sardinia. Likewiſe apparel for his Souldiers, was ſent from home, or from Sardinia: though ſcarce enough to ſerve turn, for that it was a matter of more coſt. The ſhips that brought theſe things, he fraighted homewards with ſuch part of his booty, as he could beſt ſpare: eſpecially with captives to be ſold for ſlaves. Aſdrubal and Syphax encamped near unto Scipio: not ſo ſtrongly fortifying themſelves, as did the Romans, either for that they wanted the ſeverer inſtitution, which the Romans uſed in the diſcipline of war, or for that they preſumed upon their multitude, againſt which they found in Scipio no diſpoſition to iſſue forth of his ſtrength, and fight. So the Winter paſſed without action.

When Spring drew near, Scipio thought it good to aſſay his old friend the Numidian King, if perhaps he might be won by perſwaſions to forſake the Carthaginians. It was conſidered, that thoſe Barbarians were naturally unconſtant; and particularly, that Syphax had given proof before this of his much levity. It might therefore be hoped, that having wearied himſelf by lodging a whole Winter in the Camp: and being peradventure no leſs weary with ſatiety of his wife, who had cauſed him to enter into this war: he might be moved with a little entreaty to withdraw himſelf home into his Kingdom, and reſt a Neuter. But it is not unlikely, that ſuch a friend as this King, had been highly entertained and honoured in the City of Carthage, which was near at hand, as often as during this Winter it had pleaſed him, or as he had been invited, to make a ſtep thither and repoſe himſelf a while: his wife Queen Sophonisba lying alſo there at the ſame time, to cheriſh him in his reſolution. Howſoever it were, Syphax did only make an overture of peace: propounding it as reaſonable, That Hannibal ſhould be recalled out of Italy by the Carthaginians: and that the Romans in like ſort ſhould quietly depart out of Africk, and ſo make an end of the war: wherewith now both Africk and Europe were diſquieted. Unto this would not Scipio at the firſt give ear: yet being preſſed earneſtly by many meſſages from Syphax, and deſiring to continue the intercourſe of Embaſſadors; he began to make ſhew, as if he would conſider of the motion. He was given to underſtand by thoſe whom he had ſent unto the King, that the Enemies had their camps without any great defence of earth, full of wooden Cabins, and covered with boughs: and that the Numidians, ſuch of them as came firſt with Syphax, uſed coverings of Mats and Reeds; others that came later, had thatched their lodgings with dry boughs and leaves: under which they lay careleſly without their Trenches. Upon this advertiſement he bethought himſelf, That it would not be hard for him to ſet their camps on fire, and thereby give them a notable overthrow. Without help of ſome ſuch ſtratagem, he foreſaw that it would be a work of great difficulty for him, to proceed in his wars when time ſhould ſerve. It was a plain open Country wherein he lay: and the Enemies had great advantage of him in number, eſpecially in horſe; which, upon ſuch ground, could not be reſiſted by the Roman Legions. The longer therefore that he thought upon the matter; the more needful he found it for himſelf, to make ſome ſudden attempt upon their Camp. To this end he ſent many Embaſſadours, under pretence of treating about the Peace; but indeed of purpoſe to diſcover all that might concern the intended ſurpriſe. With theſe Embaſſadours he ſent, as Attendants, many old Souldiers, diſguiſed like ſlaves; that wandring (as it were) idle up and down the Camp, might obſerve the wayes and entrances, with whatſoever elſe was needful. When he had learned as much as he deſired: upon the ſudden ſudden he ſent word to Syphax, that it was vain to hold any longer treaty, foraſmuch as he could not get the conſent of his Council of war; whithout whoſe approbation, all that himſelf could do, was no more, than the good will of one man. This he did, to the end that, without any breach of faith, he might put his deſign in execution. The Truce being thus cut off, Aſdrubal and Syphax were very penſive: as having lately perſwaded themſelves, that their trouble was almoſt at an end. But ſince it could be no better, they began to deviſe, by what art they might draw Scipio out of his Camp, and provoke him to battel in thoſe Plains. This if they could do, they hoped to make his Council of war repent as greatly the refuſal of peace, as did Marcus Atilius after the like preſumption. But if he ſhould refuſe to come forth of his Trenches, what elſe remained than to beſiege him? Which they themſelves were well able to do by land; and the Carthaginian Fleet ſhould do by Sea, that was making ready for the purpoſe. By ſuch diſcourſes theſe two comforted themſelves; recompencing (in conceipt) the loſs of their hopes paſt, with that victory to come. But herein they were extreamly and worthily diſappointed: for that conſulting about the future, they provided not againſt preſent danger, but continued in the ſame negligence, which was grown upon them by the long diſcourſe of peace. As for Scipio, he was not idle; but made preparation out of hand, as it were to do ſomewhat againſt Utica. Two thouſand Souldiers he had made ready, and appointed to take the ſame piece of ground, whereon he lay againſt Utica before. This he did, partly to keep ſecret that which he had in hand, leſt being ſuſpected by his own Souldiers, the Enemy might happen to have notice of it; partly to hinder thoſe of Utica from ſetting upon the few, that he purpoſed to leave behind him in his Camp. He cauſed his men that night to ſup well, and betimes that they might be ready for the journey. After ſupper, he appointed ſuch Companies as he thought fit, to the defence of his Camp; all the reſt of the Army he led forth, about nine of the clock at night. The Carthaginians lay from him ſeven miles and an half: whom he purpoſed to undertake himſelf with the one half of his Army; the other half he committed to Lælius and Maſaniſſa, whom he ſent before him to ſet upon the camp of Syphax, that was farther off. It was his meaning, that the camp of Syphax ſhould be on a light fire, ere he would meddle with the Carthaginians. For the fire might ſeem to have taken by caſualty upon the Numidians that lay farther off, whereas if it firſt appeared in the camp of Aſdrubal, it would be ſuſpected as the doing of enemies, and give Syphax warning to look to himſelf. To this end therefore Scipio marched fair and ſoftly; that Lælius and Maſaniſſa, who had a longer journey, and were to fetch a compaſs about for fear of being diſcovered, might have time to get before him, and do their feat. It was about two or three a clock in the morning, when the camp of Syphax began to blaze: which not only the Numidians, but their King himſelf, imputed unto caſualty; as thinking themſelves ſafe enough from enemies, for that the Carthaginians lay interpoſed between them and the danger. Wherefore as if there were no more to do, ſome ſtarting half aſleep; and others that had ſitten up late at drinking, ran out of their Cabbins to quench the fire. But ſo great was the tumult, that they neither could rightly underſtand in what caſe they were, nor give any remedy to the miſchance as it was ſuppoſed. Many were ſmothered and burnt in the flame, which grew greater and greater: many, leaping into the Trenches for fear of the ſudden miſchief, were trampled to death by the multitude that followed them. They that eſcaped the fire fell upon the enemies ſword, which was ready to receive them. Eſpecially Maſaniſſa, that beſt knew the Country, did great execution upon them: having laid all the wayes, by which he foreſaw that they would ſeek to eſcape. The Carthaginians perceiving this fire, thought none other than that it was a pittiful miſchance: ſo that ſome ran out to help the poor Numidians; carrying only what would ſerve to quench the fire. Others ran up to the Rampart: where fearleſs of any danger toward themſelves, they ſtood beholding the greatneſs of the flame, and lamenting the misfortune. This fell out right as Scipio would have it. He therefore loſt no time: but ſetting upon thoſe that were running towards the Numidians, he killed ſome, and purſued the reſt back into their camp, which in a little while he made to burn as bright, as did that of Syphax. Aſdrubal ſeeing this, and knowing that the Romans were there, did not ſtand to make reſiſtance, but ſhifted only for himſelf, and eſcaped with a few of his horſe about him. If Hannibal, or any of the Barchine faction, had been taken in ſuch a manner: it is more than probable that old Hanno would have judged him worthy to be crucified. It would then have been ſaid, that with leſs than one half of 30000. men, he might at leaſt have given ſome bad recompence, to them that were taking pains in kindling theſe fires, had he not been only careful how to ſave his own fearful head. Nevertheleſs Polybius acknowledgeth, and it is moſt likely to have been true, That if Aſdrubal, or any of thoſe about him, would have ſtricken to ſhew valour, when the Camp was once on fire: He ſhould not thereby have done any manner of good, becauſe of the tumult and conſternation. I ſhall not need to tell what a fearful thing it was, to hear the cries of ſo many thouſands that periſhed by fire and ſword, or to behold the cruel flame that conſumed them; which (as Polybius affirms) none that hath being is able to deſcribe. It is enough to ſay, That of thoſe many thouſands, very few did eſcape; which accompanied Aſdrubal and Syphax in their ſeveral wayes of flight. Beſides theſe alſo there were ſome ſcatterers, eſpecially of the Numidians, that ſaved themſelves in the dark: but they were not many, as after ſhall appear. Surely it muſt needs have been very hard to tell, how many were burnt or otherwiſe made away, and what numbers eſcaped in the dark of night. Wherefore Livie, who in the reſt of this relation, as often elſewhere, doth follow Polybius, may ſeem to have followed ſome leſs worthy Author, and him no good Arithmetician, in caſting up the ſumm. For he reckons only two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, to have eſcaped; forty thouſand to have periſhed by ſword or fire: and above ſix thouſand to have been taken priſoners: the whole number of all which together, is far ſhort of fourſcore and thirteen thouſand, which were in theſe two Camps.

Aſdrubal, putting himſelf into the next Town that was very ſtrongly fortified, thought there to find the Romans work, until the Carthaginians at good leiſure might repair their Army. He had with him no more than two thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe: which he thought ſufficient to defend the Town; if the Townſ-men would not be wanting to themſelves. But he found the Inhabitants of the place very earneſt in contention, whether it were better to fight, or to yield. Unto this diſputation, he well foreſaw, that the arrival of Scipio would ſoon give an end. Wherefore, leſt they ſhould lay hold upon him, and ſeek the Victors favour by delivering him up: he ſhrunk away betimes and made all haſte to Carthage. As for the town which he left; it opened the gates to Scipio, at his firſt coming: and thereby preſerved it ſelf from all manner of loſs. The two next Towns adjoyning would needs be valiant, and make countenance of war: but their ſtrength not being anſwerable, they were ſoon taken by Scipio, who abandoned them to the pleaſure of his Souldiers. This being done, he returned to the ſiege of Utica.

The Carthaginians were ſore troubled, as they had good reaſon, when inſtead of either Peace or Victory, which they lately hoped for, they heard news of ſuch a lamentable overthrow. Neceſſity enforced them to make haſty proviſion for the future: but how to do it, few of them ſaw any means. Some gave advice to crave peace of Scipio: others to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy; but the moſt, and they which finally prevailed, were of opinion, That notwithſtanding the loſs of this Army, they might well defend themſelves againſt the Romans, by raiſing new forces: eſpecially, if Syphax would not leave them. It was therefore concluded, that they ſhould bend all their care this way, levying in all haſte another Army; and ſending Embaſſadours to deal with Syphax, who lay then at a Town called Abba, not paſſing eight miles from Carthage. Immediately the ſame their unfortunate Commander, Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco, was employed to make new levies of men: and Queen Sophonisba went forth with Embaſſadours to her husband Syphax, who having gathered together as many as he could of his ſubjects that had eſcaped from the late ſlaughter, was thinking to return into his own Kingdom. Sophonisba laboured ſo with her husband, that at length ſhe won him to her own deſire. And it fell out at the ſame time, that four thouſand Spaniards, waged by the Carthaginians, were brought over to ſerve in Africk. Of theſe were made ſuch brave reports, as if their courage, and the Arms which they uſed, were not to be reſiſted. Even the multitude within Carthage believed theſe tales, and were more glad than they had cauſe to be; which is great wonder, ſince in one age, the whole country of Spain had been twice conquered; firſt, by the Carthaginians themſelves, and after by the Romans. But with Syphax theſe tales prevailed much: which the Carthaginian Embaſſadors helped with a lye; ſaying, That there were come ten thouſand of theſe terrible Spaniards. Upon this confidence, the people of Carthage and their friends gathered ſuch ſpirit, that in thirty dayes they made up an Army, conſiſting well-near of thirty thouſand men, reckoning the Spaniards and Syphax with his Numidians in the number. So they incamped in a Region called,

The

The great Fields, about five dayes journey from Utica. Scipio hearing of this, came from Utica thither, to viſit them: leaving behind him his impediments, with ſome part of his Army, to make a ſhew of continuing the ſiege. Two or three dayes, after the meeting of both Armies, paſſed away in ſkirmiſh, without any great thing done. It had now been time for Aſdrubal to follow the example of the Roman Fabius, and ſeek to weary out the Enemy by delayes. But either (which is likely) he was a far worſe Commander, or elſe it was not in his power, to give ſuch directions as beſt pleaſed himſelf. The fourth day the Armies met in battel: wherein the Romans were marſhalled by Scipio after their wonted manner, having their Italian horſe in the right wing; and Maſaniſſa with his Numidians in the left. On the contrary ſide, Aſdrubal and his Carthaginians had the right wing; Syphax the left; and the Spaniards, the battel. The victory was gotten without many blows: for the untrained followers of Syphax and Aſdrubal, could not ſuſtain the firſt charge of the Italians, or of Maſaniſſa. Only the Spaniards fought a long time, even untill they were all in a manner ſlain: rather as men deſperate, and not hoping for mercy, ſince they were thus come over to fight againſt Scipio, who had otherwiſe deſerved of them, than upon any likelihood or conceit of victory. This their obſtinacy was beneficial to thoſe that fled; for that it hindred the Romans from making any great purſuit. Hereby Aſdrubal, and Syphax eſcaped: Aſdrubal, to Carthage; and Syphax home to his own Kingdom: whither his wife was either gone before, or immediately followed him.

Scipio, having thus gotten the maſtery of the field, took counſel about the proſecution of the war. It was reſolved upon as the beſt courſe, That he himſelf, with part of the Army, ſhould attempt the Cities round about him: and that Maſaniſſa, with his Numidians, and Lælius, with ſome of the Roman Legions, ſhould follow after Syphax; not permitting him to take reſt within his own Kingdom, where eaſily elſe he might repair his forces, and put them to new trouble. This advice, it ſeems that Maſaniſſa gave: who knew beſt the quality of the Numidians; and what good might be done among them, by the reputation of a victory. The leaſt that could be expected, was his reſtitution into his own Kingdom, uſurped by Syphax: which to accompliſh, it no leſs concerned the Romans at the preſent, than it did himſelf. According to this order concluded, Lælius was ſent away with Maſaniſſa: and Scipio ſtayed behind, carrying the war from town to town. Many places yielded for fear; many were taken by force; and all the ſubjects of Carthage wavered in their fidelity, as if the time were now come, wherein they might take notice of thoſe unreaſonable burdens, which their proud Maſters had laid upon them, for maintenance of the war in Spain and Italy. What to do in this caſe, the Carthaginians could hardly reſolve. Fortune was their enemy; they had loſt their Armies and many of their Towns: neither durſt they make bold to trouble their own ſubjects with any violent exaction of men or money; who nevertheleſs of their own free will were likely to give little help. Very much it grieved them to ſend for Hannibal out of Italy: yet ſince there was no other hope remaining, than in him and his good Army; it was decreed, That Embaſſadors ſhould be forthwith ſent to call him home. Some there were that gave advice, to ſet out a fleet againſt that of Scipio, and rode before Utica, weakly manned, that eaſie to be taken, whileſt Scipio himſelf was buſied in the Iſland Countrys. Some were of opinion, that it ſhould be their principal care, to fortifie by all means the City of Carthage: upon the ſafety whereof they ſaid all depended: adding, that whileſt they were true, and at unity among themſelves, they might well enough ſubſiſt, and expect thoſe opportunities, with which Fortune (doubtleſs) would preſent them. Theſe counſels were not rejected; but order was forthwith taken, both for all things concerning the defence of the City, and for the attempt upon the Roman fleet at Utica. Nevertheleſs, it was conſidered, that thereby they ſhould only protract the war; without any advancing their own affairs towards likelihood of victory, no, though it ſhould fall out, that all the ſhips at Utica might be taken, or deſtroyed. Wherefore the determination held concerning Hannibal, that he ſhould immediately come over into Africk, as the laſt refuge of Carthage. The Council was no ſooner broken up, than all the Senators betook themſelves to the execution of that which was decreed: ſome, to the fortification of the Town: ſome, to make ready the Fleet; and ſome, appointed thereunto, forthwith to embarque themſelves for Italy.

In this their trepidation Scipio came to Tunes, a City in thoſe dayes very ſtrong, and ſtanding in proſpect almoſt of every part of Carthage. This place, or rather ſome defenſible piece adjoyning, he eaſily took; the garriſons forſaking it, and running away, as ſoon as he drew near. But whileſt he was about there to incamp, and fortifie himself against the City, he might perceive the Carthaginian Fleet setting forth, and making towards Utica: What this meant, he readily conceived; and stood in great fear, lest his own ships that were very ill prepared for Sea-fight (as being heavily loaden with engines of battery, and wholly disposed in such order, as was most convenient for assaulting the town) should make bad resistance, against a fleet appointed for that special service. Wherefore he hasted away towards Utica, to assist with his presence in this needful case. It fell out well, that he had sent his carriages, and all the great booty which he drew along with him, thither before, at his going to Tunes. For had not he now made great expedition, he should have come too late. Neither could he indeed have been there in due time, if the Carthaginians had used such diligence as was convenient. But they rested one night in harbour by the way: and at their coming to Utica, they tarryed a while to make a bravado; presenting themselves in order of battel, as if the Romans would have put forth to Sea against them. But Scipio had no such intent: he thought it would be sufficient, if he could preserve his Gallies. As for the pleasure of their bravery at Sea; it should little avail the Carthaginians, if they got nothing by it, and lost their whole estate by Land. Wherefore he took his ships of burden, and fastning them together with cables, in four ranks, one behind another, made a four-fold bridge over the channel of the Haven; whereon he placed a thousand of his choise men, with store of Darts, and other casting weapons, to make defence. Some other spaces he left, whereat his Frigots, and other small Vessels, might run out and back again upon any advantage or need: but these he covered with planks, using the masts and yards of his ships instead of rafters, to joyn all together, that his men might help one another, and the bridge it self not be torn asunder. Scarce was this work finished, when the Carthaginians, seeing none issue forth against them, came into the Haven. The fight between them and the Romans that were in the Hulks, was rather like to the assaulting of a wall, than to any Sea-fight. For they that stood upon the bridge, had sure footing, and threw their weapons downwards, with their whole strength and violence; which the Carthaginians out of their Gallies, that were lower and unsteady, could not do, but the Roman Frigots and long boats, adventuring forth from behind the bridge, were greatly overborn by the force of the Gallies; and were one occasion of that small loss that followed. They that stood upon the Bridge, were neither able to relieve them, nor yet could freely bestow their weapons among the Carthaginians, as before; for fear of hurting these their friends, that were intangled and mixed among the enemies. The Carthaginians had brought with them grappling hooks, hanging at Iron chains. These they threw upon the masts & yards, which served as arches to joyn the bridge together: then rowing backwards, they tore all asunder; in such sort, that one ship followed another, and all the first rank was broken, or defaced. The Defendants had no other way, than to save themselves as hastily as they could, by shifting into the next rank of ships, that lay behind them untouched. Neither did the Carthaginians trouble themselves any further in this laborious work: but having haled away six ships of burden, and towed them out of the Haven, returned home to Carthage. Their welcome was greater than their victory; because among so many grievous losses, only this exploit had succeeded well, though it were of small importance.

Whilest things thus passed about Carthage, Lælius and Masanissa, in their journey against Syphax, found as good success as could be desired. The fame of the victories already gotten restored Masanissa to his Kingdom, without farther contention: the Masæsyli, his subjects, joyfully receiving him, and forsaking the usurpers. But here they stayed not: neither indeed would Syphax permit them to be quiet. He had such abundance of men and horses, that he felt not greatly the losses past: and therefore being solicited by Asdrubal and Sophonisba, he prepared again for war. But beside the instigation of his beloved wife; the loss of the Masæsyli would let him take no rest: neither was it the purpose of Lælius and Masanissa, to give him any breathing time. It is common in men, to depart no less unwillingly from that which they have gotten by extortion, than from their proper inheritance; but to think all alike their own, whereof they are in possession, be the title unto some part never so unjust. Hereunto alludes the fable of the young Kite; which thought that she had vomitted up her own guts, when it was only the garbage of some other fowl, that she had hastily swallowed, and was not able to digest. But whether or no, Syphax, like the young Kite, believed the Kingdom of the Masæsyli to be part of his entrails: Lælius and Masanissa will shortly give him somewhat that shall make him cast his gorge. For to this purpose chiefly are they come so ſo far. It concerned the Romans to diſpoſſeſs (if it might be) the King, whoſe falſe and hollow friendſhip towards them, had been converted into ſtrong enmity; as alſo to ſet in his place another, who might do them ſuch good offices, as Syphax had lately done unto the Carthaginians. How eaſily this might be effected, Maſaniſſa knew beſt, as being well acquainted with the nature of thoſe Countries; wherein, even to this day though there be many ſtrong Towns, yet the fortune of a battle is enough, to tranſlate the Kingdom from one Competitor to another. So they met with Syphax, who came againſt them with no leſs an Army, than his former, and marſhalled in the Roman order, according to the ſkill, which he had learned of the Roman Centurion, long ago ſent unto him out of Spain from Cn. Scipio. But though he could teach his men how to march in order; yet could he not teach them to fight couragiouſly. They were a rabble of all ſorts, gathered up in haſte: and few of them had ſeen war before. Encamping neer unto the Romans, it fell out, as commonly, that ſome ſmall troops of horſe on both ſides, encountered one another in the midway: and they that had the worſt, were ſeconded by other of their fellows. By continuance of the ſkirmiſh, more and more were drawn out from either Camp: ſo that at length Syphax, unwilling to diſ-hearten his men by taking any foil at their firſt meeting with the Enemy, came up with all his horſe, which were the beſt part of his forces, and therewith over-charged Maſaniſſa, whoſe numbers were far leſs. But whileſt he was proſecuting his hope of victory: ſome Roman ſquadrons of Foot came againſt him through their own troops of horſe; which fell to the ſides, and made a lane for them. So their battel ſtanding now more firm, than a little before; Syphax was unable, though he laboured much in vain, to make them give ground. Maſaniſſa likewiſe, and his troops grew confident upon this aſſiſtance: and charging afreſh the Enemy, that could not make way forward, cauſed him to give back. Herewithal the Legions came in ſight: which terrified ſo the Numidian horſe, that they began preſently to diſ-band. Fain would Syphax have ſtayed them from flight: and to that end made head in perſon againſt the Romans; with hope, that his men would be aſhamed to leave him. But it fell out unhappily, that he was caſt from his horſe, which received a wound, and ſo taken priſoner. Of others that were ſlain or taken: the multitude was not great. It ſufficed, that they forſook the place, and fled, and that their King, upon whom all depended, was in the Romans hand. Maſaniſſa told Lælius, that this victory ſhould make an end of the Numidian war, if preſently they haſted away to Cirta the chief City of the Kingdom; whither he himſelf deſired to be ſent before with the Horſe, carrying Syphax along with him. Hereunto Lælius agreed. Maſaniſſa coming to Cirta, before any news of the Kings miſchance was there arrived, called out the chief of the City to parlee: wherein by many fair promiſes and threats, but eſpecially by ſhewing unto them Syphax bound, he prevailed ſo far, that the gates were forthwith opened unto him; and every one ſtrove to get his favour: that was like to be their King hereafter. Among the reſt, Queen Sophonisba yielded her ſelf into his hands, and vehemently beſought him, that ſhe might not be delivered up unto the Romans. Her youth, and excellent beauty, ſo commended her ſuit, that Maſaniſſa forthwith granted it; and to make good his promiſe, marryed her himſelf that very day; thereby to prevent Lælius and Scipio from determining otherwiſe of her, ſince ſhe was his wife. But Lælius, when he came thither, took the matter hainouſly, ſo that at firſt he would have haled her away, together with Syphax and other priſoners, and have ſent her unto Scipio. But being over intreated by Maſaniſſa, he ſuffered the matter to reſt a while as he found it, and referred all to Scipio's diſcretion; to whom he ſent away Syphax and other captives immediately; following ſhortly after himſelf with Maſaniſſa, when they had done what was needful in the Kingdom.

At the coming of Syphax, there was great joy in the Roman Camp: the mighty Armies which he had lately brought into the field; and his entertainment of Scipio and Aſdrubal, both at one time, when Rome and Carthage together ſought his friendſhip; with ſuch other commemoration of his paſt and preſent fortune, miniſtring to every one a large argument of diſcourſe. Scipio demanded of him, what had moved him, not only to forſake the Roman friendſhip, but to make war upon them, unprovoked. He briefly anſwered, That his wife had moved him ſo to do; calling her a Fury, and a peſtilent creature: and ſaying, that Maſaniſſa was no wiſer than himſelf, ſince he had now taken the ſame woman to his wife, who would ſhortly draw him to the ſame courſes. Hereat Scipio was greatly troubled: and ſtood in great doubt, leſt this perilous woman ſhould deprive him of Maſaniſſa, as ſhe had done of Syphax. It was not long, ere Maſaniſſa and Lælius came unto him: both of whom together he lovingly welcomed; and highly commended in publick, for their notable ſervice in this Expedition. Then taking Maſaniſſa apart, he brake with him, as touching Sophonisba: letting him underſtand, that the Romans had title to her head, and that ſhe was a miſchievous enemy of theirs. Wherefore he intreated him to moderate his affections: and not to deface the memory of his great ſervices already done (for which he ſhould be highly rewarded to his own contentment) by committing a great offence upon little reaſon. Maſaniſſa bluſht, and wept: and finally promiſed to be governed by Scipio, whom he nevertheleſs intreated, to think upon his faith given to Sophonisba, that ſhe ſhould not be delivered into the Romans power. So he departed to his own Tent, where, after ſome time ſpent in agony, he called unto him a ſervant of his that had the cuſtody of his poyſon (which Princes uſed then to have in a readineſs, againſt all miſchances that might make them unwilling to live:) and tempering a potion for Sophonisba, ſent it unto her with this meſſage; that gladly he would have had her to live with him as his wife: but ſince they who had power to hinder him of his deſire, would not yield thereto, he ſent her a cup, that ſhould preſerve her from falling alive into the hands of the Romans; willing her to remember her birth and eſtate, and accordingly to take order for her ſelf.

At the receit of this Meſſage and Preſent, ſhe only ſaid; That if her husband had no better token to ſend unto his new wife, ſhe muſt accept of this; adding, that ſhe might have dyed more honourably, if ſhe had not wedded ſo lately before her funeral. And herewithall ſhe boldly drank off the poiſon. Thus Livie reporteth. But Appian varies from this; and ſets it down agreeably to that which hath been ſpoken before, concerning the præcontract between Maſaniſſa, and Sophonisba. He ſaith, that after the taking of Syphax, Embaſſadours from Cirta met with Lælius and Maſaniſſa upon their way thither, yielding up their City, and the Kings Palace: and that Sophonisba, for her own private, ſent meſſengers to excuſe her marriage with Syphax, as made againſt her will, by compulſion of thoſe in whoſe power ſhe was. Maſaniſſa readily admitted this excuſe; and accepted her to wife. But when Scipio had received information from Syphax, how cunning in perſwaſion Sophonisba was: and that all her thoughts laboured for the good of Carthage; he fell out about her with Maſaniſſa at his return, and challenged her, as a part of the booty belonging to the Romans, Maſaniſſa ſaid, ſhe was his own wife, and unto him betrothed many years before. But Scipio would not hear of this: or if it were true, yet he ſaid it was no reaſon, that Maſaniſſa ſhould keep her in poſſeſſion, as long as it was diſputable, unto whom ſhe might appertain. Wherefore he willed him firſt of all to produce her, and then afterwards to make his claim unto her, wherein he ſhould have no wrong. Herewithall he ſent to fetch her away: and Maſaniſſa accompanied the meſſengers, as it were to deliver her: but making her acquainted with the neceſſity, gave unto her a cup of poiſon, wherewith ſhe ended her life, before they came that ſhould have apprehended her. So he ſhewed unto the Romans her dead body, which he royally interred. The ſudden violence of Maſaniſſa his love, and the ready conſent of Sophonisba to marry with him, add not ſo much credit unto this relation of Appian, as doth the want of all other evident cauſe (which Livie notes) of the ſudden falling out between him and the Carthaginians, under whom he had been trained up, and done them great ſervice. Howſoever it were; Scipio, hearing of this tragical accident, ſent for Maſaniſſa, and comforted him as well as he could, leſt his melancholy ſhould lead him to ſome inconvenience. Having therefore gently rebuked him for his raſhneſs, he brought him forth in preſence of the Army: where extolling his noble acts, and ſhewing how highly he had deſerved of the City of Rome, he proclaimed him King, and gave unto him a Crown of gold, with other Royal ornaments. This was indeed the ready way to divert his thoughts from the ſad remembrance of that which was paſt, unto the more chearful contemplation of good fortune, that began to ſmile upon him.

This was the firſt time that the Romans took upon them to create or proclaim a King. Which honour though Maſaniſſa well deſerved: yet would not the Title have redounded unto his great benefit: neither ſhould he have been much beholding to them for it, if he had not by their means recovered poſſeſſion of his Country, together with the greateſt part of Syphax his Dominions. It ſeemeth not unlikely, that had he remained a Neuter in theſe wars, and ſuſtained himſelf with his troop of horſe, in ſuch ſort as he did before the coming of the Romans; he might nevertheleſs have recovered his proper inheritance, by the love of his own ſubjects without other help, when Syphax had once or twice been vanquiſhed.

vanquished. As for the inlargement of his Kingdome, it was not more than he deserved: neither were the Romans then in case, to make a conquest of Numidia for themselves; neither could they have wished a fitter opportunity, than of such a man upon whom to bestow it, that was their assured friend, & passable withall among the Numidians as being (for the Massæsyli were a Numidian Tribe) a great Prince of the same Nation. Yet this liberality of the Romans, was noised abroad as very glorious: and the Romans themselves, in a politick sort of gravity, took highly upon them; as if even their saluting him by the name of King, had been a matter of great consequence. He thrived indeed well after it: & by their maintenance waxed mighty in times following, incroaching upon his neighbours on all sides; but most of all upon the State of Carthage, whereat they were little displeased. Hence it grew that Vermina the son of Syphax (of whom we shall shortly speak more) which held some pieces of his fathers Kingdome, desiring friendship of the Romans, and promising by all means to deserve their love, requested therewithall, that they would call him King. But though it were so, that never any before him had made this a matter of suit: yet the Roman Senate was Puntilious herein, and answered very Liv. l. 31. bravely, That it was not their custome to give the honour of that appellation, save only unto such Kings, as had greatly deserved of their City. Thus they made it a matter of State; and in process of time grew so proud of this their imaginary prerogative, that they imputed as a singular benefit unto Kings that no way depended upon them, the salu-

§. XIX.

The Carthaginians desired Truce, and break it.

THe Carthaginians were extreamly dismayed, when they heard of the great calamity, that was befallen their good friend Syphax, and understood that Masanissa their mortal enemy, had got possession of his Kingdome. To increase their fear, Scipio returned again to Tunes in view of their City: where he made an end of that Fortification, which he had begun at his last being there. The Carthaginians had neither forces, nor courage, to withstand him: but their hearts so failed them, that they sent forth unto them thirty Embassadours, Princes of the City, which were their Privy Councel, to make suit for peace. These being admitted into the presence of Scipio, did not only prostrate themselves on the ground; but kissed the * feet of him and of those that sat in Councel with him.

* Excepto Polib. l. 15. & Liv. l. 30.

Answerable to this base adoration was their speech that followed. They confessed themselves to have unjustly broken the Peace between them and Rome; and to have deserved whatsoever punishment it should please the Romans to inflict upon them. Yet they humbly besought Scipio and the rest, that in common regard of those misfortunes whereto all men are subject, they would shew mercy unto the City of Carthage, and let it remain, as a monument of their clemency; which, by the folly of her Citizens, had now twice deserved to be overthrown. Herewithall they did not forget, to lay the blame upon Hannibal: who without their appointment had begun the War; and was maintained in his doings by a Faction, without the good liking of the whole City. By this it appears, that these Embassadours were no Barchines: but rather, that they were Hanno, and the choice of his company; who had now their long desired work in hand, of suing unto the Romans for peace. Whatsoever they were, it must needs be that they were most insolent men over those that were subject unto their power, for they would not have made such adoration to the Romans in their own necessity, unless they themselves had expected the like, wherein they had the advantage.

It was not unknown to Scipio, or to his assistants, in what poor case the City of Rome then was; and how unable to defray the charges of continuing the War. Neither were the Carthaginians, notwithstanding the loss of so many Armies, in such ill case, as the Romans themselves had very lately been. For they had money enough, wherewith to wage more men: they had a City far stronger than Rome; and they had the Sea free. But they wanted the Roman resolution: and therefore distrusted the walls of Carthage; though Utica, a weaker City, had all this while held out against Scipio, and could not yet be forced by him and his Army, though so often victorious in the field. Scipio therefore accepted their submission, and told them, That though he came into Africk, to make a conquest, and not peace: yet having the Conquest as it were in his hand, he would not deny to grant them the Peace which they desired; for thereby should all Nations understand, that the people of Rome did follow the rule of Justice, both in making war, and in concluding it. The Conditions which he impoſed upon them, were theſe; That they ſhould render up unto him all the priſoners that they had taken, together with all Renegadoes and fugitive ſlaves: That they ſhould withdraw their Armies out of Italy and Gaule: That they ſhould not meddle in Spain, nor yet in any Iſland between Italy and Africk: That they ſhould deliver up all their ſhips of war, ſave twenty; and that they ſhould pay a great ſumm of mony, with certain hundred thouſand buſhels of wheat and barley. To conſider of theſe Articles, he gave them three daies: and when they had approved them, he granted a Truce; that they might ſend Embaſſadors unto the Roman Senate.

This done, Maſaniſſa was diſmiſſed, and went home into his Kingdome, as if the war had been already at an end. Syphax was a little before ſent with Lælius unto Rome: where the fame of theſe victories filled men with joy, and gave hope, that the long endured miſeries would be ſhortly at an end. Wherefore all the Temples were ſet open, and an holy day appointed for thankſgiving and ſupplication to their Gods. Lælius was accompanied with Embaſſadors from King Maſaniſſa: who gratulating the happy ſucceſs of the Romans in their African war, and giving thanks unto the Senate for the benefits done by Scipio unto their Maſter, made requeſt for the Numidians, ſuch as were now his Subjects and priſoners in Rome, that they might be beſtowed upon him, who by rendring them to liberty, ſhould do an act very plauſible, that would make him gracious among his people in the beginning of his reign. The Roman Senate were not behind with Maſaniſſa in complement: but ſhewing themſelves to be highly pleaſed with all that Scipio had done, and ſhould do for him, they called him King again; releaſed his Numidians that were captives; and ſent him two purple Caſſocks, that had each of them one gold button, with ſuch other preſents, as in time of their poverty might ſerve to teſtifie their good will. Scarcely were theſe and Lælius gone from Rome, when the news came, that Embaſſadors from Carthage were arrived to deſire peace. Theſe Embaſſadors were not admitted into the City, but were lodged without: untill Lælius being ſent for, came back from Oſtia, to be preſent when their demands were to be heard. Then was audience given them in the Temple of Bellona; that ſtood in the Suburbs, The errand of theſe Embaſſadors, was peace, but the meaning of them and of their City was only to win time, and get reſpite for war; until Hannibal and Mago ſhould come out of Italy, either to chaſe the Romans out of Africk, or to obtain peace for Carthage, by terror of their great Names and Armies, upon more eaſie conditions. Wherefore they made an idle diſcourſe of the League, that was concluded between them and Lucatius Catulus, at the end of the former war. This League they ſaid, all things well conſidered, did ſtill remain in force: neither had there ſince been any war at all, between the people of Rome and the Carthaginians. For it was only Hannibal, that without any leave from Carthage, had of his own head beſieged and razed the Town of Saguntum: and after that adventured in like ſort, without Commiſſion, to paſs the Alpes, and trouble (as he had done) the quiet of Italy. This being ſo, their Meſſage was none other than to deſire, that the League before ſpoken of, made in the time of Catulus, might hereafter ſtand in force; as indeed it hitherto did, and ought to do. The Senators had cauſe to wonder at this tale, hearing theſe Embaſſadors make (as it were) a jeſt of war, that had been ſo terrible. Wherefore they aſked them a great many queſtions, concerning that peace made by Lucatius, and other paſſages following between the two Cities. But they excuſed themſelves, by their age: (for they were all young men) and ſaid, That thoſe things were beyond their knowledge and remembrance. Forthwith it appeared, That all was but colluſion, and that they ſought no other than to gain time, untill they might repair the war. Wherefore they were ſent home, in company of Lælius, without any concluſion at all of peace, and in effect, without anſwer. This notwithſtanding, we find in Polybius, That the Senate received advertiſement from Scipio, of that which had paſſed between him and the Carthaginians in this Treaty of peace: approved the Conditions by him propounded, and gave him licence thereupon, to proceed unto Concluſion. This may with good reaſon be believed, ſince it was not unknown that if the war continued, all theſe goodly hopes muſt reſt upon the moſt uncertain iſſue of one battel between Hannibal and Scipio: wherein if fortune ſhould be averſe to them, their forces in Africk were no better than quite loſt.

Matters thus hanging in ſuſpence, before the Carthaginian Embaſſadours came back from Rome, a Fleet out of Sicil, wherein were two hundred ſhips of burden, and thirty Gallies, being bound for Africk, to victual the Roman Camp, was over-taken by foul weather at Sea, and hardly eſcaping wrack, wrak, was diſperſed, and driven aground in divers parts of the Bay of Carthage, even in view, and under command of the City. There was at that time, as we find in Appian, and may gather out of Polybius, a great dearth of victuals in Carthage, which cauſed the people to cry out upon their Magiſtrates, that they ſhould not let ſuch a booty eſcape them, ſaying, that the danger of famine was greater and worſe, than of breaking Truce. Whether it were ſo, that hunger urged them, or that they yielded to their own greedy deſires: the multitude in Carthage underſtood (as it ſeems) that all this diſcourſe of Peace in hand, was no better than meer mockery, and therefore cared not for obſervation of particular points, when they meant deceit in the whole. It was the manner in Carthage, as likewiſe in Alexandria, for all the raſcality, together with women and boys, to be medling in uproars: the clamors of the boyes being in ſuch tumults no leſs violent than of the men. Wherefore it is no marvel, if little regard were had of reaſon, or of honour, in any ſuch commotion. A Fleet was ſent out under Aſdrubal, to gather up the diſperſed Roman ſhips of burden (for the Gallies, by force of Oars, recovered the ſtation whereto their camp adjoyned) and bring them into Carthage; which was done. Scipio was hereat much offended: not only for the loſs; and for that the Town was thereby relieved: but for that by this breach of Truce, he foreſaw the intention of the Carthaginians to renew the war, and put him to more trouble. Wherefore he ſent Embaſſadors unto them, both to require ſatisfaction for the injurie done; and to deterr them from entertaining any other hope, than in the peace which they had ſo much deſired. Theſe gave the Carthaginians to underſtand, that Letters were come from Rome unto Scipio, with allowance to conclude the Peace; upon thoſe conditions which he had propounded. But (ſay they) we hold it ſtrange, That ye, who ſo lately have caſt your ſelves to the ground before us, and kiſſed our feet after an unuſual manner of humility, confeſſing your ſelves to have perfidiouſly broken the League that was between us, and thereby to have deſerved ſuch puniſhment as is due unto Rebels; ſhould ſo ſoon forget what ye then uttered, and run headlong again into the ſame crimes for which ye acknowledged your ſelves worthy to be deſtroyed, having only recourſe unto our mercy. We are not ignorant, that it is the confidence which ye repoſe in Hannibal, that thus emboldens you. Yet were it not amiſs, that ye ſhould conſider, how long he hath been pent up in a corner of Italy, among the Brutians; where he is in a manner beſieged, and unable to ſtir: ſo that ye are like to find his help wanting in your greateſt need. Or let it be ſuppoſed that he were now in Africk, and ready to give us battel: yet ſhould it well agree with your wiſdome to doubt what might befal, remembring that he is a man, and not invincible. Now if it ſhould happen that he were overcome, what refuge have ye left unto your ſelves againſt hereafter? What gods will ye either ſwear by, to be believed, or call upon in your miſery? What words, and lamentable geſture will ye henceforth uſe, to move compaſſion? Surely ye have already waſted all your force of perſwaſion, and ſhall not again deceive us, if ye refuſe the grace, whereof at this preſent ye are capable. It is no marvel though the Carthaginians were angry, when they heard themſelves upbraided with the baſe demeanour of their Embaſſadours. For it was not the general opinion of the City, that the Truce was broken by themſelves: though it had pleaſed Hanno, or ſuch as were of his faction, to gratifie the Romans with all manner of ſubmiſſion; and to renounce not only their hope of the future, but all juſtification of matters paſt. And indeed it ſeems, that the Roman Embaſſadors were very much delighted, in the rehearſal of that point which was yielded unto them, as knowing that thereon depended the juſtice of the quarrel. But the Carthaginians took this in ſo ill part, that hardly they could refrain from doing violence unto the men, who had uſed unto them ſuch inſolent ſpeeches. Yet the fury of the multitude was in ſome ſort appeaſed; either by Hanno, whom Appian, (I know not why) calls Hanno the Great: or by the very reverence, due unto the place of thoſe that had uttered ſuch liberal words. So they were diſmiſſed in friendly ſort, although it were without anſwer to their Propoſition. There were alſo two gallies appointed for their ſafe convoy home; though with little intent of good unto their perſons. Aſdrubal was then in the mid-way, as men ſailed from Carthage towards Utica. He, whether only deſirous to pleaſe the multitude, of whoſe diſpoſition he was informed, or whether directed by publick order to cut off theſe Embaſſadours in their way homeward, lay waiting for them behind a Cape, that was a little beyond the mouth of the River Bagradas. Their Convoy having brought them on the way, as far as to the mouth of Bagradas, wiſhed them a good voyage; and ſo took leave of them, as if they had been then in ſafety, ſince the Roman Camp was even in ſight. The Embaſſadors took this in ill part; not as fearing any danger toward, but thinking themselves too much neglected, forasmuch as their attendants did so abruptly leave them. But no sooner had they doubled the Cape, than Asdrubal fell upon them, in such manner, as they might well discern his purpose: which was to have stemmed them. They rowed hard therefore: and being in a Quinquireme, that had more banks of Oars, than had any Gallye of Asdrubal, they slipt away, and made him over-shoot himself. Yet he gave them chase, and had well-near surprised them. But they discovered some Roman Companies on the shoar over against them, and therefore adventured to run their Vessel aground: whereby they saved their own lives, though a great part of their company were slain, or hurt. This practice of the Carthaginians was inexcusable: and for the same cause perhaps were the Citizens heartned in such a dishonourable attempt, by those that were desirous to continue the war; that thereby they might be driven to study nothing else, than how to get the victory, as having none other hope remaining. Yet likely it is, that the same fear, which had caused them to make such earnest suit for peace, would also have caused them to be better advised, than thus to abandon all hope of Treaty; had they not been given to understand, that Hannibal was already landed in Africk, in whom they reposed no small confidence, but verily perswaded themselves, that he would change their fortune, and teach the Romans to hold themselves contented with more easie conditions, than were those that Scipio, in the pride of his fortune, had of late propounded.

§. XX.

In what sort Hannibal spent the time after the Battle of Metaurus: The doings of Mago in Italy. Hannibal and Mago called out of Italy. How the Romans were diversly affected by Hannibals departure.

EVer since the loss of that battel at Metaurus, Hannibal remaining in the Country of the Brutians, waiting for another supply from Carthage. The Roman Consuls that succeded unto Claudius and Livius, by whom Asdrubal was overcome and slain, were contented to be quiet all their year. Neither did Licinius the Colleague of Scipio, ought worthy of remembrance against Hannibal, being hindred by the Pestilence that was in his Army. Sempronius the Consul, who followed Licinius; and Cn. Servilius Capio, who followed Sempronius, were earnestly bent to have done somewhat: but their diligence was in a manner fruitless. In some skirmishes with Hannibal, they had the better; in some the worse: and a few poor Towns they got from him, as it were by stealth; his care being more to preserve his Army, than to keep those places that were weak.

The Romans had at this time so many great pieces of work in hand, that their chief enemy was become not the chief part of their care. Their thoughts were mainly bent upon Africk, wherein they were at no small charges to maintain the Army, which (as was hoped) should bring the War to a short and happy conclusion. They stood nevertheless in much fear of Mago, the brother of Hannibal: who took exceeding pains among the Ligurians and Gauls to raise an Army, wherewith to kindle anew the War in Italy, that began to wax cold. Mago solicited also the Hetrurians, and found them so ready to stir in his behalf, that if he could have entred their Country strong, it might have proved no less needful for Scipio to return home out of Africk, than shortly it was for Hannibal to make speed unto the defence of Carthage. These dangers caused the Romans to imploy one of their Consuls or Pro-consuls, with an Army, among the Hetrurians; another among the Gauls; and a third among the Ligurians: forasmuch as it was uncertain, upon which side Mago would break on: Being thus busied, it is no wonder though they forbore to overcharge Hannibal with any great power.

As for Mago, when things were in some readiness for his setting forwards, he met in the Country of the Insubrians, which is about Milan, with M. Cornelius the Roman Proconsul, and P. Quintilius Varrus one of the Prætors. With these he fought a battel, wherein though his vertue shewed it self worthy of his Father and Brethren: yet his fortune was Carthaginian. The fight continued a long while doubtful; in such sort that the Roman Commanders began to distrust the issue. Wherefore Quintilius the Prætor taking unto him all the Roman Horse, thought to have shaken the Enemies to pieces. The Legions at the same time gave a loud shout: and strained themselves hard, as if at that brunt the victory should have been carried before them. But Mago opposed his Elephants to the Horse: the service of those beasts being fitter for such use, than against the squadrons of Foot. The figure, sent, and braying of these Elephants, did so affright the Horse, that they started aside, and were scattered ſcattered over the field; their Riders being unable to manage them. Hereby the Numidians got advantage upon them: whoſe manner of fight was more available againſt thoſe that were looſe, than againſt the troops that were cloſe and thick. Then fell the Elephants upon the Legions: which entertained them after the accuſtomed manner, with a ſhour of darts, and killed four of them; cauſing all the reſt to give back. This notwithſtanding the ſame Legions were ſo vehemently preſſed by the Enemy; that more for ſhame of running away, than by any great force to make reſiſtance, they held their ground. The Proconſul therefore brought up thoſe forces, which he had kept unto the laſt, to ſuccour where need ſhould moſt require. Againſt theſe, Mago imployed ſome of his Gauls, whom he had in readineſs for the like occaſion. But the Gauls diſcharged their parts very ill. They were ſoon beaten off, and recoiled ſo haſtily, that they brought fear upon all the reſt. When Mago ſaw that his men began to ſhrink, he put himſelf in the head of his Army; and held them ſo well to it, that keeping their order, they made a fair Retrait, with their faces toward the Enemy. But at length he received a grievous wound in his thigh; whereof ſhortly after he dyed. He was taken up, and carried out of danger by ſome of his own men: the reſt of them, after little further reſiſtance, provided every one for himſelf: So the Romans obtained victory, not without great coſt: as purchaſing the death of about five thouſand enemies, with the loſs of two thouſand and three hundred of the Prætors Army, beſides thoſe that dyed of the Proconſuls Legions; alſo beſides divers Colonels, Captains, and Gentlemen of mark that fell in this hot piece of ſervice. Neither were there any priſoners taken; whereby it may ſeem that the Enemies did not fall to rout, before they had recovered ſome ground that might aſſure them from purſuit. However it were, this victory would have much imported for the aſſurance of Italy, if the State of Carthage could longer have permitted theſe valiant ſons of Amilcar to abide therein. But Mago with-drawing himſelf (by eaſie journeys, becauſe of his wound) into Liguria, found there Embaſſadours from Carthage attending him: who gave him to underſtand the pleaſure of their City, which was, That both he and Hannibal ſhould preſently repair home with all their forces; not ſtaying any longer to think upon the conqueſt of Italy, ſince Carthage it ſelf was ready to be loſt. He obeyed this Commandment, and imbarqued ſhortly his Army; but dyed of his wound about Sardinia, in the way homewards.

About the ſame time Hannibal received the like command from Carthage, to return into Africk. He heard it with great impatience; gnathing his teeth, and groaning, and hardly keeping in the tears, that were ready to burſt out, whileſt the Embaſſadours were delivering their errand. When their meſſage was done: He told them, that this was yet plain dealing. For, ſaid He, They that now directly bid me come home, have long ago done their beſt to hale me out of Italy; though more cloſely and crookedly they went to work, by ſtopping the ſupply that ſhould have enabled me to manage the War here. Scipio therefore ſhall not need to brag, that he hath drawn me home by the heels: it is Hanno that hath wrought this noble feat; and overwhelmed the houſe of the Barchines, for lack of other means to do it, with the ruine of Carthage. He had before prepared a Fleet in readineſs, doubting that which after came to paſs: wherein he imbarqued, beſides his own men, as many of the Italians as were content to be partakers of his fortune. Many there were that ſhrunk back from him, and refuſed to do ſervice in this expedition: of whom, ſuch as he could take, he ſlew; not ſparing thoſe that fled into the Temple of Juno Lacinia, which had been held an inviolable Sactuary unto that day. He was indeed then wholly tranſported with rage; and departed out of Italy no leſs paſſionate, than men are wont to be, when they leave their own Countreys to go into exile. He looked back unto the ſhoar accuſing both gods and men; and curſing his own dulneſs, in that he had not led his Army from Cannæ, hot and bloodyed as it was, directly unto the walls of Rome. With ſuch vexation of ſpirit He quitted the poſſeſſion of Italy; wherein he had lived almoſt half his time.

If it could have been foretold unto the Romans; in the firſt beginning of this War, with what exceeding joy in times following they ſhould entertain the news of Hannibal his departure out of Italy: they would (I think) leſs earneſtly have preſſed the Carthaginians to ſend him over thither. When ſure advertiſement was brought unto the City, that Hannibal was gone with all his Army: an Holy-day was appointed for thanksgiving unto their gods; and extraordinary great ſacrifices publickly made, for joy of ſuch happy tydings. Yet old Q. Fabius was of opinion, That the danger did ſtill remain the ſame, though the place were changed: for that Hannibal at his coming into Africk, would find P. Scipio other manner of work, than he had been troubled with at any time before; and would do greater matters in his own Country, than ever he was able to perform abroad in a land of ſtrangers. The remove of the War from their own doors, and the conceit of that victory for which they hoped; was enough to make them preſume further, than at other times they would have done. When therefore the Saguntine Embaſſadors brought unto them a great maſs of Gold and Silver, together with ſome Agents of the Carthaginians taken by them in Spain: only the Carthaginian priſoners were excepted, the treaſure was rendred back unto the Saguntines that had ſurpriſed it. Upon like confidence of the future, a little before this, order was taken for the repayment of thoſe monys that had been borrowed in time of more neceſſity from private men. Hence alſo proceeded the ſevere chaſtiſement laid upon thoſe 12. Colonies, that for want either of means, or of good will, had refuſed to give aid to the Romans. They were commanded, and inforced to give double the number of Foot to that which they had been wont to ſet out for the Wars, with a proportion of Horſe anſwerable to the very moſt of their ability. So confident were the Romans grown (though their wealth were not as yet ſuitable to the greatneſs of their ſpirit) upon the good ſucceſs of the battel at Metaurus, and the hopes which they repoſed in Scipio. All this notwithſtanding, when they conſidered more nearly of that which might happen: and were informed that the terrible Army, whereof Italy had been few dayes ſince diſcharged, was landed ſafe in Africk: they began to revolve a thouſand fearful matters in their heads, and to ſtand in doubt, leſt Q. Fabius (who died about the ſame time) would be found a true Prophet. For, bethinking themſelves of that which might comfort them in their hopes: they found in the victories againſt Syphax and Aſdrubal no ſpecialty of ſo great worth, as might promiſe the like ſucceſs againſt another manner of General, followed by other manner of men, than were either of thoſe two. The Numidian King had been wont to bring into the field a raſcal multitude of half ſkullions, that were good for nothing; being himſelf a fit Captain for ſuch Souldiers. Likewiſe Aſdrubal the ſon of Geſco was a Commander well thought of by the Carthaginian Senate, but otherwiſe, one, that in the field was only good at ſaving himſelf by a ſwift retrait. But now there came an Army of men, hardened from their childhood with incredible patience, fleſhed many hundred times in Roman blood, and wearing the ſpoils, not only of good Souldiers, but of brave Captains, by them ſlain. Such talk uſed the people of Rome, ſaying, That Scipio was like to meet in battel with many that had ſlain Roman Prætors, yea, and Conſuls with their own hands: with many that had been firſt in getting over the Trenches of ſeveral Roman Camps, or in winning the tops of walls at the ſiege of towns; briefly, that he ſhould now be oppoſed by an Army, as good as ever had ſerved in war, and following the dreadful name of Hannibal.

Hannibal in Africk prepares to fight with Scipio; treats with him about peace in vain: loſeth a battel at Nedagra, and perſwades the Carthaginians to ſue for peace. Of the peace garnted from Rome to Carthage.

HAnnibal diſembarqued his Army at Leptis, almoſt an hundred miles from Carthage, Eaſtward from the Headland of Mercury, and ſomewhat more than one degree to the South. He was ill provided of Horſe; which it was not eaſie for him to tranſport out of Italy. Therefore it behoved him to land, as he did, ſomewhat far from the enemy; that he might furniſh himſelf of theſe and the like needful helps againſt the day of battel. From Leptis he paſſed on to Adrumetum, and ſo along through the Inland Country gathering friends unto him by the way. Tychæus a Numidian Prince, and familiar friend of Syphax, was ſaid to have in thoſe dayes the beſt Horſes of ſervice, that were to be found in Africk. Him therefore did Hannibal allure unto his party: making him underſtand, that if the Romans got the victory, it ſhould be eaſie for Maſaniſſa, by their countenance and help to oppreſs both him, and as many other of the neighbour Princes, as hindred his proſpect. This argument, and the fame of him that uſed it, prevailed with Tychæus; who ſhortly after brought unto the Carthaginian two thouſand Horſe. Appian further adds, That Mezetullus, (the ſame who had made himſelf Protector over Maſaniſſa his Couſins; and was Head of a Family, and adverſe to the Numidian Kings of that race) brought to Hannibal another thouſand Horſe: as likewiſe, that Vermina the Son of Syphax, holding a great part of his Fathers Kingdom, began at the ſame time to aſſail the places that yielded obedience to Maſaniſſa. This Vermina, as we find in Livie, came with more than 16. thouſand men (for he loſt more than than ſo many) to ſuccour Hannibal when it was too late.

The Carthaginians were at this time in ſuch hard eſtate, or (at leaſt) ſo impatient of the ſtate wherein they were ; that they could not attend the leiſure of thoſe preparations, which would have made the victory aſſured. When they conſidered the worth of Hannibal, and the greatneſs of his Acts : it offended them to think, that they had been ſo baſe as to make humble ſuit unto the Romans for peace ; whileſt they had ſuch a brave Champion alive, to maintain their cauſe by War. But when as they bethought themſelves of their own ſufferings, which, for want of Roman magnanimity to endure them, appeared greater than indeed they were : then cried they out earneſtly that it was no time to linger, but preſently to fight ; that ſo they might ſee an end of theſe troubles, either good or bad ; and to this purpoſe they ſent their Mandates to Hannibal : requiring him without any further protraction, to do what he could do out of hand. Hannibal made anſwer, That they were his good Lords, and had power to diſpoſe of him and his Army ; but ſince he was General of their forces, He thought it reaſonable that they ſhould ſuffer him to do as a General ought to do ; and to chooſe his own times. Nevertheleſs, to give them ſatisfaction, He made great marches to Zama ; and there encamped.

The breach of Truce made by the Carthaginians : the violence done to his Embaſſadours : and the news of Hannibal his being landed in Africk, made Scipio to underſtand the reſolution of the Carthaginians, which was, not to yield unto any conditions unprofitable for themſelves, as long as they were able to make reſiſtance. Wherefore he ſent unto Maſaniſſa : and informed him of all that was fallen out ; praying him to come away with ſpeed, and lay all other buſineſs apart. Ten Roman Companies, of Horſe and Foot together, Maſaniſſa had with him ; that were lent unto him by Scipio, to do him ſervice in the eſtabliſhing and inlarging of his Kingdom. But he well underſtood, that thoſe and many more beſides all his own forces, would but little avail him ; if Hannibal ſhould drive the Romans out of Africk. Wherefore taking ſuch order as he could upon the ſudden, for the ſafety of his own Kingdome ; with four thouſand Horſe, and ſix thouſand Foot, he made all haſte unto Scipio.

Soon after the beginning of theſe new troubles, the Carthaginian Embaſſadours that had been at Rome, returned back under the conduct of Lælius and Fulvius, who brought them ſave into the Roman Camp. There when they arrived and underſtood what had lately paſſed, eſpecially how their Citizens had behaved themſelves towards the Roman Embaſſadours : they made little doubt, how their own heads ſhould anſwer for ſuch notorious outrage. To confirm them in this opinion,

M. Bæbius one of the late Embaſſadours that had been in Carthage, being left by Scipio to take charge of the Camp, laid hands upon them and detained them ; ſending word unto his General, who was gone abroad to make War in the Country, that he had them in his power, and that now the Carthaginians might be repaid in their own Coyn, for the iujury by them lately done. Scipio was very glad to hear of this ; and commanded Bæbius to uſe them with all poſſible courteſie, and ſend them ſafe home. By thus doing, He brake the hearts of his enemies ; and cauſed them to acknowledge themſelves (which was a great victory) far leſs honourable than the Romans. This notwithſtanding, he made more cruel War upon them than before : taking their Towns by force ; and putting them to ſack, without hearkning to any Compoſition. It was the manner of the Romans, as often as they took a Town by aſſault, to put all that came in their way to the ſword, whatſoever they were, without regard. This they did, to make themſelves terrible : and the better to work ſuch impreſſion in the minds of thoſe, with whom they had to do ; they uſed oftentimes to kill the very Dogs and other Beaſts, that ran athwart them in the ſtreets : hewing their bodies aſunder : as men delighted in ſhedding of blood. This being their practice at other times ; it is likely that now they omitted no piece of cruelty ; when they meant to give proof of their vehement indignation, and revengful minds, for the injuries received. Hence it partly grew, that the Carthaginians were ſo earneſt in preſſing Hannibal to fight. Excerp. Polyb. lib. 10.

Hannibal being incamped at Zama, ſent forth his Scouts and Spies, to diſcover where the Romans lay, what they were adoing, and as much as might be, of their demeanour. Some of theſe were taken, and brought unto Scipio : who inſtead of truſſing them up, gave them free leave to view his Camp at pleaſure, appointing one to conduct them up and down, and ſhew them whatſoever they deſired. This done, He gave them leave to depart ; and ſent them away ſafe unto their General. Hannibal underſtanding this, admired the bravery and courage rage of his enemy: with whom on the ſudden he grew ſo deſirous to have an Enterview, and perſonal conference; and ſignified ſo much unto him by a meſſenger ſent of purpoſe. Of this motion the Roman liked well: and returned anſwer, that He would meet him ſhortly in a place convenient. The next day Maſaniſſa came with his Army: whom Scipio taking with him, removed unto a Town callad Nedagara; near unto which he ſat down, in a place otherwiſe commodious, & cloſe by a water that might opportunely ſerve his Camp. Thence he ſent word unto the Carthaginian, That the time and place did fitly ſerve, if he had ought to ſay to him. Hannibal thereupon removed from Zama, and came within four miles of the enemy; where he incamped well to his own good liking in all things elſe; excepting that his men were driven to take much pains, in fetching their water ſomewhat far off. Then was order taken for their meeting: aud the two Generals each of them with a troop of Horſe, rode forth of their Camps, till they came unto a piece of ground; which was before well ſearched for fear of ambuſh. There they will their followers to ſtand off: and themſelves with each of them one Interpreter, encountred each other in the mid-way between their Companies. They remained a while ſilent, viewing one the other with mutual admiration. Then began the Carthaginian, ſaluting the Roman, to deliver his mind to this effect: That it had been better both for Carthage, and Rome, if they could have limited and contained their ambition within the ſhores of Africk and of Italy; for that the Countreys of Sicil and Spain, about which their fathers and themſelves had ſtriven, were no ſufficient recompence for ſo many Fleets as had been loſt, and of ſo much blood as had been ſhed, in making thoſe coſtly purchaſes. But ſince things paſt could not be recalled: He ſaid, That it was meet for them to conſider, unto what extream dangers their own Cities had been expoſed, by the greedy deſire of extending their Empires abroad; and that it was even time for them now at length to make an end of their obſtinate contention, and pray the gods to endue them with greater wiſdom hereafter. And to ſuch peacable diſpoſition, He affirmed that his own years, and long tryal of Fortune, both good and evil, had made him inclinable. But much he feared, that Scipio, by want of the like experience, might rather fix his mind upon uncertain hopes, than upon a contemplation of that mutability, whereto all humane affairs are ſubject. Yet (ſaid he) mine own example may peradventure ſuffice to teach thee moderation. For I am that ſame Hannibal, who after my victory at Cannæ, won the greateſt part of Italy; and deviſed with my ſelf, what I ſhould do with your City of Rome, which I hoped verily to have taken. Once I brought mine Army to your walls, as thou haſt ſince brought thine to ours of Carthage: but now, ſee the change! I ſtand here intreating thee to grant us peace. This may ſerve as a document of Fortunes inſtability. I have fought with thy Father Scipio; He was the firſt of the Roman Generals that ever met me in the field. I did then little think, that the time would come, that I ſhould have ſuch buſineſs, as now at the preſent, with his ſon. But this is even one of Fortunes pageants, whereof ſhe hath many. And thou maiſt have experience of the like in thy ſelf, who knows how ſoon? Think upon M. Atilius: If he would have hearkned unto ſuch perſwaſions, as I now uſe to thee, he might have returned home to Rome an happy man, and ſo maiſt thou do now, if any reaſonable offer will give thee ſatisfaction. How ſaiſt thou? Canſt thou be contented, that all Spain, Sicil, Sardinia, and whatſoever Iſlands elſe are ſcituate between Italy and Africk be abandoned by the Carthaginians for ever, and left unto the Romans, to bear dominion therein? Thou ſhalt have glory enough by effecting thus much: and the Romans may well be glad of ſuch a bargain. As for us, our own quiet ſhall henceforth give us contentment. And the ſame contentment of ours, ſhall make us faithfully obſerve the peace with you. But if thou thinkeſt all too little, I muſt deſire thee to ponder well how great an hazzard thou muſt undergo for obtaining a very little more, than that which thou maiſt have without contention. It is now in thine own power to lay hold upon good fortune, if it pleaſe thee: ſtay but untill to morrow night, and thou maiſt take ſuch fortune as it pleaſe the Gods. The iſſue of battel is uncertain, and many times beguileth expectation. Men and ſteel we ſhall each of us bring into the field; but of the victory neither of us have aſſurance. Let us therefore without more ado make peace. And do not tell me that ſome falſ-hearted Citizens of ours dealt fraudently of late in the like treaty: It is I Hannibal that now deſire peace with thee, which I would never do, if I thought it not expedient for my Countrey. And thinking it expedient, I will alwaies maintain it, like as I have maintained, unto my power, as long as the Gods did not envy me, the war by me begun.

Hereunto Scipio made anſwer, That it was no ambitious deſire of ruling in Sicil and in

in Spain which had moved the Romans to enter into this or the former War: but that the defence of the Mamertines, and afterwards of the Saguntines, their confederates, had cauſed them to put on thoſe arms; which the gods by the final iſſue of the Wars had approved, and would approve to be moſt juſt. As for the mutability of Fortune, he ſaid, that he was not thereof ignorant; and that without any note of inſolence or overweening, he might well refuſe the conditions offered. For was it not plain that all theſe Countreys, with which the Carthaginians now ſo willingly departed, were already won from the Romans? If, ſaid he, theſe conditions had been propounded whileſt as yet ye detained ſome part of Italy, they might peradventure not have been rejected. But as the caſe now ſtands, I ſee no reaſon why I ſhould remit unto you any one piece of theſe my former demands to which the Carthaginians have yielded already, and thought me to be gracious in dealing ſo moderately. Rather I ſay, that the injuries which they have done me ſince, have made them unworthy of obtaining peace upon ſo friendly terms. But I cannot blame thee, Hannibal, though thou wouldſt be glad to make thy Citizens underſtand, from how much of their burden they are by thy means eaſed. Only thou muſt think, that in like ſort it concerns me in honour not to let them be gainers or ſavers by the wrongs which they have done of late. Thou knoweſt well, that beſides thoſe offers which thou here haſt made, they were well contented to reſtore unto us ranſome free, all priſoners that they have of ours, to pay us five thouſand talents, to deliver up their Gallies, and to deliver hoſtages for aſſurance of fair dealing, And muſt they now be diſcharged of all this by their breach of truce, their ſpoiling of our fleet, and their violating our Embaſſadours? Not ſo. But if they can be contented, beſides all this, to make ſuch amends as I ſhall require, for theſe injuries newly done; then will I take advice with my counſel what anſwer to give you; otherwiſe you may even prepare for war, and blame your own ſelves for that I have denied you peace.

Hereupon they brake off: and returned each to his own Camp, with no other news than war; bidding their Souldiers prepare for a battel, wherein ſhould be decided the quarrel between Rome and Carthage. The next morning at break of day they iſſued into the field: a notable march, and ſuch as hath very ſeldom been found: whether we regard the Generals, their Armies, the two Cities that contended, or the great importance of the battel at hand. Scipio ordered his men after the Roman manner: placing firſt the Haſtati, divided into their Maniples, or ſmall Battalions, with a reaſonable diſtance between them: Not far behind theſe followed the Principes, likewiſe divided; and ſo after them the Triarii. But herein Scipio altered a little the ordinary cuſtome of the Romans: He placed not the Maniples of his Principes oppoſite unto the void ſpaces between the Haſtati, that ſo the Haſtati, as was uſual, might fall back between the Principes; but he placed them directly one behind another, as it were, in File. This he did, becauſe of the Elephants, whereof Hannibal had many. For of thoſe beaſts the danger was leſs whileſt there was open way to let them through. Therefore he took ſuch order, that when they had paſſed through the ſpaces between the firſt Battalions, they ſhould not come upon the Principes in Front. Unto his Velites, or thoſe of the light armature that were to begin the fight he gave direction, that when they found themſelves to be overcharged, either by the Enemies; or (which was moſt to be feared) by the Elephants, they ſhould run back through thoſe lanes that were between the Maniples; and that thoſe which were ſwifteſt, or otherwiſe beſt able, ſhould continue on their flight, until they were got behind all their own Army; thereby leaving room enough unto thoſe that were wounded, or caſt behind, to ſave themſelves on the void ground, that was betwixt the firſt and ſecond, or the ſecond and third battels, without cloying up the way between the Maniples, which he deſired to keep open. His Italian horſe he placed in the left wing, under C. Lælius. In the right wing was Maſaniſſa with his Numidians. He himſelf riding up and down, exhorted his men to do valiantly; uſing words, not many, but forcible. He bad them remember what they had atchieved, ſince their coming into Africk. He told them, that if this day were theirs, the War was at an end: and that their victory in this War, ſhould make them Lords of all the World, for that afterwards, none would be found able to reſiſt them. On the contrary, if they were beaten, he aſked them whither they would flie. They were far from home, yea, and far from their own ſtanding Camp: neither was there any place in Africk, that would give them ſhelter: if they fell into the Carthaginians hands, they knew what to expect. And therefore there was none other way, but death or victory: unleſs they would live like wretched ſlaves under moſt mercileſs Enemies. In ſuch neceſſity he ſaid, that they which conſider themſelves to be, and take reſolution anſwerable thereunto, have never been known to fail of getting victory.

Hannibal on the other ſide placed his Elephants, that were more than fourſcore in Front of his Battle. Next behind theſe he made his Vant-guard all of Mercenaries, Ligurians, Gaules, Balcares and Moors. Then followed his Battel; which was of Carthaginians and Africans, more intereſſed in the quarrel than were thoſe Mercenaries; though not ſo good ſouldiers: but to help (if it might be) their want of courage, they had with them four thouſand Macedonians, lately ſent from King Philip. More than the ſpace of a furlong, behind theſe came his Rereward, conſiſting of thoſe brave Souldiers which had ſerved him in his Italian wars; and were the only men, in whom he repoſed any confidence. Oppoſite to Lælius, in his own right wing he beſtowed the Carthaginian Horſe. Tychæus and the Numidians he placed in his left wing againſt Maſaniſſa. He was indeed far too weak for the Enemy in Horſe, both in number and in goodneſs. For Tychæus and Mazetullus had no more than three thouſand; and thoſe not ſo well exerciſed, as were the four thouſand of Maſaniſſa. The Carthaginians alſo were no more, nor none other, than ſuch as could be levied in the haſte of a few dayes; and the remainder of thoſe, that had of late been often vanquiſhed, and accuſtomed to flye. But it was no time for Hannibal, neither had he perhaps authority, to make theſe his companions alight and ſerve on foot, ſetting better men in their ſaddles. All that he could have done, was to ſtay a little longer, and expect more help. Had Vermina the ſon of Syphax come thither, as he did in a few dayes after, with ſixteen thouſand and upwards, the moſt of them Horſe, the advantage of number might have ſerved well to ſupply all other defect. Yet ſince the Lords of Carthage would brook no delay, Hannibal muſt be fain to comfort himſelf with the hope that he repoſed in his old Italian ſouldiers; whoſe vertue had wrought greater wonders, when it was more ſtrongly oppoſed. He encouraged therefore his men, with words agreeable to their ſeveral conditions: promiſing unto the Mercenaries bountiful rewards; threatning the Carthaginians with inevitable ſervitude if they loſt that day: but eſpecially animating his old fellow-ſouldiers, by the many victories which they had obtained againſt far greater numbers. He bad them to look upon the Enemies and make an eſtimate, whether they were any thing like ſo many, as that huge Army which they had ſlaughtered at Cannæ. He willed them to remember, That it was one P. Scipio, even the father of this man, whom they had firſt of all compelled to run away. He told them, that theſe Legions, which they yonder beheld, were for the moſt part of them, the very worſt of the Roman Souldiers; even ſuch, as for their daſtardly flight out of ſundry battels, could no longer be truſted to bear Arms in their own Country. As for the reſt, they were young men, the ſons of Cowards, and bred up in the continual fear of thoſe weapons, by which their fathers were daily ſlain or chaſed. Wherefore he intreated theſe his old companions, upon whoſe vertue he meant wholly to repoſe himſelf, that they would this day ſtrive to make good their honour, and to purchaſe the fame of men invincible.

Such exhortations uſed the two Generals before the fight. When they drew near together, the Numidian horſemen on both ſides began to ſkirmiſh. The Trumpets and other inſtruments of war, ſounded to battel: and Hannibal commanded his Elephants to break upon the Romans. Of theſe Elephants (as they were alwayes an uncertain kind of help) thoſe that ſtood near unto the point of the left wing, turned back for fear: and ran upon their own Numidian horſe; which they affrighted and diſordered. Maſaniſſa eſpying this, gave charge upon the ſame Numidians; and not ſuffering them to rally themſelves, drave them quite out of the field. The reſt of thoſe beaſts made a great ſpoil of the Roman Velites, whom they followed into the ſpaces between the Maniples: but without any harm to the Battalions themſelves; which gave them open way, accordingly as Scipio had well provided. Divers of them receiving many wounds, and growing therewith furious, could no longer be governed, but ran back upon the right point of their own battel, and beyond that into the open field. Herewithal they diſordered the Carthaginian Horſe, which were in that wing: againſt whom they gave to Lælius the ſame advantage that Maſaniſſa had againſt the Numidians; which he uſed in like ſort. In the mean while, the battels of foot advanced, and drew near together with a ſlow and ſtately pace, till they were almoſt within a weapons caſt: at what time they gave a ſhout and ran one at the other. The Mercenaries for a time ſeemed both in audacity, and in quickneſs to have the better of the Romans; wounding many, and doing more harm, than they took. But the Roman diſcipline after a while prevailed againſt the boiſterous violence of theſe untrained Barbarians.

Where-

Whereunto it helped not a little, that the battel of the Principes, following ſomewhat near after the Haſtati, encouraged their fellows & ſhewed themſelvs ready, if need were, to relieve them. Contrariwiſe, the Mercenaries, received no manner of help or comfort, from thoſe that ſhould have ſeconded them. For the new-levied Carthagians and Africans, when they ſaw their hired ſouldiers give back, did alſo themſelves retire. This cauſed the Ligurians, Gaules, and the reſt, to think themſelves betrayed: whereupon they enclined unto flight. The Carthaginian Battel was herewith more terrified than before, ſo as it refuſed to give way unto the Mercenaries for their ſafe retreat; and yet withal forbore to make head againſt the Enemies, that purſued them. It was no time to aſk them what they meant by this: Fear and Indignation cauſed thoſe that were at once chaſed by the Romans, and betrayed, as they thought, by their own fellows, to turn their arms with an heedleſs fury againſt both the one and the other. Thus were many of the Carthaginians beaten down and ſlain, through their own indiſcretion, by their own Mercenaries. The Roman Haſtati in like ſort, fighting with deſperate men in a throng, had their hands ſo full of work, that the Principes were fain to come up unto them, and help to over-bear this great medley of enemies, that were together by the ears among themſelves. In this place was made a great ſlaughter, both of the Mercenaries and of the Carthaginians: which hindering one another, could neither fight, nor eaſily flye. Such of them as eſcaped, ran towards Hannibal: who kept his ground, and would not ſtir one foot, to help or ſave theſe Run-awayes. He cauſed his men to bend their Pikes at thoſe of his own ſide, that would have ruſhed upon him: whom he thereby compelled to turn aſide beyond his battel, and ſave themſelves in the open field. The ground over which, the Romans were now to march, ere they could meet with Hannibal, was covered with heaps of dead bodies and weapons; and ſo ſlippery with blood, that Scipio began to ſtand in great doubt, leſt the orders of his Battalions ſhould be diſſolved in paſſing that way. In ſuch caſe, if he ſhould fight with that warlike Army, which he ſaw before him, remaining yet entire, and without fear expecting him; He might be well aſſured to receive a notable overthrow. He cauſed therefore the Haſtati to make a ſtand there where they were, oppoſite to the main battel of the Hannibalians. Then drawing up his Principes and Triarii, he placed them, when they had overcome the bad way, all in one Front with the Haſtati, and made of them his two Cornets. This done, he advanced towards Hannibal: who entertained him after another manner, than ever he had been received in his life before. All the days work till now, ſeemed to have been a matter of paſtime, in regard of the ſharp Conflict, that was maintained between theſe notable Souldiers. The Romans were encouraged by their having prevailed all the day before: they were alſo far the more in number. But theſe old Souldiers of Hannibal were freſh; (and perhaps the better men.) They fought with ſuch obſtinate reſolution, that no man gave back one foot; but rather choſe to die on the ground whereon he ſtood. So that, after a long time it was uncertain which part had the worſe: unleſs it may ſeem, that the Romans were beginning to ſhrink; foraſmuch as the return of Maſaniſſa and Lælius from purſuit of the Enemies Horſe, is ſaid to have been moſt happy, and in a needful time. Theſe upon a ſudden charged the Hannibalians in the Rear; and over-bearing them by meer violence, compelled them to fall to Rout. * Excerpt. è Polyb. l. 15.

In this battel there dyed of the Romans fifteen hundred and upwards: on the Carthaginian ſide, above twenty thouſand; beſides as many that were taken; of whom, Sopater Captain of the Macedonians was one. The ſingular ſkill that Hannibal ſhewed in this his laſt fight, is highly commended by Polybius; and was acknowledged, as Livie reports, by Scipio himſelf. But the Enemies were too ſtrong for him in Horſe: and being enjoyned, as he was, by the State of Carthage, to take battel with ſuch diſadvantage, he could work no marvels. He ſaved himſelf with a few horſe; and ſtayed not in his journey, till he came Adrumetum. Thence he was ſent for to Carthage; from which he had been abſent ſix and thirty years. At his coming into the Senate, He ſaid plainly, That there was none other way left, than to take ſuch peace as could be gotten. Wherefore the Carthaginians not knowing what other courſe to take, reſolved to ſend Embaſſadors again, and try the favour of Scipio, whoſe Arms they could not now reſiſt.

Scipio having ſpoiled the Enemies Camp, returned back to Utica: where he found P. Lentulus newly arrived, with fifty Gallies and an hundred Ships of burden. With this Fleet, and that which he had before, He thought it beſt to make towards Carthage: rather of purpoſe to terrifie the City, than with any hope to take it. His Legions he committed unto Cn. Octavius; whom he willed to meet him there by land. Then sending Lælius away to Rome with news of the victory, set sail from Utica towards Carthage. He was encountred on the way by ten Embassadors from the City: who bearing up with the Admiral Gally, began to use the pittiful gesture of suppliants. But they received none other answer, than that they should meet him at Tunes, where he would give them audience. So rowing along before the City, and viewing it more in bravery, than with meaning to attempt it; he returned back to Utica, and called back Octavius thither, with whom in person he set forwards to Tunes. As they were in their journy thither, they heard the news, that Vermina the son of Syphax, was coming with an Army of more horse than foot, to the succour of those that were already vanquished. This Vermina seems to have been both careless of getting intelligence how things passed, and very defective in all other duties requisite in the Commander of an Army. Part of the Roman foot, with all their power of Horse, was sent against him: which did not only beat him, but so compass him in, that he hardly escaped himself with a few; leaving fifteen thousand of his followers dead behind him, and twelve hundred taken prisoners. If this good company had been with Hannibal at Nadagara, they should have been far better conducted, and might well have changed the Fortune of the day; which the Carthaginian lost by default of Horse. But God had otherwise determined. It is not to be doubted, that this victory, though it were no great access unto the former; yet served well to daunt the Carthaginians, and imprint in them the greater fear of Scipio. When he came to Tunes, there met him thirty Embassadors from Carthage: whose behaviour, though it was more pittiful than it had been before, yet procured it less commiseration, by reason of their late false dealing, after they had in like sort humbled themselves. Nevertheless it was considered, what a long and laborious work it would prove, to besiege the mighty City of Carthage. And particularly, Scipio stood in great doubt, lest the honour of this war, if it were protracted, should be taken out of his hands, and given to one of the Consuls. Cn. Servilius Cæpio, that Consul who had charge of the war against Hannibal at such time as he departed out of Italy: was bold to pass over into the Isle of Sicil (as it were in chase of Hannibal by him terrified and driven away) with a purpose thence to have proceeded into Africk, and taken from Scipio the command of the Army there. But a Dictator was chosen of purpose, to restrain the ambition of this Consul Servilius. After him followed Tiberius Claudius, who made suit for the same Province of Africk: and was therein so earnest, that though neither the Senate, nor People, would grant him his desire; yet he needs would be going, procuring only leave of the Senate, that be being Consul might join with Scipio, were it with no more than equal authority. But ere he could have his Fleet, and all things in a readiness for the journy, wherein no man cared to further him, Winter came on, and he was only tost at Sea with foul weather; first upon the Coast of Hetruria, and afterwards by Sardinia; where his Consulship expired, and so he returned home a private man. Then came the joyful news to Rome, of the victory obtained against Hannibal, and that the war was now even at an end. Yet was Lentulus the new Consul so passionate, in desiring Africk for his Province, that he said he would suffer nothing to pass in the Senate, until he had first his will. Much ado there was about this: and after many contentions, both in the Senate, and before the people, at last it was ordered, That if peace were granted, it should be granted by Scipio; if the war continued, Scipio should have command therein by Land, and the Consul at Sea. The ambition of these men, caused Scipio to give the more favourable answer unto the Carthaginian Embassadors. He willed them to consider what they had deserved: and in regard thereof, to think themselves well dealt withal; in that he was contented to leave unto them their liberty and their own Laws, without appointing any Governour over them, or Garrison to hold them in subjection; leaving also unto them their possessions in Africk, such as they were at the beginning of this war. As touching the rest he was at a point, that, before he either granted them peace or truce, they should make satisfaction for wrongs which they had done, whilst the late Treaty was in dependance. Hereunto if they would yield, then required, He, That immediately they should deliver up to the Romans all prisoners, fugitives, and renegado's, that they had of theirs: likewise all their Gallies, excepting ten: and all their Elephants. That they should make no war at all thenceforth out of Africk, neither yet within Africk, without licence of the Romans: That the Countrys, Towns, goods whatsoever, belonging any wise unto Masanissa, or to any of his Ancestors, which were in their possession, should be all by them restored unto him: That they should find corn for the Roman Army, and wages for their

Auxiliaries

Auxiliaries, during the time of Truce, untill the Peace were fully concluded; that they should pay ten thousand Talents of Silver, in the term of fifty years, by two hundred Talents a year, and that for observance of Conditions, they should give an hundred hostages: such as Scipio would choose, being none of them under fourteen years of age, nor above thirty.

With these conditions the Embassadours returned home, and reported them unto the City. They were very unpleasing; and therefore one Gesco stood up to speak against them: and exhorted the people, who gave good attention, that they should not condescend unto such intolerable demands. But Hannibal perceiving this, and noting withal what favourable audience was given to this vain Oratour, by the unquiet, yet unwarlike multitude, was bold to pull him down from his standing, by plain force. Hereat all the people murmured, as if their common liberty were too much wronged, by such insolence of this presumptuous Captain. Which Hannibal perceiving, rose up and spake unto them, saying; That they ought to pardon him, if he had done otherwise than the customes of the City would allow; forasmuch as he had been thence absent ever since he was a Boy of nine years old, until he was now a man of five and forty. Having thus excused himself of the disorder, he discoursed unto them concerning the Peace: and perswaded them to accept it, as wanting ability to defend themselves, had the Demands of the Enemy been yet more rigorous. Finally, upon good advice they resolved to yield unto the Conditions propounded by Scipio: to whom they paid out of hand five and twenty thousand pounds weight in Silver, in recompence of damages, and injuries by them done to his Fleet and Embassadours. Scipio granted them Truce for three moneths, in which time they might negotiate with the State of Rome, about confirmation of the League. But herewithal he gave injunction, that they should neither in the mean while send Embassadours any whither else, nor yet dismiss any Embassadours to them sent, without first making him acquainted what they were, and what their errand was.

At this time Hanno, and they of his Faction, were become wise and honourable men, by the miseries whereinto Carthage was fallen, through their malicious counsels. Asdrubal, surnamed the Kid, a venerable man, and a great friend of Hanno, was chief of the Embassages which they sent to Rome for obtaining peace. They went thither in company of Scipio his Embassadours, who related unto the Senate and People these joyful news. About the same time arrived at Rome Embassadours from Philip King of Macedon: who, together with the Carthaginians, were fain to wait a while for audience, till the election of new Consuls, then in hand was finished; and order taken, for the Provinces of them, and the new Prætors. Then were the Macedonian Embassadours called into the Senate: who first answering unto some points, wherein the Romans had lately signified unto their King, that they found themselves grieved; returned the blame upon those Greeks themselves, that had made their complaint at Rome. Then accused they Marcus Aurelius: who being one of the three Embassadours, that had lately been sent from Rome unto King Philip, tarried in Greece behind his fellows, and there levying men, made war upon the King, without any regard at all of the league, that was between him and the Romans. Further they desired of the Senate, That one Sopater, a Macedonian Gentleman, with other of their Countrymen, that had lately served Hannibal for Pay; and being taken prisoners in Africk, were kept in bonds by Scipio, might be released and delivered unto them. Unto all this M. Furius, whom Aurelius had sent to Rome for that purpose, made a sharp answer. He said, that the Greeks, which were confederate with Rome, enduring so many injuries at the hands of Philip, that M. Aurelius was fain to stay behind, to help them as he might; which else were like to be brought under the Kings subjection. As for Sopater, he affirmed him to be one of the Kings Counsel, and very inward with him: one that served not for money, but carryed money with him, and four thousand men, sent from the King to the aid of Hannibal. About these points, when the Macedonian Embassadours could make unto the Senate no good answer, they were willed to return, and tell their Master, That war he sought, and war he should find, if he proceeded as he had begun. For in two main points He had broken the League, that was between him and the Romans: first, in that he had wronged their Confederates; and secondly, in that he had aided their Enemies against them, with men and money.

These quarrels with Philip, that promised to open a way into Greece and the Eastern Countreys, helped well the Carthaginian Embassadours in their solicitation of Peace. They appeared a very reverend company, when they entred into the Senate: and Asdrubal above the rest was much respected, as one, one, whose good offices had kept the Romans from necessity of sending Embassadours to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the justice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Romans side; saying, that it was the fault of some violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuse the City, that had been too vehement in the prosecution of bad counsel. But if Hanno, and himself might have had their wills, the Carthaginians, even at the best of their Fortune, should have granted the peace, which they now desired. Herewithal he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no small argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had been victorious. To the same effect spake the rest of the Embassadours: all of them entreating to have the peace ratified; though some with more lamentable words than others, according to the diversity of their stile. They had patience enough to endure such reproof of Perjury, as they themselves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been such as the Romans was. Among the rest, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would swear to keep the peace hereafter: Asdrubal made answer; Even by the same gods, that are so severe unto those that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Consul, interposing the authority of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto conclusion of peace; for that hereby he was like to lose the honour, which he purposed to get by making war in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom rested the Soveraign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleasure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, sent unto him from Rome of purpose, should make a League with the Carthaginians, upon such Conditions as seemed best: which were none other, than the same which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embassadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might visit their Countrymen, which were prisoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ransome and carry home with them some that were their especial friends; of whom they gave in writing almost two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of those Prisoners, which the Embassadours would choose, should be sent over into Africk, and be freely restored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in commission.

At their coming into Africk, the peace was given, and accepted, without any controversie or disputation. The Prisoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewise the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon those of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the first payment of their money, the Carthaginians were somewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treasury could have spared two hundred Talents for the present; yet since the pension was annual, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the sum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; so as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwise, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which, when he was checked by Asdrubal Hædus, and told, That it worst of all beseemed him to laugh, since he had been the cause why all others did weep; He answered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from joy; but sometimes from extreamity of indignation: Yet, said He, My laughter is more seasonable, and less absurd, than your tears. For ye should have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the use of arms, without the good leave of the Romans first obtained. This miserable condition keeps us under, and holds us in assured servitude. But of these matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purses, ye have thereof some sense. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye shall acknowledge, that it was the very least part of your misery for which ye have shed these tears. Thus discoursed Hannibal unto those, who tasting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counsel, repented when it was too late; and instead of cursing their own disorders, which had bred this grievous disease, accused the Physician, whose noble endevours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Masanissa, and magnified him in presence of the Army, with high commendations not undeservedly. To him also he consigned over those towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that present held; wherein, to say truth, he gave him but his due; and that that which otherwise he knew not well how to bestow. But the love of the Romans, and friendship of Scipio, was fully answerable, now and hereafter, to all the deservings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there rested no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themselves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lylibæum, Scipio with some part of his Army took his way home to Rome by Land; and sent the rest before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no less glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he passed along. He entred the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with so great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time shortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dying soon after in prison; or whether he were dead a while before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, that it was a barbarous custome of the Romans, to insult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumeliously in Triumph; yea, though they were such, as had always made fair and courteous war. But hereof we shall have better example ere the same age pass. It was neither the person of Syphax, nor any other glory of the spectacle, that so much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous war past, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope that ever they should set Italy free. This made them look chearfully upon the Author of so great a conversion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: stiling him by the name of that Province, which he had subdued. This honourable kind of surname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was usurped by men of less desert: especially by many of the Cæsars, who sometimes arrogated unto themselves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if such glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip the father of Perseus King of Macedon; his first Acts and War with the Romans, by whom he was subdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the East-Countreys, and desirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Ætolians over-run Peloponnesus. Philip and his Associates make War against the Ætolians. Alteration of the state in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

OF the great similitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath been assigned as a probable cause. For since Nature is confined unto a subject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature must needs be finite, and many of them resemble one the other. Now in those actions, that seem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are less to wonder, if we find less variety: since it is no great portion of things which are obnoxious unto humane power; and since they are the same affections, by which the wills of sundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be observed in the change of Empires, before those times whereof we now write, how the Assyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thousand Foot, and threescore thousand Horse; but failing in their intended conquest, they became subject within a while themselves unto the Medes and Persians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with such number of men, as might have seemed resistless. But after that the Persians were beaten home again, their Empire was never secure of the Greeks: who at all times of leisure from intestine War, devised upon that conquest thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander.

one, whoſe good offices had kept the Romans from neceſſity of ſending Embaſſadours to Carthage, upon the like errand. He liberally granted, that the juſtice of the quarrel had been wholly on the Romans ſide; ſaying, that it was the fault of ſome violent men, through which the Peace was broken. Yet could he not altogether excuſe the City, that had been too vehement in the proſecution of bad counſel. But if Hanno, and himſelf might have had their wills, the Carthaginians, even at the beſt of their Fortune, ſhould have granted the peace, which they now deſired. Herewithal he commended the moderation of the Romans, as no ſmall argument of their valour; by which alwayes they had been victorious. To the ſame effect ſpake the reſt of the Embaſſadours: all of them entreating to have the peace ratified; though ſome with more lamentable words than others, according to the diverſity of their ſtile. They had patience enough to endure ſuch reproof of Perjury, as they themſelves might have laid upon the Romans, if their diligence and fortune had been ſuch as the Romans was. Among the reſt, when one of the Senators demanded, by what gods they would ſwear to keep the peace hereafter: Aſdrubal made anſwer; Even by the ſame gods, that are ſo ſevere unto thoſe that violate their Leagues.

Lentulus the Conſul, interpoſing the authority of his office, would have hindred the Senate from proceeding unto concluſion of peace; for that hereby he was like to loſe the honour, which he purpoſed to get by making war in Africk. But the matter was propounded unto the people, in whom reſted the Soveraign Command of Rome; and by them referred wholly unto the pleaſure of the Senate. So it was decreed, That Scipio, with ten Delegates, ſent unto him from Rome of purpoſe, ſhould make a League with the Carthaginians, upon ſuch Conditions as ſeemed beſt: which were none other, than the ſame which he had already propounded. For this favour the Carthaginian Embaſſadours humbly thanked the Senate; and craved licence, that they might viſit their Countrymen, which were priſoners in Rome: afterwards, that they might ranſome and carry home with them ſome that were their eſpecial friends; of whom they gave in writing almoſt two hundred names. Whereupon the Senate ordained, that two hundred of thoſe Priſoners, which the Embaſſadours would chooſe, ſhould be ſent over into Africk, and be freely reſtored to liberty by Scipio, when the peace was fully concluded. So they took leave, and returned home, in company of the ten Delegates, that were appointed by the Senate to joyn with Scipio in commiſſion.

At their coming into Africk, the peace was given, and accepted, without any controverſie or diſputation. The Priſoners, Fugitives, and Renegado's, were delivered up to Scipio: likewiſe the Gallies, and the Elephants. Scipio took more vengeance upon the Renegado's than upon the Fugitives; and upon thoſe of the Romans, than upon the Latines, or other Italians. The Latines he beheaded: the Romans he crucified. About the firſt payment of their money, the Carthaginians were ſomewhat troubled. For though perhaps their common Treaſury could have ſpared two hundred Talents for the preſent; yet ſince the penſion was annual, and to continue fifty years: it was thought meet to lay the burden upon the Citizens. At the collection of the ſum there was piteous lamentation, as if now the Roman yoke had begun to pinch them; ſo as many, even of the Senators, could not forbear weeping. Contrariwiſe, Hannibal could not refrain from laughter. For which, when he was checked by Aſdrubal Hædus, and told, That it worſt of all beſeemed him to laugh, ſince he had been the cauſe why all others did weep; He anſwered, That laughter did not alwayes proceed from joy; but ſometimes from extreamity of indignation: Yet, ſaid He, My laughter is more ſeaſonable, and leſs abſurd, than your tears. For ye ſhould have wept when ye gave up your Ships and Elephants, and when ye bound your own hands from the uſe of arms, without the good leave of the Romans firſt obtained. This miſerable condition keeps us under, and holds us in aſſured ſervitude. But of theſe matters ye had no feeling. Now, when a little money is wrung out of your private purſes, ye have thereof ſome ſenſe. God grant that the time come not hereafter, wherein ye ſhall acknowledge, that it was the very leaſt part of your miſery for which ye have ſhed theſe tears. Thus diſcourſed Hannibal unto thoſe, who taſting the bitter fruits of their own malicious counſel, repented when it was too late; and inſtead of curſing their own diſorders, which had bred this grievous diſeaſe, accuſed the Phyſician, whoſe noble endevours had been employed in procuring the remedy.

Scipio being to take leave of Africk, produced Maſaniſſa, and magnified him in preſence of the Army, with high commendations not undeſervedly. To him alſo he conſigned over thoſe towns of King Syphax, which the Romans at that preſent held; wherein, to ſay truth, he gave him but his due; and that that which otherwiſe he knew not well how to beſtow. But the love of the Romans, and friendſhip of Scipio, was fully anſwerable, now and hereafter, to all the deſervings of this Numidian King. About Carthage there reſted no more to be done. Wherefore the Romans embarqued themſelves for Sicil: where when they arrived at Lylibæum, Scipio with ſome part of his Army took his way home to Rome by Land; and ſent the reſt before him thither by Sea. His journey through Italy was no leſs glorious than any triumph: all the people thronging out of the Towns and Villages, to do him honour as he paſſed along. He entred the City in Triumph: neither was there ever before, or after, any triumph celebrated with ſo great joy of the people, as was this of Scipio; though, in bravery of the pomp, there were others in time ſhortly following, that exceeded this. Whether Syphax were carried through the City in this Triumph, and dying ſoon after in priſon; or whether he were dead a while before: it cannot be affirmed. Thus much may be avowed, that it was a barbarous cuſtome of the Romans, to inſult over the calamities of mighty Princes, by leading them contumelioully in Triumph; yea, though they were ſuch, as had alwayes made fair and courteous war. But hereof we ſhall have better example ere the ſame age paſs. It was neither the perſon of Syphax, nor any other glory of the ſpectacle, that ſo much beautified the Triumph of Scipio; as did the contemplation of that grievous war paſt, whereof the Romans had been in a manner without hope that ever they ſhould ſet Italy free. This made them look chearfully upon the Author of ſo great a converſion; and filled them with more joy, than they well could moderate. Wherefore they gave to Scipio the Title of the African: ſtiling him by the name of that Province, which he had ſubdued. This honourable kind of ſurname, taken from a conquered Province, grew afterwards more common, and was uſurped by men of leſs deſert: eſpecially by many of the Cæſars, who ſometimes arrogated unto themſelves the title of Countreys, wherein they had performed little or nothing; as if ſuch glorious Attributes could have made them like in vertue unto Scipio the African.

CHAP. IV.

Of Philip the father of Perſeus King of Macedon; his firſt Acts and War with the Romans, by whom he was ſubdued.

§. I.

How the Romans grew acquainted in the Eaſt-Countreys, and deſirous of War there. The beginning of many Princes, with great Wars, at one time. The Ætolians over-run Peloponneſus. Philip and his Aſſociates make War againſt the Ætolians. Alteration of the ſtate in Sparta. The Ætolians invade Greece and Macedon, and are invaded at home by Philip.

OF the great ſimilitude found in worldly events, the limitation of matter hath been aſſigned as a probable cauſe. For ſince Nature is confined unto a ſubject that is not unbounded; the works of Nature muſt needs be finite, and many of them reſemble one the other. Now in thoſe actions, that ſeem to have their whole dependance upon the will of man, we are leſs to wonder, if we find leſs variety: ſince it is no great portion of things which are obnoxious unto humane power; and ſince they are the ſame affections, by which the wills of ſundry men are over-ruled, in managing the affairs of our daily life. It may be obſerved in the change of Empires, before thoſe times whereof we now write, how the Aſſyrians or Chaldeans invaded the kingdom of the Medes, with two hundred thouſand Foot, and threeſcore thouſand Horſe; but failing in their intended conqueſt, they became ſubject within a while themſelves unto the Medes and Perſians. In like manner Darius, and after him Xerxes, fell upon the Greeks with ſuch number of men, as might have ſeemed reſiſtleſs. But after that the Perſians were beaten home again, their Empire was never ſecure of the Greeks: who at all times of leiſure from inteſtine War, deviſed upon that conqueſt thereof, which finally they made under the great Alexander.

If

If Nabuchodonosor with his rough old Souldiers, had undertaken the Medes: or Cyrus with his well-trained Army, had made attempt upon Greece; the issue might, in humane reason, have been far different. Yet would it then have been expedient for them, to employ the travel and vertue of their men, rather than the greatness of their names against those people; that were no less valiant, though less renowned, than their own. For the menacing words used by Cyrus, and some small displeasures done to the Greeks (in which kind it may be, that Nabuchodonosor likewise offended the Medes and Persians) were not so available to victory, as to draw on revenge in the future. Great Kingdoms, when they decay in strength, suffer as did the old Lion, for the oppression done in his youth; being pinched by the Wolf, gored by the Bull, yea and kickt by the Ass. But Princes are often carryed away from reason, by mis-understanding the language of Fame: and despising the vertue that makes little noise, adventure to provoke it against themselves; as if it were not possible that their own glory should be foiled by any of less-noted excellence. Against the same stone, whereat Xerxes, and before him (as I take it) Evilmerodach, had stumbled, Pyrrhus the Epirot had dasht his foot. He was not indeed the King of all Greece; though most of mark, and a better Souldier than any other Greekish King, when he entred into the war against the Romans. This war he undertook as it were for his minds sake; having received no injury; but hoping by the glory of his name, and of the Greeks that served under him, to prevail so easily against the barbarous Romans, that they should only serve as a step to his further intended conquests, of Sicil and Africk. But when the Romans by their victory against Pyrrhus had found their own vertue to be of richer metal, than was the more shining valour of the Greeks: than did all the bravery of the Epirot (his Elephants, and whatsoever else had served to make him terrible) serve only to make the Romans, in time following, to think more highly of themselves. *For since they had overcome the best Warrior in Greece, even Him, that, being thus beaten by them, could in a year after make himself Lord of Greece and Macedon: what should hinder them from the conquest of all those unwarlike Provinces, which in compass of 12. years a Macedonian King of late memory had won? Certainly there was hereunto requisite no more: than to bring to their own devotion by some good means, the whole Country of Greece: all the rest, this done, would follow it self. How to deal with the Greeks, Philip and Alexander had shewed a way: which, or perhaps a better, they might learn, by getting more acquaintance with the Nation.

* The King of Spain's pretended invincible Navy, being beaten out of the British Seas, invited us to those of Spain: having broken the greatest fleet that ever the Spaniards gathered together, we never made account of any of his preparations after that time.

When therefore the first Punick war was ended, which followed soon after the wars of Pyrrhus and of the Tarentines: then were the Romans at good leasure to hearken after news in Greece; and to entertain any good occasion, that should be on that side presented. They had also then a strong Fleet: and were become, though not otherwise very skilfull Marriners; yet good fighters at Sea. So it fell out as happily as could be wished, that the Illyrian Queen Teuta made at the same time cruel war upon the Greeks: wasting their Countrey, and sacking their Towns, only because they were unable to resist, though they had done her none offence. Into this quarrel, if the Romans were desirous to enter; the Queen was not slow to give them cause. And their happy accomplishing of that war, which they made with Her, was, in their own opinion, a matter not unworthy to make their Patronage to be desired by the Greeks. But no such thing hapned: though they sent Embassadours, as it were to offer themselves; by signifying, that for the love of Greece they had undertaken this Illyrian war. Thus began the first acquaintance betwixt the Greeks and Romans: which afterwards encreased very hastily, through the indiscretion of King Philip the Macedonian; whose business with them, now being the subject of our story, it is meet that we should relate (though somewhat briefly) the beginning of his reign, and his first Actions. It was like to prove a busie time in the world, when, within the space of 4. years, new Kings began to reign in the most of all Countreys known; and 3. of them young boyes, in 3. of the greatest kingdoms. This hapned from the third year of the hundred thirty ninth Olympiad, unto the third of the Olympiad following. For in this time died Seleucus Ceraunus King of Asia and Syria, in whose room succeeded his brother Antiochus, afterwards called the Great. Ptolomy Philopater succeeded in the Kingdom of Egypt unto his father Euergetes. And Philip the son of Demetrius, being 16. or 17. years old, received the Kingdom of Macedon, together with the Patronage of the Achæans and most of the Greeks, by the decease of his Uncle Antigonus Doson, that was called the Tutor or Protector. About the same time also was the like change in Cappadocia, Lacedæmon, and the Countreys about Mount

Mount Taurus. For Ariarathes then began his reign in Cappadocia. Lycurgus found means to make himself King over the Lacedæmonians, whose Common-weal, since the flight of Cleomenes, had continued in a manner headless; and Achæus, a kinsman of Antiochus, but a Rebel unto him, occupied the Regions near unto Mount Taurus, and kept a while the State of a mighty King. Lastly, in the second and third years of the one hundred and fortieth Olympiad it was, that open war brake out between Rome and Carthage; and that Hannibal began his great Invasion upon Italy. Those troubles of the Western world, which were indeed the greatest, we have already followed unto an end: Of Antiochus, Ptolomy, and the rest; we shall speak hereafter, when the Romans find them out.

Philip, soon after the beginning of his reign, came into Peloponnesus; greatly desired of the Achæans, and many other his dependants. That Countrey, having freed it self by the help of Antigonus from the danger (accounted great) of an easie subjection unto Cleomenes; was now become no less obnoxious to the Macedonian, than it should have been to the Spartan; and therewithal it lay open unto the violence of the Ætolians; who despised even the Macedonian Kings, that were Patrons thereof. The Ætolians were no men to be idle; nor were much addicted unto any other Art than war. Therefore wanting employment, they fell upon the Messenians that were their own Clients, and (excepting the Eleans, that were anciently of their consanguinity) the only good friends which they had at the present in Peloponnesus. Their invasion was no less unexpected, than it was unjust: whereby with greater case they made spoil of the Countrey; finding none prepared to make resistance. The Achæans, were called by the Messenians to help: which they did the more willingly: because the Ætolians passing without leave through their Territory, had (as was their manner) done what harm they listed. Old Aratus could hardly abide these Ætolians; as both knowing well their nature, and remembring the injuries, wherewith most ingratefully they had requited no small benefits done to them by the Achæans. He was therefore so hasty to fall upon this their Army, that he could hardly endure to stay few dayes until the time of his own Office came; being chosen Prætor of the Achæans for the year following. But his anger was greater than his courage: and he shewed himself a man fitter (as hath been already noted of him) for any other service, than leading of Army. He suffered them to pass quietly along with their booty, through a part of the Country, wherein he might very easily have distressed them; and afterwards pressed them to fear, when they had recovered ground of advantage, that they easily defeated all his Army. So they departed home rich, and well animated to return again. As for the Achæans, they got hereby only the friendship of the Messenians: with whom, by licence of King Philip, they made Confederacy. Shortly after, the Ætolians invaded Peloponnesus again: having no more to do, than to pass over the narrow Straights of the Corinthian Bay, called now the Gulph of Lepanto, where they might land in the Countrey of the Eleans. There joyned with them, in this their second invasion, a great number of the Illyrians: who neglecting that Condition imposed upon them by the Romans, of setting out no Ships of war unto the Coast of Greece: made bold to seek adventures again, and did great mischief. Demetrius Pharius, a creature of the Romans, commanded a part of these Illyrians: who shortly repented him of this his voyage; which caused him to lose his Kingdom, as is shewed before. But this Demetrius went another way, and fell upon the Islands of the Cyclades in the Ægean sea: whence returning, he did some good offices for King Philip, or his friends. The rest of the Illyrians under Scerdilaidas, or Scerdiletus, having gotten what they could elsewhere by roving at Sea, accompanied the Ætolians into Peloponnesus: who made greater havock in the Country now, than in their former Expedition, and returned home without finding any resistance.

Of these things great complaint was made unto Philip, when he came to Corinth. And because men were desirous to satifie themselves with some speedy revenge: there were that urged to have some grievous punishment laid upon the Lacedæmonians; who were thought underhand to have favoured the Ætolians, in meer despight of the Achæans and Macedonians, by whom themselves had lately been subdued. It is true, that the Lacedæmonians had been so affected: and (which was worse) at the arrival of Philip, they slew such friends of his, as having checked their inclination, seemed likely to appeach them of the intended rebellion. Neither durst they well commit themselves to judgement: but intreated the King, that he would abstain from coming to them with an Army: since their Town was lately much disquieted with civil discord, which they hoped soon to appease; and meant always to remain at his devotion. Philip was easily satisfied with this: not for that he (or rather old Aratus, who then wholly governed him) did well understand the Lacedæmonians: but for that a greater work was in hand, which ought not to be interrupted. There met at Corinth in presence of the King, the Embassadors of the Achæans, Bœotians, Epirots, and Acarnanians: all complaining upon the Ætolians: and desiring to have War decreed against them, by common assent. Philip sent his letters unto the Ætolians, requiring them to make ready their answer in some convenient time: if they could alledge any thing in excuse of that which they had done. They returned word, that a Diet should be holden at Rhium for that purpose: whither if it pleased him to come, or send, he should be well informed of them and their whole meaning. The King prepared to have been there at the day. But when the Ætolians understood this for certain, they adjourned the Councel unto a further time: saying, That such weighty matters ought not to be handled, save in the great Parliament of all Ætolia. This trick of Law notwithstanding, open War was proclaimed against them. And they, as it were, to shew how well they had deserved it, made election of Scopas to be their Prætor, that was Author of these Invasions made on Peloponnesus; and the only man, in a sort, upon whom they must have laid the blame of these actions, if they would have shifted it from the publick.

After this, Philip went into Macedon, where he prepared busily for the War against the year following. He also assayed the Illyrian, Scerdilaidas, with fair words and promises; whom he easily won from the Ætolian side, forasmuch as the Ætolians had couzened him of his share, when he was partner with them in their late robberies. In like sort the Achæans, who had first of all others proclaimed the War in their own Countrey, sent unto the Acarnanians, Epirots, Messenians, and Lacedæmonians: requesting them forthwith to declare themselves, and to denounce war unto the Ætolians; without staying (as it were) to await the event. Hereunto they received divers answers according to the qualities of those with whom they dealt. The Acarnanians, a free-hearted and valiant, though a small Nation, and bordering upon the Ætolians, of whom they stood in continual danger; said, that they could not honestly refuse to shew their faithful meaning in that War, which was concluded by general assent. The Epirots that were more mighty, were nevertheless more cunning and reserved: so that they stood upon a needless point, and desired to be held excused, until Philip (of whose meaning they needed not to have made any doubt) should first proclaim the war. The Messenians, for whose cause the war was undertaken, excused themselves, by reason of a Town which the Ætolians held upon their borders, and said, that they durst not be over-bold, until that bridle were taken out of their mouths. As for the Lacedæmonians, the chief of them studied only, how to manage the treason for which their City had been so lately pardoned: and therefore dismissed the Embassadors of the Confederates, without any answer at all. They had three years together continued subject against their wils to the Macedonians, expecting still when Cleomenes should return out of Egypt to reign over them again, and maintain, as he was wont, the honour of their City. In this regard they chose not any Kings, but were contented with the rule of Ephori. Of these there were some, that thought the publick safety to consist, in holding their faith with the Macedonian that had preserved them. And hereto they referred all their counsels: being perhaps a little moved with respect of the benefit, which might redound unto themselves, by adhering firmly to those which at the present bore rule over them. Others, and those the greater part were still devising, how to make all ready for Cleomenes against his return; and sought to joyn with the Ætolians, which were the most likely to give him strong assistance. The Macedonian faction had the more authority, and durst more freely speak their minds: but the contrary side was the more passionate, and spared not by murders or any other violent courses, to set forward their desire. Neither did it suffice, that about these times there came certain report of Cleomenes his death. For it was the liberty and honour of Sparta, which these intended; fancying unto themselves the glory of their Ancestors in such Ages past, as it were not like to come again. Cleomenes was, they knew, the most able man to restore them unto their greatness & lustre; which once he had in a manner performed: But since he was dead, and that, without injury to his well-deserving vertue, they might proceed to the election of new Kings: Kings they would have, and those of the race of Hercules, as in former times; for that without such helps, they must continue little better than subjects unto the Macedonian, and far less by him respected, than were the Achæans. Thus were they transported by contemplation of their old Nobility and fame. Some of the most working spirits among among them, procured the Ætolians to send an Embassie to Sparta: which propounded the matter openly unto the people, whereof no one of the Citizens durst have made himself the Author. Much disputation, and hot, there was, between those of the Macedonian party, and these their opposites: in such wise that nothing could be concluded; until by massacre or banishment of all, or the chief, that spake against the Ætolians: the diversity of opinion was taken quite away. Then forthwith a League was concluded between the Lacedæmonians and Ætolians: without all regard of the Macedonians or Achæans, who had spared the City, when they might have destroyed it. Then also they went in hand with the election of new Kings: wherein their diligence was so nice, and so regardful of their ancient Laws, as touching the choosing of the one King, that we may justly wonder, how they grew so careless in making choice of the other. In the one of their Royal Families they found Agesipolis, the son of Agesipolis, the son of King Cleombrotus: and him they admitted to reign over them, as heir apparent to his grandfather. This Agesipolis was a young Boy, standing in need of a Guardian; and had an Uncle, his Fathers Brother, that was fit for the Government. Yet becaus the Law required, that the son, how youngsoever, should have his fathers whole right and Title: the Lacedæmonians, though standing in need of a man, were so punctual in observation of the Law, that they made this child their King, and appointed his Uncle Cleomenes to be his Protector. But in the other branch of the Royal Family, though there was no want of heirs: yet would not the people trouble themselves about any of them, to examine the goodness of his Claim; but made election of one Lycurgus, who having no manner of title to the Kingdom, bestowed upon each of the Ephori, a Talent, and thereby made himself be saluted King of Sparta, and a Gentleman of the race of Hercules. This Lycurgus to gratifie his Partisans, and to approve his worth by action, invaded the Country of the Argives: which lay open and unguarded, as in a time of peace. There he did great spoil, and won divers Towns; whereof two he retained, and annexed unto the State of Lacedæmon. After such open hostility, the Lacedæmonians declared themselves on the Ætolian side; and proclaimed War against the Achæans.

Thus the beginnings of the War fell out much otherwise, than the Achæans and their Confederates had expected, when they first made preparation. Philip was not ready: the Epirots gave uncertain answer: the Messenians would not stir: all the burden must lye upon themselves and the poor Acarnanians, whom the Ætolians, by favour of the Eleans, could invade at pleasure, as they were like to do; and by help of the Lacedæmonians, could assail on all parts at once. It was not long ere the Ætolians, passing over the Bay of Corinth, surprised the Town of Ægira: which if they could have held, they should thereby grievously have molested the Achæans, for that it stood in the mid-way between Ægium and Sycion, two of their principal Cities, and gave open way into the heart of all their Country. But as Ægira was taken by surprise: so was it presently lost again, through greedines of spoil; whilest they that should have made it their first care, to assure the place unto themselves, by occupying the citadel and other pieces of strength, fell heedlesly to ransack private houses, and thereby gave the Citizens leave to make head, by whom they were driven with great slaughter back unto their Fleet. About the same time, another Ætolian Army landing among the Eleans, fell upon the Western Coast of Achaia; wasting all the Territory of the Dymæans and other people, that were first beginners of the Achæan Confederacy. The Dymæans and their neighbours made head against these Invaders; but were so well beaten, that the enemy grew bolder with them than before. They sent for help unto their Prætor, and to all the Towns of their Society in vain. For the Achæans having lately been much weakened by Cleomenes, were now able to do little of themselves: neither could they get any strength of Mercenaries; forasmuch as at the end of Cleomenes his war they had covetously with-held part of their due from those that served them therein. So through this disability of the Achæans, and insufficiency of their Prætor; the Dymæans, with others, were driven to with-hold their contribution heretofore made for the publick service, and to convert the money to their own defence. Lycurgus also with his Lacedæmonians, began to win upon the Arcadians, that were confederate with Philip and the Achæans.

Philip came to the borders of the Ætolians, whilst their Army was thus employed a far off in Peloponnesus. The Epirots joined all their forces with him: and by such their willing readines, drew him to the siege of a Frontier piece, which they desired to get into their own hands; for that, by commodity thereof, they hoped shortly to make themselves Masters of Ambracia. There he spent forty dayes, ere he could end the business; which tended only to the benefit of the Epirots. Had he entred into the heart of Ætolia at his first coming in; it is thought that he might have had an end of the War. But it happens oft, that the violence of great Armies is broken upon small Towns or Forts: and not seldom, that the importunity of Associates, to have their own desires fulfilled, converts the preparations of great Kings to those uses for which they never were intended; thereby hindering the prosecution of their main designs. Thus was our King Henry the eighth led aside, and quite out of his way, by Maximilian the Emperour to the siege of Tournay: at such time as the French King Lewis the twelfth, hearing that the strong City of Terwin was lost, and that his Cavallery, wherein rested his chief confidence, two thousand were beaten by the Earl of Essex with seven hundred English; was thinking to withdraw himself into Britain, in fear that Henry would have come to Paris.

The stay that Philip made at Ambrachus, did wondrously embolden the Ætolians: in such sort, as their Prætor Scopas adventured to lead all their forces out of the Country; and therewith not only to over-run Thessalie, but to make impression into Macedon. He ran as far as to Dium, a City of Macedon upon the Ægean Sea: which, being forsaken by the Inhabitants at his coming, he took, and razed to the ground. He spared neither Temple, nor any other of the goodly buildings therein, but overturned all: and among the rest, he threw down the Statua's that were there erected, of the Macedodian Kings. For this he was highly honoured by his Country-men at his return; forasmuch as hereby they thought their Nation to be grown terrible, not only (as before) unto Peloponnesus, but even to Macedon it self. But this their pride was soon abated; and they rewarded shortly at home in their own Country, for their pains taken at Dium. Philip having dispatched his work at Ambracus, made a strong invasion upon Ætolia. He took Phœtiæ, Metropolis, Oeniade, Pæanium, Elæus, and divers other Towns and Castles of theirs: of which he burnt some, and fortified others. He also beat the Ætolians in sundry skirmishes: and wasted all the Countrey over, without receiving any harm. This done, while he was about to make a cut over the Straights into Peloponnesus, and to do the like spoil in the Country of the Eleans, whereto he was vehemently solicited by the Achæan Embassadors; news came out of Macedon, that the Dardanians were ready with a great Army to fall upon the Country. These Dardanians were a barbarous people, divided by Mount Hæmus from the Northern part of Macedon, and were accustomed to seek booty in that wealthy Kingdom, when they found their own times. Having therefore intelligence, that Philip was about to make a journey into Peloponnesus; they purposed in his absence, which they thought would be long, to get what they could for themselves in his Countrey: as had been their manner upon the like advantages. This made the King to dismiss the Achæan Embassadors, (whom he should have accompanied home with his Army) and to bid them have patience until another year. So he took his way home-wards: and as he was passing out of Acarnania into Epirus, there repaired unto him Demetrius Pharius, with no more than one Ship; that was newly chased out of his Kingdom by the Romans. This Demetrius had lately shewed himself a friend to Antigonus Doson in the wars of Cleomenes: and returning in his last Voyage from the Cyclades, was ready at their first request, to take part with Philips Captains. These, or the like considerations, made him welcome unto the Macedonian King: whose Counsellor he was ever after. The Dardanians hearing of the Kings return, brake up their Army, and gave over for the present their invasion of Macedon, towards which they were already on their way.

All that summer following the King rested at Larissa in Thessaly, whilest his people gathered in their Harvest. But the Ætolians rested not. They avenged themselves upon the Epirots: whom for the harms by them and Philip done in Ætolia, they requited with all extremities of War, among which, the most notable was the ruine of the most famous Temple of Dodona. When Winter grew on, and all thought of War, until another year, was laid aside: Philip stole a journy into Peloponnesus, with 5000. Foot, & about 400. Horse. As soon as he was within Corinth; He commanded the gates to be shut, that no word should be carryed forth of his arrival. He sent privily for old Aratus to come thither unto him: with whom he took order, when, and in what places, he would have the Achæan Souldiers ready to meet him. The enemies were then abroad in the Country, without somewhat more than two thousand Foot, and an hundred Horse;

Horſe; little thinking to meet with oppoſition. Indeed they had little cauſe to fear: ſince the Achæans themſelves were not aware that the King was in their Land with his Macedonians; until they heard, that theſe two thouſand Eleans, Ætolians, and their fellows, were by him ſurprized, and all made priſoners, or ſlain. By this exploit which he did at his firſt coming, Philip got very much reputation, and likewiſe he purchaſed both reputation and love, by divers actions immediately following. He won Pſophis, an exceeding ſtrong Town, in the borders of Arcadia, which the Eleans and Ætolians then held. He won it by aſſault at his firſt coming: wherein it much availed him, that the Enemy, not believing that he would undertake ſuch a piece of work at ſuch an unſeaſonable time of the year, was careleſs of providing even ſuch ſtore of weapons, as might have ſerved to defend it. The Town was preſerved by the King from ſack; and given to the Achæans of his meer motion, before they requeſted it. Thence went he to Laſion, which yielded for very fear; hearing how eaſily he had taken Pſophis. This Town alſo he gave to the Achæans. The like liberality he uſed towards others, that had ancient title unto places by him recovered. Then fell he upon the Country of Elis, where was much wealth to be gotten: for that the people were addicted to huſbandry, and lived abroad in Villages; even ſuch as were of the wealthier ſort among them. So he came to the City of Olympia: where having done ſacrifice to Jupiter, feaſted his Captains, and refreſhed his Army three days; He proceeded on to the ſpoil of thoſe, that had taken pleaſure to ſhare with the Ætolians, in the ſpoils of their otherwiſe-deſerving neighbours. Great abundance of Cattel he took, with great numbers of ſlaves, and much wealth of all ſorts, ſuch as could be found in rich villages. Then he fell in hand with the Towns, whereinto a great multitude of the Country people were fled. Some of theſe were taken at the firſt aſſault. Some yielded for fear. Some prevented the labour of his journey, by ſending Embaſſadors to yield before he came. And ſome that were held with Garriſons againſt their wils, took courage to ſet themſelves at liberty, by ſeeing the King ſo near: to whoſe Patronage thenceforth they betook themſelves. And many places were ſpoiled by the Ætolians Captains; becauſe they diſtruſted their ability to hold them. So the King won more Towns in the Country, than the ſharpneſs of winter would ſuffer him to ſtay there days. Fain he would have fought with the Ætolians: but they made ſuch haſte from him, that he could not overtake them, till they had covered themſelves within the Town of Samicum; where they thought to have been ſafe. But Philip aſſaulted them therein ſo forcibly, that he made them glad to yield the place; obtaining licenſe to depart with their lives and arms. Having performed ſo much in this expedition, the King repoſed himſelf a while in Megalopolis, and then removed to Argos, where he ſpent all the reſt of the winter.

Before the Kings arrival in Peloponneſus, the Lacedæmonians, with Lycurgus their new King, had gotten ſomewhat in Arcadia; and threatned to do great matters. But when they were admoniſhed, by the calamity that fell upon the Eleans, of the danger hanging over their own heads; they quitted their winnings, and withdrew themſelves home. This Lycurgus, as he had no other right to the Kingdom of Sparta, than that which he could buy with mony, ſo was he neither free from danger of conſpiracies made againſt him: nor from thoſe jealouſies, with which Uſurpers are commonly perplexed. There was one Chilon, of the Royal blood, that thinking himſelf to have beſt right unto the Kingdom, purpoſed to make way thereunto by maſſacre of his oppoſites; and afterwards to confirm himſelf, by propounding unto the multitude ſuch reformation of the State as was moſt popular: namely, by making an equal diſtribution of all the lands among the whole number of the Citizens, according to the ancient inſtitution of that Commonwealth. He won to his party ſome two hundred men; with whom he fell upon the Ephori, as they were together at ſupper, & ſlew them all. Then went he to Lycurgus his houſe: who perceiving the danger, ſtole away and fled. It remained that he ſhould give account of theſe doings to the people, and procure them to take part with him. But their minds not being hereto prediſpoſed; they ſo little regarded his goodly offers, as even whilſt he was uſing his beſt perſwaſions, they were conſulting how to apprehend him. Chilon perceived whereabout they went, and ſhifted preſently away. So he lived afterwards among the Achæans a baniſhed man, and hated of his own people. As for Lycurgus he returned home: & ſuſpecting thenceforth all thoſe of Hercules his race, found means to drive out his fellow-King young Ageſipolis whereby he made himſelf Lord alone. His doings grew to be ſuſpected, in ſuch ſort, as once he ſhould have been apprehended by the Ephori. But though his actions hitherto might have been defended; yet rather than than to adventure himself into judgment, he chose to flie for a time, and sojourn among his friends the Ætolians. His well-known vehemency in opposition to the Macedonians, had procured unto him such good liking among the people, that in his absence they began to consider the weakness of their own surmises against him; and pronouncing him innocent, recalled him home to his Estate. But in time following, he took better heed unto himself: not by amending his condition (for he grew a Tyrant, and was so acknowledged) but by taking order, that it should not be in the power of the Citizens to expel him when they listed. By what actions he got the name of a Tyrant; or at what time it was, that he chased Agesipolis out of the City; I do not certainly find. Like enough it is, That his being the first of three usurpers, which followed in order one after another, made him to be placed in the rank of Tyrants; which the last of the three very justly deserved. Whatsoever he was toward some private Citizens, in the war against Philip, he behaved himself as a provident man, and careful of his Countreys good.

§. II.

How Philip was misadvised by ill Counsellors: who afterwards wrought treason against him; and were justly punished. He invadeth the Ætolians a second time: and forceth them to sue for peace: which is granted unto them.

WHilest the King lay at Argos devising upon his business for the year following, some ambitious men that were about him, studied so diligently for their own greatness, as they were like to have spoiled all that he took in hand. Antigonus Doson had left unto Philip such Counsellors, as to him did seem the fittest men for governing of his youth. The chief of these was Apelles; that had the charge of his person, and also the ordering of his Treasures. This man, seeming to himself a great Politician, thought that he should do a notable piece of service to his Prince, if he could reduce the Achæans unto the same degree of subjection, wherein the Macedonians lived. To bring this to pass; during the late Expedition he had caused some of the Macedonians to thrust the Achæans out of their lodgings, and to strip them of the booty that they had gotten. Proceeding further, as occasion fell out; he was bold to chastise some of that Nation; causing his Ministers to take and whip them. If any of them offered (as there were some of them that could not refrain) to help their fellows; them he laid by the heels, and punished as Mutiners. Hereby he thought to bring it to pass by little and little, that they should be qualified with an habit of blind obedience; and think nothing unjust that pleased the King. But these Achæans were tenderly sensible in matters of liberty: whereof if they could have been contented to suffer any little diminution, they needed not have troubled the Macedonians to help them in the war against Cleomenes. They bemoaned themselves unto old Aratus: and besought him to think upon some good order, that they might not be oppressed by degrees. Aratus forthwith dealt earnestly with the King; as in a matter more weighty than at first it might seem. The King bestowed gracious words upon those that had been wronged, and forbade Apelles to follow the course begun. Hereat Apelles was inwardly vexed, though he dissembled his choler for a time. He thought so well of his own Project, that he could not endure to lay it aside; being perhaps unable to do the King any valuable service, in business of other nature. He purposed therefore hereafter to begin at the head: since, in biting at the tail, the fish had shot away from his mouth. It could not otherwise be than that among the Achæans there were some, who bore no hearty affection to Aratus. These he enquired out, and sending for them, entertained them with words of Court: promising to become their especial friend, and commend them unto the King. Then brake he his purpose with the King himself: letting him know, that as long as he continued to make much of Aratus, he must be fain to deal precisely with the Achæans, and as it were by Indenture, according to the letter of the Contract: whereas if he would be pleased, to give countenance unto those others whom he himself commended, then should the Achæans, and all other Peloponnesians, be quickly brought to conform themselves unto the duty of obedient Subjects. By such perswasions, he drew the King to be present at Ægium, where the Achæans were to hold election of a new Prætor. There with much more labour, than would have been needful in a business of more importance, the King by fair words and threatnings together, obtained so much, That Eperatus, a very insufficient man, but one of Apelles his new favourites, was chosen Prætor, instead of one more worthy, for whom Aratus had laboured. This was thought a good good introduction unto greater matters that ſhould follow. The King from thence paſſed along by Patras and Dyma, to a very ſtrong Caſtle held by the Eleans, which was called Tichos. The garriſon yielded it up for fear, at his firſt coming: whereof he was glad, for that he had an earneſt deſire to beſtow it upon the Dymæans, as he preſently did.

The King thought it ſtrange, that all this while he heard of no meſſengers from the Eleans, to ſue for peace. For at his departure out of their Country the laſt Winter, he had let looſe one Amphidamus a Captain of theirs, that was his priſoner; becauſe he found him an intelligent man, and one that undertook to make them forſake their alliance with the Ætolians, and joyn with him upon reaſonable terms. This if they could be contented to do, he willed Amphidamus to let them underſtand, That he would render unto them freely all priſoners which he had of theirs; That he would defend them from all forrain invaſion; and that they ſhould hold their liberty entire, living after their own Laws, without paying any manner of Tribute, or being kept under by any garriſon. Theſe conditions were not to be deſpiſed, if they had found credit, as they might have done. But when Philip came to the Caſtle of Tichos, and made a new invaſion upon their Country: then began the Eleans, (that were not before over-haſty to believe ſuch fair promiſes) to ſuſpect Amphidamus as a Traitor, and one that was ſet on work for no other end, than to breed a mutual diffidence between them and the Ætolians. Wherefore they purpoſed to lay hands upon him, and ſend him priſoner into Ætolia. But he perceived their intent, and got away to Dyma: in good time for himſelf; in better for Aratus. For the King (as was ſaid) marvailing what ſhould be the cauſe, that he heard no news from the Eleans, concerning the offers which he had made unto them by Amphidamus: Apelles his Counſellor, thereby took occaſion to ſupplant Aratus. He ſaid that old Aratus, and his ſon together, had ſuch devices in their heads, as tended little to the Kings good: And long of them he ſaid it was, that the Eleans did thus hold out. For when Amphidamus was diſmiſſed home, the two Arati, (the father and the ſon) had taken him aſide and given him to underſtand, that it would be very prejudicial to all Peloponneſus, if the Eleans once became at the devotion of the Macedonian: And this was the true cauſe, why neither Amphidamus was ver ycareful in doing this meſſage; nor the Eleans in hearkning to the Kings offers. All this was a falſe lye, diviſed by Apelles himſelf, upon no other ground than his own malice. Philip had no ſooner heard this tale, but in a great rage he ſent for the two Arati, and bade Apelles rehearſe it over again to their faces. Apelles did ſo, and with a bold countenance, talking to them as to men already convicted. And when he had ſaid all the reſt, ere either Philip or they ſpake any word; He added this clauſe, as it were, in the Kings name: Since the King hath found you ſuch ungrateful wretches; it is his meaning to hold a Parliament of the Achæans; and therein having made it known what ye are, to depart into Macedon, and leave you to your ſelves. Old Aratus gravely admoniſhed the King; That whenſoever he heard any accuſation, eſpecially againſt a friend of his own, or a man of worth, He ſhould forbear a while to give credit, untill he had diligently examined the buſineſs. For ſuch deliberation was Kingly, and he ſhould never thereof repent him. At the preſent he ſaid there needed no more, than to call in thoſe that had heard his talk with Amphidamus, and eſpecially him that had brought this goodly tale to Apelles. For it would be a very abſurd thing, That the King ſhould make himſelf the Author of a report in the open Parliament of Achaia, whereof there was none other evidence, than one mans yea, and anothers no. Hereof the King liked well; and ſaid that he would make ſufficient inquiry. So paſſed a few dayes: wherein whileſt Apelles delayed to bring in the proof, which indeed he wanted, Amphidamus came from Elis, and told what had befaln him there. The King was not forgetful, to examine him about the conſpiracy of the Arati: which, when he found no better than a meer device againſt his honourable friends; he entertained them in loving manner as before. As for his love to Apelles, though it was hereby ſomewhat cooled; yet by means of long acquaintance and daily employment, no remiſſion therein could be diſcerned.

The unreſtful temper of Apelles, having with much vehemency brought nothing to paſs, began (as commonly Ambition uſeth) to ſwell and grow venemous for want of his free motion. He betakes himſelf to his cunning again: and as before, being checkt in his doings with thoſe of the vulgar, he had prepared a ſnare for the Arati: ſo railing of them, he thinks it wiſdom to lay for the King himſelf, and for all at once which were about him. In ſuch manner ſometime, the Spider thought to have taken the Swallow which drave away flyes out of the chimny; but but was carryed (net and all) into the Air by the bird, that was too ſtrong to be caught, and held by the ſubtle workmanſhip of a Cob-web. Of the four that next unto Apelles were left by Antigonus in chief place about Philip; Taurion, his Lieutenant in Peloponneſus, and Alexander Captain of the Guard, were faithful men, and ſuch as would not be corrupted, The other two, Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, and Megaleas chief of the Secretaries, were eaſily won to be at Apelles his diſpoſition. This politician therefore ſtudied how to remove the other two from their places, and put ſome Creatures of his own into their rooms. Againſt Alexander he went to work the ordinary way, by calumniation and privy detraction. But for the ſupplanting of Taurion he uſed more fineneſs; loading him with daily commendations, as a notable man of war, and one, whom for his many vertues the King might ill ſpare from being alwayes in his preſence. By ſuch Art he thought to have removed him, as we ſay, Out of Gods bleſſing into a warm Sun. In the mean ſeaſon Aratus retired himſelf: and ſought to avoid the dangerous friendſhip of the King, by forbearing to meddle in affairs of State. As for the new Prætor of Achaia, lately choſen by ſuch vehement inſtance of the King; He was a man of no diſpatch, and one that had no grace with the people. Wherefore a great deal of time was loſt, whileſt Philip wanted both the money and the Corn, wherewith he ſhould have been furniſhed by the Achæans. This made the King underſtand his own errour: which he wiſely ſought to reform betimes. He perſwaded the Achæans to rejourn their Parliament from Ægium, to Sycion, the Town of Aratus. There he dealt with the old man and his ſon, perſwading them to forget what was paſt; and laying all the blame upon Apelles, on whom thenceforth he intended to keep a more diligent eye. So by the travel of theſe worthy men, he eaſily obtained what he would of the Achæans. Fifty talents they gave him out of hand; with great ſtore of Corn; and further decreed, That ſo long as he himſelf in perſon followed the wars in Peleponneſus, he ſhould receive ten talents a moneth. Being thus enabled, he began to provide ſhipping, that ſo he might invade the Ætolians, Eleans, and Lacedæmonians, that were maritime people, at his pleaſure, and hinder their excurſions by Sea.

It vexed Apelles beyond meaſure, to ſee things go forward ſo well without his help; even by the miniſtry of thoſe whom he moſt hated. Wherefore he entred into conſpiracy with Leontius and Megaleas: binding himſelf and them by Oath, to croſs and bring to nought, as well as they were able, all that the King ſhould take in hand. By ſo doing, they thought to bring it to paſs, that very want of ability to do any thing without them; ſhould make him ſpeak them fair, and be glad to ſubmit himſelf to their directions. The King it is like had ſtood in ſome awe of them whileſt he was a child; and therefore theſe wiſe men perſwaded themſelves, that by looking big upon him; and imputing unto him all that fell out ill through their own miſgovernment of his affairs, they might rule him as a child ſtill. Apelles would needs go to Chalcis, there to take order for the proviſions, which were to come that way out of Macedon: The other two ſtaid behind with the King, to play their parts; all more mindful of their wicked oath, than of their duty.

His Fleet and Army being in a readineſs: Philip made countenance, as if he would have bent all his forces againſt the Eleans; to whoſe aid therefore the Ætolians ſent men, little fearing that the miſchief would have fallen, as ſoon after it did, upon themſelves. But againſt the Eleans and thoſe that came to help them, Philip thought it enough to leave the Achæans, with ſome part of his and their Mercenaries. He himſelf with the body of his Army putting to Sea, landed in the Iſle of Cephalenia: whence the Ætolians, dwelling over againſt it, uſed to furniſh themſelves of ſhipping, when they went to rove abroad. There he beſieged the Town of Palæa, that had been very ſerviceable to the Enemy againſt him and his Confederates; and might be very uſeful to him, if he could get it. Whileſt he lay before this Town, there came unto him fifteen ſhips of war from Scerdilaidas; and many good Souldiers, from the Epirots, Acarnanians, and Meſſenians. But the Town was obſtinate; and would not be terrified with numbers. It was naturally fenced on all parts ſave one, on which ſide Philip carryed a Mine to the wall, wherewith he overthrew two hundred foot thereof. Leontius Captain of the Targettiers, was appointed by the King to make the aſſault. But he, remembring his covenant with Apelles, did both wilfully forbear to do his beſt: and cauſed others to do the like. So the Macedonians were put to foile, and many ſlain, not of the worſt Souldiers: but ſuch as had gotten over the breach, and would have carried the Town, if the Treaſon of their Captain, and ſome by him corrupted, had not hindred the victory. The King was angry with this, but but there was no remedy: and therefore he thought upon breaking up the ſiege. For it was eaſier unto the Towns-men to make up the gap in their wall, than for him to make it wider. Whileſt he ſtood thus perplexed and uncertain what courſe to take: the Meſſenians and Acarnanians lay hard upon him, each of them deſirous to draw him into their own Countrey. The Meſſenians alledged, that Lycurgus was buſie in waſting their Countrey: upon whom the King might come unawares in one day; the Eteſian winds which then blew, ſerving fitly for his Navigation. Hereto alſo Leontius perſwaded; who conſidered that thoſe winds, as they would eaſily carry him thither, ſo would they detain him there perforce (blowing all the Dog-dayes) and make him ſpend the Summer to ſmall or no purpoſe. But Aratus gave better counſel, and prevailed: he ſhewed how unfitting it were, to let the Ætolians over-run all Theſſaly again, and ſome part of Macedon, whileſt the King withdrew his Army far off to ſeek ſmall adventures. Rather, he ſaid that the time now ſerved well to carry the war into Ætolia: ſince the Prætor was gone thence abroad on roving, with the one half of their ſtrength. As for Lycurgus, he was not ſtrong enough to do much harm in Peloponneſus: and it might ſuffice, if the Achæans were appointed to make head againſt them. According to this advice, the King ſet ſail for Ætolia, and enters the Bay of Ambracia, which divided the Ætolians from Acarnania. The Acarnanians were glad to ſee him on their borders; and joyned with him as many of them as could bear arms, to help in taking vengeance upon their bad neighbours. He marched up into the inland Countrey: and taking ſome places by the way, which he filled with Garriſons to aſſure his Retreat; He paſſed on to Thermum, which was the Receptacle of the Ætolians, and ſureſt place of defence in all extremities. The Countrey round about was a great faſtneſs, environed with rocky Mountains of very narrow ſteep, and difficult aſcent. There did the Ætolians uſe to hold all their chief meetings, their Fairs, their election of Magiſtrates, and their ſolemn Games. There alſo they uſed to beſtow the moſt precious of their goods, as in a place of greateſt ſecurity. This opinion of the natural ſtrength, had made them careleſs in looking unto it. When Philip therefore had overcome the bad way, there was nothing elſe to do than to take ſpoil: whereof he found ſuch plenty, that he thought the pains of his journy well recompenced. So he loaded his Army: and conſuming all that could not be carried away, forgot not to raze a goodly Temple, the chief of all belonging unto the Ætolians; in remembrance of their like courteſie, ſhewed upon the Temples of Dium and Dodana. This burning of the Temple, might (queſtionleſs) more for the Kings honour have been forborn. But perhaps he thought, as Monſieur du Gourgues the French Captain told the Spaniards in Florida, That they which had no faith, needed no Church. At his return from Thermum, the Ætolians laid for him: which that they would do, he believed before, and therefore was not taken unawares. Three thouſand of them there were that lying in ambuſh, fell upon his ſkirts: but he laid a Counter-ambuſh for them, of his Illyrians; who ſtaying behind the reſt, did ſet upon the backs of the Ætolians, whileſt they were buſily charging in Rear the Army that went before. So with ſlaughter of the enemy, he returned the ſame way that he came: and burning down thoſe places that he had taken before, as alſo waſting the Country round about him, He ſafely carried all that he had gotten aboard his fleet. Once the Ætolians made countenance of fight, iſſuing out of Stratus in great bravery. But they were beaten home faſter than they came, and followed to their very gates.

The joy of this victorious expedition being every way compleat, and not deformed (as commonly happens) by any ſiniſter accident; it pleaſed the King to make a great feaſt unto all his friends and Captains. Thither were invited among the reſt Leontius, with his fellow Megaleas. They came becauſe they could not chooſe: but their heavy looks argued, what little pleaſure they took in the Kings proſperity. It grieved them to think, that they ſhould be able to give no better account unto Apelles, of their hindering the Kings buſineſs; ſince Apelles himſelf, as will be ſhewed anon, had played his own part with a moſt miſchievous dexterity. Finding Aratus on the way home to his Tent: they fell to reviling him, throwing ſtones at him, ſo that they cauſed a great uprore: many running in (as happens in ſuch caſes) to take part with the one or the other. The King ſending to enquire of the matter, was truly informed of all that had paſſed: Which made him ſend for Leontius and his fellows. But Leontius was gotten out of the way: Megaleas, and another with him, came. The King began to rate them for their diſorder: and they, to give him froward anſwers: inſomuch, as they ſaid at length, That they would never give over, till they had rewarded Aratus with a miſchief as he deſerved.

ved. Hereupon the King committed them to ward. Leontius hearing of this comes boldly to the King, with his Targettiers at his heels: and with a proud grace demanded, who it was that had dared to lay hands upon Megaleas, yea, and to caſt him into priſon? Why ſaid the King, it was even I. This reſolute anſwer, which Leontius had not expected, made him depart both ſad and angry; ſeeing himſelf out-frowned, and not knowing how to remedy the matter. Shortly after Megaleas was called forth to his anſwer, and was charged by Aratus with many great crimes. Among which were, The hinderance of the Kings victory at Palea, and the Compact made with Apelles: matters no leſs touching Leontius, that ſtood by as a looker on, than Megaleas that was accuſed. In concluſion, the preſumptions againſt him were ſo ſtrong, and his anſwers thereto ſo weak; that he, and Crinon one of his fellows, were condemned in twenty Talents: Crinon being remanded back to priſon; and Leontius becoming Bail for Megaleas. This was done upon the way home-wards, as the King was returning to Corinth.

Philip diſpatched well a great deal of buſineſs of this year. For as ſoon as he was at Corinth, he took in hand an Expedition againſt the Lacedæmonians. Theſe and the Eleans had done what harm they could in Peloponneſus, whileſt the King was abſent. The Achæans had oppoſed them as well as they could; with ill ſucceſs, yet ſo, as they hindred them from doing ſuch harm as elſe they would have done. But when Philip came, he over-ran the Country about Lacedæmon: and was in a manner at the Gates of Sparta, ere men could well believe that he was returned out of Ætolia. He took not in this Expedition any Cities, but made great waſt in the fields: and having beaten the enemy in ſome ſkirmiſhes, carried back with him to Corinth a rich booty of cattel, ſlaves, and other Country ſpoil. At Corinth he found attending him, Embaſſadors from the Rhodians and Chians, that requeſted him to ſet Greece at quiet, by granting peace unto the Ætolians. They had gracious audience: and he willed them to deal firſt with the Ætolians, who if they would make the ſame requeſt, ſhould not find him unreaſonable. The Ætolians had ſped ill that year: neither ſaw they any likely hopes for the years following. The Army that they had ſent forth to waſte Theſſaly and Macedon, found ſuch oppoſition on the way; that not daring to proceed, it returned home without bringing any thing to effect. In the mean ſeaſon they had been grievouſly afflicted, as before is ſhewed, by Philip in the centre of their own Countrey. All Greece and Macedon was up in arms againſt them, and their weak Allies the Eleans and Lacedæmonians. Neither was it certain, how long the one or other of theſe their Peloponneſian friends ſhould be able to hold out, ſince they were not ſtrong enough to keep the field, but had already ſuffered thoſe miſeries of war, which by a little continuance would make them glad, each to ſeek their own peace, without regard of their Confederates. Wherefore the Ætolians readily entertain'd this negotiation of peace: and taking truce for thirty dayes with the King, dealt with him by interceſſion of the ſame Embaſſadours, to intreat his preſence at a Diet of the Nation, that ſhould be held at Rhium; whither if he would vouchſafe to come, they promiſed that he ſhould find them conformable to any good reaſon.

Whileſt theſe things were in hand, Leontius and Megaleas thought to have terrified the King, by raiſing ſedition againſt him in the Army. But this device ſorted to no good effect. The Souldiers were eaſily and quickly incenſed againſt many of the Kings friends, who were ſaid to be the cauſe, why they were not rewarded with ſo much of the booty, as they thought to belong of right unto them. But their anger ſpent it ſelf in a noiſe, and breaking open of doors, without further harm done. This was enough to inform the King (who eaſily pacified his men with gentle words) that ſome about him were very falſe. Yea, the Souldiers themſelves repenting of their inſolence, deſired to have the Authors of the tumult ſought out, and puniſhed according to their deſerts. The King made ſhew as if he had not cared to make ſuch inquiſition. But Leontius and Megaleas were afraid, leſt the matter would ſoon come out of it ſelf to their extream danger. Wherefore they ſent unto Apelles, the Head and Architect of their treaſon, requeſting him ſpeedily to repair unto Corinth, where he might ſtand between them and the Kings diſpleaſure. Apelles had not all this while been wanting to the buſineſs, undertaken by him and his treacherous companions. He had taken upon him, as a man that had the Kings heart in his own hand: and thereby was he grown into ſuch credit, that all the Kings Officers in Macedon and Theſſaly addreſſed themſelves unto him, and received from him their diſpatch in every buſineſs. Likewiſe the Greeks in all their flattering Decrees, took occaſion to magnifie the vertue of Apelles, making ſlight mention (only for faſhion ſake) of the King: who ſeemed no better better than the Miniſter and Executioner of Apelles his will and pleaſure. Such was the arrogancy of this great man, in ſetting himſelf out unto the people: but in managing the Kings affairs, he made it his ſpecial care, that money and all things needful for the publick ſervice, ſhould be wanting. Yea, he enforced the King for very need, to ſell his own Plate and houſhold veſſels: thinking to reſolve theſe and all other difficulties, by only ſaying, Sir, be ruled wholly by me, and all ſhall be as you would wiſh. Hereto if the King would give aſſent, then had this Politician obtained his hearts deſire. Now taking his journey from Chalcis in the Iſle of Eubœa, to the City of Corinth where Philip then lay: he was fetcht in with great pomp and royalty, by a great number of the Captains and Souldiers; which Leontius and Megaleas drew forth to meet him on the way. So entring the City with a goodly train, he went directly to the Court, and towards the Kings chamber. But Philip was well aware of his pride, and had vehement ſuſpition of his falſhood. Wherefore one was ſent to tell him, that he ſhould wait a while, or come another time, for the King was not now at leiſure to be ſpoken with. It was a pretty thing, that ſuch a check at his made all his attendants forſake him, as a man in diſgrace; in ſuch ſort, that going thence to his lodging, he had none to follow him ſave his own Pages. After this, the King vouchſafed him now and then ſome ſlender graces: but in conſultations, or other matters of privacy, he uſed him not at all. This taught Megaleas to look to himſelf, and run away betimes. Hereupon the King ſent forth Taurion his Lieutenant of Peloponneſus, with all the Targettiers, as it were to do ſome piece of ſervice, but indeed of purpoſe to apprehend Leontius in the abſence of his followers. Leontius being taken, diſpatched away a meſſenger preſently to his Targettiers, to ſignifie what was befaln him: and they forthwith ſent unto the King in his behalf. They made requeſt, That if any other thing were objected againſt him, he might not be called forth to trial before their return: as for the debt of Megaleas, if that were all the matter, they ſaid they were ready to make a purſe for his diſcharge. This affection of the Souldiers made Philip more haſty than elſe he would have been, to take away the Traitors life. Neither was it long, ere letters of Megaleas were intercepted, which he wrote unto the Ætolians; vilifying the King with opprobrious words, and bidding them not to hearken after peace, but to hold out a while, for that Philip was even ready to ſink under the burden of his own poverty. By this the King underſtood more perfectly the falſhood, not only of Megaleas, but of Apelles; whoſe cunning head had laboured all this while to keep him ſo poor. Wherefore he ſent one to purſue Megaleas that was fled to Thebes. As for Apelles, he committed both him, his ſon, and another that was inward with him, to priſon; wherein all of them ſhortly ended their lives. Megaleas alſo, neither daring to ſtand to trial, nor knowing whither to flie, was weary of his own life, and ſlew himſelf about the ſame time.

The Ætolians, as they had begun this war upon hope of accompliſhing what they liſted in the Nonage of Philip: ſo finding that the vigour of this young Prince tempered with the cold advice of Aratus, wrought very effectually toward their overthrow; they grew very deſirous to make an end of it. Nevertheleſs, being a turbulent Nation, and ready to lay hold upon all advantages, when they heard what was happened in the Court, the death of Apelles, Leontius, and Megaleas, together with ſome indignation thereupon conceived by ſome of the Kings Targettiers, they began to hope anew, that theſe troubles would be long laſting, and thereupon brake the day appointed for the meeting at Rhium. Of this was Philip nothing ſorry. For being in good hope throughly to tame this unquiet Nation; he thought it much to concern his own honour, that all the blame of the beginning and continuing the War ſhould reſt upon themſelves. Wherefore he willed his Confederates to lay aſide all thought of peace, and to prepare for War againſt the year following; wherein he hoped to bring it to an end. Then gratified he his Macedonian Souldiers, by yielding to let them winter in their own Country. In his return homeward, he called into judgement one Ptolomy, a companion with Apelles and Leontius in their Treaſons: who was therefore condemned by the Macedonians; and ſuffered death. Theſe were the ſame Macedonians, that lately could not endure to hear of Leontius his impriſonment; yet now they think the man worthy to die that was but his adherent. So vain is the confidence, on which Rebels uſe to build, in their favour with the Multitude.

During his abode in Macedon, Philip won ſome bordering Towns, from which the Dardanians, Ætolians, and other his ill neighbours, were accuſtomed to make rodes into his Kingdom: when he had thus provided for ſafety of his own; the Ætolians might well know what they were to expect. But there came again Embaſſadors from the Rhodians and Chians, with others from Ptolomy King of Ægypt, and from the City of Bizantium, recontinuing the former ſolicitation about the peace. This faſhion had been taken up in matters of Greece, ever ſince the Kings that reigned after Alexander, had taken upon them to ſet the whole Country at liberty: No ſooner was any Province or City in danger to be oppreſſed and ſubdued by force of war, but preſently there were found Interceſſors, who pittying the effuſion of Greekiſh blood, would importune the ſtronger to relinquiſh his advantage. By doing ſuch friendly offices in time of need, the Princes and States abroad ſought to bind unto them thoſe people, that were howſoever weak in numbers, yet very good Souldiers. But hereby it came to paſs, that the more froward ſort, eſpecially the Ætolians, whoſe whole Nation was addicted to falſhood and robbery, durſt enter boldly into quarrels with all their neighbours: being well aſſured that if they had the worſt, The love of Greece would be ſufficient for to redeem their quiet. They had, ſince the late Treaty of Peace, done what harm they could in Peloponneſus: but being beaten by the Achæans, and ſtanding in fear to be more ſoundly beaten at home, they deſired now, more earneſtly than before, to make an end of the War as ſoon as they might. Philip made ſuch anſwer unto the Embaſſadours, as he had done the former year; That he gave not occaſion to the beginning of this War, nor was at the preſent afraid to continue it, or unwilling to end it: But that the Ætolians, if they had a deſire to live in reſt, muſt firſt be dealt withal, to ſignifie plainly their determination, whereto himſelf would return ſuch anſwer as he ſhould think fit.

Philip had at this time no great liking unto the Peace, being a young Prince, and in hope to increaſe the honour which he daily got by the War. But it happened in the middeſt of this Negotiation, that he was advertiſed by letters out of Macedon, what a notable victory Hannibal had obtained againſt the Romans in the battel at Thraſymene. Theſe letters he communicated unto Demetrius Pharius: who greatly encouraged him to take part with Hannibal: and not to ſit ſtill, as an idle beholder of the Italian War. Hereby he grew more inclinable than before unto Peace with the Ætolians: which was concluded ſhortly in a meeting at Naupactus. There did Agelaus an Ætolian make a great Oration: telling, how happy it was for the Greeks, that they might at their own pleaſure diſpute about finiſhing War between themſelves, without being moleſted by the Barbarians. For when once either the Romans or Carthaginians had ſubdued one the other; it was not to be doubted, that they would forthwith look Eaſtward, and ſeek by all means to ſet footing in Greece. For this cauſe he ſaid it were good, that their Country ſhould be at peace within it ſelf: and that Philip, if he were deſirous of War, ſhould lay hold on the opportunity, now fitly ſerving to enlarge his Dominion, by winning ſomewhat in Italy.

Such advice could the Ætolians then give, when they ſtood in fear of danger threatning them at hand: but being ſoon after weary of reſt, as being accuſtomed to enrich themſelves by pillage, they were ſo far from obſerving and following their own good counſel, that they invited the Romans into Greece, whereby they brought themſelves and the whole Countrey (but themſelves before any other part of the Country) under ſervitude of ſtrangers. The Condition of this Peace was ſimple, That every one ſhould keep what they held at the preſent, without making reſtitution, or any amends for dammages paſt.

§. III.

Philip, at the perſwaſion of Demetrius Pharius, enters into League with Hannibal againſt the Romans. The tenour of the League between Hannibal and Philip.

THis being agreed upon: the Greeks betook themſelves to quiet courſes of life; and Philip to prepare for the buſineſs of Italy, about which he conſulted with Demetrius Pharius. And thus paſſed the time away, till the great battel of Cannæ: after which he joyned in league with Hannibal, as hath been ſhewed before. Demetrius Pharius bore great malice unto the Romans; and knew no other way to be avenged upon them, or to recover his own loſt Kingdom, than by procuring the Macedonian, that was in a manner wholly guided by his counſel, to take part with their enemies. It had otherwiſe been far more expedient for Philip, to have ſupported the weaker of thoſe two great Cities againſt the more mighty. For by ſo doing, he ſhould perhaps have brought them to peace upon ſome equal terms; and thereby, as did Hiero, a far weaker weaker Prince, have both ſecured his own Eſtate, and cauſed each of them to be deſirous of chief place in his friendſhip. The iſſue of the counſel which he followed, will appear ſoon after this. His firſt quarrel with the Romans; the trouble which they and the Ætolians did put him to in Greece; and the Peace which they made with him for a time, upon ſuch Conditions that might eaſily be broken, have been related in another place, as belonging unto the ſecond Punick War. Wherefore I will only here ſet down the tenour of the League between him and Carthage, which may ſeem not unworthy to be read, if only in regard of the form it ſelf then uſed: though it had been overlong to have been inſerted into a more buſie piece.

The Oath and Covenants between HANNIBAL General of the Carthaginians, and XENOPHANES, Embaſſadour of PHILIP King of Macedon.

THis is the Leagure ratified by Oath, which Hannibal the General, and with him Mago, Myrcal, and Barmocal, as alſo the Senators of Carthage that are preſent, and all the Carthaginians that are in his Army, have made with Xenophanes the ſon of Cleomachus Athenian, whom King Philip the ſon of Demetrius hath ſent unto us, for himſelf and the Macedonians, and his Aſſociates: Before * Jupiter, and Juno, and Apollo, before the God of the Carthaginians, Hercules and Tolaus: before Mars, Triton, Neptune: before the Gods accompanying Arms, the Sun, the Moon, and the Earth: before Rivers and Meadows, and Waters: before all the Gods that have power over Carthage: before all the Gods that rule over Macedon, and the reſt of Greece: before all the Gods that are Preſidents of War, and preſent at the making of this League. Hannibal the General hath ſaid, and all the Senators that are with him, and all the Carthaginians, in his Army: Be it agreed between You and Us, that this Oath ſtand for friendſhip and loving affection, that We become friends, familiar, and brethren, upon Covenant, that the ſafety of the Lords the Carthaginians, and of Hannibal the General, and thoſe that are with him, and of the Rulers of Provinces of the Carthaginians, uſing the ſame Laws, and of the Uticans, and as many Cities and Nations as obey the Carthaginians, and of the Souldiers and Aſſociates, and of all Towns and Nations with which we hold friendſhip in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, and with whom we ſhall hold friendſhip, or make alliance hereafter in this Region; be preſerved by King Philip and the Macedonians, and ſuch of the Greeks as are their Aſſociates. In like manner, ſhall King Philip and the Macedonians, and other the Greeks his Aſſociates, be ſaved and preſerved by the Carthaginian Armies, and by the Uticans, and by all Cities and Nations that obey the Carthaginians, and by their Aſſociates and Souldiers, and by all Nations and Cities in Italy, Gaule, and Liguria, that are of our Alliance, or ſhall hereafter joyn with Us in Italy. We ſhall not take Counſel one againſt the other, nor deal fraudulently one with the other. With all readineſs and good will, without deceit or ſubtlety, We ſhall be enemies unto the enemies of the Carthaginians, excepting thoſe Kings, Towns, and Havens, with which We have already league and friendſhip. We alſo ſhall be enemies to the enemies of King Philip, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and Nations, with which we have already league and friendſhip. The War that We have with the Romans, have ye alſo with them, until the Gods ſhall give Us a new and happy end. Ye ſhall aid Us with thoſe things whereof we have need, and ſhall do according to the Covenants between Us. But if the Gods ſhall not give unto You and Us their help in this War againſt the Romans and their Aſſociates; then if the Romans offer friendſhip, We ſhall make friendſhip in ſuch wiſe, that ye ſhall be partakers of the ſame friendſhip, With Condition, That they ſhall not have power to make War upon You: Neither ſhall the Romans be Lords over the Corcyræans, nor over thoſe of Apollonia, nor Dyrrhachium, nor over Pharus, nor Dimalle, nor the Parthini, nor Atintania. They ſhall alſo render unto Demetrius Pharius all that belong unto him, as many as are within the Romans Dominions. But if the Romans (after ſuch peace made) ſhall make War upon You or Us; We will ſuccour one another in that War, as either ſhall have need. The ſame ſhall be obſerved in War made by any other, excepting thoſe Kings, Cities, and States, with whom we hold already league and friendſhip. To this league, if We or Ye ſhall think fit to add or detract, ſuch addition or detraction ſhall be made by our common conſent.

* Dæmon.

§. IV.

How Philip yielded to his natural vices, being therein ſoothed by Demetrius Pharius. His deſire to tyrannize upon the free States his Aſſociates: With the troubles into which he thereby fell, whileſt he bore a part in the ſecond Punick War. He poiſoneth Aratus: and grows hateful to the Achæans.

HItherto Philip had carried himſelf as a vertuous Prince. And though with more commendation of his wiſdom, he might have offered his friendſhip to the Romans, that were like to be oppreſſed, than to the Carthaginians, who had the better hand: yet this his medling in the Punick War, proceeded from a royal greatneſs of mind, with a deſire to ſecure and increaſe his own eſtate, adding therewithal reputation to his Country. But in this buſineſs he was guided (as hath been ſaid) by Demetrius Pharius: who looking throughly into his nature, did accommodate himſelf to his deſires: and thereby ſhortly governed him as he liſted. For the vertues of Philip were not indeed ſuch as they ſeemed. He was luſtful, bloody, and tyrannical: deſirous of power to do what he liſted, and not otherwiſe liſting to do what he ought, than ſo far forth, as by making a fair ſhew he might breed in men ſuch good opinion of him, as ſhould help to ſerve his turn in all that he took in hand. Before he ſhould buſie himſelf in Italy, he thought it requiſite in good policy, to bring the Greeks that were his Aſſociates, under a more abſolute form of ſubjection. Hereunto Apelles had adviſed him before: and he had liked reaſonably well of the courſe. But Apelles was a boyſterous Counſellor, and one that referring all to his own glory, thought himſelf deeply wronged, if he might not wholly have his own way, but were driven to await the Kings opportunity at other times. Demetrius Pharius could well be contented to obſerve the Kings humours: and guided, like a Coach-man, with the reins in his hand, thoſe affections which himſelf did only ſeem to follow. Therefore he grew daily more and more in credit: ſo as, without any manner of contention, he ſupplanted Aratus; which the violence of Apelles could never do.

There aroſe about theſe times a very hot Faction among the Meſſenians, between the Nobility and Commons: their vehement thoughts being rather diverted (as happens often after a forreign War) unto domeſtical objects, than allayed and reduced unto a more quiet temper. In proceſs of no long time, the contention among them grew ſo violent, that Philip was intreated to compound the differences. He was glad of this: reſolving ſo to end the matter, that they ſhould not henceforth ſtrive any more about their Government: for that he would aſſume it wholly to himſelf. At his coming thither, he found Aratus buſie among them to make all friends, after a better manner than agreed with his own ſecret purpoſe. Wherefore he conſulted not with this reverend old man: but talked in private with ſuch of the Meſſenians as repaired unto him. He aſked the Governours, what they meant to ſtand thus diſputing: and whether they had not Laws to bridle the inſolence of the unruly Rabble: Contrariwiſe, in talking with the heads of the popular Faction, he ſaid it was ſtrange, that they being ſo many would ſuffer themſelves to be oppoſed by a few; as if they had not hands to defend themſelves from Tyrants. Thus whileſt each of them preſumed on the Kings aſſiſtance; they thought it beſt to go roundly to work, ere that he were gone, that ſhould countenance their doings. The Governours therefore would have apprehended ſome ſeditious Orators, that were, they ſaid, the ſtirrers up of the multitude unto ſedition. Upon this occaſion, the people took Arms: and running upon the Nobility and Magiſtrates, killed of them in a rage, almoſt two hundred. Philip thought, it ſeems, that it would be eaſie to worry the Sheep, when the Dogs their Guardians were ſlain. But his falſhood and double dealing was immediately found out. Neither did the younger Aratus forbear to tell him of it in publick, with very bitter and diſgraceful words. The King was angry at this. But having already done more than was commendable, or excuſable: and yet further intending to take other things in hand wherein he ſhould need the help and countenance of his beſt friends; he was content to ſmother his diſpleaſure, and make as fair weather as he could. He led old Aratus aſide by the hand; and went up into the Caſtle of Ithome, that was over Meſſene. There he pretended to do ſacrifice: and ſacrifice he did. But it was his purpoſe to keep the place to his own uſe: for that it was of notable ſtrength, and would ſerve to command the further parts of Peloponneſus, as the Citadel of Corinth, which he had already, commanded the entrance into that Country. Whileſt he was therefore ſacrificing, and had the entrails of the beaſt delivered into his hands, as was the manner; he ſhewed them to Aratus, and gently aſked him, whether the tokens that he

he ſaw therein did ſignifie, That being now in poſſeſſion of this place, he ſhould quietly go out of it, or rather keep it to himſelf. He thought perhaps, that the old man would have ſoothed him a little; were it only for deſire for to make amends for the angry words newly ſpoken by his ſon. But as Aratus ſtood doubtful what to anſwer, Demetrius Pharius gave this verdict: If thou be a Soothſayer, thou maiſt go thy way, and let ſlip this good advantage; if thou be a King, thou muſt not neglect the opportunity, but hold the Oxe by both his horns. Thus he ſpake; reſembling Ithome and Acrocorinthus unto the two horns of Peloponneſus. Yet would Philip needs hear the opinion of Aratus: who told him plainly, That it were well done to keep the place, if it might be kept without breach of his faith unto the Meſſenians: But if, by ſeizing upon Ithome, he muſt loſe all the other Caſtles that he held, and eſpecially the ſtrongeſt Caſtle of all that was left unto him by Antigonus, which was his credit; then were it far better to depart with his Souldiers, and keep men in duty, as he had done hitherto, by their own good wills, than by fortifying any ſtrong places againſt them, to make them of his friends become his enemies.

To this good advice, Philip yielded at the preſent: but not without ſome diſlike thenceforth growing between him and the Arati: whom he thought more froward than beſeemed them, in contradicting his will. Neither was the old man deſirous at all, to deal any longer in the Kings affairs, or be inward with him. For, as he plainly diſcovered his tyrannous purpoſes; ſo likewiſe he perceived, that in reſorting to his houſe, he had been diſhoneſt with his ſons wife. He therefore ſtaid at home: where at good leaſure he might repent, that in deſpight of Cleomenes, his own Countrey-man, and a temperate Prince, he had brought the Macedonians into Peloponneſus.

Philip made a Voyage out of Peloponneſus into Epirus, wherein Aratus refuſed to bear him company. In this journey he found by experience what Aratus had lately told him, That unhoneſt counſels are not ſo profitable in deed, as in appearance. The Epirots were his followers and dependants; and ſo they purpoſed to continue. But he would needs have them ſo to remain, whether they purpoſed it or not. Wherefore to make them the more obnoxius unto his will, he ſeized upon their Town of Oricum, and laid ſiege to Apollonia; having no good colour of theſe doings: but thinking himſelf ſtrong enough to do what he liſted, and not ſeeing whence they ſhould procure friends to help them. Thus inſtead of ſetling the Country, as his intended Voyage into Italy required: he kindled a fire in it which he could never quench, until it had laid hold on his own Palace. Whileſt he was thus labouring to bind the hands that ſhould have fought for him in Italy, M. Valerius the Roman came into thoſe parts; who not only maintained the Epirots againſt him, but procured the Ætolians to break the Peace, which they had lately made with him.

Thus began that War; the occurrents whereof we have related before, in the place whereto it belonged. In managing whereof, though Philip did the offices of a good Captain: yet when leiſure ſerved, he made it apparent that he was a vicious King. He had not quite left his former deſire, of oppreſſing the liberty of the Meſſenians; but made another journey into their Countrey, with hope to deceive them as before. They underſtood him better now than before; and therefore were not haſty to truſt him too far. When he ſaw that his cunning would not ſerve, he went to work by force; and calling them his enemies, invaded them with open War. But in that War he could do little good; perhaps, becauſe none of his Confederates were deſirous to help him in ſuch an enterpriſe. In this attempt upon Meſſene, he loſt Demetrius Pharius; that was his Counſellor and Flatterer, not his Perverter; as appears by his growing daily more naught in following times. The worſe that he ſped, the more angry he waxed againſt thoſe that ſeemed not to favour his injurious doings. Wherefore, by the miniſtery of Taurion, his Lieutenant, he poiſoned old Aratus; and ſhortly after that, he poyſoned alſo the younger Aratus: hoping that theſe things would never have been known, becauſe they were done ſecretly, and the poyſons themſelves were more ſure than manifeſt in operation. The Sicyonians, and all the people of Achaia, decreed unto Aratus more than humane honours, as Sacrifices, Hymns, and Proceſſions, to be celebrated every year twice, with a Prieſt ordained unto him for that purpoſe; as was accuſtomed unto the Heroes, or men, whom they thought to be tranſlated into the number of the gods. Hereunto they are ſaid to have been encouraged by an Oracle of Apollo: which is like enough to have been true, ſince the help of the Devil is never failing to the increaſe of Idolatry.

The living memory of Aratus their Patron, and ſingular Benefactor, could not but work work in the Achæans a marvellous diſlike of that wicked King which had made him thus away. He ſhall therefore hear of this hereafter, when they better dare to take counſel for themſelves. At the preſent, the murder was not generally known or believed: neither were they in caſe to ſubſiſt, without his help that had committed it. The Ætolians were a moſt outragious people, great darers, and ſhameleſs robbers. With theſe the Romans made a league: whereof the Conditions were ſoon divulged, eſpecially that main point, concerning the diviſion of the purchaſe which they ſhould make, namely, That the Ætolians ſhould have the Countrey and Towns; but the Romans the ſpoil, and carry away the people to ſell for ſlaves. The Achæans, who in times of greater quiet, could not endure to make ſtrait alliance with the Ætolians, as knowing their uncivil diſpoſition; were much the more averſe from them, when they perceived how they had called in the Barbarians (for ſuch did the Greeks account all other Nations except their own) to make havock of the Country. The ſame conſideration moved alſo the Lacedæmonians to ſtand off a while, before they would declare themſelves for the Ætolians, whoſe friendſhip they had embraced in the late war. The induſtry therefore of Philip, and the great care which he ſeemed to take of the Achæans his Confederates, ſufficed to retain them: eſpecially, at ſuch time, as their own neceſſity was thereto concurrent. More particularly he obliged unto himſelf the Dymæans by an ineſtimable benefit: recovering their Town, after it had been taken by the Romans and Ætolians; and redeeming their people whereſoever they might be found, that had been carried away captive, and ſold abroad for ſlaves. Thus might he have blotted out the memory of offences paſt: if the malignity of his natural condition had not otherwhiles broken out, and given men to underſtand, that it was the Time, and not his Vertue, which cauſed him to make ſuch a ſhew of goodneſs. Among other foul acts, whereof he was not aſhamed, he took Polycratia the wife of the younger Aratus, and carried her into Macedon: little regarding how this might ſerve to confirm in the people their opinion, that he was guilty of the old mans death. But of ſuch faults he ſhall be told, when the Romans make War upon him the ſecond time: for, of that which happened in this their firſt Invaſion, I hold it ſuperfluous to make repetition.

§. V.

Of Philopœmen General of the Achæans: and Machanidas, Tyrant of Lacedæmon. A battel between them, wherein Machanidas is ſlain.

IT happens often, that the deceaſe of one eminent man diſcovers the vertue of another. In the place of Aratus there ſtood up Philopœmen: whoſe notable valour, and great ſkill in Arms, made the Nation of the Achæans redoubtable among all the Greeks, and careleſs of ſuch protection, as in former times they had needed againſt the violence of their neighbours. This is that Philopœmen, who being then a young man, and having no command, did eſpecial ſervice to Antigonus at the battel of Sellaſia againſt Cleomenes. Thence forward untill now he had ſpent the moſt part of his time in the Iſle of Crete: the Inhabitants whereof being a valiant people, and ſeldom or never at peace between themſelves; he bettered among them his knowledge, and practice in the Art of War. At his return home, he had charge of the Horſe: wherein he carried himſelf ſo ſtrictly, travelling with all the Cities of the Confederacy to have his followers well mounted, & armed at all pieces; as alſo he ſo diligently trained them up in all exerciſe of ſervice, that he made the Achæans very ſtrong in that part of their forces. Being afterward choſen Prætor or General of the Nation, he had no leſs care to reform their military diſcipline throughout, whereby his Countrey might be ſtrong enough to defend it ſelf, and not any longer (as in former times) need to depend upon the help of others. He perſwaded the Achæans to cut off their vain expence of bravery, in apparel, houſhold-ſtuff, and curious fare, and to beſtow that coſt upon their Arms: wherein by how much they were the more gallant, by ſo much were they like to prove the better Souldiers, and ſutable in behaviour, unto the pride of their furniture. They had ſerved hitherto with little light Bucklers, and ſlender Darts, to caſt afar off; that were uſeful in ſkirmiſhing at ſome diſtance, or for ſurpriſes, or ſudden and haſty Expeditions, whereto Aratus had been moſt accuſtomed. But when they came to handy-ſtrokes, they were good for nothing, ſo long as they were wholly driven to rely upon the courage of their Mercenaries. Philopœmen altered this: cauſing them to arm themſelves more weightily, to uſe a larger kind of ſhield, with good ſwords, and ſtrong pikes, fit for ſervice at hand. He taught them alſo to fight in cloſe order, order, and altered the form of their embattelling: not making the Files ſo deep as had been accuſtomed, but extending the Front, that he might uſe the ſervice of many hands.

Eight moneths were ſpent of that year, in which he firſt was Prætor of the Achæans, when Machanidas the Tyrant of Lacedæmon cauſed him to make trial, how his Souldiers had profited by his diſcipline. This Machanidas was the ſucceſſor unto Lycurgus, a man more violent than his fore-goer. He kept in pay a ſtrong Army of Mercenaries: and he kept them not only to fight for Sparta, but to hold the City in obedience to himſelf perforce. Wherefore it behoved him not to take part with the Achæans, that were favorers of liberty; but to ſtrengthen himſelf by friendſhip of the Ætolians: who, in making Alliances, took no further notice of vice or vertue, than as it had reference to their own profit. The people alſo of Lacedæmon, through their inveterate hatred unto the Argives, Achæans, and Macedonians, were in like ſort (all or moſt of them) inclinable to the Ætolian Faction. Very unwiſely. For in ſeeking to take revenge upon thoſe, that had lately hindered them from getting the Lordſhip of Peloponneſus; they hindered themſelves thereby from recovering the Maſtery of their own City. This affection of the Spartans, together with the regard of his own ſecurity, and no ſmall hope of good that would follow, ſuffered not Machanidas to be idle; but alwayes made him ready to fall upon his neighbours backs, and take of theirs what he could, whileſt they were enforced, by greater neceſſity, to turn face another way. Thus had he often done, eſpecially in the abſence of Philip: whoſe ſudden coming into thoſe parts, or ſome other oppoſition made againſt him, had uſually made him fail of his attempts. At the preſent he was ſtronger in men, than were the Achæans, and thought his own men better Souldiers than were theirs.

Whileſt Philip therefore was buſied elſewhere, he entered the Country of the Mantinæans: being not without hope to do as Cleomenes had done before him; yea and perhaps to get the * Lordſhip of Peloponneſus, as having ſtronger friends and weaker oppoſition, than Cleomenes had found. But Philopœmen was ready to entertain him at Mantinæa; where was fought between them a great battel. The Tyrant had brought into the field upon Carts a great many of engines, wherewith to beat upon the Squadrons of his enemies, and put them in diſorder. To prevent this danger, Philopœmen ſent forth his light armature a good way before him; ſo as Machanidas was fain to do the like. To ſecond theſe, from the one and the other ſide came in continual ſupply; till at length all the Mercenaries, both of the Achæans and of Machanidas, were drawn up to the fight: being ſo far advanced, each before their own Phalanx, that it could no otherwiſe be diſcerned which preſſed forward, or which recoyled, than by riſing of the duſt. Thus were Machanidas his engines made unſerviceable, by the interpoſition of his own men; in ſuch manner as the Cannon is hindered from doing execution, in moſt of the battels fought in theſe our times. The mercenaries of the Tyrant prevailed at length: not only by their advantage of number, but (as Polybius well obſerveth) by ſurmounting their oppoſites in degree of courage; wherein uſually the hired Souldiers of Tyrants exceed thoſe that are waged by free States. For as it is true, that a free people are much more valiant than they which live oppreſſed by Tyranny, ſince the one, by doing their beſt in fight, have hope to acquire ſomewhat beneficial to themſelves, whereas the other do fight (as it were) to aſſure their own ſervitude: ſo the Mercenaries of a Tyrant, being made partakers with him in the fruits of his proſperity, have as good cauſe to maintain his quarrel as their own; whereas they that ſerve under a free State, have no other motive to do manfully, than their bare ſtipend. Further than this, when a free State hath gotten the Victory, many companies (if not all) of forreign Auxiliaries are preſently caſt; and therefore ſuch good fellows will not take much pains to bring the War to an end. But the Victory of a Tyrant, makes him ſtand in need of more ſuch helpers; becauſe that after it he doth wrong to more, as having more ſubjects; and therefore ſtands in fear of more, that ſhould ſeek to take revenge upon him. The ſtipendiaries of the Achæans, being forced to give ground, were urged ſo violently in their retreat by thoſe of Machanidas; that ſhortly they betook themſelves to flight: and could not be ſtaid by any perſwaſions of Philopœmen, but ran away quite beyond the battel of the Achæans. This diſaſter had been ſufficient to take from Philopœmen the honour of the day; had he not wiſely obſerved the demeanour of Machanidas, and found in him that error which might reſtore the Victory. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries gave chace unto thoſe that fled: leaving behind him in good order of battel his Lacedæmonians; whom he thought ſufficient to deal with the Achæans, that were already diſheartned by the flight of their companions. But when this his rashness had carried him out of sight, Philopœmen advanced towards the Lacedæmonians that stood before him. There lay between them athwart the Country a long ditch, without watter at that time, and therefore passable (as it seemed) without much difficulty, especially for Foot. The Lacedæmonians adventured over it, as thinking themselves better Souldiers than the Achæans; who had in a manner already lost the day. But hereby they greatly disordered their own Battel; and had no sooner the foremost of them recovered the further bank, than they were stoutly charged by the Achæans, who drave them headlong into the ditch again. Their first ranks being broken, all the rest began to shrink: so as Philopœmen getting over the ditch, easily chaced them out of the Field. Philopœmen knew better how to use his advantage, than Machanidas had done. He suffered not all his Army to disband and follow the chace, but retained with him a sufficient strength, for the custody of a bridge that was over the ditch, by which he knew that the Tyrant must come back. The Tyrant with his Mercenaries returning from the chace, looked very heavily when he saw what was fallen out. Yet, with a lusty troop of Horse about him, he made towards the bridge: hoping to find the Achæans in disorder; and to set upon their backs, as they were carelesly pursuing their Victory. But when he and his Company saw Philopœmen ready to make good the bridge against them; then began every one to look, which way he might shift for himself. The Tyrant, with no more than two in his company, rode along the ditch side; and searched for an easie passage over. He was easily discovered by his purple Cassock, and the costly trappings of his Horse. Philopœmen therefore leaving the charge of the bridge unto another, coasted him all the way as he rode, and falling upon him at length in the ditch it self, as he was getting over it, slew him there with his own hand. There died in this Battel on the Lacedæmonians side about four thousand: and more than four thousand were taken prisoners. Of the Achæan Mercenaries, probable it is, that the loss was not greatly cared for; since that War was at an end, and for their money they might hire more when they should have need.

§. VI.

Philip having peace with Rome, and with all Greece, prepares against Asia. Of the Kings of Pergamus, Cappadocia, Pontus, Paphlagonia, Bithynia, and their Lineages. Of the Galatians.

BY this Victory the Achæans learned to think well of themselves. Neither needed they indeed after a while (such was their discipline and continual exercise) to account themselves in matter of War inferiour to any, that should have brought against them no great odds of number. As for the Macedonian, he made no great use of them. But when he had once concluded peace with the Romans and Ætolians, he studied how to enlarge his Dominion Eastward; since the fortune of his friends the Carthaginians declined in the West. He took in hand many matters together, or very neerly together, and some of them not honest: wherein if the Achæans would have done him service, they must by helping him to oppress others that never had wronged him, have taught him the way how to deal with themselves. He greatly hated Attalus King of Pergamus, who had joyned with the Romans and Ætolians in War against him.

This Attalus, though a King, was scarce yet a Nobleman, otherwise than as he was ennobled by his own, and by his Fathers vertue. His fortune began in Philetærus his Uncle: who being guelded, by reason of a mishap which he had when he was a child, grew afterwards thereby to be the more esteemed: as great men in those times reposed much confidence in Eunuchs, whose affections could not be obliged unto wives or children. He was entertained into the family of Docimus, a Captain following Antigonus the first; and after the death of Antigonus, he accompanied his Master, that betook himself to Lysimachus King of Thrace. Lysimachus had a good opinion of him; and put him in trust with his money and accounts. But when at length he stood in fear of this King, that grew a bloody Tyrant; he fled into Asia, where he seized upon the Town of Pergamus, and nine thousand talents belonging to Lysimachus. The Town and money, together with his own service, he offered unto Seleucus the first, that then was ready to give Lysimachus battel. His offer was kindly accepted, but never performed; for that Seleucus, having slain Lysimachus, died shortly after himself, before he made use of Philetærus or his money. So this Eunuch still retained Pergamus, with the Country round about it; and reigned therein twenty years as an absolute King. He had had two brethren: of which the elder is ſaid to have been a poor Carter; and the younger perhaps not much better, before ſuch time, they were raiſed by the fortune of this Eunuch. Philetærus left his Kingdom to the elder of theſe, or to the ſon of the elder, called Eumenes. This Eumenes enlarged his Kingdom; making his advantage of the diſſention between Seleucus Calinicus and Antiochus Hierax, the ſons of the ſecond Antiochus. He fought a battel with Hierax, neer unto Sardis, and won the Victory. At which time, to animate his men againſt the Gaules that ſerved under his Enemy, he uſed a pretty device. He wrote the word * Victory upon the hand of his Soothſayer, in ſuch colours as would eaſily come off: and when the hot liver of the beaſt that was ſacrificed, had cleanly taken the print of the letters, He publiſhed this unto his Army as a Miracle, plainly foreſhewing that the gods would be aſſiſtant in that Battel.

After this Victory, he grew a dreadful enemy to Seleucus: who never durſt attempt to recover from him, by War, the Territory that he had gotten and held. Finally, when he had reigned two and twenty years, he died by a ſurfeit of over-much drink, and left his Kingdom to Attalus, of whom we now entreat, that was ſon unto Attalus the youngeſt brother of Philetærus. Attalus was an undertaking Prince, very bountiful, and no leſs valiant. By his own proper forces he reſtored his friend Ariarathes the Cappadocian into his Kingdom, whence he had been expelled. He was grievouſly moleſted by Achæus: who ſetting up himſelf as King againſt Antiochus the Great, reigned in the leſſer Aſia. He was beſieged in his own City of Pergamus: but by the help of the Tectoſages, a Nation of the Gauls, whom he called over out of Thrace, he recovered all that he had loſt. When theſe Gauls had once gotten footing in Aſia, they never wanted employment, but were either entertained by ſome of the Princes reigning in thoſe quarters, or interpoſed themſelves without invitation; and found themſelves work in quarrels of their own making. They cauſed Pruſias King of Bithynia to ceaſe from his War againſt Bizantium. Whereunto when he had condeſcended; they nevertheleſs within a while after invaded his Kingdom. He obtained againſt them a great Victory; and uſed it with great cruelty, ſparing neither age nor ſex. But the ſwarm of them increaſing, they occupied the Region about Helleſpont where, in ſeating themſelves, they were much beholding unto Attalus. Nevertheleſs, preſuming afterwards upon their ſtrength, they forced their Neighbour Princes and Cities to pay them tribute: in the ſharp exaction whereof, they had no more reſpect unto Attalus, than to any that had worſe deſerved of them. By this they compelled him to fight againſt them: and he being victorious, compelled them to contain themſelves within the bounds of that Province, which took name from them in time following, and was called Galatia. Yet continued they ſtill to oppreſs the weakeſt of their neighbours, and to fill up the Armies of thoſe that could beſt hire them.

The Kings reigning in thoſe parts, were the poſterity of ſuch, as had ſaved themſelves and their Provinces, in the ſlothful reign of the Perſians; or in the buſie times of Alexander, and his Macedonian followers. The Cappadocians were very ancient. For the firſt of their line had married with Ateſſa, ſiſter unto the great King Cyrus. Their Country was taken from them by Perdiccas, as is ſhewed before. But the ſon of that King, whom Perdiccas crucified, eſpying his time while the Macedonians were at civil wars among themſelves; recovered his Dominion, and paſſed it over to his off-ſpring. The Kings of Pontus had alſo their beginning from the Perſian Empire; and are ſaid to have iſſued from the royal houſe of Achæmenes. The Paphlagonians derived themſelves from Pylemenes, a King that aſſiſted Priamus at the war of Troy. Theſe, applying themſelves unto the times, were alwayes conformable unto the ſtrongeſt. The Anceſtors of Pruſias had begun to reign in Bythinia, ſome few generations before that of the great Alexander. They lay ſomewhat out of the Macedonians way: by whom therefore, having other employment, they were the leſs moleſted. Calantus, one of Alexanders Captains, made an expedition into their Country, where he was vanquiſhed. They had afterwards to do with a Lieutenant of Antigonus, that made them ſomewhat more humble. And thus they ſhuffled, as did the reſt, until the reign of Pruſias, whom we have already ſometimes mentioned.

§. VII.

The Town of Chios taken by Philip, at the inſtance of Pruſias, King of Bithynia, and cruelly deſtroyed. By this and the like actions, Philip grows hateful to many of the Greeks: and is warred upon by Attalus King of Pergamus, and by the Rhodians.

PRuſias as a neighbour King, had many quarrels with Attalus; whoſe greatneſs

he ſuſpected. He therefore ſtrengthened himſelf, by taking to wife the daughter of Philip; as Attalus, on the contrary ſide, entred into a ſtrict Confederacy with the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other of the Greeks. But when Philip had ended his Ætolian war, and was deviſing with Antiochus about ſharing between them two the Kingdom of Egypt, wherein Ptolomy Philopater, a friend unto them both, was newly dead; and had left his ſon Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young child, his heir: the Bythinian entreated this his Father-in-law to come over into Aſia, there to win the Town of the Ciani, and beſtow it upon him. Pruſias had no right unto the Town, nor juſt matter of quarrel againſt it: but it was fitly ſeated for him, and therewithal rich. Philip came, as one that could not well deny to help his Son-in-law. But hereby he mightily offended no ſmall part of Greece. Embaſſadours came to him whilſt he lay at the ſiege, from the Rhodians, and divers other States: intreating him to forſake the enterpriſe. He gave dilatory, but otherwiſe gentle anſwers: making ſhew as if he would condeſcend to their requeſt, when he intended nothing leſs. At length he got the Town: where, even in preſence of the Embaſſadours, of whoſe ſolicitation he had ſeemed ſo regardful, he omitted no part of cruelty. Hereby he rendred himſelf odious to his neighbours, as a perfidious and cruel Prince. Eſpecially his fact was deteſted of the Rhodians, who had made vehement interceſſion for the poor Ciani: and were advertiſed by Embaſſadours of purpoſe ſent unto them from Philip, That howſoever it were in his power to win the Town as ſoon as he liſted, yet in regard of his love to the Rhodians, he was contented to give it over. And by this his clemency, the Embaſſadours ſaid, that he would manifeſt unto the world what ſlanderous tongues they were, which noiſed abroad ſuch reports, as went of his falſhood and oppreſſion. Whileſt the Embaſſadours were declaming at Rhodes in the Theater to this effect; there came ſome that made a true relation of what had hapned: ſhewing that Philip had ſacked and deſtroyed the Town of Cios, and, after a cruel ſlaughter of the Inhabitants, had made ſlaves of all that eſcaped the ſword. If the Rhodians took this in great deſpight, no leſs were the Ætolians inflamed againſt him: ſince they had ſent a Captain to take charge of the Town; being warned before by his doings at Lyſimachia and Chalcedon (which he had withdrawn from their Confederacy to his own) what little truſt was to be repoſed in the faith of this King. But moſt of all others was Attalus moved with conſideration of the Macedonians violent ambition, and of his own eſtate. He had much to loſe; and was not without hope of getting much, if he could make a ſtrong party in Greece. He had already, as a new King, followed the example of Alexanders Captains, in purchaſing with much liberality the love of the Athenians; which were notable Trumpeters of other mens vertue, having loſt their own. On the friendſhip of the Ætolians he had cauſe to preſume; having bound them unto him by good offices, many & great, in their late war with Philip. The Rhodians that were mighty at Sea, and held very good intelligence with the Egyptians, Syrians, and many other Princes and States, he eaſily drew into a ſtreight alliance with him, by their hatred newly conceived againſt Philip.

Upon confidence in theſe his friends, but moſt of all, in the ready aſſiſtance of the Rhodians, Attalus prepared to deal with the Macedonian by open war. It had been unſeaſonable to procraſtinate, and expect whereto the doings of the enemy tended; ſince his deſire to faſten upon Aſia was manifeſt, and his falſhood no leſs manifeſt, than was ſuch his deſire. They met with him ſhortly not far from Chios, and fought with him a battel at Sea: wherein though Attalus was driven to run his own Ship on ground, hardly eſcaping to land: though the Admiral of the Rhodians took his deaths wound: and though Philip after the battel took harbour under a Promontory, by which they had fought, ſo that he had the gathering of the wracks upon the ſhore: Yet foraſmuch as he had ſuffered far greater loſs of Ships, and men, than had the enemy; and ſince he durſt not in few dayes after put forth to Sea, when Attalus and the Rhodians came to brave him in his Port; the honour of the victory was adjudged to his enemies. This notwithſtanding, Philip afterwards beſieged and won ſome Towns in Caria: whether only in a bravery, and to deſpight his oppoſites: or whether upon any hopeful deſire of conqueſt, it is uncertain. The ſtratagem, by which he won Prinaſſus, is worthy of noting. He attempted it by a mine: and finding the earth ſo ſtony, that it reſiſted his work; he nevertheleſs commanded the Pioners to make a noiſe under ground; and ſecretly in the night time he raiſed great mounts about the entrance of the mine, to breed an opinion in the beſieged, that the work went marvellouſly forward. At length he ſent word to the Towns-men, that by his undermining, two acres of their wall ſtood only upon wooden wooden props, to which if he gave fire, and entred by a Breach, they ſhould expect no mercy. The Prinaſſians little thought, that he had fetcht all his earth and rubbiſh by night a great way off, to raiſe up thoſe heaps which they ſaw; but rather that all had been extracted out of the mine. Wherefore they ſuffered themſelves to be out-faced, and gave up the Town as loſt, which the enemy had no hope to win by force. But Philip could not ſtay to ſettle himſelf in thoſe parts. Attalus and the Rhodians were too ſtrong for him at Sea, and compelled him to make haſte back into Macedon; whither they followed him all the way in manner of purſuit.

§. VIII.

The Romans, after their Carthaginian War, ſeek matter of quarrel againſt Philip. The Athenians upon ſlight cauſe, proclaim War againſt Philip; moved thereto by Attalus; whom they flatter. Philip wins divers Towns; and makes peremptory anſwer to the Roman Embaſſadour. The furious reſolution of the Abydeni.

THeſe Aſiatique matters, which no way concerned the Romans, yet ſerved well to make a noiſe in Rome; and fill the peoples heads, if not with a deſire of making war in Macedon, at leaſt with a conceit that it were expedient ſo to do. The Roman Senate was perfectly informed of the ſtate of thoſe Eaſtern Countries; and knew, that there was none other Nation than the Greeks, which lay between them and the Lordſhip of Aſia. Theſe Greeks were factious, and ſeldom or never at peace. As for the Macedonian; though length of time, and continual dealings in Greece ever ſince the reigns of Philip and Alexander, had left no difference between him and the Naturals: yet moſt of them abhorred his Dominion, becauſe he was originally forſooth a Barbarian: many of them hated him upon ancient quarrels: and they that had been moſt beholding unto him, were nevertheleſs weary of him, by reaſon of his perſonal faults. All this gave hope, that the affairs of Greece would not long detain the Roman Armies: eſpecially ſince the diviſions of the Country were ſuch, that every petty Eſtate was apt to take Counſel apart for it ſelf; without much regarding the generality. But the poor Commonalty of Rome had no great affection to ſuch a chargeable enterpriſe. They were already quite exhauſted, by that grievous war with Hannibal: wherein they had given by Loan to the Republick, all their mony: neither had they as yet received, neither did they receive until fifteen or ſixteen years after this, their whole ſum back again. That part of payment alſo which was already made, being not in preſent mony, but much of it in Land: it behoved them to reſt a while; and beſtow the more diligence in tilling their grounds, by how much they were the leſs able to beſtow coſt. Wherefore they took no pleaſure to hear, that Attalus and the Rhodians had ſent Embaſſadours to ſolicite them againſt Philip, with report of his bold attempts in Aſia: or that M. Aurelius, their Agent in Greece, had ſent letters of the ſame tenour to the Senate, and magnified his intelligence, by ſetting out the preparations of this dangerous enemy, that ſolicited not only the Towns upon the Continent, but all the Iſlands in thoſe Seas, viſiting them in perſon, or ſending Embaſſadours, as one that meant ſhortly to hold war with the Romans upon their own ground. Philip had indeed no ſuch intent: neither was he much too ſtrong, either of himſelf, or by his alliance in Greece, to be reſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians; eſpecially with the help of the Ætolians their good friends, and (in a manner) his own profeſſed enemies. But ſuch things muſt be publiſhed abroad, if only to prediſpoſe men unto the war, and give it the more honeſt colour.

Philip was a man of ill condition; and therefore could not thrive by intermedling in the affairs of thoſe that were more mighty than himſelf. He was too unſkilful, or otherwiſe too unapt, to retain his old friends: yet would he needs be ſeeking new enemies. And he found them ſuch, as he deſerved to have them: for he offered his help to their deſtruction, when they were in miſery, and had done him no harm. It behoved him therefore, either to have ſtrained his forces to the utmoſt in making war upon them; or in deſiſting from that injurious courſe, to have made amends for the wrongs paſt, by doing friendly offices of his own accord. But he, having broken that League of peace, which is of all other the moſt natural, binding all men to offer no violence willingly, unleſs they think themſelves juſtly provoked; was afterwards too fondly perſwaded, that he might well be ſecure of the Romans, becauſe of the written Covenants of peace between him and them. There is not any form of Oath, whereby ſuch Articles of peace can be held inviolable, ſave only * by the water of Styx, that is, by Neceſſity: which whileſt it binds one party, or both both unto performance, making it apparent, that he ſhall be a loſer who ſtarts from the Conditions; it may ſo long (and ſo long only) be preſumed, that there ſhall be no breach. Till Hannibal was vanquiſhed, the Romans never hearkened after Philip: for neceſſity made them let him alone. But when once they had a peace with Carthage; then was the River of Styx dryed up: and then could they ſwear as * Mercury did in the Comedy, by their own ſelves, even by their good ſwords, that they had good reaſon to make war upon him. The voyage of Sopater into Africk, and the preſent war againſt Attalus, were matter of quarrel as much as needed: or if this were not enough; the Athenians helped to furniſh them with more.

The Athenians, being at this time Lords of no more than their own barren Territory, took ſtate upon them nevertheleſs, as in their ancient fortune. Two young Gentlemen of Acarnania entring into the Temple of Ceres, in the dayes of Initiation (wherein were delivered the myſteries of Religion, or rather of idolatrous ſuperſtition, vainly ſaid to be available unto felicity after this life) diſcovered themſelves by ſome impertinent queſtions, to be none of thoſe that were initiated. Hereupon they were brought before the officers: and though it was apparent, that they came into the place by meer error, not thinking to have therein done amiſs; yet, as it had been for ſome hainous crime, they were put to death. All their Countrey-men at home took this in ill part; and ſought to revenge it as a publick injury, by war upon the Athenians. Procuring therefore of Philip ſome Macedonians to help them, they entred into Attica: who waſted it with fire and ſword; and carried thence a great booty. This indignity ſtirred up the high-minded Athenians; and made them think upon doing more, than they had ability to perform. All which at the preſent they could do, was to ſend Embaſſadors to King Attalus; gratulating his happy ſucceſs againſt Philip, and intreating him to viſit their City. Attalus was hereto the more willing, becauſe he underſtood that the Roman Embaſſadors, hovering about Greece for matter of intelligence, had a purpoſe to be there at the ſame time. So he went thither, accompanied, beſides his own followers, with ſome of the Rhodians. Landing in the Piræus, he found the Romans there, with whom he had much friendly conference: they rejoycing that he continued enemy to Philip; and he being no leſs glad, when he heard of their purpoſe to renew the war. The Athenians came out of their City, all the Magiſtrates, Prieſts, and Citizens, with their wives and children, in as ſolemn a pomp as they could deviſe, to meet and honour the King. They entertained the Romans that were with him, in very loving manner: but towards Attalus himſelf they omitted no point of obſervance which their flattery could ſuggeſt. At his firſt coming into the City, they called the people to Aſſembly: where they deſired him to honour them with his preſence, and let them hear him ſpeak. But he excuſed himſelf; ſaying, That with an evil grace he ſhould recount unto them thoſe many benefits, by which he ſtudied to make them know what love he bore them. Wherefore it was thought fit, that he ſhould deliver in writing, what he would have to be propounded. He did ſo. The points of his Declaration were; firſt, what he had willingly done for their ſake: then, what had lately paſſed between him and Philip: laſtly, an exhortation unto them, to declare themſelves againſt the Macedonians, whileſt he with the Rhodians and the Romans, were willing and ready to take their part: which if they now refuſed to do, he proteſted, that afterwards it would be vain to crave his help. There needed little intreaty: for they were as willing to proclaim the war, as he to deſire it. As for other matters, they loaded him with immoderate honours: and obtained, That unto the ten Tribes, whereof the body of their Citizens conſiſted, ſhould be added another, and called after his name; as if he were in part one of their Founders. To the Rhodians they alſo decreed a Crown of Gold, in reward of their vertue; and made all the Rhodians free Citizens of Athens.

Thus began a great noiſe of war, wherein little was left unto the Romans for their part; Attalus and the Rhodians taking all upon them. But while theſe were vainly miſſpending the time, in ſeeking to draw the Ætolians to their party: that contrary to their old manner were glad to be at quiet: Philip won the Towns of Maronea and Ænus, with many other ſtrong places about the Helleſpont. Likewiſe paſſing over the Helleſpont, he laid ſiege unto Abydus; and won it, though he was fain to ſtay there long. The Town held out, rather upon an obſtinate reſolution, and hope of ſuccour from Attalus and the Rhodians, than any great ability to defend it ſelf againſt ſo mighty an Enemy. But the Rhodians ſent thither only one Quadrireme Gallie: and Attalus no more than three hundred men, far too weak an aid to make good the place. The Roman Embaſſadors wondred much at this great negligence of them that had taken ſo much upon them.

Roman

Theſe Embaſſadors, C. Claudius, M. Æmylius, and P. Sempronius, were ſent unto Ptolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt, to acquaint him with their Victory againſt Hannibal and the Carthaginians; as alſo to thank him for his favour unto them ſhewed in that War; and to deſire the continuance thereof, if they ſhould need it againſt Philip. This Egyptian King was now in the third or fourth year of his reign, which (as his father Philopater had done before him) he began a very young boy. The courteſie for which the Romans were to thank him, was that out of Egypt they had lately been ſupplied with corn, in a time of extream Dearth; when the miſeries of War had made all their own Provinces unable to relieve them. This meſſage could not but be welcome to the Egyptian: ſince it was well known, how Philip and Antiochus had combined themſelves againſt him, conſpiring to take away his Kingdom. And therefore it might in reaſon be hoped, that he, or his Councel for him, ſhould offer to ſupply the Romans with corn: ſince this their Macedonian Expedition concerned his Eſtate no leſs than theirs.

But as the errand was for the moſt part complemental; ſo had the Embaſſadors both leiſure and direction from the Senate, to look unto the things of Greece by the way. Wherefore they agreed, that M. Æmylius the youngeſt of them ſhould ſtep aſide, and viſit Philip, to trie if he could make him leave the ſiege of Abydus; which elſe he was like to carry. Emylius, coming to Philip, tells him that his doings are contrary to the League that he had made with the Romans. For Attalus and the Rhodians, upon whom he made War, were Confederate with Rome: and the Town of Abydus, which he was now beſieging, had a kind of dependancy upon Attalus. Hereto Philip anſwered, That Attalus and the Rhodians had made War upon him: and that he did only requite them with the like. Do you alſo (ſaid Æmylius) requite theſe poor Abydeni with ſuch terrible War, for any the like Invaſion by them firſt made upon you? The King was angry to hear himſelf thus taken ſhort: and therefore he roundly made anſwer to Æmylius: It is your youth, Sir, and your beauty, and (above all,) your being a Roman, that makes you thus preſumptuous. But I would wiſh ye to remember the League that ye have made with me, and to keep it: If ye do otherwiſe, I will make ye underſtand, that the Kingdom, and Name of Macedon is in matter of War, no leſs noble than the Roman. So he diſmiſſed the Embaſſador; and had the Town immediately yielded to his diſcretion. The people had entertained a reſolution, to have died every one of them; and ſet their Town on fire; binding themſelves hereto by a fearful oath when Philip denied to accept them upon reaſonable conditions. But having in deſperate fight, once repelling him from the Breach, loſt the greateſt number of their Youth; it was thought meet by the Governours and Ancients of the City to change this reſolution; and take ſuch peace as could be gotten. So they carried out their Gold and Silver to Philip: about which, whileſt they were buſie, the memory of their oath wrought ſo effectually in the younger ſort; that, by exhortation of the Prieſts, they fell to murdering their women, children, and themſelves. Hereof the King had ſo little compaſſion, that he ſaid, he would grant the Abydeni three dayes leiſure to die: and to that end forbade his men to enter the Town; or hazzard themſelves in interrupting the violence of thoſe mad fools.

The Romans decree War againſt Philip, and ſend one of their Conſuls into Greece, as it were in defence of the Athenians their Confederates. How poor the Athenians were at this time both in quality and eſtate.

THis calamity of the Abydeni, was likened by the Romans unto that of the Saguntines: which indeed it neerly reſembled: though Rome was not alike intereſſed in the quarrel. But to help themſelves with pretence for the War, they had found out another Saguntum, even the City of Athens: which if the Macedonian ſhould win, then reſted there no more to do, than that he ſhould preſently embarque himſelf for Italy, whither he would come, not as Hannibal from Saguntum, in five moneths, but in the ſhort ſpace of five days ſayling. Thus P. Sulpitius the Conſul told the multitude, when he exhorted them to make War upon Philip; which at his firſt propounding they had denied. The example of Pyrrhus was by him alledged; to ſhew, what Philip, with the power of a greater Kingdom, might dare to undertake: as alſo the fortunate voyage of Scipio into Africk; to ſhew the difference of making War abroad, and admitting it into the bowels of their own Country. By ſuch arguments was the Commonalty of Rome indeed to believe, that this War with the Macedonian was both juſt and neceſſary. So it was decreed: and imme-immediately the ſame Conſul haſted away towards Macedon, having that Province allotted unto him before, and all things in a readineſs, by order from the Senate; who followed other Motives than the people muſt be acquainted with. Great thanks were given to the Athenian Embaſſadors, of their conſtancy (as was ſaid) in not changing their faith at ſuch times as they ſtood in danger of being beſieged. And indeed great thanks were due to them, though not upon the ſame occaſion. For the people of Rome had no cauſe to think it a benefit unto themſelves; that any Greek Town, refuſing to ſue unto the Macedonian for peace, requeſted their help againſt him. But the Senate, intending to take in hand the Conqueſt of the Eaſtern parts, had reaſon to give thanks unto thoſe, that miniſtred the occaſion. Since therefore it was an untrue ſuggeſtion, That Philip was making ready for Italy: and ſince neither Attalus, the Rhodians, nor any other State in thoſe quarters, deſired the Romans to give them protection: theſe buſie-headed Athenians, who falling out with the Acarnanians, and conſequently with Philip, a matter of Maygame, (as was ſhewed before) ſent Embaſſadors into all parts of the World, even to Ptolomy of Egypt, and to the Romans, as well as to Attalus and others their neighbours; muſt be accepted as cauſe of the War, and Authors of the benefit thence redounding.

Nevertheleſs as it loves to fall out where the meaning differs from the pretence; the doings of P. Sulpitius the Conſul were ſuch, as might have argued Athens to be the leaſt part of his care. He ſailed not about Peloponneſus, but took the ready way to Macedon, and landing about the River of Apſus, between Dyrrhachium and Apollonia, there began the War. Soon upon his coming, the Athenian Embaſſadours were with him and craved his help: whereof they could make no benefit whileſt he was far from them. They bemoaned themſelves as men beſieged, and intreated him to deliver them. For which cauſe he ſent unto them C. Claudius with twenty Gallies, and a competent number of men: but the main of his forces he retained with him, for the proſecution of a greater deſign. The Athenians were not indeed beſieged: only ſome Rovers from Chalcis, in the Iſle of Eubœa, and ſome bands of adventures out of Corinth uſed to take their Ships, and ſpoil their fields, becauſe they had declared themſelves againſt King Philip, that was Lord of theſe two Towns. The robberies done by theſe Pyrats and Free-booters, were by the more eloquent than war-like Athenians, in this declining Age of their Fortune and Vertue, called a Siege. From ſuch detriment the arrival of Claudius, and ſhortly after of three Rhodian Gallies, eaſily preſerved them. As for the Athenians themſelves, they that had been wont, in ancient times to undertake the conqueſts of Egypt, Cyprus, and Cicil; to make War upon the great Perſian King, and to hold ſo much of Greece in ſubjection, as made them redoubtable unto all the reſt; had now no more than three Ships, and thoſe open ones, not much better than long boats. Yet thought they not themſelves a whit the worſe men, but ſtood as highly upon the glory and vertue of their Anceſtors, as if it had been ſtill their own.

§. X.

The Town of Chalcis in Eubœa taken and ſackt by the Romans & their Aſſociates, that lay in Garriſon at Athens. Philip attempteth to take Athens by ſurpriſe: waſteth the Countrey about, and makes a journy into Peloponneſus. Of Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, and his wife. Philip offers to make War againſt Nabis for the Achæans. He returneth home through Attica, which he ſpoileth again: and provides againſt the Enemies. Some exploits of the Romans. Divers Princes joyn with them. Great labouring to draw the Ætolians into the War.

PHilip returning home from Abydus, heard news of the Roman Conſul his being about Apollonia. But ere he ſtirred forth to give him entertainment, or perhaps before he had well reſolved, whether it were beſt a while to ſit ſtill, and try what might be done for obtaining of peace, or whether to make oppoſition, and reſiſt theſe Invaders with all his forces: he received advertiſement from Chalcis of a grievous miſhap there befallen him, by procurement of the Athenians. For C. Claudius with his Romans, finding no ſuch work at Athens as they had expected, or was anſwerable to the fame that went abroad, purpoſed to do ſomewhat that might quicken the War, and make his own imployment better. He grew ſoon weary of ſitting as a Scar-crow, to ſave the Athenians grounds from ſpoil; and therefore gladly took in hand a buſineſs of more importance. The Town of Chalcis was very negligently guarded by the Macedonian Souldiers therein, for that there was no Enemy at hand: and more negligently by the Towns-men, who repoſed themſelves upon their Garriſon. Hereof Claudius having adadvertiſement, ſailed thither by night, for fear of being deſcried: and arriving there a little before break of day, took it by Scalado. He uſed no mercy, but ſlew all that came in his way: and wanting men to keep it, (unleſs he ſhould have left the heartleſs Athenians to their own defence) he ſet it on fire; conſuming the Kings Magazines of Corn, and all proviſions for War, which were plenteouſly filled. Neither were he and his Aſſociates contented with the great abundance of ſpoil which they carried aboard their Ships, and with inlarging all thoſe, whom Philip, as in a place of moſt ſecurity, kept there impriſoned: but to ſhew their deſpight and hatred unto the King, they overthrew and brake in pieces the Statues to him there erected. This done, they haſted away towards Athens: where the news of their exploit was like to be joyfully welcomed. The King lay then at Demetrias, about ſome 20. miles thence; whither then theſe tidings, or part of them, were brought him, though he ſaw that it was too late to remedy the matter; yet he made all haſte to take revenge. He thought to have taken the Athenians, with their truſty friends, buſie at work in ranſacking the Town, and loading themſelves with ſpoil: but they were gone before his coming. Five thouſand light-armed foot he had with him, and three hundred horſe: whereof leaving at Chalcis only a few to bury the dead, he marched from thence away ſpeedily toward Athens: thinking it not impoſſible to take his enemies in the joy of their Victory, as full of negligence, as they had taken Chalcis. Neither had he much failed of his expectation, if a Foot-poſt that ſtood Scout for the City upon the borders, had not deſcried him afar off, and ſwiftly carried word of his approach to Athens. It was mid-night when this Poſt came thither: who found all the Town aſleep, as fearleſs of any danger. But the Magiſtrates, hearing this report, cauſed a Trumpet out of their Citadel to ſound the Alarm, and with all ſpeed made ready for defence. Within a few hours Philip was there; who ſeeing the many lights, and other ſigns of buſie preparation uſual in ſuch a caſe, underſtood that they had news of his coming; and therefore willed his men to repoſe themſelves till it were day. It is like, that the paucity of his followers did help well to animate the Citizens, which beheld them from the walls. Wherefore though Claudius were not yet returned (who was to fetch a compaſs about by Sea, and had no cauſe of haſte) yet having in the Town ſome mercenary Souldiers, which they kept of their own, beſides the great multitude of Citizens; they adventured to iſſue forth at a gate, whereto they ſaw Philip make approach. The King was glad of this; reckoning all thoſe his own, that were thus hardy. He therefore only willed his men to follow his example; and preſently gave charge upon them. In that fight he gave ſingular proof of his valour: and beating down many of the Enemies with his own hands, drave them with great ſlaughter back into the City. The heat of his courage tranſported him further than diſcretion would have allowed, even to the very gate. But he retired without harm taking; for that they which were upon the Towers over the gate, could not uſe their caſting weapons againſt him, without much indangering their own people that were thronging before him into the City. There was a temple of Hercules, a place of exerciſe, with a Grove, and many goodly Monuments beſides, neer adjoyning unto Athens: of which he ſpared none; but ſuffered the rage of his anger to extend, even unto the ſepulchres of the dead. The next day came the Romans, and ſome Companies of Attalus his men from Ægina; too late in regard of what was already paſt: but in good time to prevent him of ſatisfying his anger to the full, which as yet he had not done. So he departed from thence to Corinth, and hearing that the Achæans held a Parliament at Argos, he came thither to them unexpected.

The Achæans were deviſing upon War: which they intended to make againſt Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon: who being ſtarted up in the room of Machanidas, did greater miſchief than any that went before him. This Tyrant relied wholly upon his mercenaries: and of his ſubjects had no regard. He was a cruel oppreſſor, a greedy extortioner upon thoſe that lived under him; and one that in his natural condition ſmelt rankly of the Hangman. In theſe qualities, his wife Apega was very fitly matched with him, ſince his dexterity was no greater in ſpoiling the men, then hers in fleecing their wives; whom ſhe would never ſuffer to be at quiet, till they had preſented her with all their jewels and apparel. Her huſband was ſo delighted with her property, that he cauſed an Image to be made, lively repreſenting her; and apparelled it with ſuch coſtly garments as ſhe uſed to wear. But it was indeed an Engine, ſerving to torment men. Hereof he made uſe, when he meant to try the vertue of his Rhetorick. For calling unto him ſome rich man, of whoſe money he was deſirous; he would bring him into the room where this counterfeit Apega ſtood, and there uſe all his art of perſwaſion, to get what he deſired, as it were by good will. If he could not ſo ſpeed, but was anſwered with excuſes; then took he the refractory denyer by the hand, and told him, that perhaps his Wife Apega (who ſate by in a Chair) could perſwade more effectually. So he led him to the Image, that roſe up and opened the arms, as it were for imbracement. Thoſe arms were full of ſharp iron nails, the like whereof was alſo ſticking in the breaſts, though hidden with her clothes: and herewith ſhe griped the poor wretch, to the pleaſure of the Tyrant, that laughed at his cruel death. Such, and worſe (for it were long to tell all here that is ſpoken of him) was Nabis in his government. In his dealings abroad he combined with the Ætolians, as Machanidas and Lycurgus had done before him. By theſe he grew into acquaintance with the Romans; and was comprehended in the League which they made with Philip, at the end of their former War. Of Philopœmens vertue he ſtood in fear: and therefore durſt not provoke the Achæans, as long as they had ſuch an able Commander. But when Cycliades, a far worſe Captain, was their Prætor, and all, or the greateſt part of their Mercenaries were diſcharged; Philopœmen being alſo gone into Crete, to follow his beloved occupation of War; then did Nabis fall upon their Territory; and waſting all the fields, made them diſtruſt their own ſafety in the Towns.

Againſt this Tyrant the Achæans were preparing for War, when Philip came among them, and had ſet down what proportion of Souldiers every City of their Corporation ſhould furniſh out. But Philip willed them not to trouble themſelves with the care of this buſineſs; foraſmuch as he alone would eaſe them of this War, and take the burden upon himſelf. With exceeding joy and thanks they accepted of this kind offer. But then he told them, That whileſt he made War upon Lacedæmon, he ought not to leave his own Towns unguarded. In which reſpect he thought they would be pleaſed to ſend a few men to Corinth, and ſome Companies into he Iſle of Eubœa; that ſo he might ſecurely purſue the War againſt Nabis. Immediately they found out his device; which was none other, than to engage their Nation in his War againſt the Romans. Wherefore their Prætor Cycliades made him anſwer, That their Laws forbade them to conclude any other matters in their Parliament, than thoſe for which it was aſſembled. So paſſing the Decree, upon which they had agreed before, for preparing War againſt Nabis, he brake up the Aſſembly, with every mans good liking; whereas in former times, he had been thought no better than one of the Kings Paraſites.

It grieved the King to have thus failed in his purpoſe with the Achæans. Nevertheleſs he gathered up among them a few Voluntaries; and ſo returned by Corinth back into Attica. There he met with Philocles one of his Captains, that with two thouſand men had been doing what harm he might unto the Country. With this adition of ſtrength, he attempted the Caſtle of Eleuſine, the haven of Pyreus, and even the City of Athens. But the Romans made ſuch haſte after him by Sea, thruſting themſelves into every of theſe places; that he could no more than wreak his anger upon thoſe goodly Temples, with which the Land of Attica was at that time ſingularly beautified. So he deſtroyed all the works of their notable Artificers, wrought in excellent Marble; which they had in plenty of their own: or having long ago been Maſters of the Sea, had brought from other places, where beſt choice was found. Neither did he only pull all down: but cauſed his men to break the very ſtones, that they might be unſerviceable to their reparation. His loſs at Chalcis being thus revenged upon Athens, he went home into Macedon: and there made proviſion, both againſt the Roman Conſul that lay about Apollonia; and againſt the Dardanians, with other his bad neighbours, which were likely to infeſt him. Among his other cares, he forgot not the Ætolians: to whoſe Parliament, ſhortly to be held at Naupactus, he ſent an Embaſſage, requeſting them to continue in his friendſhip. Thus was Philip occupied.

Sulpitius the Roman Conſul encamped upon the River of Apſus. Thence he ſent forth Apuſtius his Lieutenant, with part of the Army to waſte the borders of Macedon. Apuſtius took ſundry Caſtles and Towns; uſing ſuch extremity of ſword and fire at Antipatria, the firſt good Town which he won by force, that none durſt afterwards make reſiſtance, unleſs they knew themſelves able to hold out. Returning towards the Conſul with his ſpoil, he was charged in the Reer, upon the paſſage of a brook, by Athenagoras a Macedonian Captain: but the Romans had the better, and killing many of theſe enemies, took priſoners many more, to the increaſe of their booty, with which they arrived in ſafety at their Camp. The ſucceſs of this Expedition, though it were not great, yet ſerved to draw into the Roman friendſhip thoſe that had formerly no good inclination to the Macedonian. Theſe were Pleuratus, the ſon of Scerdilaidas the Illyrian: Aminander King of the Athamanians, and Bato the ſon of Longarus, Prince of the Dardanians. They offered their aſſiſtance unto the Conſul, who thanked them: and ſaid, That he would ſhortly make uſe of Pleuratus and Bato, when he entred into Macedon: but that the friendſhip of Aminander, whoſe Country lay between the Ætolians and Theſſaly, might be perhaps available with the Ætolians, to ſtir them up againſt Philip.

So the preſent care was wholly ſet upon the Ætolian Parliament at hand. Thither came Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, Romans, and Athenians. Of which, the Macedonian ſpake firſt, and ſaid: That as there was nothing fallen out, which ſhould occaſion the breach of peace between his Maſter and the Ætolians; ſo was it to be hoped, that they would not ſuffer themſelves, without good cauſe to be carried away after other mens fancies. He prayed them to conſider, how the Romans heretofore, had made ſhew, as if their War in Greece tended only to the defence of the Ætolians, and yet notwithſtanding had been angry, that the Ætolians, by making peace with Philip, had no longer need of ſuch their Patronage. What might it be that made them ſo buſie, in obtruding their protection upon thoſe that needed it not? Surely it was even the general hatred, which theſe Barbarians bore unto the Greeks. For even after the ſame ſort had they lent their help to the Mamertines: and afterwards delivered Syracuſe, when it was oppreſſed by Carthaginian Tyrants; but now both Syracuſe and Meſſana, were ſubject unto the Rods and Axes of the Romans. To the ſame effect he alledged many examples, adding, That in like ſort it would happen to the Ætolians: who if they drew ſuch maſters into Greece, muſt not look hereafter to hold, as now, free Parliaments of their own, wherein to conſult about War and Peace: the Romans would eaſe them of this care, and ſend them ſuch a Moderator, as went every year from Rome to Syracuſe. Wherefore he concluded, that it was beſt for them, whilſt as yet they might, and whilſt one of them as yet could help the other, to continue in their League with Philip: with whom if at any time, upon light occaſion, they hapned to fall out, they might as lightly be reconciled: and with whom they had three years ago made the peace which ſtill continued; although that the very ſame Romans were then againſt it, who ſought to break it now. It would have troubled the Romans, to frame a good anſwer to theſe objections. For the Macedonian had ſpoken the very truth, in ſhewing whereunto this their Patronage, which they offered with ſuch importunity, did tend. Wherefore the Athenians were ſet on by them to ſpeak next: who had ſtore of eloquence, and matter of recrimination enough, to make Philip odious. Theſe affirmed, that it was a great impudence in the Macedonian Embaſſador, to call the Romans by the name of Barbarians; knowing in what barbarous manner his own King had, in few dayes paſt, made War upon the gods themſelves, by deſtroying all their Temples in Attica. Herewithal they made a pittiful reherſal of their own calamities: and ſaid, that if Philip might have his will, Ætolia, and all the reſt of Greece, ſhould feel the ſame that Attica had felt; yea, that Athens it ſelf, together with Minerva, Jupiter, Ceres, and other of the gods, were like to have felt, if the Walls and the Roman arms had not defended them.

Then ſpake the Romans: who excuſing, as well as they could, their own oppreſſion of all thoſe, in whoſe defence they had heretofore taken Arms, went roundly to the point in hand. They ſaid, that they had of late made War in the Ætolians behalf, and that the Ætolians had without their conſent made peace: whereof ſince the Ætolians muſt excuſe themſelves, by alledging that the Romans, being buſied with Carthage, wanted leiſure to give them aid convenient; ſo this excuſe being now taken away, and the Romans wholly bent againſt their common Enemy, it concerned the Ætolians to take part with them in their war and victory, unleſs they had rather periſh with Philip.

It might eaſily be perceived, that they which were ſo vehement, in offering their help ere it was deſired, were themſelves carried unto the War by more earneſt motives, than a ſimple deſire to help thoſe friends, with whom they had no great acquaintance. This may have been the cauſe, why Dorymachus the Ætolian Prætor ſhifted them off a while with a dilatory anſwer: though he told his Country-men, That by reſerving themſelves, till the matter were inclined one way or other, they might afterwards take part with thoſe that had the better fortune. His anſwer was, firſt, in general terms; That over-much haſte was an enemy to good counſel: for which cauſe they muſt further deliberate, ere they concluded. But coming nearer to the matter in hand, he paſſed a Decree, That the Prætor might at any time call an Assembly of the States, and therein conclude upon this business; any Law to the contrary notwithstanding: whereas otherwise it was unlawful to treat of such affairs, excepting two of their great Parliaments, that were held at set times.

§. XI.

The meeting of Philip with the Romans, and skirmishing with them on his borders. The Ætolians invade his Dominions, and are beaten home. Some doings of Attalus and the Roman Fleet.

PHilip was glad to hear, that the Romans had sped no better in their solicitation of the Ætolians. He thought them hereby disappointed in the very beg nning, of one great help; and meant himself to disappoint them of another. His son Perseus, a very boy, was sent to keep the Streights of Pelagonia against the Dardanians; having with him some of the Kings Councel, to govern both him and his Army. It was judged, as may seem, that the presence of the Kings son, how young soever, would both encourage his Followers, and terrifie the Enemies, by making them at least believe, that he was not weakly attended. And this may have been the reason, why the same Perseus, a few years before this, was in like manner left upon the borders of Ætolia by his father; whom earnest business called thence another way. No danger of enemies being left on either hand; it was thought that the Macedonian Fleet under Heraclides, would serve to keep Attalus, with the Rhodians and Romans, from doing harm by Sea, when the Kings back was turned: who took his journey Westward against Sulpicius the Consul.

The Armies met in the Country of the Dessaretii, a people in the utmost borders of Macedon towards Illyria, about the Mountains of Candavia; that running along from Hæmus in the North, until they joyn in the South with Pindus, inclose the Western parts of Macedon. Two or three dayes they lay in sight the one of the other, without making offer of battel. The Consul was the first that issued forth of his Camp into the open field. But Philip was not confident in the strength which he had then about him; and therefore thought it better to send forth some of his light-armed Mercenaries, and some part of horse, to entertain them with skirmish. These were easily vanquished by the Romans, and driven back into their Camp. Now although it was so, that the King was unwilling to hazzard all at first upon a Cast, and therefore sent for Perseus with his Companies, to increase his own forces: yet being no less unwilling to lose too much in reputation; he made shew a day after, as if he would have fought. He had found the advantage of a place fit for ambush, wherein he bestowed as many as he thought meet of his Targettiers: and so gave charge to Athenagoras, one of his Captains, to provoke out the Romans to fight; instructing both him and his Targettiers, how to behave themselves respectively, as opportunity should fall out. The Romans had no mistrust of any ambush, having fought upon the same ground a day before. Wherefore perhaps they might have sustained some notable detriment, if the Kings directions had been well followed. For when Athenagoras began to fall back, they charged him so hotly, that they drave him to an hasty flight, and pursued him as hard as they were able. But the Captains of the Targettiers, not staying to let them run into the danger, discovered themselves before it was time; and thereby made frustrate the work to which they were appointed. The Consul hereby gathered, that the King had some desire to try the fortune of a battel: which he therefore presented the second time: leading forth his Army, and setting it in order, with Elephants in the front: a kind of help which the Romans had never used before, but had taken these of late from the Carthaginians. Such are the alterations wrought by Time. It was scarce above fourscore years ere this, that Pyrrhus carried Elephants out of Greece into Italy, to affright the Romans, who had never seen any of those beasts before. But now the same Romans (whilst possibly some were yet alive, which had known that Expedition of Pyrrhus) came into Macedon, bringing Elephants with them: whereof the Macedonians and Greeks have none. Philip had patience to let the Consul brave him at his Trenches: wherein he did wisely; for the Roman had greater need to fight, than he. Sulpicius was unwilling to lose time: neither could he without great danger, lying so near the Enemy, that was strong in horse, send his men to fetch in corn out of the fields. Wherefore he removed 8. miles off: presuming that Philip would not adventure to meet him on even ground: and so the more boldly he suffered his Forragers to over-run the Country. The King was nothing sorry of this: but permitted the Romans to take their good pleasure: even till their presumption, and his own ſuppoſed fear, ſhould make them careleſs. When this was come to paſs, he took all his horſe, and light-armed foot, with which he occupied a place in the mid-way, between the Forragers and their Camp. There he ſtayed in covert with part of his forces, to keep the paſſages that none ſhould eſcape. The reſt he ſent abroad the Countrey, to fall upon the ſtragglers: willing them to put all to the ſword, and let none run home with news to the Camp. The ſlaughter was great: and thoſe which eſcaped the hands of them that were ſent abroad to ſcowre the fields, lighted all or moſt of them upon the King and his companies in their flight: ſo as they were cut off by the way. Long it was ere the Camp had news of this. But in the end there eſcaped ſome: who though they could not make any perfect relation how the matter went: yet by telling what had hapned to themſelves, raiſed a great multitude. Sulpicius hereupon ſends forth all his horſe, and bids them help their fellows where they ſaw it needful: He himſelf with the Legions followed. The companies of horſe divided themſelves, accordingly as they met with advertiſements upon the way, into many parts: not knowing where was moſt of the danger. Such of them as lighted upon Philips Troops, that were canvaſſing the field, took their taſk where they found it: But the main bulk of them fell upon the King himſelf. They had the diſadvantage; as coming fewer, and unprepared, to one that was ready for them. So they were beaten away; as their fellows alſo might have been, if the King had well bethought himſelf, and given over in time. But while, not contented with ſuch an harveſt, he was too greedy about a poor gleaning; the Roman Legions appeared in ſight: which emboldened their horſe to make a re-charge. Then the danger apparent, enforced the Macedonians to look to their own ſafety. They ran which way they could: and (as men that lie in wait for others, are ſeldom heedful of that which may befal themſelves) to eſcape the Enemy; they declined the faireſt way; ſo as they were plunged in Mariſhes and Bogs, wherein many of them were loſt. The Kings horſe was ſlain under him: and there had been caſt away, if a loving ſubject of his he had not alighted, mounted him upon his own horſe, and delivered him out of peril, at the expence of his own life, that running on foot was overtaken and killed.

In the common opinion Philip was charged with improvident raſhneſs; and the Conſul with as much dulneſs, for his dayes ſervice. A little longer ſtay would have delivered the King from theſe enemies without any blow: ſince when all the fields about them were waſted, they muſt needs have retired back to the Sea. On the other ſide, it was not thought unlikely, That if the Romans following the King, had ſet upon his Camp, at ſuch time as he fled thither, half amazed with either being ſlain or taken, they might have won it. But that noble Hiſtorian, Livie, (as is commonly his manner) hath judiciouſly obſerved, That neither the one, nor the other, were much too blame in this days work. For the main body of the Kings Army lay ſafe in his Camp; and could not be ſo aſtoniſhed with the loſs of two or three hundred horſe, that it ſhould therefore have abandoned the defence of the Trenches. And as for the King himſelf, he was advertiſed, that Pleuratus the Illyrian, and the Dardanians, were fallen upon his Country; when they found the paſſage thereinto open, after Perſeus was called away from cuſtody of the Streights. This was it which made him adventure to do ſomewhat betimes; that he might ſet the Romans going the ſooner, and afterwards look unto his troubleſome neighbours. In conſideration of this, Philip was deſirous to clear himſelf of the Romans, as ſoon as he might. And to that purpoſe he ſent unto the Conſul; requeſting a day of truce for burial of the dead. But inſtead of ſo doing, he marched away by night, and left fires in his Camp to beguile the enemy, as if he had not ſtirred out of the place. Sulpicius, when he heard of the Kings departure, was not ſlow to follow him. He overtook the Macedonians in a place of ſtrength, which they had fenced (for it was a woody ground) by cutting down trees, and laying them athwart the way where it was moſt open. In making of ſuch places good, the Macedonian Phalanx was of little uſe; being a ſquare battel of pikes, not fit for every ground. The Archers of Crete were judged, and were indeed, more ſerviceable in that caſe. But they were few; and their arrows were of ſmall force againſt the Roman ſhields. The Macedonians therefore helped them by flinging of ſtones. But to no purpoſe. For the Romans got within them; and forced them to quit the place. This Victory (ſuch as it was) laid open unto the Conſul ſome poor Towns thereabout; which partly were taken by ſtrong hand, partly yielded for fear. But the ſpoil of theſe, and of the fields adjoyning, was not ſufficient to maintain his Army; and therefore he returned back to Apollonia.

The

The Dardanians, hearing that Philip was come back, withdrew themſelves a pace out of the Country. The King ſent Athenagoras to wait upon them home; whileſt he himſelf went againſt the Ætolians. For Damocritus the Prætor of the Ætolians, who had reſerved himſelf and his Nation unto the event of things, hearing report, that Philip was beaten once and again: as alſo that Pleuratus and the Dardanians were fallen upon Macedon; grew no leſs buſie on the ſudden, than before he had been wiſe. He perſwaded his Nation to take their time: and ſo, not ſtaying to proclaim War, joyned his forces with Aminander the Athamanian; and made invaſion upon Theſſaly. They took, and cruelly ſacked a few Towns: whereby they grew confident; as if, without any danger, they might do what they liſted. But Philip came upon them ere they looked for him: and killing them as they lay diſperſed, was like to have taken their Camp, if Aminander more warie than the Ætolians, had not helped at need, and made the Retrait through his own mountainous Country.

About the ſame time the Roman Fleet, aſſiſted by Attalus and the Rhodians, had taken ſome ſmall Iſlands in the Ægean Sea. They took likewiſe the Town of Oreum in the Iſle of Eubœa: and ſome other places thereabout. The Towns were given unto Attalus, after the ſame Compact that had formerly been made with the Ætolians: the goods therein found were given unto the Romans: and the people, for ſlaves. Other attempts on that ſide were hindred: either by foul weather at Sea: or by want of daring, and of means.

§. XII.

Villius the Roman Conſul waſtes a yeer to no effect. War of the Gaules in Italy. An Embaſſadour of the Romans to Carthage, Maſaniſſa, and Vermina. The Macedonian prepares for defence of his Kingdom: and T. Quintius Flaminius is ſent againſt him.

THus the time ran away: and P. Villius a new Conſul, took charge of the War in Macedon. He was troubled with a mutiny of his oldeſt Souldiers: whereof two thouſand, having ſerved long in Sicil and Africk, thought themſelves much wronged, in that they could not be ſuffered to look unto their own eſtates at home. They were (belike) of the Legions that had ſerved at Cannæ: as may ſeem by their complaint, of having been long abſent from Italy: whither fain they would have returned, when by their Colonels they were ſhipped for Macedon. How Villius dealt with them, it is uncertain. For the Hiſtory of his year is loſt: whereof the miſs is not great, ſince he did nothing memorable. Valerius Antius, as we finde in Livie, hath adorned this Villius with a great exploit againſt Philip. Yet ſince Livie himſelf, an Hiſtorian to whom few of the beſt are matchable, could finde no ſuch thing recorded in any good Author: we may reaſonably believe, that Villius his year was idle.

In the beginning of this Macedonian War, the Romans found more trouble than could have been expected with the Gauls. Their Colony of Placentia, a goodly and ſtrong Town, which neither Hannibal, nor after him Aſdrubal, had been able to force: was taken by theſe Barbarians, and burnt in a manner to the ground. In like ſort Cremona was attempted: but ſaved her ſelf, taking warning by her neighbours calamity. Amilcar a Carthaginian, that ſtayed behind Aſdrubal, or Mago in thoſe parts: was now become Captain of the Gaules, in theſe their enterpriſes. This when the Romans heard, they ſent Embaſſadours to the Carthaginians: giving them to underſtand, That if they were not weary of the peace, it behoved them to call home, and deliver up, this their Citizen Amilcar; who made War in Italy. Hereunto it was added (perhaps leſt the meſſage might ſeem otherwiſe to have ſavoured a little of ſome fear) That of the fugitive ſlaves belonging to the Romans, there were ſome reported to walk up and down in Carthage: which if it were ſo, then ought they to be reſtored back to their Maſters: as was conditioned in the late peace. The Embaſſadours that were ſent on this errand, had further charge to treat with Maſaniſſa, as alſo with Vermina the ſon of Syphax. Unto Maſaniſſa, beſides matter of complement, they were to ſignifie what pleaſure he might do them, by lending them ſome of his Numidian Horſe, to ſerve in their War againſt the Macedonian. Vermina had entreated the Senate, to vouchſafe unto him the name of King: and promiſed thereafter to deſerve it, by his readineſs in doing them all good offices. But they were ſomewhat ſcrupulous in the matter, and ſaid, That having been, and being ſtill (as they took it) their Enemy, He ought firſt of all to deſire peace; for that the name of King, was an honour which they uſed not to confer upon any, ſave only upon ſuch as had royally deſerved it at their hands. The au-authority to make peace with him; was wholly committed unto these Embassadors, upon such termes as they should think fit; without further relation to the Senate and People: For they were then busied with greater cares. The Carthaginians made a gentle answer, That they wholly disclaimed Amilcar: banishing him, and confiscating his good. As for the Fugitives, they had restored as many as they could finde; and would in that point, as far as was requisite, give satisfaction to the Senate. Herewithal they sent a great proportion of Corn to Rome; and the like unto the Army that was in Macedon. King Masanissa would have lent unto the Romans two thousand of his Numidian horse: but they were contented with half the number; and would accept no more. Vermina met with the Embassadours, to give them entertainment, on the borders of his Kingdom; and without any disputation, agreed with them upon terms of peace.

Thus were the Romans busied in taking order for their Macedonian War, that they might pursue it strongly, and without interruption. As for Amilcar and his Gaules, they laid siege unto Cremona; where L. Furius a Roman Prætor came upon them, fought a battel with them, and overcame them. Amilcar the Carthaginian died in this battel: and the fruit of the Victory was such, as both made amends for losses past, and left the work easie to those, that afterwards should have the managing of War among those Gaules. So was there good leisure to think upon the business of Macedon: where Philip was carefully providing to give contentment unto his Subjects, by punishing a bad Counseller whom they hated: as also to assure unto himself the Achæans, by rendring unto them some Towns that he held of theirs; and finally to strengthen his Kingdom, not only by exercising and training his people, but by fortifying the passages that led thereinto out of Epirus. This was in doing when Villius, having unprofitably laboured to finde way into Macedon, taking a journey (as Sulpicius had done before him) wherein he could not be supplied with victuals, determined at length to trie a new course. But then came advertisement, that T. Quintius Flaminius was chosen Consul, and had Macedon allotted him for his Province; whose coming was expected; and he very shortly arrived at the Army.

§. XIII.

The Romans begin to make War by negotiation. T. Quintius wins a passage against Philip. Thessaly wasted by Philip. the Romans, and Ætolians. The Achæans forsaking the Macedonian, take part with the Romans. A treaty of peace, that was vain. Philip delivers Argos to Nabis the Tyrant, who presently enters into League with the Romans.

THe Romans had not been wont in former times, to make War after such a trifling manner. It was their use, to give battel to the enemie, as soon a they met with him. If he refused it, they besieged his Towns: and so forced him to try the fortune of a day, with his disadvantage in reputation, when he had long forborn it (as it would be interpreted) upon knowledge of his own weakness. But in this their War with Philip, they began to learn of the subtle Greeks, the art of Negotiation: wherein hitherto they were not grown so fine, as within a little while they proved. Their Treasury was poor, and stood indebted, * many years after this unto private men, for part of those moneys that had been borrowed in the second Punick War. This had made the Commonalty averse from the Macedonian War; and had thereby driven the Senators, greedy of the enterprize, to make use of their cunning. Yet being weary of the slow pace wherewith their business went forward, they determined to increase their Army, that they might have the less need to relie upon their Confederates. So they levied eight thousand Foot, and eight hundred Horse (the greater part of them of the Latines) which they sent with T. Quintius Flaminius, the new Consul, into Macedon. Their Navie, and other means could well have served, for the setting forth and transportation of a greater Army; but by straining themselves to the most of their ability, they should (besides other difficulties incident unto the sustenance of those that are too many and too far from home) have bred some jealousie in their friends of Greece, and thereby have lost some friends, yea, perhaps have increased the number of their enemies, more than of their own Souldiers. This present augmentation of the forces was very requisite; for that Attalus, about the same time, excused himself unto them by his Embassadour; requesting that either they would undertake the defence of his Kingdom against Antiochus, who invaded it; or else that they would not take it uncourteously; courteouſly, that he quitted the War with Philip, and returned home, to look unto that which moſt concerned him. Their anſwer was remarkable. They ſaid, That it was not their manner to uſe the aid of their friends, longer then their friends had good opportunity, and could alſo be well contented to affoord it; That they could not honeſtly take part with Attalus, their good friend, though he were againſt Antiochus, whom they held in the like account; but, That they would deal with Antiochus by Embaſſadors, and (as common friends unto both of the Kings) do their beſt to perſwade an atonement between them. In ſuch loving faſhion did they now carry themſelves, towards their good friend the King Antiochus; who reciprocally at their intreaty, withdrew his Army from the Kingdom of Attalus. But how little they regarded theſe terms of friendſhip, after that once they had made an end with Philip, it will very ſoon appear.

T. Quintius haſting away from Rome, came betimes into his Province, with the ſupply decreed unto him; which conſiſted for the moſt part, of old Souldiers, that had ſerved in Spain and Africk. He found Villius the old Conſul, (whom at his coming he preſently diſcharged) and King Philip of Macedon, encamped one againſt the other, in the Streights of Epirus; by the river of Apſus, or Aous. It was manifeſt, that either the Romans muſt fetch a compaſs about, and ſeek their way into Macedon, through the poor Country of the Daſſaretians; or elſe win, by force, that paſſage which the King defended. In taking the former way, they had already two years together miſ-ſpent their time, and been forced to return back without profit, for want of victuals: whereof they could neither carry with them ſtore ſufficient, nor find it on the way. But if they could once get over theſe Mountains, which divided the South of Epirus from Theſſaly, then ſhould they enter into a plentiful Country; and, which by long dependance on the Macedonian, was become (in a manner) part of his Kingdom, whereof it made the South border. Nevertheleſs, the deſire of winning this paſſage, was greater than the likelihood. For the river of Apſus running along through that valley which alone was open between the Mountains, made it all a deep Mariſh and unpaſſable Bogge: a very narrow way excepted, and a path cut out of the main rock by mans hand. Wherefore Quintius aſſailed to climb in the Mountains: but finding himſelf diſappointed of this hope, through the diligence of his enemy, who neglected not the guard of them that was very eaſie; he was compelled to ſit ſtill, without doing any thing for the ſpace of forty dayes.

This long time of reſt gave hope unto Philip, that the War might be ended by compoſition, upon ſome reaſonable terms. He therefore ſo dealt with ſome of the Epirots, (among whom he had many friends) that He and the Conſul had a meeting together. But nothing was effected. The Conſul would have him to ſet all Towns of Greece at liberty; and make amends for the injuries, which he had done to many people in his late Wars. Philip was contented to give liberty to thoſe whom he had ſubdued of late: but unto ſuch, as had been long ſubject unto him and his Anceſtors, He thought it againſt all reaſon, that he ſhould relinquiſh his claim and dominion over them. He alſo ſaid, That as far forth as it ſhould appear that he had done wrong unto any Town or people whatſoever, He could well be pleaſed to make ſuch amends, as might ſeem convenient in the judgement of ſome free State, that had not been intereſſed in thoſe quarrels. But herewithal Quintius was not ſatisfied. There needed (he ſaid) no judgement or compromiſe; foraſmuch as it was apparent, that Philip had alwayes been the invader; and had not made War, as one provoked, in his own defence. After this altercation, when they ſhould come to particulars: and when the Conſul was required to name thoſe Towns, that he would have to be ſet at liberty; the firſt that he named were the Theſſalians: Theſe had been ſubjects (though conditional) unto the Macedonian Kings, ever ſince the dayes of Alexander the Great, and of Philip his Father. Wherefore, as ſoon as Flaminius had named the Theſſalians; the King in a rage demanded what ſharper condition He would have laid upon him, had he been but vanquiſhed. And herewithal abruptly he flang away: refuſing to hear any more of ſuch diſcourſe.

After this the Conſul ſtrove in vain two or three dayes together, to have prevailed againſt the difficulties of that paſſage which Philip kept. When he had well wearied himſelf, and could not reſolve what courſe to take: there came to him an Heards-man ſent from Charopus a Prince of the Epirots that favoured the Romans, who having long kept beaſts in thoſe Mountains, was throughly acquainted with all by-paths, and therefore undertook to guide the Romans, without any danger, to a place where they ſhould have advantage of the Enemy. This guide, guide, for fear of treacherous dealing, was faſt bound: and being promiſed a great reward, in caſe he made good his word, had ſuch Companies as was thought fit, appointed to follow his directions. They travelled by night (it being then about the full of the Moon) and reſted in the day-time, for fear of being diſcovered. When they had recovered the hill-tops, and were above the Macedonians, (though undiſcovered by them, becauſe at their banks) they raiſed a great ſmoke, whereby they gave notice of their ſucceſs unto the Conſul. Some ſkirmiſhes, whilſt theſe were on their journy, T. Quintius had held with the Macedonian; thereby to avert him from thought of that which was intended. But when on the third morning he ſaw the ſmoke ariſe more and more plainly, and thereby knew that his men had attained unto the place whither they were ſent, he preſſed as near as he could unto the Enemies Camp, and aſſailed them in their ſtrength. He prevailed as little as in former times, until the ſhoutings of thoſe that ran down the hill, and charged Philip on the back, aſtoniſhed ſo the Macedonians, that they betook themſelves unto flight. The King, upon firſt apprehenſion of the danger, made all ſpeed away to ſave himſelf. Yet anon conſidering, that the difficulty of the paſſage muſt needs hinder the Romans from purſuing him: he made a ſtand at the end of five miles, and gathered there together his broken troops, of whom he found wanting no more than two thouſand men. The greateſt loſs was of his Camp and proviſions: if not rather perhaps of his reputation: for that now the Macedonians began to ſtand in fear, leſt being driven from a place of ſuch advantage, they ſhould hardly make good their party againſt the Enemy, upon equal ground. Neither was Philip himſelf much better perſwaded. Wherefore he cauſed the Theſſalians, as many of them as in his haſty retrait he could viſit, to forſake their Towns and Country, carrying away with them as much as they were able, and ſpoiling all the reſt. But all of them could not be perſwaded, thus to abandon (for the pleaſure of their King) their ancient habitations, and all the ſubſtance which they had gotten. Some there were that forcibly reſiſted him; which they might the better do, for that he could not ſtay to uſe any great compulſion. He alſo himſelf took it very grievouſly, that he was driven to make ſuch waſte of a moſt pleaſant and fruitful Country, which had ever been well affected unto him: ſo that a little hindrance did ſerve, to make him break off his purpoſe, and withdraw himſelf home into his Kingdom of Macedon.

The Ætolians and Athamanians, when this fell out, were even in a readineſs to invade Theſſaly; whereinto the ways lay more open, out of their ſeveral Contries. When therefore they heard for certainty, that Philip was beaten by the Romans: they foreſtowed not the occaſion, but made all ſpeed, each of them to lay hold upon what they might. T. Quintius followed them within a little while: but they had gotten ſo much before his coming, that he, in gleaning after their harveſt, could not find enough to maintain his Army. Thus were the poor Theſſalians, of whoſe liberty the Romans a few days ſince had made ſhew to be very deſirous, waſted by the ſame Romans and their Confederates; not knowing which way to turn themſelves, or whom to avoid. T. Quintius won Phaleria by aſſault: Metropolis and Piera yielded unto him. Rhage he beſieged: and having made a fair breach, yet was unable to force it: ſo ſtoutly it was defended both by the Inhabitants, and by a Macedonian garriſon therein. Philip alſo at the ſame time, having ſomewhat recollected his ſpirits, hovered about Tempe with his Army, thruſting men into all places, that were like to be diſtreſſed. So the Conſul, having well near ſpent his victuals, and ſeeing no hope to prevail at Rhage: brake up his ſiege, and departed out of Theſſaly. He had appointed his Ships of burden to meet him at Anticyra, an Haven Town of Phocis, on the Gulph of Corinth: which Country being friend to the Macedonian, he preſently invaded; not ſo much for hatred unto the people, as becauſe it lay conveniently ſeated between Theſſaly and other regions, wherein he had buſineſs, or was ſhortly like to have. Many Towns in Phocis he won by aſſault: many were yielded up unto him for fear; and within ſhort ſpace he had (in effect) maſtered it all.

In the mean time L. Quintius the Conſuls brother, being then Admiral for the Romans in this War, joyned with King Attalus and the Rhodian Fleet. They won two Cities in Eubœa; and afterward laid ſiege unto Cenchree, an Haven and Arcenal of the Corinthians on their Eaſtern Sea. This enterpriſe did ſomewhat help forward the Achæans, in their deſire to leave the part of Philip; ſince it might come to paſs, that Corinth it ſelf, ere long time were ſpent; and that Cenchree, with other places appertaining to Corinth, now very ſhortly ſhould be rendered unto their Nation, by favour of the Romans.

But there were other motives, inducing the Achæans to preferr the friendship of the Romans, before the patronage of Philip; whereto they had been long accustomed. For this King had so many ways offended them in time of peace, that they thought it best course to rid their hands of him, whilst being intangled in a dangerous War, he wanted means to hinder the execution of such counsel as they should hold the safest. His tyrannous practises to make himself their absolute Lord: his poysoning of Aratus their old Governour: his false dealing with the Messenians, Epirots, and other people their Confederates, and his own dependants: together with many particular outrages by him committed: caused them long since to hold him as a necessary evill, even whilst they were unable to be without his assistance. But since by the vertue of Philopœmen, they were grown somewhat confident in their own strength: so as without the Macedonians help they could as well subsist, as having him to friend: then did they only think how evil he was; and thereupon rejoyce the more, in that he was become no longer necessary. It angred him to perceive how they stood affected: and therefore he sent murderers to take away the life of * Philopœmen. But failing in this enterprise; and being detected, he did thereby only set fire to the Wood, which was throughly dry before, and prepared to burn. Philopœmen wrought so with the Achæans, that no discourse was more familiar with them, than what great cause they had to withdraw themselves from the Macedonian. Cycliadus, a principal man among them: and lately their Prætor, was expelled by them, for shewing himself passionate in the cause of Philip; and Aristænus chosen Prætor, who laboured to joyn them in society with the Romans.

These news were very welcome to T. Quintius. Embassadors were sent from the Romans and their Confederates, King Attalus, the Rhodians and Athenians, to treat with the Achæans, making promise, that they should have Corinth restored unto them, if they would forsake the Macedonian. A Parliament of the Achæans was held at Sycion, to deliberate and resolve in this weighty case. Therein the Romans and their adherents desired the Achæans to joyn with them in making War upon Philip. Contrariwise, the Embassadors of Philip, whom he had also sent for this business, admonishing the Achæans of their Alliance with the King, and of their faith due unto him; requested them, that they would be contented to remain as Neuters. This moderate request of Philips Embassadors did no way advance their Masters cause. Rather it gave the Achæans to understand, That he, who could be satisfied with so little at their hands, knew himself unable to gratifie them in any reciprocal demand. Yet were there many in that great Councel, who remembring the benefits of Philip and Antigonus, laboured earnestly for the preservation of the ancient League. But in fine, the sense of late injuries, and expectation of like or worse from him in the future; prevailed against the memory of those old good turns, which he (and Antigonus before him) had partly sold unto them, and partly had used as baits, whereby to allure them into absolute subjection. Neither was it perhaps of the least importance; That the Romans were strong, and likely to prevail in the end. So after much altercation, the Decree passed, That they should thence-forward renounce, the Macedonian, and take part with his enemies in this War. With Attalus and the Rhodians they forthwith entred into society; with the Romans (because no League would be of force, until the Senate and people had approved it) they forbore to decree any society at the present, until the return of those Embassadors from Rome, which they determined to send thither of purpose. The Megalopolitans, Dymeans, and Argives, having done their best for the Macedonean, as by many respects they were bound, rose up out of the Councel, and departed before the passing of the Decree; which they could not resist, nor yet with honesty thereto give assent. For this their good will, and greater, which they shortly manifested, the Argives had so little thank, that all the rest of the Achæans may be the better held excused, for escaping how they might, out of the hands of so fell a Prince.

Soon after this, upon a solemn day at Argos, the affection of the Citizens discovered it self so plainly, in the behalf of Philip, that they which were his Partisans within the Town, made no doubt of putting the City into his hands, if they might have any small assistance. Philocles a Lieutenant of the Kings, lay then in Corinth, which he had manfully defended against the Romans and Attalus. Him the Conspirators drew to Argos; whither coming on a sudden, and finding the multitude ready to joyn with him, he easily compelled the Achæan Garrison to quit the place.

This getting of Argos, together with the good defence of Corinth, and some other Towns, as it helped Philip a little in his reputation, so they gave him hope to obtain some ſome good end by Treaty, whileſt as yet with his honour he might ſeek it: and when (the Winter being now come on) a new Conſul would ſhortly be choſen; who ſhould take the work out of Titus his hands, if it were not concluded the ſooner. Titus had the like reſpect unto himſelf; and therefore thought it beſt, ſince more could not be done, to pre-diſpoſe things unto a Concluſion, for his own reputation. The meeting was appointed to be held on the Sea-ſhore, in the Bay then called the Malian, or Lamian Bay, now (as is ſuppoſed) the Gulf of Ziton; in the Ægean Sea, or Archipelago. Thither came Titus with Animander the Athamanian; an Embaſſador of Attalus; the Admiral Rhodes; and ſome Agents for the Ætolians and Achæans. Philip had with him ſome few of his own Captains, and Cycliadas, lately baniſhed for his ſake out of Achaia. He refuſed to come on ſhore: though fearing (as he ſaid none but the immortal Gods: yet miſdoubting ſome treachery in the Ætolians. The demands of Titus in behalf of the Romans, were, That he ſhould ſet all Cities of Greece at liberty; deliver up to the Romans and their Confederates, all priſoners which he had of theirs, and Renegadoes; likewiſe whatſoever he held of theirs in Illyria: and whatſoever about Greece or Aſia he had gotten from Ptolomy then King of Egypt, after his fathers death. Attalus demanded reſtitution to be made, entire of Ships, Towns, and Temples by him taken and ſpoiled in the late War between them. The Rhodians would have again the Country of Perea, lying over againſt their Iſland; as alſo that he ſhould withdraw his garriſons out of divers Towns about the Helleſpont, and other Havens of their friends. The Achæans deſired reſtitution of Argos and Corinth: about the one of which they might, not unjuſtly, quarrel with him; the other had been long his own by their conſent. The Ætolians took upon them angerly, as Patrons of Greece: willing him to depart out of it, even out of the whole Country, leaving it free; and withal to deliver up unto them, whatſoever he held that had at any time been theirs. Neither were they herewithal content: but inſolently declaimed againſt him, for that which he had lately done in Theſſaly; corrupting (as they ſaid) the rewards of the Victors, by deſtroying, when he was vanquiſhed, thoſe Towns, which elſe they might have gotten. To anſwer theſe malapart Ætolians, Philip commanded his Gally to be rowed nearer the ſhore. But they began to plie him afreſh: telling him that he muſt obey his betters, unleſs he were able to defend himſelf by force of Arms. He anſwered them (as he was much given to gybing) with ſundry ſcoffs; and eſpecially with one, which made the Roman Conſul underſtand what manner of companions theſe Ætolians were. For he ſaid, That he had often dealt with them; as likewiſe the beſt of the Greeks; deſiring them to abrogate a wicked law, which permitted them to take ſpoil from ſpoil: yet could he get no better an anſwer, than that they would ſooner take Ætolia out of Ætolia. Titus wondred what might be the meaning of this ſtrange Law. So the King told him, That they held it a laudable cuſtome, as often as War happened between their friends, to hold up the quarrel, by ſending Voluntaries to ſerve on both ſides, that ſhould ſpoil both the one and the other. As for the liberty of Greece, he ſaid it was ſtrange, that the Ætolians ſhould be ſo careful thereof, ſince divers Tribes of their own, which he there named, were indeed no Græcians: wherefore he would fain know, whether the Romans would give him leave to make ſlaves of thoſe Ætolians, which were no Greeks. Titus hereat ſmiled, and was no whit offended, to hear the Ætolians well ratled up; touching whom he began to underſtand, how odious they were in all the Country. As for that general demand of ſetting all Greece at liberty, Philip acknowledged, that it might well beſeem that greatneſs of the Romans; though he would alſo conſider, what might beſeem his own dignity. But that the Ætolians, Rhodians, and other petty Eſtates, ſhould thus preſume, under countenance of the Romans, to take upon them, as if by their great might he ſhould be thereunto compelled: it was, he ſaid, a ſtrange and ridiculous inſolence. The Achæans he charged with much ingratude; reciting againſt them ſome Decrees of their own; wherein they had loaden both Antigonus and him, with more than humane honours. Nevertheleſs, he ſaid, that he would render Argos unto them: but as touching Corinth, that he would further deliberate with Titus himſelf. Thus he addreſſed himſelf wholly to the Roman General; unto whom if he could give ſatisfaction, he cared little for all the reſt. With Attalus and the Rhodians, his late War (he ſaid) was only defenſive; they having been the offerers: or if he gave them any occaſion, it was only in helping Pruſias, his ſon-in-law; neither did he ſee why they ſhould rather ſeek amends at his hands, than he at theirs. For whereas they complained, that ſpoiling a Temple of Venus, he had cut down the Grove, and pleaſant walks thereabouts: what could he do more, than ſend Gardners thither with young plants; if one King of another would ſtand to aſk ſuch recompence? Thus he jeſted the matter out: but offered nevertheleſs, in honour of the Romans, to give back the Region of Peræa to the Rhodians; as likewiſe to Attalus, the Ships and Priſoners of his, whereof he had then poſſeſſion. Thus ended that dayes conference, becauſe it was late: Philip requiring a nights leiſure to think upon the Articles, which were many, and he ill provided of Counſel, wherewith to adviſe about them. For your being ſo ill provided of Counſel (ſaid Titus) you may even thank your ſelf; as having murdered all your friends, that were wont to adviſe you faithfully. The next day Philip came not, until it was late at night; excuſing his long ſtay by the weightineſs of the things propounded, whereon he could not ſuddenly tell how to reſolve. But it was believed, that he thereby ſought to abridge the Ætolians of leiſure to rail at him. And this was the more likely, for that he deſired conference in private with the Roman General. The ſum of his diſcourſe, as Titus afterward related it, was, That he would give the Achæans both Argos and Corinth; as alſo that he would render unto Attalus and the Rhodians what he had promiſed the day before; likewiſe to the Ætolians, that he would grant ſome part of their demands; and to the Romans, whatſoever they did challenge. This when Titus his aſſociates heard, they exclaimed againſt it, ſaying, That if the King were ſuffered to retain any thing in Greece, he would ſhortly get poſſeſſion of all which he now rendred up. The noiſe that they made came to Philips ear: who thereupon deſired a third day of meeting; and proteſted, that if he could not perſwade them, he would ſuffer himſelf to be perſwaded by them. So the third day they met early in the morning: at what time the King intreated them all, that they would with ſincere affection hearken unto good offers of peace; and immediately conclude it, if they could like well of thoſe Conditions which he had already tendred; or otherwiſe, that they would make truce with him for the preſent, and let him ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, where he would referr himſelf to the courteſie of the Senate.

This was even as Quintius would have it: who ſtood in doubt, leſt a new Conſul might happen to defraud him of the honour, which he expected by ending of the War. So he eaſily prevailed with the reſt to aſſent hereunto: foraſmuch as it was Winter, a time unfit for ſervice in the War; and ſince, without authority of the Senate, he ſhould be unable to proceed reſolvedly either in War or Peace. Further, he willed them to ſend their ſeveral Embaſſadors to Rome, which intimating unto the Senate what each of them required, ſhould eaſily hinder Philip from obtaining any thing to their prejudice. Among the reſt, he perſwaded King Aminander to make a journey to Rome in perſon: knowing well, that the name of a King, together with the confluence of ſo many Embaſſadors, would ſerve to make his own actions more glorious in the City. All this tended to procure that his own command of the Army in Greece might be prorogued. And to the ſame end had he dealt with ſome of the Tribunes of the people at Rome: who had already (though as yet he knew not ſo much) obtained it for him, partly by their authority, partly by good reaſons which they alledged unto the Senate.

The Embaſſadors of the Greeks, when they had audience at Rome, ſpake bitterly againſt the King, with good liking of the Senate; which was more deſirous of Victory, than of ſatisfaction. They magified the honourable purpoſe of the Romans, in undertaking to ſet Greece at liberty. But this (they ſaid) could never be effected: unleſs eſpecial care were taken, that the King ſhould be diſpoſſeſſed of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. In this point they were ſo vehement, producing a Map of the Country, and making demonſtration how thoſe places held all the reſt in ſervility; that the Senate agreed to have it even ſo as they deſir . When therefore the Embaſſadors of Philip were brought in, and began to have made a long Oration; they were briefly cut off in the middeſt of their Preface, with this one demand: Whether their Maſter would yeild up Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias. Hereto they made anſwer, That concerning thoſe places, the King had given them no direction or commiſſion what to ſay or do. This was enough. The Senate would no longers hearken to Philips deſire of peace: wherein they ſaid he did no better than trifle. Yet might his Embaſſadors have truly ſaid, That neither the Ætolians, Achæans, nor any of their fellows, had in the late Treaty required by name, that Chalcis and Demetrias ſhould be yielded up. For which of them indeed could make any claim to either of theſe Towns? As for Corinth, whereto the Achæans had ſome right; (though their right were no better, than that, having ſtoln it from one Macedonian King in a night, they had, after mature deliberation, made it away away by bargain unto another) Philip had already condeſcended to give it back unto them, And this perhaps would have been alledged, even againſt the Greeks, in excuſe of the King, by ſome of T. Quintius his friends; that ſo he might have had honour to conclude the War, if a ſucceſſor had been decreed unto him. But ſince he was appointed to continue General: neither his friends at Rome, nor he himſelf, after the return of the Embaſſadours into Greece, cared to give ear unto any talk of peace.

Philip ſeeing that his Achæans had forſaken him, and joyned with their common enemies; thought even to deal with them in the like manner, by reconciling himſelf unto Nabis, whom they hated moſt. There were not many years paſt, ſince the Lacedæmonians under Cleomenes, with little other help then their own ſtrength, had been almoſt ſtrong enough both for the Macedonians and Achæans together. But now the condition of things was altered. Nabis his force conſiſted, in a manner, wholly in his Mercenaries: for he was a Tyrant, though ſtiling himſelf King. Yet he ſorely vexed the Achæans: and therefore ſeemed to Philip one likely to ſtand him in great ſtead, if he could be won. To this purpoſe it was thought meet, that the Town of Argos, which could not otherwiſe be eaſily defended, ſhould be conſigned over into his hands; in hope, that ſuch a benefit would ſerve to tie him faſt unto the Macedonian. Philocles the Kings Lieutenant, who was appointed to deal with Nabis, added further, That it was his Maſters purpoſe to make a ſtreight alliance with the Lacedæmonian, by giving ſome daughters of his own in marriage unto Nabis his ſons. This could not but be well taken. Yet Nabis made ſome ſcruple in accepting the Town of Argos; unleſs by decree of the Citizens themſelves he might be called into it. Hereabout Philocles dealt with the Argives: but found them ſo averſe, that, in open aſſembly of the people, they deteſted the very name of the Tyrant, with many railing words. Nabis hearing of this, thought he had thereby a good occaſion to rob and fleece them. So he willed Philocles, without more a do, to make over the Town which he was ready to recieve. Philocles accordingly did let him with his Amy into it by night; and gave him poſſeſſion of the ſtrongeſt places therein. Thus dealt Philip with the Argives: who for very love had forſaken the Achæans, to take his part. Early in the morning, the Tyrant made himſelf maſter of all the gates. A few of the principal men, underſtanding how things went, fled out of the City at the firſt tumult. Wherefore they were all baniſhed, and their goods confiſcated. The reſt of the chief Citizens that ſtayed behind, were commanded to bring forth, out of hand, all their Gold and Silver. Alſo a great impoſition of money was laid upon all thoſe that were thought able to pay it. Such as made their contribution readily, were diſmiſſed without more a do. But if any ſtood long upon the matter: or played the theeves in purloyning their own goods: they were put to the whip, and beſides loſs of their wealth, had their torments to boot. This done, the Tyrant began to make popular laws: namely, ſuch as might ſerve to make him gracious with the raſcal multitude: abrogating all debts, and dividing the lands of the rich among the poor. By ſuch art of oppreſſing the great ones, it hath been an old cuſtom of Tyrants, to aſſure themſelves of the Vulgar for a time.

As ſoon as Nabis had gotten Argos, He ſent the news to T. Quintius and others to joyn with him againſt Philip. Titus was glad of it: ſo as he took the pains to croſs over the Streights into Peloponneſus, there to meet with Nabis. They had ſoon agreed (though King Attalus who was preſent with the Conſul, made ſome cavil touching Argos) and the Tyrant lent unto the Roman, ſix hundred of his Mercenaries of Crete: as alſo he agreed with the Achæans, upon a Truce for four moneths, reſerving the final concluſion of peace between them until the War of Philip ſhould be ended; which after this continued not long.

§. XIV.

The battel at Cynoſcephalæ, wherein Philip was vanquiſhed by T. Quintius.

Titus Quintius, as ſoon as he underſtood that he was appointed to have command of the Army, without any other limitation of time, than during the pleaſure of the Senate; made all things ready for diligent purſuit of the War. The like did Philip: who having failed in his negotiation of peace, and no leſs failed in his hopes of getting Nabis to friend in that War, meant afterwards wholly to rely upon himſelf.

Titus had in his Army about ſix and twenty thouſand: and Philip a proportionable number. But neither of them knew the other's ſtrength, or what his Enemy intended to do. Only Titus heard that Philip was in Theſſaly, Plut. in vit. T. Q. Flam.

Theſſaly, and thereupon addreſſed himſelf to ſeek him out. They had like to have met unawares, neer unto the City of Pheræ: where the vant-currers on both ſides diſcovered each other; and ſent word thereof unto their ſeveral Captains. But neither of them were over-haſty to commit all to hazard upon ſo ſhort warning. The day following each of them ſent out three hundred Horſe, with as many light-armed Foot, to make a better diſcovery. Theſe met, and fought a long while: returning finally back into their ſeveral Camps, with little advantage unto either ſide. The Country about Pheræ was thick ſet with trees: and otherwiſe full of gardens and mud-walls; which made it unproper for the ſervice of the Macedonian Phalanx. Wherefore the King diſlodged, intending to remove back into Scotuſa, in the Frontier of Macedon; where he might be plentifully ſerved with all neceſſaries. Titus conceived aright his meaning: and therefore purpoſed alſo to march thitherwards; were it only to waſte the Country. There lay between them a great ledge of hills, which hindered the one from knowing what courſe the other took. Nevertheleſs they encamped not far aſunder, both the firſt and the ſecond night; though neither of them underſtood what was become of the other. The third day was very tempeſtuous, and forced each of them to take up his lodging where he found it by chance. Then ſent they forth diſcoverers again, in greater number than before. Theſe meeting together, held a long fight, wherein at firſt the Macedonians had the worſe. But Philip anon ſent in ſuch ſtrong ſupply; that if the reſiſtance of the Ætolians had not been deſperate, the Romans their fellows had been driven back into their Camp. Yet all reſiſtance notwithſtanding, the Macedonians prevailed: ſo that Titus himſelf was fain to bring forth his Legions, that were not a little diſcouraged, by the defeat of all their Horſe, to animate thoſe which were in flight.

It was altogether beſides the Kings purpoſe to put the fortune of a battel in truſt that day, with ſo much of his Eſtate as might thereon depend. But the news came to him thick and tumultuouſly, how the enemies fled, and how the day was his own, if he could uſe an occaſion, the like whereof he ſhould not often find. This cauſed him to alter his purpoſe: inſomuch as he embattelled his men; and climed up thoſe hills, which, for that the knops thereon had ſome reſemblance unto Dogs heads, were called, by a word ſignifying as much, Cynoſcephalæ. As ſoon as he was on the hill-top; it did him good to ſee that they of his own light armature were buſie in fight, almoſt at the very Camp of the Enemies; whom they had repelled ſo far. He had alſo liberty to chooſe his ground, as might ſerve beſt his advantage; foraſmuch as the Romans were quite driven from all parts of the Hill. But of this commodity he could make no great uſe: the roughneſs of the place among thoſe Dogs heads, as they were called, ſerving nothing aptly for his Phalanx. Nevertheleſs he found convenient room, wherein to marſhall the one part of his Army: and gave order unto his Captains, to follow with the reſt, embattelling them as they might. Whileſt he was doing this: He perceived that his Hoſemen and light armature began to ſhrink; as being fallen upon the Roman Legions, by force whereof they were driven to recoyle. He ſets forward to help them: and they no leſs haſtily draw unto him for ſuccour; having the Romans not far behind them.

As the Legions began to climbe the Hill; Philip commanded thoſe of his Phalanx to charge their pikes, and entertain them. Here Titus found an extream difficult piece of work. For this Phalanx being a great ſquare battel of armed pikes, like in all points to thoſe which are now uſed in our modern Wars: and being in like manner uſed, as are ours; was not to be reſiſted by the Roman Targettiers, as long as the Phalanx it ſelf held together undiſſolved. The Macedonians were embattelled in very cloſe order: ſo that two of them ſtood oppoſite to one of the Romans; as alſo the pikes of the firſt rank had their points advanced two or three foot before their fore-man. Wherefore it is no marvel if the Romans gave back: every one of them being troubled (as it were) with ten enemies at once; and not able to come nearer to the next of them, than the length of a dozen foot, or thereabout. Titus finding this, and not knowing how to remedy it, was greatly troubled: for that ſtill the Phalanx bare down all which came in the way. But in the mean while he obſerved, That they which were appointed by Philip to make his left wing, were not able through the much unevenneſs of the ground, to put themſelves in order: ſo as either they kept their places on the Hill-tops; or elſe (which was worſe) upon deſire either of beholding the paſtime, or of ſeeming to be partakers in the work, ran fooliſhly along by the ſide of their fellows, which were occupied in fight.

Of

Of this their diſorder he made great and preſent uſe. He cauſed the right wing of his battel to march up the Hill againſt theſe ill-ordered troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increaſe the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to diſpute what ſhould be done in ſuch a caſe, than well adviſed what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they ſhould have done their beſt, it could not have ſerved; ſince the ground whereon they ſtood, made their weapons unuſeful. For let it be ſuppoſed, that Philip having ſix and twenty thouſand in his Army (as he is ſaid to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thouſand Horſe, four thouſand Targettiers, and four thouſand light-armed: ſo ſhall there remain fourteen thouſand Pikes: whereof himſelf had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having uſually ſixteen in File, muſt, when it conſiſted of ſeven thouſand, have well-near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would ſerve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or ſeven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three froot of ground: this Front muſt have occupied twelve hundred foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a ſpace of open Champian, free from incumberance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that muſt of neceſſity disjoyn this cloſe battel of the Phalanx, was not every-where to be found. Here at Cynoſcephalæ Philip had ſo much room, as would only ſuffice for the one half of his men; the reſt were fain to ſtand ſtill and look about them, being hindred from putting themſelves in order, by the roughneſs of the Dogs-heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindred from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in maſtering thoſe Enemies, whoſe feet were in a manner bound by the diſcommodity of the place. The very firſt impreſſion of the Elephants, cauſed them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themſelves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, ſeeing the victory on that part aſſured, left the proſecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Enſignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by ſome two thouſand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory compleat. He conſidered that Philip, in purſuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on ſo far, as that himſelf with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere. The hindermoſt ranks of the Phalanx, and all of them indeed ſave the firſt five, were accuſtomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thruſt on their fore-men: and ſo were they doing at the preſent. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it ſerved neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were ſo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meſopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in ſuch order, that all the four ſides of it were as ſo many Fronts looking ſundry wayes, becauſe he expected that he ſhould be encompaſſed round: yet is it to be underſtood, that herein he altered the uſual form; as alſo at the ſame time he embattelled his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turn their weapons which way need ſhould require. Likewiſe it is to be conſidered, That Alexanders men being thus diſpoſed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unleſs their hindmoſt ranks could have marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch proviſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe unable to help themſelves, threw down their weapons and fled. The King himſelf had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noiſe behind him, and turning a little aſide with a troop of horſe, to ſee how all went; when he beheld his men caſting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he preſently betook himſelf to flight. Neither ſtaid he afterwards in any place (except only a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) untill he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

Liv. & Polyb. l. 17.

There died of the Roman Army in this battel, about ſeven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlain; and five thouſand taken priſoners.

Of

Of this their diſorder he made great and preſent uſe. He cauſed the right wing of his battel to march up the Hill againſt theſe ill-ordered troops: his Elephants leading the way, to increaſe the terrour. The Macedonians were readier to diſpute what ſhould be done in ſuch a caſe, than well adviſed what to do; as having no one man appointed to command that part in chief. Indeed if they ſhould have done their beſt, it could not have ſerved; ſince the ground whereon they ſtood, made their weapons unuſeful. For let it be ſuppoſed, that Philip having ſix and twenty thouſand in his Army (as he is ſaid to have been equal to the Enemy in number) had four thouſand Horſe, four thouſand Targettiers, and four thouſand light-armed: ſo ſhall there remain fourteen thouſand Pikes: whereof himſelf had embattelled the one half in a Phalanx; the other half in the left wing, are they whom Quintius is ready now to charge. The Phalanx having uſually ſixteen in File, muſt, when it conſiſted of ſeven thouſand, have well-near four hundred and forty in rank: but four hundred would ſerve, to make a Front long enough; the other forty or ſeven and thirty Files might be cut off, and reckoned in the number of the Targettiers, or light-armed. Allowing therefore, as Polybius doth, to every man of them three froot of ground: this Front muſt have occupied twelve hundred foot, or two hundred and forty paces; that is, very near a quarter of a mile in length. Such a ſpace of open Champian, free from incumberance of Trees, Ditches, Hillocks, or the like impediments, that muſt of neceſſity disjoyn this cloſe battel of the Phalanx, was not every-where to be found. Here at Cynoſcephalæ Philip had ſo much room, as would only ſuffice for the one half of his men; the reſt were fain to ſtand ſtill and look about them, being hindred from putting themſelves in order, by the roughneſs of the Dogs-heads. But the Romans, to whom all grounds were much alike, were not hindred from coming up unto them; nor found any difficulty in maſtering thoſe Enemies, whoſe feet were in a manner bound by the diſcommodity of the place. The very firſt impreſſion of the Elephants, cauſed them to give back; and the coming on of the Legions, to betake themſelves to flight. A Roman Tribune or Colonel, ſeeing the victory on that part aſſured, left the proſecution of it unto others: and being followed by twenty Enſignes or Maniples, that is, (as they might fall out) by ſome two thouſand men, took in hand a notable piece of work; and mainly helpful to making of the Victory compleat. He conſidered that Philip, in purſuing the right wing of the Romans, was run on ſo far, as that himſelf with his fellows, in mounting the Hill to charge the left wing of the Macedonians, was already gotten above the Kings head. Wherefore he turned to the left hand, and making down the Hill after the Kings Phalanx, fell upon it in the Rere. The hindermoſt ranks of the Phalanx, and all of them indeed ſave the firſt five, were accuſtomed, when the battels came to joyning, to carry their pikes upright; and with the whole weight of their bodies to thruſt on their fore-men: and ſo were they doing at the preſent. This was another great inconvenience in the Macedonian Phalanx. That it ſerved neither for offence nor defence, except only in Front. For though it were ſo, that Alexander, when he was to fight with Darius in Meſopotamia, arranged his Phalanx in ſuch order, that all the four ſides of it were as ſo many Fronts looking ſundry wayes, becauſe he expected that he ſhould be encompaſſed round: yet is it to be underſtood, that herein he altered the uſual form; as alſo at the ſame time he embattelled his men in looſe order, that ſo with eaſe they might turn their weapons which way need ſhould require. Likewiſe it is to be conſidered, That Alexanders men being thus diſpoſed, were fit only to keep their own ground; not being able to follow upon the enemy, unleſs their hindmoſt ranks could have marched backwards. But in this preſent caſe of Philip, there was no ſuch proviſion for reſiſtance. Therefore his men, being otherwiſe unable to help themſelves, threw down their weapons and fled. The King himſelf had thought until now, that the fortune of the battel was every where alike, and the day his own. But hearing the noiſe behind him, and turning a little aſide with a troop of horſe, to ſee how all went; when he beheld his men caſting down their weapons, and the Romans at his back on the higher ground; he preſently betook himſelf to flight. Neither ſtaid he afterwards in any place (except only a ſmall while about Tempe, there to collect ſuch as were diſperſed in this overthrow) untill he was gotten into his own Kingdom of Macedon.

There died of the Roman Army in this battel, about ſeven hundred: of the Macedonians about eight thouſand were ſlain; and five thouſand taken priſoners.

§. XV.

§. XV.

T. Quintius falleth out with the Ætolians, and grants truce unto Philip, with conditions upon which the peace is ratified. Liberty proclaimed unto the Greeks. The Romans quarrel with Antiochus.

THe Ætolians wonderfully vaunted themselves, and desired to have it noised through all Greece, that the Victory at Cynoscephalæ was gotten (in a manner) wholly by their valour. They had gotten indeed the most of the booty by sacking the Macedonian Camp, whilest the Romans were busied in the chase. Titus therefore being offended both at their vain-glory, and at their ravenous condition; purposed to teach them better manners, by regarding them as slightly, as they thought highly of themselves. He also well perceived, That by using them with any extraordinary favour, he should greatly offend the rest of his confederates in Greece; who detested the Ætolians much more vehemently, than ever they had done the Macedonians. But this displeasure brake not forth yet a while.

After the battel, Titus made haste unto Larissa, a City in Thessaly, which he presently took. Before his coming, Philip had sent thither one of his Courtiers to burn all his letters, and passages whatsoever in writing, betwixt him and others: of which many were there kept. It was well done of the King, that among the cares of so much adversity, he forgot not to provide for the safety of his friends. Yet by thus doing, they of Larissa might well perceive, that he gave them as already lost. Wherefore we find not that they, or any of their neighbours, did make delay of opening their gates to Titus. At the same time, the Town of Leucas, bordering upon Arcanania, was taken by the Roman Fleet, and very soon after, all the Arcananians, a warlike Nation, and in hatred of the Ætolians ever true to Philip; gave up themselves unto the Romans, hearing of the Victory at Cynoscephalæ. The Rhodians also were then in hand with the conquest of Pærea, a Region of the Continent over against the Island; whereof they had demanded restitution in the late Treaty of Peace. They did herein more manly, than any other of the Greeks: forasmuch as they awaited not the good leasure of the Romans; but with an Army of their own, and some help which they borrowed of the Achæans and other their friends gave battel to Dinocrates the Kings Lieutenant. wherein they had the Victory, and consequently recovered the whole Province. It angred Philip worse then all this, that the Dardanians gathered courage out of his affliction, to invade his Kingdom; wasting and spoiling, as if all had been abandoned to their discretion. This made him gather an Army in all haste of 6000. Foot, and 500. horse: wherewith coming upon them, he drave them, with little or no loss of his own, and great slaughter of theirs, hastily out of the Kingdom. Which done, he returned to Thessalonica.

In this one enterprise he had success answerable to his desire: but seeing what bad fortune accompanied his affairs, in all other parts at the same time, he thought it wisdom to yield unto necessity; and therefore sent in all haste Limnæus and Demosthenes with Cycliadas the banished Achæan, in whom he reposed much confidence, Embassadours unto Titus. These had conference a long while in private, with Titus and some of his Roman Colonels: by whom they were gently entertained, and in very friendly wise dismissed. It seems that they had Commission, to refer all unto Titus his own discretion; as Philip himself in few dayes after did. There was granted unto him a Truce for fifteen dayes: in which time, the King himself might come and speak with the Roman General. In the mean season, many suspicious rumours went of Titus, as if he had been corrupted with great rewards from the King, to betray the Greeks his Confederates. Of these bruits the Ætolians were chief authors: who being wont to regard neither friendship nor honesty, where profit led them a wrong way, judged alike of all men else. But against the day appointed for the meeting betwixt him and Philip, Titus had sent letters unto his Associates; willing them to have their Agents ready by a time appointed, at the entrance of Tempe, where the treaty should be held. There when they were all assembled, they entred into consultation before the Kings arrival, what should be most expedient for the common benefit of them all, and for every state in particular. The poor King Amynander besought them all, and especially the Romans, that they would think upon him; and, considering his weakness which he confessed, make such provision, that after the Romans had turned their backs, and were gone home, Philip might not wreak his anger upon him who was not able to resist. Then spake Alexander, one of the Ætolians: who commending Titus forasmuch as he had thus assembled the Confederates to advise upon their own good, good, and had willed them to deliver their minds freely: added, That in the main of the purpoſe, which he had in hand, he was utterly deceived: for that by making peace with Philip, he could neither aſſure the Romans of their quiet, nor the Greeks of their liberty. There was, he ſaid, none other end to be made of the War, which could agree either with the purpoſe of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the fair promiſes made by Titus himſelf unto the Greeks, than the chaſing of Philip quite out of his Kingdom. And to this effect he made a long diſcourſe. But Titus anſwered, That this Ætolian was ill acquainted, either with the good pleaſure of the Senate and people of Rome, or with the laudable cuſtoms which they generally held: for that it was not the manner of the Romans, to ſeek the utter deſtruction of any King or Nation, at ſuch time as they firſt made War with them, until by ſome rebellion they found it a matter of neceſſity, to take ſuch a rigorous courſe. And hereof he alledged the Carthaginians as a notable example: adding, That victory, to generous minds, was only an inducement to moderation. As concerning the publick benefit of Greece, it was (he ſaid) expedient, that the Kingdom of Macedon ſhould be greatly weakned and brought low; not that it ſhould be utterly deſtroyed: foraſmuch as it ſerved as a bar to the Thracians, Gaules, and a multitude of other ſalvage Nations, which would ſoon over-flow the whole continent of Greece, if this Kingdom were not interpoſed. Wherefore he concluded, that if Philip would yield unto thoſe demands, wherewith he had preſſed him in the former Treaty; then was there no reaſon to deny him peace. As for the Ætolians: if they thought otherwiſe, it ſhould be at their own pleaſure, to take Counſel apart for themſelves as they thought good. Then began Phaneas, another of the Ætolians, to ſay, that all was come to nothing: for that ere long, Philip would trouble all the Greeks, no leſs than he had done in time before. But Titus interrupted him, and bade him leave his bablings; ſaying, That himſelf would take ſuch order, as that Philip, were he never ſo deſirous, ſhould thenceforth not have it in his power to moleſt the Greeks.

The next day King Philip came thither: whom Titus uſed friendly: and ſuffering him to repoſe himſelf that night, held a Councel the day following: wherein the King yielded unto all that had been required at his hands; offering yet further to ſtand to the good pleaſure of the Senate, if they would have more added to the Conditions. Phaneas the Ætolian, inſulting over him, ſaid It was to be hoped, that he would then at length give up to the Ætolians a many of Towns, (which he there named) bidding him ſpeak whether he would or no. His anſwer was, that they might take them all. But Titus interpoſing himſelf, ſaid it ſhould be otherwiſe. There were Theſſalian Towns, and ſhould be all free; one of them only excepted, which not long ago had refuſed to commit it ſelf to the faith of the Romans, and therefore ſhould now be given to the Ætolians. Hereat Phaneas cried out, that it was too great an injury, thus to be defrauded of the Towns that had ſometimes belonged unto their Common-weal. Rather he willed Titus to conſider, that by an ancient Covenant between him and the Romans, all the Towns taken ought to be their own, and the Romans to have nothing ſave the pillage and captives. It is true, that there had been ſuch a condition in the former War: but it ceaſed to be of any validity, as ſoon as the Ætolians made peace with Philip. And thus much Titus gave them to underſtand; aſking them whether they thought it reaſonable, that all the Towns in Greece, which had let in the Romans by compoſition, ſhould be delivered into ſubjection of the Ætolians. The reſt of the Confederates were very much delighted with theſe angry paſſages between the Romans and the Ætolians: neither had they great reaſon to fear any hard meaſure; ſince Titus was ſo earneſt in the behalf of thoſe Theſſalians, to give them liberty, though they had ſtood out againſt him, even till very fear made them open their gates. Wherefore they oppoſed not themſelves; but gave their conſent willingly unto a Truce for four Moneths.

The chief cauſe that moved Titus to grant peace ſo readily to the Macedonians, beſides that laudable cuſtom by him before alledged, was, the fame of Antiochus his coming with an army from Syria, and drawing near toward Europe. He had alſo perhaps yet a greater motive; even the conſideration that his ſucceſſor might happen to defraud him of the honour, if the War ſhould happen to be protracted. And he was in the right. For when his letters, together with Embaſſadors from the Macedonian, and ſundry States of Greece, came unto Rome, new Conſuls were choſen: who (eſpecially the one of them) ſtood very earneſtly againſt the peace; alledging frivolous matter of their own ſuſpition, in hope to get the honour of concluding the War. The Senate began to be doubtfully affected, between the Embaſſadors of Philip, offering to ſtand to whatſoever was demanded; and the letters of Titus, preſſing them to accept this offer, on the one ſide, and the importunity of the Conſul on the other; who ſaid, that all theſe goodly ſhews were fraudulent, and that the King would rebel, as ſoon as the Army was called out of Greece. But the matter was taken out of the Senators hands by two of the Tribunes, that referred it to an Aſſembly of the People; by whoſe ſoveraign authority it was concluded, that peace ſhould be granted to the King. So ten Embaſſadors were ſent from Rome, over into Greece: in which number were they that had been Conſuls before Titus: and it was ordained by their advice, that Titus ſhould go through with the buſineſs of Peace. Theſe would very fain have retained thoſe three important Cities of Corinth, Chalcis, and Demetrias, until the eſtate of Greece were ſomewhat better ſetled. But finally, Titus prevailed ſo, that Corinth was (though not immediately) rendred unto the Achæans; and all the other Greek Towns which Philip held, as well in Aſia as in Greece, reſtored unto liberty.

The Conditions of Peace granted unto Philip, were, That before the celebration of the next * Iſthmian Games, He ſhould withdraw his Garriſons out of all the Greek Towns which he held, and confine them over to the Romans: That he ſhould deliver up unto them all Captives that he had of theirs, and all Renegado's. Likewiſe all his Ships of War, reſerving to himſelf only five of the leſſer ſort, and one of extraordinary greatneſs, wherein ſixteen men laboured at every oar: Further, that he ſhould pay a thouſand talents, the one half in hand, the other in ten years following, by even portions. Hereto * Livie adds, That he was forbidden to make War out of Macedon, without permiſſion of the Senate. But I find not that he obſerved this Article; or was at any time charged with the breach of it. Four hundred talents he had already delivered to Titus, together with his younger ſon Demetrius, to remain as hoſtage for his true dealing in this matter of peace, at ſuch time as he lately ſent his Embaſſadors to Rome: when it was promiſed, that the money, and his ſon, ſhould be reſtored back unto him, if the Senate were not pleaſed with the agreement. Whither this money were reckoned as part of the thouſand talents, I cannot find: and it ſeemeth otherwiſe, foraſmuch as young Demetrius, who, together with thoſe four hundred talents, was given for hoſtage, remained ſtill in cuſtody of the Romans, as a part of the bargain which Titus formerly had made. Letters alſo were then ſent by Titus unto Pruſias King of Bithynia: giving him to underſtand, what agreement was made with Philip in behalf of the Greeks; and how the Senate held it reaſonable, that the Ciani, moſt miſerably ſpoiled and oppreſſed by Philip, to gratifie this Bithynian his ſon-in-law, ſhould be reſtored to liberty, and permitted to enjoy the ſame benefit of the Romans, which other of their Nation did. What effect theſe letters wrought, it was not greatly material; ſince the Romans were ſhortly buſied with Antiochus, in ſuch wiſe, that they had not leiſure to examine the conformity of Pruſias to their will.

All Greece rejoyced at the good bargain which Titus had made with Philip. Only the Ætolians found themſelves agrieved that they were utterly neglected: which was to the reſt no ſmall part of their contentment. The Bœotians continued to favour the Macedonian; and thereby occaſioned much trouble unto themſelves. There were ſome among them well-affected to the Romans: who, ſeeing how things were like to go, made their complaint unto Titus; ſaying, that they were no better than loſt, for the good will which they had born unto him; unleſs at this time, when he lay cloſe by them with his Army, their Prætor, which was head of the oppoſite Faction, might be made away. Titus refuſed to have a hand in the execution, yet nevertheleſs did animate them in their purpoſe. So they commited the fact, and hoped to have kept themſelves undiſcovered. But when the murder came out, and ſomewhat was confeſſed by thoſe which were put to torture: the hatred of the people brake out violently againſt the Romans: in ſuch wiſe, that howſoever they durſt not take Arms againſt them, yet ſuch of them as they found ſtragling from their Camp, they murdered in all parts of the Country. This was deteſted within a while, and many of the dead bodies found. Hereupon Titus requires of the Bœotians, to have the murderers delivered into his hands; and for five hundred Souldiers, which he had loſt by them, to have paid unto him five hundred talents. In ſtead of making any ſuch amends, they paid him with excuſes; which he would not take as good ſatisfaction. He ſends Embaſſadors to the Achæans, and Athenians, informing them what had hapned: and requeſted them not to take it amiſs, though he dealt with theſe their friends as they had deſerved. Herewithal he falls to waſting their Country; and beſiegeth two ſuch ſuch Towns of theirs, as did ſeem to be moſt culpable of the murders lately done. But the Embaſſadors of the Achæans and Athenians (eſpecially of the Achæans, who offered, if he needed them, to help him in this War; yet beſought him rather to grant peace unto the Bœotians) prevailed ſo far with him, that he was pacified with 30. talents, and the puniſhments of ſuch as were known offenders.

In like ſort, though not ſo violently, were many States of Greece diſtracted: ſome among them rejoycing that they were free from the Macedonian; others greatly doubting, that the Roman would prove a worſe neighbour. The Ætolian would have been glad of any Commotion; and therefore publiſhed rumours abroad, That it was the purpoſe of the Romans, to keep in their own hands all thoſe places, wherein Philip lately had his Garriſons. Little did they, or the reſt of the Greeks, conceive, that this Macedonian War ſerved as an introduction to the War to be made in Aſia againſt King Antiochus; where grew the fruit, that was to be reaped of this and many other victories. Wherefore to ſtay the progreſs of bad rumors, when the Iſthmian games were held, which in time of peace were never without great ſolemnity and concourſe; Titus in that great aſſembly of all Greece, cauſed proclamation to be made by ſound of Trumpet to this effect, That the Senate and people of Rome, and Titus Quintius Flaminius the General, having vanquiſhed King Philip and the Macedonians, did will to be at liberty, free from Impoſitions, free from Garriſons, and living at their own Laws, the Corinthians, Phocians, Locrians, Eubœans, Achæans of Phthiotis, Magneſians, Theſſalians, and Perrhæbians. The ſuddenneſs of this Proclamation aſtoniſhed men: ſo as though they applauded it with a great ſhout, yet preſently they cried out to hear it again, as if they durſt ſcarce credit their own ears. The Greeks were Crafts-maſters in the Art of giving thanks; which they rendred now to T. Quintius with ſo great affection, as that they had well-near ſmothered him, by thronging officiouſly about him.

This good will of the Greeks, was like to be much more available unto the Romans in their War againſt Antiochus, then could have been the poſſeſſion of a few Towns, yea, or of all thoſe Provinces which were named in the Proclamation. Upon confidence hereof, no ſooner were the Iſthmian games at en end, than Titus, with the Romans that were of his Councel, gave audience to Hageſianax and Lyſias, King Antiochus his Embaſſadors: whom they willed to ſignifie unto their Lord, That he ſhould do well to abſtain from the free Cities in Aſia, and not vex them with War: as alſo to reſtore whatſoever he had occupied, belonging to the Kings, Ptolomy or Philip. Moreover they willed him by theſe his Embaſſadors, that he ſhould not paſs over his Army into Europe; adding, That ſome of them would viſit him in perſon ere it were long, to talk with him further concerning theſe points. This done, they fell to accompliſhing their promiſes unto the Greeks; to the reſt they gave what they had promiſed. But the Phocians and Locrians they gave unto the Ætolians; whom they thought it no wiſdom to offend overmuch, being ſhortly to take a greater work in hand. The Achæans of Phthiotis they annexed unto the Theſſalians; all ſave the Town of Thebes in Phthiotis, the ſame which had been abandoned by T. Quintius to the Ætolians in the laſt Treaty with Philip. The Ætolians contended very earneſtly about Pharſalus and Leucas. But they were put off with a dilatory anſwer, and rejected unto the Senate: for howſoever ſomewhat the Councel might favour them, yet was it not meet that they ſhould have their wills, as it were in deſpight of Titus. So the Achæans were reſtored Corinth, Triphylia, and Herea. So the Corinthians were made free indeed, (though the Romans yet a while kept the Acrocorinthus) for that all which were partakers of the Achæan Common-wealth, enjoyed their liberty in as abſolute manner as they could deſire. To Pleuratus the Illyrian were given one or two places, taken by the Romans from Philip: and upon Aminander were beſtowed thoſe Caſtles, which he had gotten from Philip during this War; to reign in them, and the grounds which they commanded, as he did among his Athamanians. The Rhodians had been their own Carvers. Attalus was dead a little before the Victory; and therefore loſt his ſhare. Yet many that were with Titus in Councel, would have given the Towns of Oreum and Euretia, in the Iſle of Eubœa, to his ſon and ſucceſſor King Eumenes. But finally it was concluded, that theſe as well as the reſt of the Eubœans, ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy their liberty. Oreſtes, a little Province of the Kingdom of Macedon, bordering on Epirus, and lying towards the Ionian Sea, yet yielded unto the Romans long ere this, and ſince continued true to them: for which cauſe it was alſo ſet at liberty, and made it a free eſtate by it ſelf.

Theſe buſineſſes being diſpatcht, it remained, that all care ſhould be uſed, not how to avoid the War with King Antiochus, but how to accomplish it with most ease and prosperity. Wherefore Embassadors were sent, both to Antiochus himself, to pick matter of quarrel; and about unto others, to prediſpose them unto the assisting of the Romans therein. What ground and matter of War against this King, the Romans now had, or shortly after found: as also how their Embassadors and Agents dealt and sped abroad, I refer unto another place.

CHAP. V.

§. I.

What Kings of the races of Seleucus and Ptolomy reigned in Asia and Egypt before Antiochus the Great.

Seleucus Nicanor, the first of his race, King of Asia and Syria, died in the end of the hundred twenty and fourth Olympiad. He was treacherously slain by Ptolomy Ceraunus, at an Altar called Argos; having (as is said) been warned before by an Oracle, to beware of Argos, as the fatal place of his death. But I never read that any mans life hath been preserved, or any mischance avoided by the predictions of such Divellish Oracles. Rather I believe, that many such predictions of the Heathen gods, have been ante-dated by their Priests; or by others, which devised them after the event.

Antiochus Soter, the son and heir of this Seleucus, was dearly beloved of his father: who surrendred unto him his own wife Stratonica, when he understood how much the young Prince was enamoured on her. Wherefore Ptolomy Ceraunus had great cause to fear, that the death of Seleucus would not be unrevenged by this his Successor. But Antiochus was contented to be pacified, either with gifts, or perhaps only with fair words containing himself within Asia; and letting Ceraunus enjoy that quietly, which he had purchased in Europe, with the blood of Seleucus. It is said of this Antiochus, that although he married with the Queen Stratonica in his fathers life, yet out of modesty he forbore to embrace her, till his father was dead. So that perhaps his incestuous love was partly, if not chiefly, that cause of his not prosecuting that revenge, whereunto Nature should have urged him. Afterwards he had Wars with Antigonus Gonatus, and with Nicomedes King of Bithynia. Also Lutarius and Leonorius Kings or Captains of the Gauls, were set upon him by the same Nicomedes. With these he fought a great battel: wherein, though otherwise the enemies had all advantage against him, yet by the terror of his Elephants, which affrighted both their horses and them, he won the Victory. He took in hand an enterprise against Ptolomy Philadelphus: but finding ill success in the beginning, he soon gave it over. To this King Antiochus Soter it was, that Berosus the Chaldæan dedicated his History of Assyria; the same which hath since been excellently falsified by the Friar Annius. He left behind him one son, called Antiochus Theos; and one daughter, called Apame, that was married unto the King of Cyrene. So he died about the end of the hundred twenty and ninth Olympiad, or the beginning of the Olympiad following, in the fiftieth or one and fiftieth year of the Kingdom of the Greeks, when he had reigned nineteen years. Genes. xii. l. 2. Jos. Mat. Par.

Antiochus, surnamed Theos, or the god, had this vain and impious title given to him, by flattery of the Milesians; whom he delivered from Timarchus, a Tyrant that oppressed them. He held long and difficult, but fruitless War with Ptolomy Philadelphus King of Egypt; which finally he compounded, by taking to wife Berenice the daughter of Ptolomy.

Of these two Kings, and of this Lady Berenice, S. Hierom and other Interpreters have understood that Prophecy of Daniel: The Kings daughter of the South shall come to the King of the North to make an agreement; and that which followeth. Dan. 11.

Ptolomy Philadelphus was a great lover of Peace and Learning; and (setting apart his incestuous marriage with his own Sister Arsinoe) a very excellent Prince: howsoever, the worthiest of all that race. It was he that built, and furnished with Books, that famous Library in Alexandria: which to adorn, adorn and to honour the more, he sent unto Eleazar, then high Priest of the Jews, for the Books of Moses and other Scriptures. The benefits of this King unto the Jews had formerly been very great; for he had set at liberty as many of them, as his father held in slavery throughout all Ægypt; and he had sent unto the * Temple of God in Jerusalem very rich Presents. Wherefore Eleazar, yielding unto the Kings desire, presented him with an Hebrew copy: which Ptolomy caused to be translated into Greek, by seventy two of the most grave and learned persons that could be found among all the Tibes. In this number of the 72. Interpreters, or (as they are commonly called) the Seventy, Jesus the son of Syrach, is thought by Genebrard to have been one; who that he lived in this Age, it seems to me very sufficiently proved by Jansenius, in his Preface unto Ecclesiasticus. The whole passage of this business between Philadelphus and the high Priest, was written (as (a) Josephus affirms) by Aristæus that was employed therein. Forty years Ptolomy Philadelphus was King; reckoning the time wherein he joyntly reigned with his father. He was exceedingly beloved of his people; and highly magnified by Poets, and other Writers. Towards his end he grew more voluptuous, than he had been in his former years: in which time he boasted, that he alone had found out the way how to live for ever. If this had been referred unto his honourable deeds, it might have stood with reason: otherwise the Gout, with which he was often troubled, was enough to teach him his own errour. He was the first of the Kings derived from Alexanders Successors, that entred into League with the Romans: as also his off-spring was the last among those Royal Families, which by them was rooted up.

* Ant. de civ. Dei. lib. 18. c. 42.

(a) Jos. ant. l. 12. cap. 2. Concerning that Book which goes under the name of Aristæus; many learned men, and among the rest, Lodovicus Vives, hold suspicion that it is counterfeit, and the invention of some late Author. Surely if it were to be suspected in the time of Vives; it may be now much more justly suspected: since a new Edition of it is come forth, purged from faults, (as the Papists term those Books, wherein they have changed what they please) and set forth by Middendorpius at Colen, An Dom. 1578.

Antiochus Theos had another wife called Laodice, at such time as he married with Berenice the daughter of this Ptolomy. After his second marriage, he used his first wife with no better regard, then if she had been his Concubine. Laodice hated him for this: yet adventured not to seek revenge, until her own son Seleucus Callinicus was of ability to be King. This was two or three years after the death of Ptolomy Philadelphus: at what time she poysoned her husband Theos; and, by permission of Seleucus her son, murdered Berenice, together with a son that she had born to Antiochus. Justine reports, that Berenice saved her self, together with the young Prince her child, a while in the Sanctuary at Daphne: and that not only some Cities of Asia prepared to succour her, but her brother Ptolomy Energetes King of Ægypt, came to rescue her with an Army; though too late, for she was slain before. Just. l. 27.

With such cruelties Seleucus Callinicus, succeding unto his Father, that had fifteen years been King, began his reign. His subjects were highly offended at his wicked nature; which they discovered in his first entrance. Wherefore it was like, that his Estate would have been much endangered, if Ptolomy Energetes, who came against him, had not been drawn back into his own Countrey, by some Commotions there in hand. For there were none that would bear armes against Ptolomy, in defence of their own King: but rather they sided with the Ægyptian; who took Laodice the Kings mother, and rewarded her with death as she had well deserved. Wherefore Seleucus, being freed from this invasion, by occasion of those domestical troubles which recalled Energetes home inro Ægypt; went about a dangerous piece of work, even to make War upon his own subjects, because of their bad affection towards him; when it had been much better, by well deserving to have changed their hatred into love. A great Fleet he prepared: in furnishing and maning whereof he was at such charges, that he scarce left himself any other hope, if that should miscarry. Herein he embarqued himself, and putting to Sea, did meet with such a tempest, as devoured all save himself, and a very few of his friends that hardly escaped. This calamity, having left him nothing else in a manner than his naked body, turned nevertheless to his great good; as anon after it seemed. For when his subjects understood in what sort the gods (as they conceived it) had punished him for his offences: they had commiseration of his Estate; and, presuming that he would thenceforth become a new man, offered unto him their service with great alacrity. This revived him, and filled him such a spirit; as thinking himself well enough able to deal with the Ægyptian, he made ready a mighty Army for that purpose. But his fortune was no better at Land, that it had been at Sea. He was vanquished by Ptolomy in a great battel: whence he escaped hardly; no better attended, than after his late Shipwrack. Hasting therefore back to Antioch, and fearing that the enemy would soon be at his heels; heels; He wrote unto his brother Antiochus Hierax who lay then in Asia, praying him to bring succour with all speed; and promising, in recompence of his faith and diligence, the Dominion of a great part of Asia. Antiochus was then but fourteen years old, but extreamly ambitious; and therefore glad of such an occasion to make himself great, He levied a mighty Army of the Gaules; wherewith he set forward to help his brother, or rather to get what he could for himself. Hereof Ptolomy being advertised: and having no desire to put himself in danger more then he needed; took Truce with Seleucus for ten years. No sooner was Seleucus freed from this care of the Ægyptian War, but his brother Antiochus came upon him, and needs would fight with him, as knowing himself to have the better Army. So Seleucus was vanquished again; and saved himself with so few about him, that he was verily supposed to have perished in the battel. Thus did Gods Justice take revenge of those murders by which the Crown was purchased; and setled (as might have been thought) on the head of this bloody King. Antiochus was very glad to hear of his brothers death, as if thereby he had purchased his hearts desire. But the Gaules, his Mercenaries, were gladder then he, For when he led them against Eumenes King of Pergamus, being in hope to get honour by making a Conquest in the beginning of his Reign: these perfidious Barbarians took counsel against him, and devised how to strip him of all that he had. They thought it very likely, that if there were none of the Royal house to make head against them; it would be in their power, to do what should be best pleasing to themselves, in the lower Asia. Wherefore they laid hands on Antiochus; and enforced him to ransome himself with money, as if he had been their lawful Prisoner. Neither were they so contented: but made him enter into such Composition with them, as tended but little to his honour. In the mean while Seleucus had gathered a new Army: and prepared once more to try his fortune against his brother. Eumenes hearing of this, thought the season fit for himself, to make his profit of their discord. Antiochus fought with him, and was beaten: which is no great marvail, since he had great reason to stand in no less fear of the Gaules, his own Souldiers, than of the enemy with whom he had to deal. After this, Eumenes won much in Asia; whilest Antiochus went against his brother. In the second battel, fought between the brethren, Seleucus had the upper hand: and Antiochus Hierax (or the Hawk) which surname was given him, because he sought his prey upon every one, without care whether he were provoked or not) soared away as far as he could, both from his brother, and from his own Gaules. Having fetcht a great compass through Mesopotamia and Armenia, He fell at length in Cappadocia; where his father-in-law King Artamenes took him up. He was entertained very lovingly in outward shew; but with a meaning to betray him. This he soon perceived: and therefore betook him to his wings again; though he knew not well, which way to bend his flight. At length he resolved to bestow himself upon Ptolomy; his own conscience telling him, what evil he had meant unto Seleucus his brother; and therefore what little good he was reciprocally to expect at his hands. Infidelity can find no sure harbour. Ptolomy well understood the perfidious and turbulent nature of this Hierax. Wherefore he laid him up in close prison: whence though by means of an harlot, he got out; yet flying from his keepers, he fell into the hands of thieves, by whom he was murthered. Near about the same time died Seleucus. The Parthians and Bactrians had rebelled against him, during his Wars with his brother. He therefore made a journey against Arsaces founder of the Parthian Kingdom: wherein his evil fortune, or rather Gods vengeance, adhered so closely to him, that he was taken prisoner. Arsaces dealt friendly with him, and dismissed him, having every way given him royal entertainment: but in returning home, he brake his neck by a fall from his horse, and so ended his unhappy reign of twenty years. He had to wife Laodice the sister of Andromachus, one of his most trusty Captains: which was father unto that Achæus, who making his advantage of this affinity, became shortly after (as he stiled himself) a King; though rather indeed, a great troubler of the world in those parts. By Laodice he had two sons; Seleucus the third, surnamed Ceraunus; and Antiochus the third, called afterwards the Great.

Seleucus Ceraunus reigned only three years: in which time he made War upon Attalus the first, that was King of Pergamus. Being weak of body through sickness, and in want of money, he could not keep his men of War in good order: and finally he was slain by treason of Nicanor and Apaturius a Gaule. His death was revenged by Achæus, who slew the Traitors, and took charge of the Army: which he ruled very wisely, and faithfully a while; Antiochus the brother of Seleucus being a Child.

§. II.

The beginning of the Great Antiochus his reign. Of Ptolomy Euergetes, and Philopater, Kings of Ægypt. War between Antiochus and Philopater. The rebellion of Molo: an expedition of Antiochus againſt him. The recontinuance of Antiochus his Ægyptian War: with the paſſages between the two Kings: the Victory of Ptolomy, and peace concluded. Of Achæus, and his rebellion; his greatneſs, and his fall. Antiochus his expedition againſt the Parthians, Bactrians, and Indians. Somewhat of the Kings reigning in India, after the death of the Great Alexander.

Antiochus was ſcarcely fifteen years old, when he began his reign, which laſted ſix and thirty years. In his minority he was wholly governed by one Hermias, an ambitious man, and one which maligned all vertue, that he found in any of the Kings faithful ſervants. This vile quality in a Counſellor of ſuch great place, how harmful it was unto his Lord, and finally unto himſelf; the ſucceſs of things will ſhortly diſcover.

Soon after the beginning of Antiochus his reign, Ptolomy Euergetes King of Ægypt died, and left his heir Ptolomy Philopater, a young Boy likewiſe, as hath elſewhere been remembred. This was that Euergetes, who relieved Aratus and the Achæans: who afterwards took part with Cleomenes: and lovingly entertained him, when he was chaſed out of Greece by Antigonus Gonatus. He annexed unto his Dominion the Kingdom of Cyrene by taking to wife Bernice, the daughter of King Magas. He was the third of the Ptolomies; and the laſt good King of that race. The name of Euergetes, or the doer of good, was given to him by the Ægyptians; not ſo much for the great ſpoils which he brought home, after his victories in Syria; as for that he recovered ſome of thoſe Images or Idols, which Cambyſes, when he conquered Ægypt, had carried into Perſia. He was ready to have made War upon the Jews, for that Onias their high Prieſt, out of meer covetouſneſs of money, refuſed to pay unto him his yearly tribute of 20. talents: but he was pacified by the wiſdom of Joſephus a Jew, to whom afterwards he let in farm the Tributes and cuſtoms that belonged unto him in thoſe parts of Syria which he held. For Cæloſyria, with Palæſtina, and all thoſe parts of the Country that lay neareſt unto Egypt, were held by the Egyptian; either as having fallen to the ſhare of Ptolomy the firſt, at ſuch time as the great Antigonus was vanquiſhed and ſlain in the battel at Ipſus; or as being won by this Euergetes, in the troubleſome and unhappy reign of Seleucus Callinicus. The victories of this Euergetes in Syria, with the contentions that laſted for many ſucceeding ages between the Ptolomies and the Seleucidæ; were all foretold by Daniel in the Prophecy before cited, which is expounded by S. Hierome. Thus Ptolomy Euergetes reigned ſix and twenty years; and died towards the end of the hundred thirty and ninth Olympiad. It may ſeem by that which we find in the Prologue unto Jeſus the ſon of Syrach his book, that he ſhould have reigned a much longer time. For Siracides there ſaith that he came into Egypt in the eight and thirtieth year, when Euergetes was King. It may therefore be, That either this King reigned long together with his father: or that thoſe eight and thirty years were the years of Jeſus his own age; if not perhaps reckoned (as the Jews did otherwhiles reckon) from ſome notable accident that had befallen them.

Not long after the death of Euergetes, Hermias the Counſellor, and in a manner the Protector of King Antiochus, incited his Lord unto War againſt the Egyptians; for the recovery of Cæloſyria and the Countries adjoyning. This Counſel was very unſeaſonably given, when Molo, the Kings Lieutenant in Media, was broken out in rebellion, and ſought to make himſelf abſolute Lord of that rich Country. Nevertheleſs Hermias, being more froward than wiſe, maintained ſtiffely, that it was moſt expedient and agreeable with the Kings honour, to ſend forth againſt a rebellious Captain, other Captains that were faithful; whileſt he in perſon made War upon one that was like himſelf, a King. No man durſt gain-ſay the reſolution of Hermias; who therefore ſent Xenætas an Achæan, with ſuch forces as he thought expedient, againſt the Rebel; whileſt in the mean ſeaſon an Army was preparing for the Kings expedition into Cæloſyria. The King having marched from Apamea to Laodicea, and ſo over the Deſarts into the Valley of Maſſias, between the Mountains of Libanus and Anti-libanus, found his way there ſtopped by Theodotus an Ætolian, that ſerved under Ptolomy. So he conſumed the time there a while to none effect: and then came news, that Xenætas, his Captain, was deſtroyed with his whole Army; and Molo thereby become Lord of all the Countrey, as far as unto Babylon.

and drew near to the River of Tygris, received many advertisements, by such as fled over unto him from the Enemy, That the followers of Molo were, for the most part, against their wills drawn by their Commander to bear arms against their King. This report was not altogether false; but Molo himself stood in some doubt lest his followers would leave him in time of necessity. Xenætas therefore making shew, as if he had prepared to pass the River by Boats in face of his enemy; left in the night time such as he thought meet to defend his Camp: and with all the flower of his Army went over Tygris, in a place ten miles lower than Molo his Camp. Molo heard of this, and sent forth his horse to give impediment: but hearing that Xenætas could not so be stopped, He himself dislodged, and took his journey towards Media; leaving all his baggage behind him in his Camp. Whether he did this, as distrusting the faith of his own Souldiers; or whether thereby to deceive his Enemy: the great folly of Xenætas made his stratagem prosperous. For Xenætas, having born himself proudly before, upon the countenance of Hermias, by whom he was advanced unto this charge; did now presume that all should give way to his authority, without putting him to much trouble of using the sword. Wherefore he suffered his men to feast with the provisions which they found ready in the forsaken Camp: or rather he commanded them so to do, by making Proclamation, That they should cherish up themselves against the journey, which he intended to take the next day, in pursuit of the Rebels that fled. And to the same purpose he busied himself, in transporting the remainder of his Army, which he had left on the other side of Tygris. But Molo went no further that day, than he could easily return the same night. Wherefore understanding what good rule the Kings men kept: he made such haste back unto them, that he came upon them early in the morning; whilest they were yet heavy with the Wine and other good cheer that they had spent at supper. So Xenætas and a very few with him, died fighting in defence of the Camp: the rest were slaughtered without making resistance; and many of them ere they were perfectly awake. Likewise the Camp on the other side of Tygris, was easily taken by Molo: the Captains flying thence, to save their own lives. In the heat of this Victory, the Rebel marched unto Seleucia, which he presently took: and, mastering within a little while the Province of Babylonia, and all the Countrey down to the red Sea, or Bay of Persia, He hasted unto Susa; where at his first coming, he won the City; but failing to take the Castle that was exceeding strong, returned back to Seleucia, there to give order concerning this business.

The report of these things coming to Antiochus, whilest he lay (as is said before) in the Vale of Mapsyas; filled him with great sorrow, and his Camp with trouble. He took Counsel what to do in this needfull case: and was well advised by Epigenes, the best man of War he had about him, to let alone this enterprise of Cœlosyria; and bend his forces thither, where more need required them. This Counsel was put in execution with all convenient haste. Yet was Epigenes dismissed by the way, and soon after slain, by the practice of Hermias: who could not endure to hear good Counsel given, contrary to his own good liking and allowance. In the journey against Molo, the name and presence of the King was more available, than any odds which he had of the Rebel in strength. Molo distrusted his own followers: and thought, that neither his late good success, nor any other consideration, would serve to hold them from returning to the Kings obedience, if once they beheld his person. Wherefore he thought it safest for him to assail the Kings Camp in the night time. But going in hand with this, He was discovered by some that fled over from him to the King. This caused him to return back to his Camp: which by some errour, took alarm at his rturn: and was hardly quieted, when Antiochus appeared in sight. The King was thus forward in giving battel to Molo, upon confidence which he had that many would revolt unto him. Neither was he deceived in this his belief. For not a few men or Ensigns: but all the left wing of the enemy which was opposite unto the King, changed side forthwith as soon as ever they had sight of the Kings person; and were ready to do him service against Molo. This was enough to have won the Victory: but Molo shortned the work, by killing himself; as did also divers of his friends, who for fear of torments, prevented the Hang-man with their own swords.

After this Victory, came joyful news, that the Queen Laodice daughter of Mithridates King of Pontus, which was married unto Antiochus a while before, had brought forth a son. Fortune seemed bountiful unto the King: and therefore he purposed to make what use he could of her friendly disposition while it lasted. But now in the Eastern parts of his Kingdom, He judged it convenient to visit his frontiers, were it only only to terrifie the Barbarians, that bordered upon him. Hereunto his Counſellor Hermias gave aſſent: not ſo much reſpecting the Kings honour, as conſidering what good might thereby happen to himſelf. For if it ſhould come to paſs, that the King were taken out of the World by any caſuality: then made he no doubt of becoming Protector to the young Prince; and thereby of lengthening his own Goverment. Antiochus therefore went againſt Artabanes, who reigned among the Atropatians; having the greateſt part of his Kingdom ſituate between the Caſpian and Euxine Sea. This barbarous King was very old and fearful; and therefore yielded unto whatſoever conditions it pleaſed Antiochus to lay upon him. So in this journey Antiochus got honour, ſuch as well contented him; and then returned homewards. Upon the way, a Phyſition of his brake with him as concerning Hermias; informing him truly how odious he was to the people; and how dangerous he would be ſhortly unto the Kings own life. Antiochus believed this, as having long ſuſpected the ſame Hermias; but not daring for fear of him to utter his ſuſpitions. It was therefore agreed, that he ſhould be made away on the ſudden: which was done, he being trained forth by a ſleight, a good way out of the Camp, and there killed without warning or diſputation. The King needed not to have uſed ſo much art in ridding his hands of a man ſo much deteſted. For howſoever he ſeemed gracious whileſt he was alive: yet they that for fear had been moſt obſequious to him, whileſt he was in caſe to do them hurt, was as ready as the foremoſt, to ſpeak of him as he had deſerved, when once they were ſecure of him: yea, his wife and children, laying then at Apamea, were ſtoned to death by the wives and children of the Citizens; whoſe indignation brake forth the more outragiouſly, the longer that it had been concealed.

About theſe times, Achæus (of whom we ſpake before) thinking that Antiochus might happen to periſh in ſome of theſe expeditions which he took in hand; was bold to ſet a Diadem upon his own head, and take upon him as a King. His purpoſe was to have invaded Syria: but the fame of Antiochus his returning thitherwards, made him quit the enterpriſe; and ſtudy to ſet ſome handſome colour on his former preſumption. It is very ſtrange that Antiochus neither went againſt Achæus; nor yet diſſembled the notice which he had taken of theſe his traiterous purpoſes: but wrote unto him, ſignifying that he knew all, and upbraiding him with ſuch infidelity, as any offender might know to be unpardonable. By theſe means he emboldned the Traitor: who being already detected, might better hope to maintain his former actions by ſtrong hand, than to excuſe them or get pardon by ſubmiſſion. Antiochus had at that time a vehement deſire to recover Cœloſyria, or what elſe he could, of the Dominions of Ptolomy Philopater in thoſe parts. He began with Seleucia, a very ſtrong City near to the mouth of the River Orontes; which ere long he won, partly by force, partly by corrupting with bribes the Captains that lay therein. This was that Seleucia, whereto Antigonus the Great, who founded it, gave the name of Antigonia: but Seleucus getting it ſhortly after, called it Seleucia; and Ptolomy Euergetes having lately won it, might if it had ſo pleaſed him, have changed the name into Ptolomais. Such is the vanity of men, that hope to purchaſe an endleſs memorial unto their names, by works proceeding rather from their greatneſs, than from their vertue; which therefore no longer are their own, than the ſame greatneſs hath continuance. Theodotus the Ætolian, he that before had oppoſed himſelf to Antiochus, and defended Cœloſyria in the behalf of Ptolomy; was now grown ſorry, that he had uſed ſo much faith and diligence, in ſervice of an unthankful and luxurious Prince. Wherefore as a Mercenary, he began to have regard to his own profit: which thinking to find greater, by applying himſelf unto him that was (queſtionleſs) the more worthy of theſe two Kings; he offered to deliver up unto Antiochus, the Cities of Tyrus and Ptolomais. Whilſt he was deviſing about this Treaſon, and had already ſent meſſengers to King Antiochus: his practice was detected, and he beſieged in Ptolomais by one of Ptolomies Captains, that was more faithful than himſelf. But Antiochus haſting to his reſcue, vanquiſhed this Captain who met him on the way: and afterwards got poſſeſſion, not only of Tyrus and Ptolomais, with a good Fleet of the Egyptian Kings that was in thoſe Havens: but of ſo many other Towns in that Country, as emboldned him to think upon making a journey into Egypt it ſelf. Agathocles and Soſibius bore all the ſway in Egypt at that time: Ptolomy himſelf being loath to have his pleaſures interrupted, with buſineſs of ſo ſmall importance, as the ſafety of his Kingdom. Wherefore theſe two agreed together, to make proviſion as haſtily, and yet as ſecretly as might be for the War: and nevertheleſs at the ſame time, to preſs Antiochus with daily Embaſſadours to ſome good agreement. There came in the heat of this buſineſs, Embaſſadours from Rhodes, Byzantium, and Cyzicus, as likewiſe from the Ætolians; according to the uſual courteſie of the Greeks, deſiring to take up the quarrel.

Theſe were all entertained in Memphis, by Agathocles and Soſibius: who intreated them to deal effectually with Antiochus. But whilſt this treaty laſted, great preparations were made at Alexandria for the War: wherein theſe two Counſellors perſwaded themſelves reaſonably, that the victory would be their own; if they could get, for money, a ſufficient number of the Greeks to take their parts. Antiochus heard only what was done at Memphis, and how deſirous the Governours of Ægypt were to be at quiet: whereunto he gave the readier belief, not only for that he knew the diſpoſition of Ptolomy, but becauſe the Rhodians, and other Embaſſadours, coming from Memphis, diſcourſed unto him all after one manner; as being all deceived by the cunning of Apathocles and his fellow: Antiochus therefore having wearied himſelf, at the long ſiege of a Town called Dura, which he could not win: and being deſirous to refreſh himſelf and his Army in Seleucia, during the winter which then came on, granted to the Ægyptian a Truce for four moneths, with promiſe that he would be ready to hearken unto equal Conditions, when they ſhould be offered. It was not his meaning to be ſo courteous, as he would fain have ſeemed, but only to lull his enemies aſleep, whileſt he took time to refreſh himſelf; and to bring Achæus to ſome good order, whoſe treaſon daily grew more open and violent. The ſame negligence which he thought the Ægyptian would have uſed, he uſed himſelf, as preſuming that when time of the year better ſerved, little force would be needful; for that the Towns would voluntarily yield unto him, ſince Ptolomy provided not for their defence. Nevertheleſs, he gave Audience to the Embaſſadours, and had often conference with thoſe that were ſent out of Ægypt: pleaſing himſelf, well to diſpute about the juſtice of his quarrel which he purpoſed ſhortly to make good by the ſword, whether it were juſt or no. He ſaid, that it was agreed betweex Seleucus his Anceſtor, and Ptolomy the Son of Lagi, That all Syria, if they could win it from Antigonus, ſhould be given in poſſeſſion to Seleucus: and that this bargain was afterward ratified, by general conſent of the Confederates, after the battel at Ipſus. But Ptolomies men would acknowledge no ſuch bargain. They ſaid that Ptolomy the ſon of Lagi, had won Cœloſyria, and the Provinces adjoyning for himſelf: as alſo that he had ſufficiently gratified Seleucus, by lending him forces to recover his Province of Babylon, and the Countries about the River of Euphrates. Thus whileſt neither of them greatly cared for peace; they were in the end of their diſputation, as far from concluding, as at the beginning. Ptolomy demanded reſtitution; Antiochus thought, that he had not as yet gotten all that was his own: Alſo Ptolomy would needs have Achæus comprehended in the league between them, as one of their Confederates; But Antiochus would not endure to hear of this, exclaiming againſt it as a ſhameful thing, that one King ſhould offer to deal ſo with another, as to take his rebel into protection, and ſeek to joyn him in Confederacy with his own Soveraign Lord. When the Truce was expired, and Antiochus prepared to take the field again: contrary to his expectation, he was informed, That Ptolomy, with a very puiſſant Army, was coming up againſt him out of Ægypt. Setting forward therefore to meet with the Enemy, he was encountred on the way by theſe Captains of Ptolomy, that had reſiſted him the year before. They held againſt him the paſſages of Libanus, whence nevertheleſs he drave them: and proceeding onward in his journey, won ſo many places, that he greatly encreaſed his reputation; and thereby drew the Arabians, with divers of the bordering people, to become his followers. As the two Kings drew near together: many Captains of Ptolomy forſook his pay, and fled over to Antiochus. This notwithſtanding, the Ægyptian had the courage to meet his enemy in the field. The battle was fought at Raphia: where it was not to be decided, whether the Ægyptians, or the Aſiatiques were the better Souldiers, (for that the ſtrength of both Armies conſiſted in Mercenaries, chiefly of the Greeks, Thracians, and Gauls;) but whether of the Kings was the more fortunate. Ptolomy, with Arſinoe his Siſter and Wife, rode up and down encouraging his men; the like did Antiochus on the other ſide: each of them rehearſing the brave deeds of his Anceſtors; as not having of their own, whereby to value themſelves. Antiochus had the more Elephants, as alſo his being of Aſia, had they been fewer, would have beaten thoſe of Africk. Wherefore by the advantage of thoſe beaſts, He drave the Enemies before him, in that part of the battel wherein he fought himſelf. But Ptolomy had the better men by whoſe valour he brake the Groſs of his enemies battel, and won the victory: whileſt whileſt Antiochus was heedleſly following upon thoſe, whom he had compelled to retire. Antiochus had brought into the field above ſeventy thouſand foot, and ſix thouſand horſe; whereof though he loſt ſcarce ten thouſand foot, and not four hundred horſe; yet the fame of his overthrow took from him all thoſe places which he had lately won. When therefore he was returned home to Antioch: He began to ſtand in fear, leſt Ptolomy and Achæus, ſetting upon him both at once, ſhould put him in danger of his whole Eſtate. This cauſed him to ſend Embaſſadors to the Egyptian, to treat of peace; which was readily granted; it being much againſt the nature of Ptolomy to vex himſelf thus with the tedious buſineſs of War. So Ptolomy having ſtaid three moneths in Syria, returned home into Egypt, clad with the reputation of a Conqueror; to the great admiration of his ſubjects and all thoſe that were acquainted with his voluptuous and ſlothful condition.

Achæus was not compriſed in the league between theſe two Kings: or if he had been included therein; yet would not the Egyptian have taken the pains, of making a ſecond expedition for his ſake. The beſt was, that he thought himſelf ſtrong enough, if fortune were not too much againſt him, to deal with Antiochus. Neither was he confident without great reaſon: for beſides his many victories, whereby he had gotten all that belonged unto Antiochus on this ſide of Taurus, he had alſo good ſucceſs againſt Attalus King of Pergamus: that was an able man of War, and commanded a ſtrong Army. Neither was he, as Molo the Rebel had been, one of mean regard otherwiſe, and carried beyond himſelf by apprehending the advantage of ſome opportunity: but Couſin-german to the King, as hath been ſhewed before; and now lately the Kings brother-in-law, by taking to wife a younger daughter of the ſame Mithridates King of Pontus, which was alſo called Laodice, as was her Siſter the Queen, Antiochus his wife. Theſe things had added Majeſty unto him, and had made his followers greatly to reſpect him, even as one to whom a Kingdom was belonging. Neither made it a little for him, That King Ptolomy of Egypt held him in the nature of a friend: and that King Antiochus was now lately vanquiſhed in the battel at Raphia: and had thereby loſt all his gettings in Syria. But all theſe hopes and likelihoods came to nothing: for the King of Pontus, if he would meddle in that quarel between ſons-in-law, had no reaſon to take part againſt the more honourable. As for the Egyptian, he was not only ſlothful, but hindred by a rebellion of his own ſubjects, from helping his friends abroad. For the people of Egypt, of whom Ptolomy, contrary to the manner of his Progenitors, had armed a great number to ſerve in the late expedition; began to entertain a good opinion of their own valour, thinking it not inferiour to the Macedonian. Hereupon they refuſed to ſuffer as much as formerly they had done: ſince they leſs eſteemed, than they had done, the force of the Kings mercenary Greeks: which had hitherto kept them in ſtraight ſubjection. Thus brake out a War between the King and his ſubjects: wherein though the ill-guided force of the multitude was finally broken; yet King Ptolomy thereby waſted much of his ſtrength, and much of his time, that might have been ſpent, as he thought, much better in revelling: or, as others thought, in ſuccouring Achæus. As for Antiochus, He had no ſooner made his peace with the Egyptian, than he turned all his care to the preparation of War againſt Achæus. To this purpoſe he entred into League with Attalus; that ſo he might diſtract the forces of his Rebel, and find him work on all ſides. Finally, his diligence and fortune were ſuch, that within a while he had pent up Achæus into the City of Sardes; where he held him about two years beſieged. The City was very ſtrong, and well victualled: ſo as there appeared not, when the ſecond year came, any greater likelihood of taking it, than in the firſt years ſiege. In the end, one Lagoras a Cretan found means how to enter the Town. The Caſtle it ſelf was upon a very high rock, and in a manner impregnable; as alſo the Town-wall adjoyning to the Caſtle, in that part which was called the Sawe, was in like manner ſituate upon ſteep Rocks, and almoſt inacceſſible; that hung over a deep bottom, whereinto the dead carkaſes of Horſes, and other beaſts, yea, and ſometimes of men, uſed to be thrown. Now it was obſerved by Lagoras, that the Ravens and other birds of prey, which haunted that place by reaſon of their food which was there never wanting, uſed to flye up unto the top of the Rocks, and to pitch upon the wals, where they reſted without any diſturbance. Obſerving this often, he reaſoned with himſelf, and concluded that thoſe parts of the wall were left unguarded, as being thought unapproachable. Hereof he informed the King: who approved his judgement, and gave unto him the leading of ſuch men, as he deſired for the accompliſhing of the enterpriſe. The ſucceſs was agreeable to that which

Lagoras had afore conceived: and though with much labour, yet without reſiſtance, he ſcaled thoſe rocks, and whileſt a general aſſault was made, entred the Town in that part, which was at other times unguarded, then unthought upon. In the ſame place had the Perſians, under Cyrus, gotten into Sardes; when Cræſus thought himſelf ſecure on that ſide. But the Citizens took not warning by the example of a loſs of many ages paſt: and therefore out of memory. Achæus held ſtill the Caſtle: which not only ſeemed by nature impregnable, but was very well ſtored with all neceſſaries, and manned with a ſufficient number, of ſuch as were to him well aſſured. Antiochus therefore was conſtrained to waſte much time about it: having none other hope to prevail, than by famiſhing the incloſed. Beſides the uſual tediouſneſs of expectation, his buſineſs called him thence away into the higher Aſia, where the Bactrians, and Parthians with the Hyrcanians, had erected Kingdoms taken out of his Dominions, upon which they ſtill incroached. But he thought it not ſafe, to let Achæus break looſe again. On the other ſide there were ſome Agents of Ptolomy the Egyptian, and good friends unto Achæus; that made it their whole ſtudy, how to deliver this beſieged Prince. If they could reſcue his perſon, they cared for no more: but preſumed that when he ſhould appear in the Countrys under Taurus, he would ſoon have an Army at command, and be ſtrong enough to hold Antiochus as hardly to work as at any time before. Wherefore they dealt with one Bolis a Cretian, that was acquainted well with all the wayes in the Country, and particularly with the by-paths and exceeding difficult paſſages among thoſe Rocks, whereon the Caſtle of Sardes ſtood. Him they tempted with great rewards, which he ſhould receive at the hands of Ptolomy, as well as of Achæus; to do his beſt for performance of their deſire. He undertook the buſineſs: and gave ſuch likely reaſons of bringing all to good effect, that they wrote unto Achæus, by one Arianus, a truſty meſſenger, whom Bolis found means to conveigh into the Caſtle. The faith of theſe Negotiators Achæus held moſt aſſured. They alſo wrote unto him in privie Characters, or Ciphers, wherewith none ſave he and they were acquainted: whereby he knew, that it was no fained device of his Enemies, in the name of his friends. As for the meſſenger, he was a truſty fellow, and one whom Achæus found by examination, heartily affected unto their ſide. But the Contents of the Epiſtle, which were that he ſhould be confident in the faith of Bolis, and of one Cambylus whom Bolis had won unto the buſineſs, did ſomewhat trouble him. They were men to him unknown: and Cambylus was a follower of Antiochus; under whom he had the command of thoſe Cretans, which held one of the Forts that blocked up the Caſtle of Sardes. Nevertheleſs other way to eſcape he ſaw none, than by putting himſelf to ſome adventure. When the meſſenger had therefore paſſed often to and fro, it was at length concluded, That Bolis himſelf ſhould come ſpeak with Achæus, and conduct him forth. There was none other than good faith meant by any of the reſt, ſave only by Bolis and Cambylus; which were Cretans, and (as all their Countrymen,* ſome few excepted, have been, and ſtill are,) falſe knaves. Theſe two held a conſultation together, that was, as (a) Polybius obſerves it, rightly Cretical: neither concerning the ſafety of him whoſe deliverance they undertook, nor touching the diſcharge of their own faith; but only how to get moſt with leaſt adoe and danger to themſelves. Briefly they concluded, That firſt of all, they would equally ſhare between them ten Talents, which they had already received in hand: and then, That they would reveal the matter to Antiochus; offering to deliver Achæus unto him, if they might be well rewarded both with preſent money, and with promiſe of conſideration anſwerable to the greatneſs of ſuch a ſervice, when it ſhould be diſpatched. Antiochus hearing this promiſe of Cambylus, was no leſs glad, than were the friends of Achæus well pleaſed with the comfortable promiſes of Bolis. At length when all things were in readineſs on both ſides, and that Bolis with Arianus was to get up into the Caſtle, and conveigh Achæus thence: He firſt went with Cambylus to ſpeak with the King, who gave him very private audience; and confirmed unto him by word of mouth the aſſurance of his liberal promiſes. And after that, putting on the countenance of an honeſt man, and of one that was faithful unto Ptolomy, whom he had long ſerved, he accompanied Arianus up into the Caſtle. At his coming thither, he was lovingly entertained; yet queſtioned at large by Achæus, touching all the weight of the buſineſs in hand. But he diſcourſed ſo well, and with ſuch gravity; that there appeared no reaſon of diſtrusting either his faith or judgement. He was an old Souldier, had long been a Captain under Ptolomy, and did not thruſt himſelf into this buſineſs; but was invited by honourable and faithful me. He had also taken a safe course, in wining (as it seemed) that other Country-man of his, who kept a Fort that stood in their way; and thereby had already sundry times given safe passage and repassage unto Arianus. But against all these comfortable hopes, the importance of so great an adventure stirred up some diffidence. Achæus therefore dealt wisely, and said, that he would yet stay in the Castle a little longer: but that he meant to send away with Bolis three or four of his friends; from whom, when he received better advertisement, concerning the likelihood of the enterprise, then would he issue forth himself. Hereby he took order, not to commit himself wholly unto the faith of a man unknown. But as Polybius well notes, he did not consider that he played the Cretian with a man of Crete: which is to say, that he had to do with one, whose knavery could not be avoided by circumspection. Bolis and Cambylus had laid their plots thus, That if Achæus came forth alone, then should he easily be taken by the ambush prepared for him: if he were accompanied with many of his friends, then should Arianus be appointed to lead the way, as one that of late had trodden it oft: and Bolis following behind, should have an eye upon Achæus to prevent him, not only from escaping in the tumult, but from breaking his own neck, or otherwise killing himself: to the end that being taken alive, he might be to Antiochus the more welcome Present. And in such order came they now forth: Arianus going before as Guide: the rest following as the way served, and Bolis in the Rear. Achæus made none acquainted with his purpose, till the very instant of his departure. Then signified he the matter to his Wife Laodice; and comforting her with hope as well as he could, appointed four of his special friends to bear him company. They were all disguised: and one of them alone took upon him to have knowledge of the Greek tongue; speaking & answering as need should require for all, as if the rest had been Barbarians. Bolis followed them, craftily devising upon his business, and much perplexed. For (saith Polybius) though he were of Crete, and prone to surmise any thing to the mischief of another; yet could he not see in the dark, nor know which of them was Achæus, or whether Achæus himself were there. The way was very uneasie, and in some places dangerous; especially to those that knew it not. Wherefore they were fain to stay in divers places, and help one another up or down. But upon every occasion they were all of them very officious towards Achæus; lending him their hands, and taking such care of him, as easily gave Bolis to understand that he was the man: and so by their unseasonable duty, they undid their Lord. When they came to the place where Cambylus lay in wait, Bolis whistled, and presently clapsed Achæus about the middle, holding him fast that he could not stir. So they were all taken by the Ambush, and carried forthwith to Antiochus; who sate up watching in his Pavilion, expecting the event. The sight of Achæus, brought in bound unto him, did so astonish the King that he was unable to speak a word, and anon brake out into weeping. Yet was he before informed of the plot, which might have kept him from admiration: as also the next morning betimes, assembling his friends together, he condemned Achæus to a cruel death: which argues, that he was not moved with pity towards this unhappy man. Wherefore it was the general regard of calamities, incident unto great fortunes, that wrung from him these tears: as also the rarity of the accident, that made both him and his friends to wonder: though it be so, that such a course as this of his, in imploying two mischievous knaves against one Traitor, doth not rarely succeed well; according to that Spanish Proverb, A un traydor dos allevosos. The death of Achæus brought such astonishment upon those which held the Castle, that after a while they gave up the place and themselves unto the King; whereby he got entire possession of all to him belonging in the lesser Asia.

Some years passed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition against the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obscure beginnings, and commonly subject unto those that ruled in Media. In the great shuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of small regard: shortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus: and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whose posterity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Calinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The lustful insolency of one of these Lieutenants, together with the misfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquished and thought to be slain by the Gauls, did stir up Arsaces, a nobleman of the Countrey, to seek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebel. So he slew the Kings Lieutenant; made himself King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought prosperously with those that disturbed him in his

Some years paſſed after this, ere Antiochus was ready for his expedition againſt the Parthians and Hyrcanians. The Parthians were a little Nation of obſcure beginnings, and commonly ſubject unto thoſe that ruled in Media. In the great ſhuffling for Provinces, after the death of Alexander, the Government over them was committed by Antipater, to one Philip, a man of ſmall regard: ſhortly they fell to Eumenes; then to Antigonus: and from him, together with the Medes, to Seleucus; under whoſe poſterity they continued until the Reign of Seleucus Calinicus, being ruled by Lieutenants of the Syrian Kings. The luſtful inſolency of one of theſe Lieutenants, together with the miſfortune of Callinicus, that was vanquiſhed and thought to be ſlain by the Gauls, did ſtir up Arſaces, a nobleman of the Countrey, to ſeek revenge of injuries done, and animate them to rebel. So he ſlew the Kings Lieutenant; made himſelf King of the Parthians, and Lord of Hyrcania; fought proſperouſly with thoſe that diſturbed him in his his beginnings; and took Seleucus Callinicus priſoner in battel, whom he royally entertained and diſmiſſed. Hereby he won reputation as a lawful King: and by good government of his Countrey, procured unto himſelf ſuch love of his Subjects, that his name was continued unto his ſucceſſors; like as that of the Ptolomies in Egypt, and that of the Cæſars afterwards in Rome. Much about the ſame time the Bactrians rebelled: though theſe at length, and all belonging unto the Seleucidæ beyond Euphrates, increaſed the Parthians dominion. Now Antiochus went againſt them with ſo ſtrong an army, that they durſt not meet him in plain field; but kept themſelves in woods or places of ſtrength, and defended the Straights and paſſages of mountains. The reſiſtances they made availed them not. For Antiochus had with him ſo great a multitude, and ſo well ſorted, as he needed not to turn out of the way, from thoſe that lay fortified againſt him, in Woods and Straights between their mountains; it being eaſie to ſpare out of ſo great a number, as many as fetching a compaſs about, might either get above the enemies heads; or come behind, and charge them on the back. Thus did he often imploy againſt them his light armature: wherewith he cauſed them to diſlodge, and give way unto his Phalanx; upon which they durſt not adventure themſelves in open ground. Arſaces, the ſecond of the name, (for his father was dead before this) was then King of Parthia: who though he was confident in the fidelity of his own ſubjects; yet feared to encounter ſo mighty an Invader. His hope was, that the bad wayes and Deſarts would have cauſed Antiochus, when he was at Ecbatane in Media, to give over the journey, without proceeding much further. This not ſo falling out: He cauſed the Wels and Springs in the Wilderneſs, through which his Enemy muſt paſs, to be dammed up and ſpoiled. By which means, and the reſiſtance before ſpoken of, when he could not prevail, He withdrew himſelf out of the way; ſuffering the Enemy to take his pleaſure for a time, in waſting the Countrey: wherein without ſome Victory obtained, he could make no long abode. Antiochus hereby found, That Arſaces was nothing ſtrongly provided for the War. Wherefore he marched through the heart of Parthia: and then forward into Hyrcania where he wan Tambrace, the chief City of that Province. This indignity and many other loſſes, cauſed Arſaces at length, when he had gathered an Army that ſeemed ſtrong enough, to adventure a battel. The iſſue thereof was ſuch as gave to neither of the Kings hope of accompliſhing his deſires, without exceeding difficulty. Wherefore Arſaces craved peace, and at length obtained it: Antiochus thinking it not amiſs, to make him a friend, whom he could not make a ſubject.

The next expedition of Antiochus, was againſt Entydemus King of the Bactrians; one that indeed had not rebelled againſt him or his Anceſtors: but having gotten the Kingdom from thoſe that had rebelled, kept it himſelf. With Euthydemus he fought a battel by the River Artus, where he had the Victory. But the Victory was not ſo greatly to his honour, as was the teſtimony which he gave of his own private valour, in obtaining it. He was thought that day to have demeaned him more courageouſly, than did any one man in all his Army. His horſe was ſlain under him; and he himſelf received a wound in his mouth, whereby he loſt ſome of his teeth. As for Euthydemus, He withdrew himſelf back unto the furthermoſt parts of his Kingdom, and afterwards protracted the War, ſeeking how to end it by compoſition. So Embaſſadors paſſed between the Kings: Antiochus complaining, That a Countrey of his was unjuſtly uſurped from him: Euthydemus anſwering, That he had won it from the children of the Uſurpers: and further, That the Bactrians, a wild Nation, could hardly be retained in order, ſave by a King of their own; for that they bordered upon the Scythians, with whom if they ſhould join, it would be greatly to the danger of all the Provinces that lay behind them. Theſe allegations, together with his own wearineſs, pacified Antiochus, and made him willing to grant Peace, upon reaſonable Conditions. Demetrius, the ſon of Euthydemus, being a goodly Gentleman, and employed by his father, as Embaſſador in this Treaty of Peace, was not a little available unto a good concluſion: for Antiochus liked him ſo well, that he promiſed to give him in marriage, one of his own daughters; and therewithal permitted Euthydemus to retain the Kingdom, cauſing him nevertheleſs to deliver up all his Elephants; as alſo to bind himſelf by oath, to ſuch Covenants as he thought requiſite.

So Antiochus leaving the Bactrian in quiet, made a journey over Caucauſus, and came to the borders of India, where he renewed with Sophagaſenus, King of the Indians, the ſociety that had been between their Anceſtors. The Indians had remained ſubject unto the Macedonians for a little while, after Alexanders death. Eumenes in his War againſt againſt Antigonus, raiſed part of his forces out of their Countrey. But when Antigonus (after his victory) turned Weſtward, and was overbuſied in a great Civill War: then did one Sandrocottus, an Indian, ſtir up his Country men to rebellion; making himſelf their Captain, and taking upon him, as protector of their liberty. This Office and Title he ſoon changed, though not without ſome contention, into the Name and Majeſty of a King. Finally he got unto himſelf (having an Army of ſix hundred thouſand men) if not all India, yet as much of it as had been Alexanders. In this eſtate he had well confirmed himſelf, ere Seleucus Nicanor could find leiſure to call him to account. Neither did he faint, or humble himſelf at the coming of Seleucus; but met him in the field, as ready to defend his own, ſo ſtrongly and well appointed, that the Macedonian was contented to make both peace and affinity with him, taking only a reward of fifty Elephants. This League, made by the Founders of the Indian and Syrian Kingdoms, was continued by ſome offices of love between their children, and now renewed by Antiochus: whoſe number of Elephants were increaſed thereupon, by the Indian King, to an hundred and fifty: as alſo he was promiſed, to have ſome treaſure ſent after him; which he left one to receive. Thus parted theſe two great Kings. Neither had the Indians, from this time forwards in many generations, any buſineſs worthy of remembrance with the Weſtern countries. The poſterity of Sandrocottus is thought to have retained that Kingdom unto the dayes of Auguſtus Cæſar: to whom Porus, then reigning in India, ſent Embaſſadors with preſents, and an Epiſtle written in Greek, wherein among other things, he ſaid, That he had command over ſix hundred Kings. There is alſo found, ſcattered in ſundry Authors, the mention of ſome which held that Kingdom, in divers Ages, even unto the time of Conſtantine the Great: being all peradventure of the ſame race. But Antiochus, who in this Treaty with Sophagaſenus carryed himſelf as the worthier perſon, receiving preſents and after marching home through Drangiana and Carmania, with ſuch reputation, that all the Potentates, not only in the higher Aſia, but on the hither ſide of Taurus, humbled themſelves unto him, and called him The Great: ſaw an end of his own greatneſs within few years enſuing, by preſuming to ſtand upon points with the Romans: whoſe Greatneſs was the ſame in deed, that his was only in ſeeming.

§. III.

The lewd reign of Ptolomy Philopater in Ægypt: with the Tragical end of his favourites, when he was dead. Antiochus prepares to war on the young child Ptolomy Epiphanes, the ſon of Philopater. His irreſolution in preparing for divers wars at once. His voyage towards the Helleſpont. He ſeeks to hold amity with the Romans, who make friendly ſhew to him; intending nevertheleſs to have war with him. His doings againſt the Helleſpont; which the Romans made the firſt ground of their quarrel to him.

THis expedition being finiſhed, Antiochus had leiſure to repoſe himſelf a while; and ſtudy which way to convert the terrour of his puiſſance, for the enlargement of his Empire. Within two or three years Ptolomy Philopater died: leaving his ſon Ptolomy Epiphanes, a young Boy, his ſucceſſour in the Kingdom: unlikely by him to be well defended againſt a neighbour ſo mighty and ambitious. This Ptolomy ſurnamed Philopater, that is to ſay, a lover of his Father, is thought to have had that ſurname given him in meer deriſion; as having made away both his Father and Mother. His young years being newly paſt, his childhood when he began to reign, may ſeem to diſcharge him of ſo horrible a crime, as his Fathers death: yet the beaſtlineſs of all his following life, makes him not unlike to have done any miſchief, whereof he could be accuſed. Having won the battles at Raphiah, He gave himſelf over to ſenſuality, and was wholly governed by a Strumpet called Agathoclea. At her inſtigation He murdered his own wife and ſiſter; which had adventured her ſelf with him, in that only dangerous action by him undertaken and performed with honour. The Lieutenant-ſhips of his Provinces, with all Commands in his Army, and Offices whatſoever, were wholly referred unto the diſpoſition of this Agathoclea, and her brother Agathocles, and Oenanthe a filthy bawd that was mother unto them both. So theſe three governed the Realm at their pleaſure, to the great grief of all the Countrey, till Philopater died; who having reigned ſeventeen years, left none other ſon than Ptolomy Epiphanes, a child of five years old, begotten on Arſinoe that was his ſiſter and wife. After the Kings death Agathocles began to take upon him, as protector of young Epiphanes, and Governour of the Land. He aſſembled the Macedons (which were the Kings ordinary forces in pay, not all born in Macedonia, but the race of those that abode in Egypt with Ptolomy the first, and would not be accounted Ægyptians; as neither would the Kings themselves) and bringing forth unto them his sister Agathoclea, with the young King in her arms; began a solemn Oration. He told them, That the deceased Father of this their King, had committed the child into the arms of his sister; but unto the faith of them: on whose valiant right hands, the whole state of the Kingdom did now rely. He besought them therefore that they would be faithful, and, as great need was, defend their King against the Treason of one Tlepolemus an ambitious man; who traiterously went about to set the Diadem upon his own head, being a meer stranger to the Royal blood. Herewithall he produced before them a witness, that should justifie his accusation against Tlepolemus. Now though it were so, that he delivered all this with a fained passion of sorrow, and counterfeiting tears: yet the Macedons that heard him, regarded not any word that he spake; but stood laughing, and talking one to another, what a thameless dissembler he was to take so much upon him, as if he knew not how greatly he was hated. And so brake up the Assembly: he that had called it, being scarce aware how. Agathocles therefore, whom the old Kings favour had made mighty, but neither wise nor well qualified, thought to go to work, as had formerly been his manner; by using his authority, to the suppression of those that he distrusted. He haled out of the Temple the mother-in-law of Tlepolemus; and cast her into prison. This filled Alexandria with rumours, and made the people (though accustomed to suffer greater things, whilest they were committed in the old Kings name) to meet in knots together, and utter one to another their minds, wherein they had conceived extream hate, against these three pernicious Misgovernours of the old King. Besides their consideration of the present injurie done to Tlepolemus, they were somewhat also moved with fear of harm; which in way of requital, Tlepolemus was likely to do unto the City. For he was thought a man most unapt for Government, as afterwards he proved, yet no bad Souldier, and well beloved of the Army. It was also then in his power, to stop the provision of victuals which was to come into Alexandria. As these motives wrought with the people, so by the remedy which Agathocles used, were the Macedons more hastily, and more violently stirred unto uproar. He secretly apprehended one of their number whom he suspected of conspiracy against him; and delivered him unto a follower of his own, to be examined by torture. This poor Souldier was carried into an inner room of the Palace, and there stripped out of all his apparel to be tormented. But whilest the whips were brought forth, and all things even in a readiness for that purpose, there was brought unto the minister of Agathocles, a sad report of Tlepolemus his being at hand. Hereupon the Examiner, and his Torturers, one after another, went out of the room; leaving Moeragenes the Souldier alone by himself, and the doors open. He perceiving this, naked as he was, conveighed himself out of the Palace, and got unto the Macedonians of whom he found some in a Temple thereby at dinner. The Macedonians were as fierce in maintenance of their Priviledges, as are the Turks Janizaries. Being assured therefore that one of their fellows had thus been used, they fell to Armes in a great rage, and began to force the Palace: crying out, That they would see the King, and not leave him in possession of a dangerous man. The whole multitude in the City, with loud clamours, made no less ado than the Souldiers, though to less effect. So the old Bawd Oenantha fled into a Temple: her Son and Daughter stayed in the Court, untill the King was taken from them, and they, by his permission which he easily gave, and by appointment of those that now had him in their hands, delivered up to the fury of the people. Agathocles himself was stabbed to death, by some which therein did the Office of friends; though in manner of enemies. His sister was drag'd naked up and down the streets; as was also his mother, with all to them belonging; the enraged multitude committed upon them a barbarous execution of justice: biting them, pulling out their eyes, and tearing them in pieces.

These troubles in Ægypt, served well to stir up King Antiochus; who had very good leasure, though he wanted all pretence, to make war upon young Ptolomy. Philip of Macedon had the same desire to get what part he could of the childes estate. But it hapned well, that Ptolomy Philopater in the Punick War, which was now newly ended, had done many good offices unto the Romans. Unto them therefore the Ægyptians addressed themselves, and craved help against these two Kings: who though they secretly maligned one the other; yet had entred into covenant to divide between them all that belonged unto this Orphan; whose Father had been confederate with them them both. So * M. Lepidus was ſent from Rome, to protect from all violence the King of Egypt; eſpecially againſt Antiochus. As for the Macedonian; he was very ſoon found buſied with War at his own Doors. Alſo Scopas the Ætolian, being a Penſioner to the Egyptian, was ſent into Greece to raiſe an Army of Mercenaries. What Lepidus did in Egypt, I do not find: and therefore think it not improbable, that he was ſent thither only one of the three Embaſſadors, in the beginning of the War with Philip, as hath been ſhewed before. As for Scopas; he ſhortly after went up into Syria with his Army; where, winning many places, among the reſt of his Acts, he ſubdued the Jews, who ſeem to have yeilded themſelves a little before unto Antiochus, at ſuch time as they ſaw him prepare for his War, and deſpaired of receiving help from Egypt. But it was not long ere all theſe Victories of Scopas came to nothing. For the very next year following, which was (according to Euſebius) the ſame year that Philip was beaten at Cynoſcephalæ; Antiochus vanquiſhed Scopas in battel, and recovered all that had been loſt. Among the reſt, the Jews, with great willingneſs, returned under his obedience; and were therefore by him very gently entreated.

The Land of Egypt, this great King did forbear to invade; and gave it out, that he meant to beſtow a Daughter of his own in Marriage unto Ptolomey: either hoping, as may ſeem, that the Country would willingly ſubmit it ſelf unto him, if this young Child ſhould happen to miſcarry; or elſe that greater purchaſe might be made in the Weſtern parts of Aſia, whileſt Philip was held overlaboured by the Romans. It appears that he was very much diſtracted; hunting (as we ſay) two Hares at once with one Hound. The quarrels between Attalus, Philip, and the Grecks, promiſed to afford him great advantage, if he ſhould bring his Army to the Helleſpont. On the other ſide, the ſtate of Egypt being ſuch as hath been declared, ſeemed eaſily to be ſwallowed up at once. One while therefore he took what he could get in Syria: where all were willing (and the Jews, among the reſt, though hitherto they had kept faith with the Egyptian) to yield him obedience. Another while, letting Egypt alone, he was about to make invaſion upon Attalus his Kingdom; yet ſuffered himſelf eaſily to be perſwaded by the Roman Embaſſadors, and deſiſted from that enterpriſe. Having thus far gratified the Romans; he ſends Embaſſadors to the Senate, to conclude a perfect Amity between him and them. It is not lightly to be over-paſſed, That theſe his Embaſſadors were lovingly entertained at Rome; and diſmiſſed, with a Decree and anſwer of the Senate, altogether to the honour of King Antiochus. But this anſwer of the Romans was not ſincere; being rather framed according to regard of the Kings good liking, than of their own intent. They had not yet made an end with Philip: neither would they gladly be troubled with two great Wars at once. Wherefore, not ſtanding much upon the nice examination of what belonged unto their honour, they were content to give good words for the preſent. In the mean time Antiochus fights with Scopas in Syria, and ſhortly prepares to win ſome Towns elſewhere, belonging unto Ptolomy; yet withall he ſends an Army Weſtward, intending to make what profit he can of the diſtractions in Greece. Likewiſe it is conſiderable, as an argument of his much irreſolution, how notwithſtanding his attempts upon both of their Kingdoms, he offered one of his Daughters to Ptolomey, and another to Eumenes the Son of Attalus, newly King of Pergamus: ſeeking each of their friendſhips at one and the ſame time, when he ſought to make of each of them a ſpoil. Thus was he acting and deliberating at once; being carried with an inexplicable deſire of Repugnancies, which is a diſeaſe of great and over-ſwelling-fortunes. Howſoever it was, he ſent an Army to Sardes by Land, under two of his Sons: willing them there to ſtay for him; whileſt he himſelf, with a Fleet of an hundred Gallies, and two hundred other Veſſels, intended to paſs along by the Coaſts of Cilicia and Caria, taking in ſuch places as held for the Egyptian. It was a notable act of the Rhodians, that, whileſt the War of Philip lay yet upon their hands, they adventured upon this Great Antiochus. They ſent unto him a proud Embaſſage; whereby they gave him to underſtand, That if he paſſed forward beyond a certain Promontory in Cilicia, they would meet with him, and fight with him; not for any quarrel of theirs unto him; but becauſe he ſhould not joyn with Philip their enemy, and help him againſt the Romans. It was inſolently done of them, neither ſeemed it otherwiſe, to preſcribe ſuch limits unto the King: yet he tempered himſelf, and without any ſhew of indignation, gave a gentle anſwer; partly himſelf to their Embaſſadors; partly unto their whole City, by Embaſſadors which he thither ſent. He ſhewed his deſire to renew the ancient Confederacies between his Anceſtors and them: and willed them not to be afraid, leſt his coming ſhould tend unto any hurt, either of them, or of their Confederates. As touching the Romans whom they thought that he would moleſt: they were (he ſaid) his very good Friends; whereof, he thought there needed no better proof, than the entertainment and anſwer by them newly given to his Embaſſadors.

The Rhodians appear to have been a cunning People, and ſuch as could fore-ſee what weather was like to happen. This anſwer of the King, and the relation of what had paſſed between his Embaſſadors and the Senate, moved them not a whit, when they were informed ſhortly after, that the Macedonian War was ended at the Battel of Cynoſcephalæ. They knew that Antiochus his turn would be next; and prepared to be forward on the ſtronger ſide. Wherefore they would not be contented to ſit ſtill, unleſs the Towns on the South Coaſt of Aſia, belonging to Ptolomy their Friend and Confederate, were ſuffered to be at quiet. Herein alſo they did well; for that they had ever been greatly beholding to all the Race of the Ptolomies. They therefore in this time of neceſſity, gave what aid they could unto all the Subjects of the Egyptian in thoſe parts. In like manner did King Eumenes, the Son of Attalus, prognoſticate as concerning the War that followed, between Antiochus and the Romans. For when King Antiochus made a friendly offer, to beſtow one of his Daughters upon him in marriage: He excuſed himſelf, and would not have her. Attalus and Philetærus, his Brethren, wondred at this. But he told them, that the Romans would ſurely make war upon Antiochus; and therein finally prevail. Wherefore he ſaid, that by abſtaining from this affinity, it ſhould be in his power to joyn with the Romans, and ſtrengthen himſelf greatly with their friendſhip. Contrariwiſe, if he leaned to Antiochus, as he muſt be partaker in his overthrow; ſo was he ſure to be oppreſſed by him, as by an over-mighty Neighbour, if he happened to win the Victory.

Antiochus himſelf wintred about Epheſus; where he took ſuch order as he thought convenient for reducing of Smyrna and Lampſacus to obedience; that had uſurped their Liberty, and obſtinately ſtrove to maintain it, in hope that the Romans would protect them. In the beginning of the Spring he ſailed unto the Helleſpont; where, having won ſome Towns that Philip had gotten not long before this, he paſſed over into Europe ſide; and in ſhort ſpace maſtered the Cherſoneſus. Thence went he to Lyſimachia: which the Thracians had gotten and deſtroyed, when Philip withdrew his Garriſon thence, to employ it in the Roman War. The Ætolians objected as a crime unto Philip, in the conference between T. Quintius, that he had oppreſſed Lyſimachia, by thruſting thereinto a Garriſon. Hereupon Philip made anſwer, That his Garriſon did not oppreſs the Town, but ſave it from the Barbarians: who took and ſack'd it, as ſoon as the Macedonians were gone. That this anſwer was good and ſubſtantial, though it were not acceptable as ſuch; might appear by the miſerable caſe, in which Antiochus found Lyſimachia at his coming thither. For the Town was utterly raſed by the Barbarians, and the people carried away into ſlavery. Wherefore the King took order to have it re-edified: as alſo to redeem thoſe that were in bondage; and to recollect as many of the Citizens as were diſperſed in the Country thereabout. Likewiſe he was careful to allure thither, by hopeful promiſes, new Inhabitants, and to repleniſh the City with wonted frequency. Now to the end that men ſhould not be terrified from coming thither to dwell, by any fear of the neighbour Thracians: he took a Journey in hand againſt thoſe barbarous people, with the one half of his Army; leaving the other half to repair the City. Theſe pains he took, partly in regard of the convenient ſituation, and former glory of Lyſimachia; partly for that he thought it highly redounding unto his own honour, to recover and eſtabliſh the Dominion in thoſe parts which his forefather Seleucus Nicator had won from Lyſimachus, and thereby made his Kingdom of greater extent than it occupied in any following time. But for this ambition he ſhall dearly pay: and as after that Victory againſt Lyſimachus, the death of King Seleucus followed ſhortly; ſo ſhall a deadly wound of the Kingdom founded by Seleucus enſue very ſpeedily after the reconqueſt of the ſame Country, which was the laſt of Seleucus his Purchaſes.

§. IV.

The Romans hold friendly correſpondence with Antiochus, during their War with Philip; after which they quarrel with him. The doings of Hannibal at Carthage: whence he is chaſed by his Enemies, and by the Romans: His flight unto the King Antiochus. The Ætolians murmur againſt the Romans in Greece. The War of the Romans and Achæans, with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon. The departure of the Romans out of Greece. T. Quintius his Triumph. Peace denied to Antiochus by the Romans.

10. FOr the Romans, though they were unable to ſmother their deſire of war with with Antiochus, whereof notice was already taken both by their friends and by their enemies: yet was it much against their will to keep the rumour on foot, which they meant shortly to make good, of this intended war, so long as they wanted matter of quarrel; whereof they were furnished, by this enterprise of the Kings about Lysimachia. It was not long, since King Attalus, a friend and a helper of the Romans in their war with Philip, could obtain of them none other help against Antiochus, than Embassadors to speak for him, because the one of these Kings was held no less a friend than the other. Neither did there afterwards pass between them any other offices, than very friendly. Antiochus at the request of their Embassadors, withdrew his Invation from the Kingdom of Pergamus: also very shortly after he sent Embassadors to them, to make a perfect League of amity between them. This was whilest as yet they were busied with Philip, and therefore had reason to answer his good will with good acceptation: as they did in outward shew. But when the Macedonian war was at an end, and all, or most of all the States in Greece, were become little better than Clients unto the Romans: then was all this good correspondence changed into terms of worse, but more plain meaning. For T. Quintius, with his ten Counsellors sent from Rome, requited (as hath been *shewed before) with a commination of war, this Kings gratulation of their victory; as also his long professed amity, and desire to continue in the same.

These ten Counsellors were able to inform T. Quintius, and acquaint him with the purpose of the Senate: whereof yet it seems that he was not ignorant before; since, in regard of Antiochus, he was the more inclinable unto peace with Philip. It was therefore agreed, when they divided themselves to make progress through divers quarters of Greece for the execution of their late Decree, That two of them should visit King Antiochus; and the rest, where occasion served, use diligence to make a party strong against him. Neither was the Senate at Rome unmindful of the business; wherein lest T. Quintius, with his ten Assistants, should happen to forget any thing to their parts belonging; L. Cornelius was sent from Rome, of purpose to deal with the King about those controversies, that were between him and Ptolomy. What other private instructions Cornelius had, we may conjecture by the managing of this his Embassage. For coming to Selymbria: and there understanding that P. Villius and L. Terentius, having been sent by Titus, were at Lysimachia, He hastened thither; whither also came P. Lentulus (another of the ten Counsellors) from Bargillæ, to be present at the Conference. Hegesianax and Lysias were also there; the same, who had lately brought from Titus those peremptory Conditions, which the Embassadors present shall expound unto their Master. After a few daies Antiochus returned from his Thracian Expedition. The meeting and entertainment between him and these Romans, was in appearance full of love. But when they came to treat of the business in hand; this good mood was quite altered. L. Cornelius, in two or three words, briefly delivered his errand from Rome: which was, That Antiochus had reason to deliver back unto Ptolomy those Towns of his, whereof he had lately gotten possession. Hereunto he added, and that very earnestly, That he must also give up the Towns of late belonging unto Philip; and by him newly occupied. For what could be more absurd, than such folly in the Romans, as to let Antiochus enjoy the profit of that war, wherein they had laboured so much, and he done nothing? Further he warned the King, that he should not molest those Cities that were free: and finally he demanded of him, upon what reason he was come over with so great an Army into Europe; for that other cause of his journey there was none probable, than a purpose to make war upon the Romans? To this the King made answer, That he wondred why the Romans should so trouble themselves, with thinking upon the matters of Asia: wherewith he prayed them to let him alone: even as he, without such curiosity, suffered them to do in Italy what they thought good. As for his coming over into Europe: they saw well enough what business had drawn him thither; namely the war against the barbarous Thracians: the rebuilding of Lysimachia, and the recovery of Towns to him belonging, in Thrace, and Chersonesus. Now concerning his title unto that country, He derived it from Seleucus: who made conquest thereof, by his victory against Lysimachus. Neither was it so, that any of the places in controversie between him and the other Kings, had been still of old belonging to the Macedonians or Egyptians; but had been seized on by them, or by others from whom they received them, at such time as his Ancestors, being Lords of those Countries, were hindred by multiplicity of business, from looking unto all that was their own. Finally he willed them, neither to stand in fear of him, as if he intended ought against them from Lysimachia; since it was his purpose to bestow this City upon one of his Sons, that should reign therein: nor yet to be grieved with his proceedings in Asia; either against the free Cities, or against the King of Egypt; since it was his meaning to make the free Cities beholding unto himself, and to joyn ere long with Ptolomy, not only in friendship, but in a bond of near affinity. Cornelius having heard this, and being perhaps unable to refute it, would needs hear further, what the Embassadors of Smyrna and of Lampsacus, whom he had there with him, could say for themselves. The Embassadors of Lampsacus being called in, began a tale; wherein they seemed to accuse the King before the Romans, as it were before competent Judges. Antiochus therefore interrupted them, and bade them hold their peace, forasmuch as he had not chosen the Romans, but would rather take the Citizens of Rhodes, to be Arbitrators between him and them.

Thus the Treaty held some few dayes, without any likelihood of effect. The Romans, having not laid their complaints in such sort, as they might be a convenient foundation of the war by them intended: nor yet having purpose to depart well satisfied, and thereby to corroborate the present peace, were doubtful how to order the matter, in such wise as they might neither too rudely, like boistrous Galle-Greeks, pretend only the goodness of their swords: nor yet over-modestly, to retain among the Greeks an opinion of their justice, forbear the occasion of making themselves great. The King on the other side was weary of these tedious guests; that would take none answer, and yet scarce knew what to say. At length came news, without any certain author, That Ptolomy was dead. Hereof neither the King, nor the Romans, would take notice, though each of them were desirous to hasten into Egypt: Antiochus to take possession of the Kingdom, and L. Cornelius, to prevent him thereof, and set the Country in good order. Cornelius was sent from Rome Embassador both to Antiochus and to Ptolomy: which gave him occasion to take leave, and prepare for his Egyptian voyage. Both he, and his fellow Embassadors, had good leave to depart all together: and the King forthwith made ready, to be in Egypt with the first. To his Son Seleucus he committed his Army, and left him to oversee the building of Lysimachia: but all his Sea-forces he took along with him, and sailed unto Ephesus. Thence he sent Embassadors to T. Quintius: whom he requested to deal with him in this matter of peace, after such sort as might stand with honesty and good faith. But as he was further proceeding on his voyage, he was perfectly informed that Ptolomy was alive. This made him bear another way from Egypt: and afterwards a tempest, with a grievous shipwrack, made him without any further attempt on the way, glad to have safely recovered his Port of Selucia. Thence went he to Antiochia, where he wintered: secure as might appear, of the Roman war.

But the Romans had not so done with him. During the Treaty at Lysimachia, (at least-wise not long before or after it) one of their Embassadors that had been sent unto the Macedonian, gave him counsel, as in a point highly tending to his good; not to rest contented with the peace which was granted unto him by the Romans, but to desire society with them, whereby they should be bound to have the same friends and enemies. And this he advised him to do quickly, before the War brake out with Antiochus: lest otherwise he might seem, to have awaited some fit occasion of taking Arms again. They who dealt thus plainly, did not mean to be satisfied with weak excuses. In like manner some of the Greeks, were solicited; and particularly the Ætolians, That constantly and faithfully they should abide in the friendship of the people of Rome. It was needless to say plainly whereto this entreaty tended: the froward answer made by the Ætolians, declares them to have well understood the purpose. They complained, that they were not alike honoured by the Romans after the victory, as they had been during the War. They that so complained were the most moderate of them. Others cryed out that they had been wronged, and defrauded of what was promised unto them: upbraiding withal the Romans, as men to them beholding: not only for their victory over Philip, but even for helping them to set foot in Greece, which else they never could have done. Hereto the Roman gave gentle answers: telling them that there was no more to do, than to send Embassadors to the Senate, and utter their griefs: and then should all be well.

Such care took the Romans in Greece, for their War intended against Antiochus. The fame hereof arriving at Carthage, gave matter unto the enemies of Hannibal, wherewith both to pick a thank of the Roman Senate, and to chase out of their City this honourable man, whom they so greatly hated. He had of late exercised his vertue against them in the Civil administration: and given them them an overthrow, or two, in the long Robe. The Judges at that time bore all the ſway in Carthage: holding their places during life; and having ſubject unto them, the lives, goods, and fame of all the reſt. Neither did they uſe this their power with moderation: but conſpired in ſuch wiſe together, that who ſo offended any of them, ſhould have them all to be his enemies: which being once known, He was ſure to be ſoon accuſed and condemned. In this their impotent rule of the City, Hannibal was choſen Prætor. By vertue of which Office, though he was ſuperior unto them during that year: yet had it not been their manner to bear much regard unto ſuch an annual Magiſtrate, as at the years end muſt be accountable to them, if ought were laid unto his charge. Hannibal therefore ſending for one of the Queſtors, or Officers of the Treaſury, to come and ſpeak with him: the proud Queſtor ſet lightly thereby, and would not come: For he was of the adverſe Faction to Hannibal; and men of his place were to be choſen into the Order of Judges: in contemplation whereof, he was filled already with the ſpirit of future Greatneſs. But he had not to do with ſuch a tame Prætor, as were they that had occupied the place before. Hannibal ſent for him by a Purſivant; and having thus apprehended him, brought him into judgement before a publick aſſembly of the people. There he not only ſhewed what the undutiful ſtubbornneſs of this Queſtor had been; but how unſufferable the inſolency of all the Judges at the preſent was: whoſe unbridled power made them to regard neither Laws nor Magiſtrates. To this Oration when he perceived that all the Citizens were attentive and favourable; He forthwith propounded a Law, which paſſed with the general good liking; That the Judges ſhould be choſen from year to year, and no one man be continued in that Office two years together. If this Law had been paſſed, before he paſſed over Iberus: it would not perhaps have been in the power of Hanno, to have brought him unto neceſſity of reforming another grievance, concerning the Roman Tribute. This Tribute the Carthaginians were fain to levie by Taxation laid upon the whole Commonalty, as wanting money in their publike Treaſury, wherewith to defray either that, or divers other needful charges. Hannibal conſidering this, began to examine the publicke Revenues; and to take a perfect note, both how much came into the Treaſurie, by waies and means whatſoever: and in what ſort it was thence laid out. So he found, That the ordinary charges of the Common-wealth did not exhauſt the Treaſury: but that wicked Magiſtrates, and corrupt Officers, turning the greateſt part of the moneys to their own uſe, were thereby fain to load the people with needleſs burdens. Hereof he made ſuch plain demonſtration, That theſe Robbers of the common Treaſure were compelled to reſtore, with ſhame, what they had gotten by knavery: and ſo the Carthaginians were freed from the neceſſity of making ſuch poor ſhifts, as formerly they had uſed, when they knew not the value of their own Eſtate. But as the vertue of Hannibal was highly commended by all that were good Citizens: ſo they of the Roman Faction, which had, ſince the making of the peace until now, little regarded him, began to rage extreamly: as being by him ſtript of their ill-gotten goods and ill-employed authority, both at once, even when they thought themſelves to have been in full poſſeſſion of the vanquiſhed Carthage. Wherefore they ſent letters to their friends at Rome: wherein they complained, as if the Barchine Faction grew ſtrong again, and Hannibal would ſhortly be in arms. Queſtionleſs, if oppreſſing the City by injuſtice, and robbing the Treaſury, were the only way to hold Carthage in peace with Rome: theſe Enemies to the Barchines might well cry out, That having done their beſt already to keep all in quiet, they ſaw none other likelihood than of War. But having no other matter to alledge, than their own inventions: they ſaid, That Hannibal was like unto a wild beaſt, which would never be tamed; That ſecret meſſages paſt between him, and King Antiochus: and that he was wont to complain of idleneſs, as if it were harmful to Carthage; with what elſe to like effect they could imagine. Theſe accuſations they directed not unto the Senate: but addreſſing their letters craftily, every one to the beſt of his own friends at Rome, and ſuch as were Senators; they wrought ſo well, that neither pulicke notice of their Conſpiracy was taken at Carthage; nor the authority of the Roman Senate, wanting to the furtherance of their malicious purpoſe. Only P. Scipio is ſaid to have admoniſhed the Fathers, that they ſhould not thus diſhonourably ſubſcribe, and become ſeconds to the accuſers of Hannibal: as if they would oppreſs, by ſuborning or countenancing falſe witneſſes againſt him; the man, againſt whom in war they had not of long time prevailed, nor uſed their victory in ſuch baſe manner, when they obtained it. But the Romans were not not all so great minded as Scipio: they wished for some such advantage against Hannibal; and were glad to have found it. Three Embassadors they sent over to Carthage, C. Servilius, Q. Terentius, and M. Claudius Marcellus: whose very names imports sufficient cause of bad affection to Hannibal. These having past the Sea, were entertained by those that had procured their coming: and being by them instructed how to carry themselves, gave out, That they were sent to end some controversies, between the Carthaginians and Masanissa. But Hannibal had kept such good espial upon the Romans, that he knew their meaning well enough: against which he was never unprepared. It were enough to say, That he escaped them by flight: but in the actions of so famous a man, I hold it not impertinent to rehearse the particularities. Having openly shewed himself, as was his manner, in the place of Assembly. He went forth of the Town when it began to wax dark, accompanied with two which were ignorant of his determination; though such as he might well trust. He had appointed Horses to be in a readiness at a certain place: whence riding all night, He came to a Tower of his own by the Sea-side. There had he a ship furnished withall things needful; as having long expected the necessity of some such journey. So he bade Africk farewell; lamenting the misfortune of his Country, more than his own. Passing over to the Isle of Cercina; He found there in the Haven some Merchants ships of Carthage. They saluted him respectively: and the chief among them began to enquire, whither he was bound. He said He went Embassadour to Tyre: and that he intended there in the Island to make a Sacrifice; whereto he invited all the Merchants, and Masters of the Ships. It was hot weather: and therefore he would needs hold his Feast upon the shore; where, because there wanted covert, He made them bring thither all their Sails and Yards to be used instead of Tents. They did so; and feasted with him till it was late at night: at which time he left them there asleep: and putting to Sea, held on his course to Tyre. All that night, and the day following, He was sure not to be pursued. For the Merchants did neither make haste to send any news of him to Carthage, as thinking him to be gone Embassadour: neither could they, without some loss of time, such of them as made most speed homeward, get away from Cercina; being busied a while in fitting their tackle. At Carthage, the miss of so great a person was diversly construed. Some guessed aright, that he was fled. But the more common opinion was, That the Romans had made him away. At length came news where he had been seen; and then the Roman Embassadors, having none other errand thither, accused him (with an evil grace) as a troubler of the Peace; whereby they only discovered the mischief by them intended against him, and the malice of the Senate: missing the while their purpose, and causing men to understand, that he fled not thus without great reason, Hannibal coming to Tyre, the Mother-City of Carthage, was there entertained Royally: as one, in whose great worth and honour the Tyrians, by reason of affinity between their Cities, thought themselves to have interest. Thence went he to Antioch; and, finding the King departed, visited his Son in Daphne: who friendly welcomed him, and sent him unto his Father at Ephesus, that exceedingly rejoyced at his coming.

As Antiochus had cause to be glad in that he had gotten Hannibal: so had the Romans no great cause to be therefore sorry: otherwise than as they had much disgraced themselves, by discovery of their impotent malice, in chasing him thus out of his Country. For it would not prove alike easie unto this great Commander to make stout Souldiers of base Asiatiques; as it had been by his training and dicipline, to make very serviceable and skilful men of War of the Spaniards, Africans, Gaules, and other Nations, that were hardy, though unexperienced. Or were it supposed, that one mans worth, especially being so extraordinary, could alter the nature of a cowardly people: yet was it therewithall considerable, that the vanities of Antiochus, the pride of his Court, the baseness of his Flatterers, and a thousand other such vexations, would be far more powerful in making unprofitable the vertue of Hannibal, now a desolate and banished man, than had been the villany of Hanno and his Complices, hindering him in those actions, wherein he had the high Command, and was seconded by his warlike brethren. Wherefore the name of this Great Carthaginian, would only help to ennoble the Roman Victory: or if it further served to hearten Antiochus, and make him less careful to avoid the war; then should it further serve, to justifie the Romans in their quarrel. And it seems indeed that it was no little part of their care, to get a fair pretence of making war. For Antiochus, as is said before, having newly sent Embassadors to T. Quintius, requiring that the Peace might faithfully be kept: it was not probable, bable, that he had any meaning to take Arms, unleſs by meer violence he were thereto inforced. Only the Ætolians were greatly ſuſpected, as a turbulent people, deſirous of innovation, and therefore practiſing with this Great King; whom they wiſhed to ſee among them in Greece. In this regard, and to appeaſe them; they had of late been anſwered with gentle words by one of the ten Counſellers, That the Senate would grant them whatſoever with reaſon they ſhould ask. But this promiſe was too large, and unadviſed. For when their Embaſſadors came to Rome, the Senate would grant them nothing: but wholly referred them to T. Quintius, who favoured them leaſt. Hereat they murmured, but knew not how to right themſelves, otherwiſe than by ſpeaking ſuch words, as might haſten the Romans out of Greece for very ſhame, who had no deſire to be thence gone.

The daily talk at Rome, was, of War with Antiochus; but in Greece, when the Romans would leave the Country. For the Ætolians were wont to upbraid the reſt of the Greeks with the vain liberty which the Romans had proclaimed, ſaying, That theſe their Deliverers had lain heavier Fetters upon them, than formerly they did wear; but yet brighter and fairer than thoſe of the Macedonian: likewiſe, that it was a gracious act of Titus, to take from the Legs of the Greeks their chain, & tie it about their Necks. There was indeed no cauſe of tarrying longer in Greece, if the Romans had no other meaning than what they pretended. For Philip had made no delay, in accompliſhment of that which was laid upon him: all the Towns of Greece were at liberty, and the whole Country at peace, both with the Romans, and within it ſelf. As for Antiochus, He made it his daily ſuit, That the Peace between him and Rome, ſuch as it was, might be confirmed and ſtrengthened by a League of more aſſurance. Nevertheleſs, T. Quintius would needs fear that Antiochus meant forthwith to ſeize upon Greece, as ſoon as he and his Army were thence departed. And in this regard, he retained ſtill in his own hands Chalcis, Demetrius, and the Acrocorinthus: by benefit of which Towns he might the better withſtand the dangerous Invaſion like to be made by Antiochus. Suitable unto the doings of Quintius, were the reports of the ten Embaſſadors, that had been ſent over to aſſiſt him: when they returned back into the City. Antiochus, they ſaid, would queſtionleſs fall upon Greece: wherein he ſhould find not only the Ætolians, but Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, ready to give him entertainment. Wherefore there was none other way, than to do ſomewhat againſt theſe their ſuſpected Enemies: eſpecially againſt Nabis, who could worſt make reſiſtance: whileſt Antiochus was far away in Syria, and not intentive to his buſineſs. Theſe reports went not only current through the City among the Vulgar; but found ſuch credit with the chief of the Senate, that in the following year, againſt which time it was expected that Antiochus ſhould be ready to take his great enterpriſe in hand: P. Cornelius Scipio the African, deſired, and obtained, a ſecond Conſulſhip, with intention to be General in the War, againſt the King and his Hannibal. For the preſent, the buſineſs with Nabis was referred unto Titus, to deal with him as he thought good. This would be a fair colour of his longer tarriance in Greece. Therefore he was glad of the employment: whereof alſo he knew that many of the Greeks would not be ſorry: though for his own part, he wanted all good pretence of taking it in hand. For Nabis had entred into friendſhip with him, two or three years before this, as is already ſhewed, whileſt he had War with Philip: and had further been contented for the Romans ſake to be at peace with the Achæans: neither ſince that time had he done any thing, whereby he ſhould draw upon himſelf this War. He was indeed a deteſtable Tyrant, and hated of the Achæans: as one, that beſides his own wicked Conditions, had formerly done to them great miſchief. Titus therefore had a plauſible Theme whereon to diſcourſe before the Embaſſadors of all the Confederate Cities, which he cauſed to meet for that purpoſe at Corinth. He told them that in the War with Philip, not only the Greeks, but the Romans themſelves had each their motives apart (which he there briefly rehearſed) that ſhould ſtir them up, and cauſe them to be earneſt. But in this which he now propounded to them concerning Nabis, the Romans had none other Intereſt, than only the making perfect of their Honour, in ſetting all Greece at Liberty: which Noble Action was in ſome ſort maimed, or incompleat, whileſt the Noble City of Argos was left in ſubjection to a Tyrant that had lately occupied it. It therefore belonged unto them, the Greeks, duly to conſider, whether they thought the deliverance of Argos a matter worthy to be undertaken: or whether otherwiſe to avoid all further trouble, they could be well contented to leave it as it was. This concerned them, and not the Romans: who in taking this work in hand, or letting it alone, would wholly be ruled by the Greeks themſelves.

themſelves. The Athenian Embaſſador made anſwer hereunto very eloquently, and as pleaſing as he could deviſe. He gave thanks to the Romans for what was paſt; extolled their Vertues at large; and magnified them highly in regard of this their propoſition: wherein unrequeſted they freely made offer to continue that Bounty, which at the vehement requeſt of their poor Aſſociates they had already of late extended unto the Greeks. To this he added, That great pity it was to hear ſuch notable Vertue and high Deſerts ill ſpoken of by ſome: which took upon them, out of their own imagination, to foretell what harm theſe their Benefactors meant to do hereafter: when as Thankfulneſs would rather have required an Acknowledgement of the Benefits and Pleaſures already received. Every one found the meaning of this laſt clauſe, which was directly againſt the Ætolians. Wherefore Alexander the Ætolian roſe up, and told the Athenians their own: putting them in mind of their antient glory, in thoſe times when their City had been the Leader of all Greece, for defence and recovery of the Liberty general: from which Honour they were now ſo far faln, that they became Paraſites unto thoſe whom they thought moſt mighty; and by their baſe aſſentation, would lead all the reſt into ſervitude. Then ſpake he againſt the Achæans, Clients that had been a long time unto the Macedonian; and Souldiers of Philip, until they ran away from his adverſity. Theſe, he ſaid, had gotten Corinth, and muſt now have War be made for their ſakes, to the end that they might alſo be Lords of Argos: whereas the Ætolians, that had firſt made War with Philip, and alwayes been Friends unto the Romans, were now defrauded of ſome places, antiently to them belonging. Neither did he thus contain himſelf, but objected unto the Romans, fraudulent dealing: foraſmuch as they kept their Garriſons in Demetrias, Chalcis, and the Acrocorinth; having been always wont to profeſs, That Greece could never be at Liberty, whileſt thoſe places were not free. Alſo now at laſt, what elſe did they ſeek by this diſcourſe of War with Nabis, than buſineſſes wherewith to find themſelves occupied, that ſo they might have ſome ſeeming cauſe of abiding longer in the Country? But they ſhould do well, if they meant as they ſpake, to carry their Legions home out of Greece, which could not indeed be free, till their departure. As for Nabis, the Ætolians themſelves did promiſe, and would undertake, That they would either cauſe him to yield to reaſon, and relinquiſh Argos freely, withdrawing thence his Garriſon; or elſe compell him by force of Arms, to ſubmit himſelf to the good pleaſure of all Greece, that was now at unity. Theſe words had been reaſonable, if they had proceeded from better men. But it was apparent, that no regard of the common Liberty wrought ſo much with theſe Ætolians; as did their own ravenous deſire of oppreſſing others, and getting unto themſelves, that worſe would uſe it, the whole Dominion in Greece, which Philip had loſt. Neither could they well diſſemble this; making it no ſmall part of their Grievance, That the old League was forgotten: wherein it had been covenanted, That the Romans ſhould enjoy the ſpoil of all, but leave the Towns and Lands in poſſeſſion of the Ætolians. This, and the remembrance of a thouſand miſchiefs by them done in former times, made the whole Aſſembly, eſpecially the Achæans, cry out upon them: entreating the Romans to take ſuch order before they went, that not only Nabis might be compelled to do right; but the Ætolian thieves be enforced to keep home, and leave their neighbours in quiet. All this was highly to the pleaſure of Titus: who ſaw, that by diſcountenancing the Ætolians, He was become the more gracious with all the reſt. But whether it pleaſed him ſo well that Antiochus his Embaſſadors did preſently after lie hard upon him, to draw the peace to ſome good concluſion, it may be greatly doubted. He caſt them off with a ſlight anſwer: telling them, That the ten Embaſſadors or Counſellors which had been ſent unto him from Rome, to be his Aſſiſtants in theſe matters of weight, were now returned home; and that without them it was not in his power to conclude upon any thing.

Now concerning the Lacedæmonian War, it was very ſoon ended. For Titus uſed the help of all his Confederates; and made as great preparation againſt Nabis, both by Land and Sea, as if he ſhould have had to do with Philip. Beſides the Roman Forces, King Eumenes with a Navy, and the Rhodian Fleet, were invited to the Service: as alſo Philip of Macedon ſent aid by Land; doing therein poorly, whether it were to get favour of the Romans; or whether to make one among the number, in ſeeking Revenge upon Nabis, that had done him injury. But the moſt forward in this Expedition were the Achæans, who ſet out ten thouſand Foot, and a thouſand Horſe. As for the Ætolians, rather to hold good faſhion, and ſound their diſpoſitions, than in hope to ſpeed, their help was required; whereof they excuſed themſelves as well as they thought beſt. Thus are the

the Achæans now become the prime friends of the Romans in Greece; having removed the Ætolians from that degree of favour: like as they themſelves hereafter (though not in all haſte) ſhall be ſupplanted of the ſame Lacedæmonians, againſt whom they are now marching.

Some of the Argives, more bold than wiſe, began a conſpiracy againſt the Lacedæmonians that held their Town; meaning to open their gates unto the Roman. But ere Titus drew near, they were all detected and ſlain: excepting a very few, that eſcaped out of the Town. The fame of this Commotion, cauſed the Army to march apace toward Argos; with hope to be there, before things were at quiet. But there was no ſtir within the Wals: the execution done upon the firſt movers, having terrified all the reſt of the Citizens. Titus then thought it better, to aſſail Nabis in the head of his ſtrength at Lacedæmon, than to conſume time about other places; eſpecially at Argos: for the freedom whereof ſince the War was made, pity it were, that the calamities of the War ſhould thereon fall moſt heavily.

Nabis had in readineſs an Army of fifteen thouſand, wherewith to defend himſelf againſt theſe Invaders. Five thouſand of them were Mercenaries: the reſt, of his own Countrey; but ſuch as were of all others the worſt, as manumiſed ſlaves, malefactors and baſe Peaſants, unto whom his Tyrannie was beneficial. Of the goood and worthy Citizens he ſtood in doubt; and ſince he could not hope to win their love, his meaning was to hold them quiet by fear. He called them all to an aſſembly, and compaſſing them round in with his Army, told them of the danger that was toward him and them. If they could agree within themſelves; they might, he ſaid, hope the better to withſtand the common Enemy. But foraſmuch as turbulent heads were invited by light occaſions, to raiſe tumults, and work dangerous treaſons: it ſeemed unto him the ſafeſt, and (withal) the mildeſt courſe, to arreſt before hand, and put in ward, all thoſe whom he found moſt reaſon to ſuſpect. So ſhould he keep them innocent perforce; and thereby preſerve not only the City and his own perſon from danger, but them alſo from the puniſhment, which elſe they might have incurred. Hereupon he cites and apprehends about fourſcore of them; whom he leads away to priſon, and the next night putteth them all to death. Thus was he ſure that they neither ſhould offend, nor yet break looſe. As for the death of them, if it ſhould happen to be noiſed abroad: what could it elſe do than terrifie the people; who muſt thereby underſtand, that it was a mortal crime to be ſuſpected? And to the ſame purpoſe his cruelty extended it ſelf unto ſome poor wretches: whom he accuſed of a meaning to flie to the Enemy. Theſe were openly whipt through all the ſtreets, and ſlain. Having thus affrighted the Citizens: He turned the more freely, all his thoughts toward the Enemy, that came on apace. He welcomed them with a ſally: wherein, as commonly happens, the Souldiers of the Town had the better at firſt; but were at length repelled with loſs. Titus abode not many dayes before Sparta: but over-ran the Country; hoping belike to provoke the Tyrant forth to battail. The Roman Fleet at the ſame time with King Eumenes and the Rhodians, laid ſiege unto Gyttheum, the only or principal Town that Nabis had. Likely they were to have taken it by force, when there appeared hope of getting it by treaſon. There were two Governours within the Town equal in authority: whereof the one, either for fear, or deſire of reward, had a purpoſe to let in the Romans. But the other finding what was in hand, and being ſomewhat more faithful, ſlue the Traitor; after whoſe death, he himſelf alone made the better defence. Yet when T. Quintius with part of his Army came thither to Gyttheum: this Captain of the Town had not the heart to abide the uttermoſt, and await what either Time or his Maſter might do for him, but was contented to give up the place, yet upon Condition, to depart in ſafety to Sparta with his Garriſon. Pythagoras, the Son-in-law of Nabis, and brother unto his Wife, was come from Argos, whereof he had the Government, with a thouſand Souldiers Mercenaries, and two thouſand Argives: it being (as may ſeem) the Tyrants purpoſe, to relieve Gyttheum: which he thought would have held longer out. But when they heard that it was loſt, then began they to think upon finiſhing the War, by ſome reaſonable Compoſition. Pythagoras therefore was ſent his Embaſſador to Titus: requeſting only that he would appoint a time and place for Nabis to meet and ſpeak with him. This was granted. In that Parlee the Tyrant ſpake very reaſonable for himſelf: proving, that he ſuffered wrong, and had done none, and that by many good arguments: whereof the ſum was, That whatſoever they now did, or could object unto him, was of elder date than the League which they had made with him. Whereupon the inferred, That neither for his keeping the Town of Argos, nor for any other cauſe by them

alledged, they ought to make war upon him, ſince Argos, and all other their allegations whatſoever, had not hindered them, in time of their own need of him, from entring into that League with him: which was never broken on his part, nor ought to be on theirs. But Quintius was not herewith ſatisfied. He charged him with tyranny: and gave inſtance, as eaſily he might, of divers barbarous cruelties by him committed. In all which points foraſmuch as they knew this Nabis to be guilty, before they made Peace and Confederacy with him; it was expedient, that ſome other cauſe of this Invaſion ſhould be alledged. Whereto he ſaid further, That this Tyrant had occupied Meſſene, a Town Confederate with the Romans: That he had bargained to join with Philip; when he was their enemy, not only in League, but alſo in affinity: and that his Fleet had robbed many of their ſhips, about the Cape of Malea. Now touching this Piracy, ſince in the Articles by Titus propounded unto Nabis, there was no reſtitution mentioned, other than of ſhips, by him taken from the Greeks his neighbours, with home he had long held war: it may ſeem to have been objected, only by way of Complement, and to enlarge the volume of thoſe complaints, that were otherwiſe very frivolous. As for Meſſene, and the bargain of Alliance made with Philip: they were matters foregoing the League, that was made between the Romans and this Tyrant: and therefore not to have been mentioned. All this it ſeems that Ariſtænus, the Prætor of the Achæans, very well perceived: who therefore doubting leſt the Romans (that were wont to talk ſo much of their own juſtice, honour, and faithfull dealing) ſhould now relent, and forbear to moleſt him, who, though a wicked man, was yet their Confederate, and had never done them wrong: framed his diſcourſe to another end. He entreated Nabis to conſider well of his own eſtate: and to ſettle his fortunes, whileſt he might do it without hazzard: alledging the examples of many Tyrants that had ruled in the neighbour-cities, and therein committed great outrages; yet were afterwards contented to ſurrender their Eſtates, and lived in great ſecurity, honour, and happineſs, as private men. Thus they diſcourſed until night. The next day Nabis was contented to relinquiſh Argos; and requeſted them, to deliver unto him in writing their other commands, that he might take counſel with his friends. The iſſue of all was, that, in regard of the charges, whereat the Confederates muſt be, for maintenance of an Army to lie in Leaguer all that Winter (as there was no hope of making ſhort work) before the City of Sparta: they were contented to make peace with the Tyrant, upon ſuch Conditions as Titus ſhould think meet. Beſides the reſtitution of Argos, and all the places thereon depending; Titus propounded many other Conditions to Nabis, and ſome of them very grievous. He would not ſuffer the Lacedæmonian to have ought to do in the Iſle of Crete; no, nor to make any Confederacies, nor war, either in that Iſland or elſewhere; not to build any Town or Caſtle upon his own Lands: not to keep any other ſhipping, than two ſmall Barks; beſides many other troubleſome injunctions; with impoſition of an hundred talents in ſilver to be paid out of hand, and fifty talents yearly, for eight years next enſuing. For obſervance of theſe Covenants he demanded five hoſtages, ſuch as he himſelf ſhould name; and one of them to be the Tyrants own Son. If it had been the meaning of Titus, to withdraw the war from Nabis, becauſe it was not grounded upon juſtice: then had it been enough, if not more than enough, to take Argos from him; which he himſelf did offer, though it were for fear, to deliver up. But if it were thought reaſonable, to diſpenſe a little with the Roman faith, in regard of the great benefit which thereby might redound unto the ſtate of their beſt friends in Greece, by the extirpation of this Tyranny: then ſhould this enterpriſe, when once it was taken in hand, have been proſecuted unto the very utmoſt. As for this middle courſe which the Romans held: as it was not honourable unto them, to enrich themſelves by the ſpoil of one that had not offended them; nor pleaſing to the Achæans, who judged it ever after a great blemiſh to the noble acts of Titus: ſo did it miniſter unto the Ætolians, and to ſuch as curiouſly pried into the faults of thoſe which took upon them to be Patrons of Greece, no barren ſubject of malicious diſcourſe. For ſince Philip, a King, and deſcended of many famous Kings, might not be ſuffered by theſe Maſterly Romans, to hold any one of thoſe Countreys or Towns in Greece, that had belonged unto his Anceſtors: it was thought very ſtrange, that Lacedæmon, once the moſt famous City among all the Greeks, was by the ſame Romans left in poſſeſſion of a Tyrant, that had uſurped it but yeſterday; and he therein rooted by their authority, as their friend and Confederate. Nabis on the other ſide thought himſelf unmercifully dealt withall, by the ſelf-ſame Romans, whoſe amity he had prefered in time of a doubtfull war, before the love and affinity affinity of the Macedonian King, that had committed the City of Argos into his hands. But falsly had he dealt with the Macedonian: and fasly was he dealt with by those, to whom he did betake himself. Among these Articles propounded, there was nothing that pleased him, save only that for the banished Lacedæmonians, (of whom a great number were in the Roman Camp; having among them Agesipolis the natural King of Sparta, that being a young child was driven out by Lycurgus the first of the Tyrants) there was made no provision, to have them restored unto their City and Estates; but only leave required for as many of their wives, as would be so contented, to live abroad with them in banishment. Wherefore he forbore to give consent unto these demands; and sustained an assault or two; hoping belike that the enemies would soon be weary. But his fearful nature shortly overcame the resolution, which the sense of these injuries had put into him. So yielding unto all that had been propounded, He delivered the hostages; and thereupon obtained peace, that was confirmed afterwards at Rome by the Senate and People. From this time forward, He thought the Romans far more wicked than himself; and was ready upon the first advantage, to do them all the mischief that he could.

The Argives had heard news that Lacedæmon was even at point of being taken. This erected them, and gave them heart to think upon their own good. So they adventured to set upon the Garrison; which was much weakened, by the remove of the three thousand carried thence by Pythagoras to help the Tyrant at Sparta. There needed unto their liberty no more, than that all of them jointly should set their hands to the getting of it, which no sooner they did than they obtained it. Presently after this came T. Quintius to Argos, where he was joyfully welcomed. He was deservedly acknowledged as author of that benefit, whereon the Citizens had laid hold without staying for him; and that he might the better entitle himself thereto, he caused the liberty of the Argives to be proclaimed at the Nemæan games; as ratifying it by his authority. The City was annexed again to the Councel of Achaia; whereby the Achæans were not more strengthened, than the Argives themselves were secured from danger of relapse, into the same extremities out of which they had newly escaped.

After this, Titus found little business or none wherewith to set on work his Army in Greece. Antiochus was about to send another Embassage to Rome, desiring peace and friendship of the Senate. Things being therefore in appearance wholly disposed unto quiet, Scipio the African, that was chosen Consul at Rome, could not have his desire, of being sent Commander into Greece. The unsincere meaning of Antiochus, and the tumultuous disposition of the Ætolians, were held as considerations worthy of regard: yet not sufficient causes of making war. Neither appeared there any more honest way, of confuting the Ætolians, and of throughly perswading all the Greeks (which was not to be neglected, by those that meant to assure unto themselves the patronage of Greece) that the good of the Country was their sole intent: than by withdrawing thence their Legions, and leaving the Nation unto it self, till occasion should be ripe, and call them over again. Wherefore after Titus had spent a Winter there, without any matter of employment, either found, or at any near distance appearing, he called an Assembly of Delegates, from all parts of Greece to Corinth: where he meant to bid them farewell. There he recounted unto them all that passed since his coming into those parts; and willed them to value the Roman friendship, according to the difference of estate, wherein the Romans found and left them. Hereto he added some wholesome counsel; touching the moderate use of their liberty, and the care which they ought to have of living peaceably and without faction. Lastly he gave up Acrocorinthus to the Achæans; withdrawing thence the Roman Garrison, and promising to do the like (which very soon he did) at Chalcis and Demetrias; that so it might be known, what lyars the Ætolians were, who had accused the Romans, of a purpose to retain those places. With joyful acclamations did the Greeks testifie their good liking of that which Titus had said and done: as also (at his request) they agreed, to ransome and enlarge all Romans, that had been sold into their Countrey by Hannibal.

Thus Titus Crowned his actions in Greece with an happy end: and by leaving the Countrey before his departure was urged, left therein behind him the memory of his vertue and benefits, untainted by jealousie and suspition of any evil meaning. At his coming to the City, He had the honour of a Triumph; which was the goodliest of all that Rome had until that day beheld. Three daies together the shew of the pomp continued: as being set out with the spoils of a Countrey, more abundant in things worthy of such a spectacle, than any wherein the Romans had before made War. All sorts of Arms, with Statues and curious pieces of Braſs or Marble, taken from the Enemy, were carried in the firſt daies Pageant. The ſecond day, was brought in all the treaſure of Gold and Silver: Some in the rude Maſs unwrought; ſome in divers ſorts of Coin; and ſome in Veſſels of ſundry kinds, that were the more highly prized by the workmanſhip. Among theſe were ten ſhields, all of Silver; and one of pure Gold. The third day Titus himſelf entered the City in his Triumphant Chariot. Before him were carried an hundred and fourteen Crowns of Gold, beſtowed upon him by divers Cities. There were alſo led the beaſts for Sacrifice, the Priſoners, and the hoſtages: among which, Demetrius the Son of King Philip, and Armenes the Son of Nabis, were principal. After him followed his Army; and (which added much grace, and good liking to the ſhew) the Roman Captives, by his procurement redeemed from ſlavery in Greece.

Not long after this triumph, He procured audience of the Senate for many Embaſſages, that were come out of Greece and Aſia. They had all very favourable anſwers, excepting thoſe of King Antiochus: whom the Senate would not hear, but referred over to T. Quintius, and the ten that had been his Counſellors; becauſe their buſineſs was ſaid to be ſomewhat intricate. Hereat the Kings Embaſſadors wondered. They ſaid unto Titus and his Aſſociates, that they could not diſcern wherein conſiſted any perplexity of their meſſage. For all treaties of peace and friendſhip, were either between the Victor and the vanquiſhed; between thoſe, that having warred together, were upon equal terms of advantage; or between thoſe that had lived alwaies in good agreement, without any quarrel. Unto the Victor, they ſaid, that the vanquiſhed muſt yield; and patiently endure the impoſition of ſome Covenants, that elſe might ſeem unreaſonable. Where War had been made, and no advantage gotten: there was it uſual to demand and make reſtitutions of things and places claimed, gotten or loſt; accordingly as both parts could agree. But between thoſe which had never fallen out, there ought no Conditions of eſtabliſhing friendſhip to be propoſed: ſince it was reaſonable, that each part ſhould hold their own; and neither carry it ſelf as ſuperiour to the other, in preſcribing ought that might be troubleſome. Now of this laſt kind, was the league and friendſhip that had been ſo long in concluſion, betwixt Antiochus and the Romans. Which being ſo: they held it ſtrange, that the Romans ſhould thus inſiſt on points no way concerning them, and take upon them to preſcribe unto the King, what Cities of Aſia he ſhould let at liberty; from what Cities they would give him leave to exact his wonted Tributes; either putting or not putting his Garriſons into them, as the Senate ſhould think fit. Hereto Quintius anſwered, that ſince they went ſo diſtinctly to work, He would alſo do the like. Wherefore he propounded unto them two Conditions, and gave them their choice whether to except: Either that it ſhould be lawful for the Romans to take part in Aſia with any that would ſeek their friendſhip; Or if King Antiochus miſliked this, and would have them forbear to meddle in Aſia, that then he ſhould abandon whatſoever he had gotten in Europe. This was plain dealing, but no reaſonable nor pertinent anſwer, to that which the Kings Embaſſadors had propounded. For if the Romans might be hired to abſtain from Aſia, by the gift of all that Antiochus had lately won in Europe: then did not the affairs of Smyrna, Lampſacus, or any other Aſiatiques, whom they were pleaſed to reckon as their Confederates, bind them in honour to make War with a King that ſought their love, and had never done them injury. But they knew very well, that Antiochus could not without great ſhame be ſo baſe, as to deliver up unto them the City of Lyſimachia, whereon he had of late been at ſo much coſt; in building it up even from the foundation, and repeopling it with Inhabitants, that had all been diſperſed, or captive to the Barbarians. And ſo much the Embaſſadors with great indignation alledged: ſaying, That Antiochus deſired friendſhip of the Romans; but ſo, as it might ſtand with his honour. Now in point of honour the Romans took upon them as if their cauſe were far the ſuperior. For it was, they ſaid, their purpoſe to ſet at liberty thoſe Towns which the King would oppreſs and hold in ſubjection: eſpecially ſince thoſe Towns were of Greekiſh blood and language; and fell, in that regard under the patronage which Rome had afforded unto all Greece beſides. By this colour they might ſoon have left Antiochus King of not many ſubjects on the hither ſide of Euphrates. Neither did they forbear to ſay, That unleſs he would quit what he held in Europe, it was their meaning not only to protect thoſe which relied upon them in Aſia, but therein to make new Alliances: namely (as might be underſtood) with ſuch as were his ſubjects. Wherefore they urged his Embaſſadors to come to a point, and tell them plainly which of theſe two Conditions their King would accept. For lack of a pleasing answer, which the Embassadours could not hereto make, little wanted of giving presently defiance to the King. But they suffered themselves to be intreated, and were contented once again to send over P. Villius, and others that had been already with the King at Lysimachia; by whom they might receive a final answer, whether these demands made by Quintius and his Associates would be accepted, yea, or no. By this respite of time, and the fruitless Treaties ensuing, Antiochus got the leisure of two years; or thereabouts, to prepare for War; finding in the Romans all that while, no disposition to let him live in peace.

§. V.

Of the long Wars which the Romans had with the Gauls, Ligurians, and Spaniards. Of M. Portius Cato. Injuries done by Masanissa to the Carthaginians, that sue to the Romans for justice in vain.

THE Insubrians, Bojians, and other of the Cisalpine Gaules, together with the Ligurians; made often and (in a manner) continual war upon the Romans in Italy, even from such time as Hannibal and his brother Mago departed thence, untill such time as they themselves were utterly subdued: which was not, before the Romans were almost at the very height of the Empire. These Nations, having served under Mago for wages, and afterwards having gotten Amilcar a Carthaginian, to be Leader unto them all, as hath already been shewed; by this their fellowship in Arms, grew to be such willing partakers each of others fortune, that seldome afterwards either the Gaules or Ligurians did stir alone: but that their Companions, hearing it, were ready to second them. How the Romans first prevailed, and got large possession in Gallia Cisalpina, now called Lumbardie: it hath been long since rehearsed between the first and second Punick Wars. As also it hath since appeared, how they lost the greatest part of their hold in that Country, by means of Hannibal his passage there through. Neither is it likely that the re-conquest would have been more difficult or tedious unto the Romans, than was the first purchase: if, besides the greater employments which they had of their Armies abroad, their forces appointed unto this war, had not been distracted by the Ligurians: that alwaies made them to proceed warily, having an eye to the danger at their backs. The Ligurians were a stout Nation, light and swift of body; well practised in laying ambushes, and not discouraged with any overthrow, but forthwith ready to fight again. Their Countrey was mountainous, rough, woody, and full of straight and dangerous passages. Few good Towns they had: but many Castles, exceedingly well fortified by nature: so as without much labour, they could neither be taken or besieged. They were also very poor; and had little or nothing that might give contentment unto a victorious Army that should spoil their Land. In these respects, they served excellently well to train up the Roman Souldiers to hardness and military patience: teaching them (besides other exercises of War) to endure much, and live contented with a little. Their quarrel to Rome, grew partly from their love unto the Gaules, their neighbours and companions: partly from their delight in robbing and spoiling the Territory of their borderers, that were subject unto Rome. But their obstinate continuance in the War which they had begun, seems to have been grounded upon the Condition of all Salvages: To be friends or foes, by custome, rather than by Judgement: and to acknowledge no such vertue in Leagues, or formal conclusions of peace, as ought to hinder them from using their advantage; or taking revenge of injuries when they return to mind. This quality is found in all, or most of the West-Indians: who, if they be demanded a reason of the Wars between them and any of their neighbours, do use commonly this answer, It hath still been the custome for us and them, to fight one against the other.

Divers overthrows, though none that were great, these Ligurians gave unto the Romans: but many more, and greater, they received. Often they sought peace, when they found themselves in distress, and brake it again as often, when they thought it profitable so to do. The best was, that as their Countrey was a good place of exercise unto the Romans, so out of their own Countrey they did little harm: not sending any great Armies far from home; perhaps, because they knew not how to make War, save on their own ground.

The Country of Spain, as it was the first part of the Continent out of Italy that became subject unto the Romans: so was it the last of all their Provinces, which was wholly and throughly by them subdued. It is likened in figure by some Geographers unto an Oxe-hide: and the Romans found in it the property of that Oxe-hide which Calanus the Indian shewed unto the Great Alexander, as an Embleme of his large Dominions. For treading treading upon any ſide of it, the further parts would riſe from the ground. And thus was it with Spain. Seldom did it happen that thoſe parts from which the Roman Armies lay fartheſt, were not up in rebellion. The Spaniards were a very hard Nation, and eaſily ſtirred up to arms; but had not much knowledge in the art of war, nor any good Captains. They wanted alſo (which was their princial hinderance) good intelligence among themſelves: and being divided into many ſmall Signiories, that had little other communion than of language, they ſeldom or never provided in general for the common good of their Country; but made it their chief care, each of them to look unto their own Territory. Such private reſpects made them often to fall aſunder, when many had united themſelves together, for chaſing out of the Romans. And theſe were the cauſes of their often overthrows: as deſire of liberty, rather then complaint of any wrong done to them, was the cauſe of their often taking arms.

The Carthaginians had been accuſtomed, to make evaculation of this Cholerick Spaniſh humour; by employing, as Mercenaries in their wars abroad, thoſe that were moſt likely to be unquiet at home. They had alſo taken Souldiers from one part of the Countrey, and uſed them in another: finding means to pay them all, out of the profits which they raiſed upon the whole Countrey; as being far better huſbands, and of more dexterity than were the Romans, in that kind. But contrariwiſe, the Romans, uſing the ſervice of their own Legions, and of their ſure friends the Latines, had little buſineſs for the Spaniards; and therefore were fain to have much buſineſs with them. Spain was too far diſtant, and withall too great for them to ſend over Colonies thither, whereby to hold it in good order, according to the courſe that they took in Italy. Wherefore it remained, that they ſhould alwaies maintain ſuch Armies in the Countrey, as might ſerve to hold in obedience perforce; and ſuch heedful Captains as might be ſtill ready to oppoſe the Barbarians in their firſt Commotion. This they did, and thereby held the Countrey; though ſeldome in peace.

Very ſoon after the departure of Scipio, there was raiſed War in Spain againſt the Romans, even upon the ſame general ground that was the foundation of all the Spaniſh Wars following. It was thought unreaſonable, that the Spaniards ſhould one while help the Carthaginians againſt the Romans, and another while the Romans againſt the Carthaginians; baſely forgetting to help themſelves againſt thoſe that were ſtrangers, yet uſurped the Dominion over them. But the forces which Scipio had left behind him in that Country, being well acquainted with the manner of War in thoſe parts, ſuppreſſed this rebellion by many Victories: and, together with ſubjection, brought peace upon the Countrey; which laſted five years. This Victory of the Romans, though it happily ended the War: yet left it ſtill remaining the cauſe of the War; which after five years brake out again. The Spaniards fought a battel with the Roman Proconſul, whom they ſlew; and had a great Victory, that filled them with greater hopes. Yet the happy ſucceſs of their Wars in Greece, made the Romans think it enough to ſend thither two Prætors, and with each of them ſome two Legions. Theſe did ſomewhat: yet not ſo much, but that M. Portius Cato, who was Conſul the year following, and ſent into that Province; found at his coming little leſs to do, than the reconquering of all Spain. But it fell out happily, that all the Spaniards were not of one mind: ſome were faithful to Rome; and ſome were idle beholders of the pains that others took. Yet when Cato had won a great Victory upon the chiefeſt of them; they roſe againſt him in many parts of the Countrey, and put him unto much new trouble. Whileſt he was about to make a journey againſt thoſe that were as yet unſubdued: ſome of the lately vanquiſhed, were even ready to rebell. He therefore diſarmed them; which they took ſo heavily, that many of them ſlew themſelves for very grief. Hearing of this, and well underſtanding that ſuch deſperation might work dangerous effects: He called unto him the principal among them: and commending unto them peace and quietneſs, which they never had diſturbed but unto their own great loſs, He prayed them to deviſe what courſe might be taken for holding them aſſured unto Rome, without further trouble. None of them could, or would give counſel in a matter of this nature. Having therefore talked with them once or twice, and finding their invention barren in this kind of Subject; He gave expreſs charge, That upon a day appointed they ſhould throw down the walls of all their Towns. Afterwards he carryed the war about from place to place; and with ſingular induſtry finiſhed it in ſhort time. Neither thought he it any diſgrace to him or to Rome, in this time of danger, to imitate the Carthaginians, and hire an Army of the Celtiberians, againſt other of their Countrymen:

Countrymen: excuſing the indignity, ſuch as it ſeemed, with a jeſt, That if he were vanquiſhed and ſlain, then ſhould he need to pay them nothing; whereas if he had the Victory, He could pay them with the enemies money. Finally, He brought the War to ſo good end, that in long time after, though Spain were often troubleſome, yet was it in no danger of being loſt. He increaſed alſo the publick Revenues in that Province, by cauſing ſome Mines of Iron and Silver to be wrought, that had before lain unregarded. Herein he did benefit the Common-wealth by a vertue much agreeable to his own peculiar diſpoſition.

For this M. Cato was not only very notable in the Art of war, which might well be then termed the occupation of the Romans; but ſo well furniſhed with all other uſefull qualities, that very little was wanting in him which might ſeem requiſite to the accompliſhment of a perfect man. He was very ſkilful in the Roman Laws, a man of great Eloquence, and not unprofitable in any buſineſs either private or publick. Many books he wrote; whereof the principal were, of the Roman Antiquities, and of Huſbandry. In matter of Huſbandry he was notable, and thereby moſt increaſed his ſubſtance; being of mean birth, and the firſt of his houſe. Strong of body he was, and exceeding temperate: ſo as he lived in perfect health to very old age. But that which moſt commended him unto the better ſort of the Romans, was his great ſincerity of life, abſtinence from bribes, and faſhioning himſelf to the antient laudable Cuſtomes of the City: Herein he had merited ſingular commendations, if the vehemency of his nature had not cauſed him to maligne the vertue of that noble Scipio the African, and ſome other worthy men; that were no leſs honeſt than himſelf, through far leſs rigid, and more gallant in behaviour. Otherwiſe, He was a very good Citizen, and one of ſuch temper, that he could faſhion himſelf to all occaſions; as if he were never out of his Element. He loved buſineſs ſo well, or rather hated vice ſo earneſtly; that even unto the end of his life, He was exerciſed in defending himſelf or accuſing others. For at the age of fourſcore and ſix years, he pleaded in his own defence: and four years after, he accuſed Sergius Galba unto the people. So began the Nobility of Cato his family; which ended in his great grand-child M. Cato the Vtican: one that being of like vertue and fervency, had all his good purpoſes daſht, and was finally wearied out of his life, by men of ſuch nobility and greatneſs as this his Anceſtor had continually vexed.

The Spaniſh Wars, after Cato his departure out of the Countrey, though they were not very dangerous, yet were they many: and the Country ſeldom free from inſurrection, in one part or other. The Roman Prætors therefore, of which two every year were ſent over Commanders into Spain (that was divided into Governments) did rarely fail of ſuch work, as might afford the honour of Triumph. One ſlew thirteen thouſand Spaniards in a battle: another took fifty Towns: and a third enforced many States of the Country to ſue for peace. Thus every one of them, or moſt of them, did ſome laudable ſervice; and yet ſo, that commonly there were of men, towns, and people, new that rebelled, inſtead of the old that were ſlain, taken, or reclaimed. At the cauſes hereof, I have already pointed; and therefore think it enough to ſay, That the buſineſs in Spain required not the imployment of a Roman Conſul, from ſuch time as Cato thence departed, untill the Numantian War broke out, which was very long after.

In all other Countries to the Weſt of the Ionian Seas, the Romans had peace; but ſo had not the Carthaginians. For when Hannibal was gone from them, and that the enemies of the Barchine Houſe promiſed all felicity which Rome could grant, unto themſelves and their obedient City: Maſaniſſa fell to diſputing with the ſword, about the title to the beſt part of their Lands. He began with Emporia, a fruitful Region about the leſſer Syrtis: wherein, among other Cities, was that of Leptis, which daily paid a Talent unto Carthage for Tribute. This Countrey the Numidian challenged, and by winning ſome part of it, ſeemed to better his claim unto the whole. He had a great advantage: for that the Carthaginians might not make any War, without leave obtained from their Maſters the Romans. They had none other way of redreſs, than by ſending to Rome their Complaint of his doings. And ſurely they wanted not good matter to alledge, if the Judges had been impartial. For beſides that Scipio, in limiting out to them their bounds, had left them the poſſeſſion of this Country: Maſaniſſa himſelf, now very lately purſuing a Rebel that fled out of his Kingdom, deſired leave of the Carthaginians, for himſelf to paſs through it in his way to Cyrene: thereby acknowledging (had it otherwiſe been queſtionable) that the Country was theirs. This notwithſtanding, Maſaniſſa had wherewith to juſtifie his his proceedings, eſpecially unto the Roman Senate. He gave the Fathers to underſtand by his Embaſſadours, what faithleſs people the Carthaginians were, and how ill affected to the State of Rome. There had lately been ſent unto them from Hannibal, one that ſhould perſwade them to take part with Antiochus. This man they had examined upon ſome ſuſpition of his errand; yet neither arreſting him nor his ſhip, had thereby afforded him means to eſcape. Hence the Numidian concluded, that certainly it was their purpoſe to rebell; and therefore good policy to keep them down.

As for the Countrey of Emporia: it had alwaies, he ſaid, been theirs that were able to hold it by ſtrong hand: and ſo belonged ſometime unto the Numidian Kings: though now of late it was in poſſeſſion of the Carthaginians. But if the truth were known, the Citizens of Carthage had not any very warrantable title unto any more ground, than that whereon their City ſtood: or ſcarcely to ſo much. For they were no better than ſtrangers in Africk, that had gotten leave there to build upon ſo much ground, as they could encompaſs with an Oxe hide cut into ſmall thongs. Whatſoever they held without ſuch a compaſs, was purchaſed by fraud, and wrongfull encroachments. This conſidered, Maſaniſſa requeſted of the Senate, that they would not adjudge unto ſuch uſurpers, the Countrey ſometimes appertaining to the Anceſtors of him their aſſured friend. The Romans having heard theſe allegations on both ſides, found the matter ſo doubtful, that they could not on the ſudden tell what to determine. Wherefore, becauſe they would do nothing raſhly: they ſent over three Embaſſadours, of whom P. Scipio the African was one and the chief, to decide the controverſie: yet ſecretly giving them inſtructions, to leave all as they found it, without making any end one way or other. The Embaſſadors followed their directions, and left all doubtful. So was it likely, that Maſaniſſa with a ſtrong Army ſhould quickly prevail againſt thoſe that could no more than talk of their right, and exclaim againſt the wrong. By ſuch Arts were the Carthaginians held, not only from ſtirring in favour of King Antiochus, if they had thereto any diſpoſition: but were prepared by little and little, unto their final deſtruction: that came upon them, when the Romans had leiſure to expreſs the utmoſt of their hatred.

§. VI.

The Ætolians labour to provoke Antiochus, Philip, and Nabis, to War upon the Romans, by whom they hold themſelves wronged and diſgraced. Nabis beſiegeth Gytheum, and waſting ſome part of Achæa. The exact skill of Philopœmen in advantage of ground: whereby he utterly vanquiſheth Nabis. Antiochus being denied peace of the Romans, joyns with the Ætolians. The Ætolians ſurprize Demetrias; and by killing Nabis, their Confederate, ſeize upon Sparta. But they are driven out by the Citizens: who at Philopœmen his perſwaſions annex themſelves to the Achæans.

ALL Greece being at peace, and the Roman Armies thence departed: it grieved much the Ætolians to think, that they who had promiſed unto themſelves the whole ſpoil of Philip, and the higheſt reputation among the Greeks; were not only diſappointed of their covetous hopes, but quite forſaken by their ancient dependants; and of all other the moſt unregarded. Yet was there made a great acceſs to their Eſtate; by adding much unto them, of that which had been taken from the Macedonian. This might well have ſufficed them, if their deſires had not been immoderate; and their indignation more vehement, than their deſire. But they were not ſo pleaſed with that which they had, ſince they thought it no more than part of their due: as they were vexed with the denial of that which they claimed, and with finding themſelves to be wholly diſeſteemed, wherein they thought that they had unſufferable wrong. Wherefore they deviſed, in a Parliament which they ſhortly held, by what means they beſt might right themſelves; and give the Romans a ſorrowful knowledge of the difference between their enmity and friendſhip. To this purpoſe they ſoon agreed, as concurring all in one affection; That they would not only perſwade Antiochus to make war upon the Romans, as one to whom the Romans had long refuſed peace; but that they would deal with the King of Macedon their ancient enemy, and with Nabis the Tyrant of Lacedæmon, to join all together in a new Confederacy: whoſe joynt forces could not in all likelihood, but far ſurmount thoſe of the Romans, Acheans, Rhodians, and King Eumenes, with all that were of their Faction. This was a great enterpriſe, which the Ætolians took in hand; and well beſeeming them, for they were great darers. They ſent Embaſſadours baſſadors to all theſe Kings, with perſwaſions, as they thought moſt forcible. But Philip was irreſolute; and Antiochus willing to try firſt all other courſes. Nabis the Lacedæmonian, who neither (as Philip) had loſt much, nor (as Antiochus) was in fear of any War; yet ſhewed himſelf of all other the moſt forward: and not ſtaying ſo much as to ſeek any good pretence, began immediately to lay ſiege unto Gytthеum, that had been lately taken from him by the Romans. The Achæans, to whoſe care chiefly Titus at his departure had commended the Affairs of Peloponneſus, were not ſlow to admoniſh Nabis of his duty: neither would they have ſtaid long from repreſſing his violence by open war; had not ſome of them thought it wiſdom to ask Counſel of the Romans, and particularly of T. Quintius, before they engaged themſelves in a buſineſs of ſuch importance. Whilſt thus they ſpent the time in ſending Embaſſadors, and were adviſed by Quintius, to let all alone, and to wait for the coming of the Roman Forces, that would ſhortly be amongſt them: Nabis was bold to give them juſter cauſe of complaint, by waſting their own Territory.

Philopœmen was then the Prætor of the Achæans, who had long been abſent in Crete; making War there for his minds ſake and recreation. Unto him the Achæans referred themſelves, giving him leave to order the War at his pleaſure; either ſtaying till the Romans came, or doing otherwiſe, as he ſhould think beſt. He made all haſte to relieve Gytthеum by Sea; fearing leſt the Town, and the Achæan Garriſon within it, ſhould be loſt, if he uſed any delay. But Philopœmen was ſo bad a Sea-man, that he knew not a ſtrong Ship from a rotten. He made a Quadrireme Gally his Admiral, that had fourſcore years agoe been counted a gallant Veſſel in the Navie of Antigonus Gonatus. Neither was the reſt of his Fleet ſo good, as might encounter with that of the Lacedæmonian. Only it fell out well, that he committed himſelf to a light Pinnace or Brigandine, that fought better with her Wings, than with her Talons. For his Admiral Gally was ſtemmed at the firſt; and being rotten with age, ſprang ſo many leaks, and took in water ſo faſt, that ſhe was fain to yield without further reſiſtance. When the reſt of the Fleet ſaw what was become of their Admiral, all were preſently diſcouraged, and ſaved themſelves with what ſpeed they could. But Philopœmen was not herewith daunted. If he had failed in Sea-ſervice, which was none of his Occupation, He ſaid, that he would make amends by Land. The Tyrant withdrew part of his Army from the ſiege of Gytthеum, to ſtop the Achæans, if they ſhould invade his Country. But upon theſe which were placed in guard of Laconia, Philopœmen came unexpected; fired their Camp, and put all, ſave a very few of them, to the Sword. Then marched he with all his Army towards Lacedæmon: within ten miles whereof he was, when the Tyrant met him, that had already taken Gytthеum. It was not expected that Nabis would have been ready for them ſo ſoon. Or if he ſhould come from Gytthеum with any part of his Forces: yet was it thought that he muſt over-take them, and charge them in Rere. They marched therefore almoſt ſecurely, in a long troop, reaching ſome five miles; having their Horſe, and the greateſt parr of their Auxiliaries at their backs, to bear off any ſudden impreſſion. But Nabis, who formerly underſtood, or at leaſt ſuſpected, what courſe they would take, appeared in the front of them with all his Army; encamped there where they meant to have lodged. It was the cuſtome of Philopœmen, when he walked, or travelled abroad with his friends, to mark the ſituation of the Country about him; and to diſcourſe what might befal an Army marching the ſame way. He would ſuppoſe, that having with him there ſuch a number of Souldiers, ordered and ſorted in ſuch manner, and marching towards ſuch a place; he were upon that ground encountred by a greater Army, or better prepared to fight. Then would he put the queſtion, Whether it were fit for him to hold on his way, retire, or make a ſtand? What piece of Ground it were meet for him to ſeize upon? And in what manner he might beſt do it? In what ſort he ſhould order his men? Where beſtow his Carriages, and under what Guard? In what ſort encamp himſelf? And which way march the day following. By ſuch continual meditation he was grown ſo perfect, that he did never meet with any difficulty, whence he could not explicate himſelf and his followers: At this time he made a ſtand: and having drawn up his Rere, He encamped near unto the place where he was; within half a mile of the Enemy. His baggage with all thereto belonging, he beſtowed on a Rock; encompaſſing them round with his Souldiers. The Ground was rough, the wayes bad, and the day almoſt quite ſpent; ſo as Nabis could not at the preſent greatly moleſt him. Both Armies were to water at one Brook; whereto the Achæans lay the nearer. This watering therefore was firſt to miniſter the like occaſion of skirmiſh. Philopœmen underſtood this; and laid an ambuſh in place convenient; whereinto the Mercenaries of Nabis fell, and were ſlaughtered in great numbers. Preſently after this, he cauſed one of his own Auxiliaries to go to the Tyrant as a fugitive, and tell him, That the Achæans had a purpoſe to get between him and Lacedæmon; whereby they would both debar his return into the City, and withal encourage the People to take Arms for the Recovery of their Freedom. The Tyrant hearing this, marched haſtily away; and left his Camp, which hardly otherwiſe would have been forced. Some Companies he made to ſtay behind, and ſhew themſelves upon the Rampart, thereby to conceal his departure. But Philopœmen was not ſo to be beguiled. He eaſily won the Camp, and gave chaſe to Nabis: whoſe followers being overtaken, had no courage to turn about and make head. The enemies being thus diſperſed, and fled into woods where they lay in covert all that day: Philopœmen conceived aright, that their fear and neceſſity would teach them to creep homewards, and ſave themſelves when it grew dark. Wherefore in the evening, when he had gathered together all thoſe of his light armature, which had followed the chaſe whilſt it was day, he led forth the reſt that had well refreſhed themſelves, and occupied the two moſt ordinary paſſages unto Lacedæmon. So Nabis his men, when it was dark night, perceiving in Philopœmens Camp great ſtore of lights; thought that all had been at reſt: and therefore adventured to make an eſcape home. But they were ſo way-laid, that hardly one quarter of them got into Sparta. Thirty days together after this, did Philopœmen waſte the Country round about, whilſt Nabis durſt not iſſue forth of his Town; and then returned home, leaving the Tyrant in a manner without forces.

The Roman Embaſſadors were then in Greece, and T. Quintius among them, labouring to make their party ſtrong againſt Antiochus and Nabis, whom they knew to be ſolicited by the Ætolians. Very fair countenance they alſo made unto Philip; and with comfortable promiſes drew him to make ſhew, what ſoever he thought, of good correſpondence. They promiſed to reſtore unto him his Son: and were contented to let him hope, that he ſhould receive other favours at their hands; and regain poſſeſſion of many places, by them taken from him. Thus did the Romans prepare for War againſt Antiochus in Greece, whileſt their Embaſſadors that were with him in Aſia, denied otherwiſe to grant him Peace, than if he would yield unto one of the Conditions, by them ſo often propounded. The long abſence of this King in Syria, where he had accompliſhed the marriage between Ptolomy and his Daughter; together with the death of young Antiochus the Kings Son, which happened during the Treaty, and hindered, or ſeemed to hinder the King from giving audience in perſon to the Embaſſadors; cauſed them to return home to Rome; as uncertain of their anſwer as at their ſetting forth. One thing that might have been, and partly was, beneficial unto them, they brought to paſs during their abode at Epheſus; either by cunning, or (as Livy rather think) by chance. Finding Hannibal there, they diſcourſed often with him, and blamed him for having thus fled unto Antiochus upon a cauſeleſs ſuſpition wherein he held the Romans; that honoured his vertue, and intended him no harm. Many have affirmed that P. Scipio was one of theſe Embaſſadors; and that he, among other diſcourſes with Hannibal, demanded once, Which of all the famous Captains that had lived, Hannibal judged the moſt worthy? So Hannibal gave to Alexander of Macedon the firſt place: to Pyrrhus the ſecond: and the third he challenged unto himſelf. But Scipio, who thought his own title better than that it ought to be ſo forgotten, asked yet further, What wouldſt thou have ſaid then, Hannibal, if thou hadſt vanquiſhed me? To whom the Carthaginian replied, Then would not I have given the firſt place to Alexander, but have claimed it as due unto my ſelf. Now whether this were ſo or otherwiſe, the often and friendly conference of Hannibal with the Roman Embaſſadors, made him ſuſpected of Antiochus; who therefore did forbear a while to uſe his counſel. Yet afterwards, when Hannibal perceived this change in the King, and plainly deſiring him to tell the cauſe thereof, heard what it was; he eaſily recovered his former grace and credit. For he told how his Father had cauſed him to ſwear at the Altars, when he was a little Boy, that he never ſhould be friend unto the Romans. Wherefore he willed the King not to regard any vain ſurmizes: but to know thus much, that ſo long as he thought upon War with Rome, ſo long would Hannibal do him all good ſervice: whereas contrariwiſe, if he intended to make peace, then ſhould it behoove him to uſe the counſel of ſome other man.

The Ætolians, and their Friends, were leſs buſie all this while, in making their party ſtrong againſt the Romans, than were the Romans in muſtering up their friends in Greece. They had ſo often dealt with Antiochus, vaunting vaunting much of their own forces, and arrogating to themselves the honour of the Victory against Philip, that finally they prevailed with him; especially when the Roman Embassadors had left him without hope of peace, unless he would buy it at too dear a rate. They dealt in like sort with the Macedonian. But in vain. He understood the Romans and himself too well. Wherefore it concerned them to improve their own Forces to the uttermost: as knowing that all the burthen must lie upon Antiochus and themselves, without help from any, save only from some few that were discontented in Greece. Whilst they were about this, and had with them an Embassador of the King Antiochus, that animated them to resolution, the Athenian Embassadors, whom Titus had requested to be at their meeting, stayed their vehemency a little; by exhorting them not to conclude rashly, without first hearing the Romans, that lay near at hand. For want of a ready Answer hereto, they were contented to approve the motion. Titus hearing this, thought the business worthy of his presence. For since Antiochus had now declared himself against the Romans, it would be no small piece of service, to withdraw from his friendship, those by whose encouragement he had made the adventure. Wherefore he came to their Panætolium, or great Assembly of the Nation; where he forgot nothing that might serve to appease them. He willed them to consider the weight of the enterprise which they took in hand; whereby Greece was like to become a Champaign-field, on which to the ruine of the Country, the Romans and King Antiochus, that commanded no small part of the World, should fight for the Mastery: the Ætolians, as Masters in that kind of Fence, setting them on, and becoming Liv. 35. *the Sticklers. As for those grievances which did thus exasperate them, and urge them to such violent courses, he willed them to consider how slight they were, and how much better they might do, to send Embassadors to Rome, that should either plead their Right in the Senate, or (if their Right unto the places which they claimed, were not good) make request to have what they desired: than thus to set the World in an uproar, and be afterwards the first that should repent it. But what he said or could say, it skilled not much. They had already done ill, to make the Embassador of the King, whose help they had sought, wait so long for an answer, and stay doubting what good end they should make with the Romans. Neither was it news unto them to hear those comfortable words; that by sending to Rome, they might happen to obtain what they desired; either as their Right, or else by way of Favour. For with such Terms had they been feasted once already: and were by the Senate rejected unto Titus: who having it in his own power, gave them no satisfaction; yet would now again refer them to the Senate. This were only loss of time, and might abate their credit with Antiochus. Wherefore, without more ado they made a Decree, That King Antiochus the Great should be intreated to come over into Greece, as well to set the Country at liberty, as also to decide the Controversies depending between the Romans and the Ætolians. Such a Decree they would not have made, had they not understood the Kings mind before. Having made it, they forgot no point of bravery, whereby to vaunt themselves to the Kings Embassadors, and against the Romans. Titus desired of their Prætor to let him see a Copy of this new Decree. The Prætor answered, That then he had other things to do: but that this Decree, and their further answer they would shortly let him know, if he came to their Camp in Italy upon the River of Tibris. Gentler words would have done better, as the Ætolians are like to understand hereafter. But having thus begun, they meant henceforth to go roundly to work. The care of the War they referred unto the more private Council of their Nation; that no occasion might slip, in waiting for the Authority of a General Assembly. The Apoclets (so were the privy Council of Ætolia called) went as hotly to work, as any of the youngest heads could have done. They laid a Plot how to get into their hands at one time the Towns of Chalcis, Demetrias, and Sparta: to each of which they sent men for the purpose. Demetrias they took upon the sudden; entring some of them as friends, to conduct home a principal man of the City: who for speaking words against T. Quintius, had been driven to flee thence; but was by intercession of those that loved him, again re-called. His Ætolian Companions that were not many, seized upon a Gate; whereat they let in a Troop which they had left not far behind them: and so fell to murdering the chief of the Roman Faction. At Chalcis they sped not so well. Thither also they had a banished man to bring home: but they came so strong, that their purpose was discovered, and the Town prepared to defend it self against them. Being therefore demanded the cause of this Hostility, they gave a gentle answer, saying, That they came not thither as Enemies, but only to deliver the Town from the Romans; who more insolently domineered over it, than ever the Macedonians had done. By which Rhetorick they prevailed no more than they could do by plain force. For the Towns-men replyed, That they neither founnd any abridgement of their liberty, nor needed any Garrison to keep them from the Romans, from whom they neither feared any danger, nor received injury. So this business was dasht. The attempt upon Sparta was more strange and desperate. Nabis their good Friend was Lord of the Town, styling himself King, but more truly by all men called Tyrant. He had well-near lost all, by means of the overthrow which Philopœmen had lately given him: since he durst not stir abroad; and dayly expected the mischief, that on all sides threatned him. Wherefore he sent Messengers, one after another, to the Ætolians; requesting them, That as he had not been slow to stir in their behalf, but adventured himself upon the utmost of danger, when all others were backward; so they would be pleased to send him what help they might, since his bad fortude had caused him presently to need it. It hath been often said, That the ravenous Ætolians were only true to themselves, and regarded neither faith nor friendship, otherwise, than as it might conduce to their own ends. And so dealt they now. For since Nabis his mercenary forces, which upheld his Tyranny, were in a manner consumed: they thought it expedient for their Estate, to put him out of the way; and by so doing to assure Lacedæmon unto themselves. To this purpose, they sent thither Alexamenus, one whom they thought a man fit for such a work. To him they gave a thousand Foot, and thirty Horse, chosen for the purpose. These thirty were by Democritus the Prætor brought into the Counsel of the Apocleti, where they were commanded to be no wiser than they should be, nor to think that they were sent to make War with the Achæans, or to do ought else, save only what Alexamenus should command them; which were it never so desperate, and in seeming against all reason; yet must they understand, that unless they performed it, they should have no good welcome home. So Alexamenus came to the Tyrant, whom he encouraged with brave words, telling him that Antiochus was already in Europe, and would be anon in Greece, meaning to cover all the Land and Sea with his mighty Armies; and that the Romans were like to find other manner of work, than of late with Philip: since the Elephants of this Great King, without other help, would suffice to tread them down. As for the Ætolians, he said that if need should so require, they would presently send away to Lacedæmon all the Forces that they could raise: But that they were very desirous at the present, to make as goodly a muster as they could, before the great King; which caused them to send him thither afore with no greater company. Hereupon he willed Nabis to take heart; bring forth his men, that had been long pent up in the City; and train them without the Walls: as if shortly he should employ them in work of Conquest, rather than Defence. Nabis was glad of this: and daily exercised his men in the field: riding up and down with this Alexamenus, and no more than three or four Horse about him, from one point to another, to order and behold them. During this time of exercise, Alexamenus made it his fashion, to step aside alone to his Ætolians, and say somewhat as he thought fit: which done, he still returned again to Nabis. But when he saw time for the great work which he had in hand; he then went aside to his thirty Horsemen, and bade them remember the task enjoyned them at their setting forth; telling them, That they were all in case of banished men, unless they would anon come up to him, and help him to finish that which they should see him take in hand. Herewithall the Tyrant began to draw near them: and Alexamenus making towards him, charged him on the sudden, and struck him down. The thirty Ætolians never stood to deliberate upon the matter, but all flew in; and, before any succour could arrive, had made an end of this wretched Nabis. Presently upon the fact committed, the Tyrant his Mercenaries ran unto the dead body: where in stead of seeking revenge, they stood foolishly gazing as beholders. Alexamenus with his Ætolians, hasted into the City, and seized on the Palace: where he fell to ransacking the Treasure; and troubled himself with none other care, as though all were already done. Such of his Followers as were dispersed in the Town, did also the like; with the greater indignation of the Citizens: who seeing themselves free by the death of the Tyrant, could not endure to see those that had slain him, begin to tyrannize anew. Wherefore all the Town was shortly in Arms: and for lack of another Captain, they took a little Boy of the Royal Stock, that had been brought up with Nabis his Children, whom they mounted upon a good Horse, and made him their Chief. So they fell upon the Ætolians that were idly straggling about; and put them all to the Sword. Alexamenus with not many of his Company, were slain in keep-keeping the Citadel : and those few that escaped thence into Arcadia, were taken by the Magistrates; who sold them all as bond-slaves. In this doubtful estate of things at Lacedæmon, Philopœmen came thither : who calling out the chief of the City, and speaking such words unto them as Alexemanus should have done, after he had slain the Tyrant : easily perswaded them for their own good and safety, to incorporate themselves with the Achæans. Thus by the enterprise, no less dishonourable than difficult, of the Ætolians : and the small, but effectual, travel of Philopœmen, the Achæans made a notable purchase : and Lacedæmon, that had hitherto been governed either by Kings, or by Tyrants that called themselves Kings, became the Member of a Commonwealth, whereof the Name had scarce any reputation, when Sparta ruled over all Greece.

§. VII.

Antiochus, perswaded by Thoas the Ætolian, comes over into Greece ill attended. Sundry passages between Him, the Ætolians, Chalcidians, and others. He wins Chalcis, and thereby the whole Isle of Eubœa. The vanity of the Kings Embassadors and the Ætolians, with the civil Answer of Titus to their discourse, before the Achæans. That it concerned the Greeks to have desired Peace between the Romans and Antiochus, as the best assurance of their own Liberty. Of many petty Estates that fell to the King. Of Aminander; and an idle vanity by which King Phillip was lost. Hannibal gives good counsel in vain. Some Towns won in Thessaly. The King retires to Chalcis, where he marrieth a young Wife, and revels away the rest of Winter. Upon the coming of the Roman Consul, all forsake Antiochus. He with two thousand Ætolians keeps the Straights of Thermopylæ. He is beaten, and flees into Asia : leaving all Greece unto the Victors.

Antiochus was troubled much in Asia, with Smyrna and Lampsacus, that would not hearken to any Composition. He thought it neither safe nor honourable, to leave them Enemies behind him : and to win them by force, was more than hitherto he was able. Yet was he desirous with all speed convenient, to shew himself in Greece : where he had been told, that his presence would effect wonders. It was said, that in all the Country there was a very small number, which bore hearty affection unto the Romans : That Nabis was already up in arms : That Philip was like a Bandog in a chain, desiring nothing more, than to break loose : and that the Ætolians, without whom the Romans had done nothing, nor nothing could have done, were ready to confer upon him the greatness, which they had unworthily bestowed upon insolent Barbarians. Of all this, the least part was true. Yet that which was true, made such a noise, as added credit unto all the rest. Whilst therefore the King was thinking to send Hannibal into Africk, there to molest the Romans, and so give him the better leisure of using his own opportunities in Greece : Thoas the Ætolian came over to him, and bade him lay all other care aside; for that his Countreymen had already taken Demetrias, a Town of main importance, that should give him entertainment, whence he might proceed as became the greatness of his vertue and fortune. This did serve to cut off all deliberation. As for Hannibal, Thoas was bold to tell the King, first, that it was not expedient for him to divide his forces at such a time, when the very reputation of his numbers, brought into Greece, might serve to lay open unto him all places, without need of using violence : and secondly, That in any such great enterprise there could not be chosen a more unfit man to be employed in the Kings service, than was that famous Hannibal the Carthaginian. For he said that the King should as greatly feel the loss of a Fleet or Army, perishing under such a notable Commander, if his fortune were bad, as if the same had miscarried under one of meaner quality : whereas nevertheless if Hannibal prevailed, Hannibal alone should have all the honour, and not Antiochus. In this regard he was of opinion that such a renowned Warriour should be alwayes near unto the Kings Person, to give advice : which being followed, as often as it was found commodious, the good success would wholly redound unto the honour of him that had the soveraign Command, even of the King himself. Antiochus gladly hearkened unto this admonition; being jealous of the Vertue, that shined brighter than the Majesty of his own fortune. And thereupon he laid aside the determination, which tended more to the advancement of his desires, than did any thing else by him then or after thought upon.

Presently after this, He made ready for Greece. Before his setting forth, in a frivolous pomp of ceremony, he went up from the Sea-side to Ilium; there to do sacrifice to Minerva of Troy. Thence passing over the Ægean Sea, He came to Demetrias. Eurylochus the Magnetian; the same whom the Ætolians had lately waited on home, when by that pretext pretext they won Demetrias; was now the chief man, and ruler of his Nation. He therefore with his Countreymen, in great frequency, came to do their duties to the King Antiochus, and bid him welcome. The King was glad of this, and took it as a sign of good luck, to be so entertained at the beginning. But it may be suspected, That the Magnetians found not the like cause of joy. For whereas they had expected a Fleet and Army somewhat like to that of Xerxes: they saw three hundred ships; of which no more than forty were serviceable for the Wars, with an Army of ten thousand Foot, five hundred Horses and six Elephants. The Ætolians no sooner heard of his coming, than they called a Parliament, and made a Decree whereby they invited him into their Country. He knew before that they would so do; and was therefore well onward on his way towards them, when they met with him that brought the Decree. At his coming to Lamia, the Ætolians gave him as joyful entertainment as they could devise. Being brought into their Council, he made an Oration: wherein he desired them to hold him excused, that he came not followed with a greater Army. This was, he said, in true estimation, a sign of his good will: in that he staid not to make all things ready, but hasted unto their aid, even whilst the season was unfit for Navigation. Yet it should not be longer, ere the hope of all those which had expected him, would be satisfied unto the full. For it was his meaning to fill all Greece with Armies, and all the Sea-Coast with his Fleets. Neither would he spare for any Charge, Travel, or Danger, to follow the business which he had undertaken: even to drive the Romans and their Authority out of Greece, leaving the Countrey free indeed, and the Ætolians therein the Chief. Now as the Armies that were following him, should be very great; so was it his meaning, that all Provisions to them belonging should be correspondent; because he would not be any way burdensome unto his Confederates. But at the present he must needs intreat them, having thus hastily come over unto their aid, unprovided of many necessaries, that they would help him with Corn and other Victuals, whereof he stood in need. So he left them to their consultation: the conclusion whereof was, after a little dispute, (for a vain motion was made by some, that the differences between the Romans and them, should be put by Compromise to the decision of Antiochus) that they would yield unto the Kings desire, and assist him with all their Forces. Here we may observe how vain a thing it is for an absolute Prince to engage himself, as did Antiochus, in a business of dangerous importance upon the promised assurance of a State that is meerly popular. For if the vehemency of Thoas, and some other of that Faction, had not prevailed in this Council; the Ætolians, for gain of two or three Towns, yea, for hope of such gain that might have deceived them, were like to have abandoned this King their Friend, unto the discretion of the Romans. And what remedy had there been, if this had so fallen out? He could have bemoaned himself to Thoas, and complained of the wrong: but he must have been contented with this answer, That the fault was in those of the opposite side, whom Thoas would therefore have pronounced to be very wicked men. It happened much better for the present, though in the future it proved much worse, both for him, and for the Ætolians. He was chosen General of all their Forces: and thirty Commissioners were appointed to be about him, as a Council of War for the Nation. These armed such as readily they could, whilest it was in dispute where they should begin the War. Chalcis was thought the meetest place to be first undertaken: whither if they came suddenly, they should not peradventure need to use much force. The King had brought with him into Ætolia but a thousand Foot, leaving the rest behind him at Demetrias. With these he hasted away directly toward Chalcis; being overtaken by no great number of the Ætolians, which accompanied him thither. At his coming, the Magistrates, and some of the Chief Citizens, issued forth to parle with him. There the Ætolians began, as they had lately done before, to tell, how the Romans had only in words and false semblance, set Greece at liberty. But such liberty as might be true and useful, they said, would never be obtained; until by removing the necessity of obeying their pleasure that were most mighty, every several estate had where to find redress, of any pressure. And to this end was the great Antiochus come thither; a King well able to counterpoise, yea to overweigh the Romans: who nevertheless desired them only, so to joyn with him in League, as that if either the Romans or He should offer them wrong, they might keep it in their power, to seek redress at the others hands. The Chalcidians made hereto the same answer, which, to the like allegations, they had made not long before: That their freedom was not imaginary, but absolute; for which they were to thank the Romans; without whose good liking they would enter into no new confederacy.

confederacy. That which they ſpake of themſelves, they could likewiſe affirm of all the Greeks: foraſmuch as none of them paid any tribute, was kept under by any Garriſon, or lived otherwiſe than by their own Laws, and without being tied unto conditions which diſpleaſed them. Wherefore they wondred why the King ſhould thus trouble himſelf to deliver Cities that were already free. But ſince he and the Ætolians requeſted their friendſhip; they beſought both him and the Ætolians, to do a friendly Office, in departing from them quietly, and leaving them in ſuch good caſe as they were. With this anſwer the King departed: for he was not as then, ſtrong enough to force them. But very ſoon after, he brought thither a greater power, which terrified them, and made them yield: before all the ſuccours could arrive, which Titus had ſent for their defence.

The chief City of Eubœa being thus gotten, all the reſt of the Iſland ſhortly yielded to Antiochus. Four or five hundred Roman Souldiers, that came over late to have defended Chalcis, repoſed themſelves at Delium, a little Town of Bœotia, lying over againſt the Iſland; where was a Temple and Grove, conſecrated unto Apollo, that had the priviledge of an inviolable Sanctuary. In this place were ſome of them walking, and beholding the things there to be ſeen, whilſt others were buſied as they ſound cauſe, without fear of any dangor; as being in ſuch a place, and no War hitherto proclaimed. But Menippus, one of Antiochus his Captains, that had wearied himſelf in many vain Treaties of peace, took advantage of their careleſneſs, and uſed them with all extremity of War. Very few of them eſcaped; fifty were taken, and the reſt ſlain. Hereat Quintius was grieved: yet ſo, as it pleaſed him well to conſider that his Romans had now more juſt cauſe than before, to make War upon the King.

Antiochus liked well theſe beginnings, and ſent Embaſſadors into all quarters of Greece; in hope, that his reputation ſhould perſwade very many to take his part. The wiſer ſort returned ſuch anſwer, as the Chalcidians had done. Some reſerved themſelves until he ſhould come among them: knowing that either if he came not, he muſt hold them excuſed for not daring to ſtir: or if he came, the Romans muſt pardon their juſt fear, in yielding to the ſtronger. None of thoſe that lay far off, joyned with him in true meaning, ſave the Eleans, that alwayes favoured the Ætolians, and now feared the Achæans. Little reaſon there was, that he ſhould think to draw the Achæans to his party. Nevertheleſs he aſſayed them, upon a vain hope, that the envy which Titus was ſaid to bear unto Philopœmens vertue, had bred a ſecret diſlike between that Nation and the Romans. Wherefore both he and the Ætolians ſent Embaſſadors to the Council at Ægium, that pared not brave words, if the Achæans would have been ſo taken. The Kings Embaſſador told of great Armies and Fleets that were coming; reckoning up the Dahans, Medians, Elimeans, and Cadusians: names that were not every day heard of, and therefore as he thought the more terrible. Then told he them what notable men at Sea, the Sydonians, Tyrians, Aradians, and Pamphilians were; ſuch indeed as could not be reſiſted. Now concerning money, and all warlike furniture: it was, he ſaid, well known, that the Kingdoms of Aſia had alwayes therein great plenty. So as they were much deceived: who conſidering the late War made againſt Philip, did think that this with Antiochus would prove the like: the caſe was ſo far different. Yet this moſt potential King, that for the liberty of Greece was come from the utmoſt parts of the Eaſt; requeſted no more of the Achæans, than that they would hold themſelves as neutral, and quietly look on, whilſt he took order with the Romans. To the ſame effect ſpake the Ætolian Embaſſador, and further added, That in the Battel at Cynoſcephalæ, neither Titus had done the part of a General, nor the Romans of good Souldierss: but that both he and his Army had been there deſtroyed, had they not been protected by vertue of the Ætolians, which carried the day. Titus was preſent at the Council, and heard all this: to which he made as fit anſwer, as could have been deſired. He told the Achæans, That neither the Kings Embaſſador, nor the Ætolian, did ſo greatly labour to perſwade thoſe unto whom they addreſſed their Orations; as to vaunt themſelves the one unto the other. So as a man might well diſcern what good correſpondence in vanity it was, that had thus linked the King and the Ætolians together. For even ſuch brags as here they made before the Achæans, who knew them to be Lyars, had the Ætolians alſo made unto King Antiochus: Proclaiming the victory over Philip to be meerly their Act: and the whole Country of Greece to be dependent on them. Interchangeably had they been feaſted by the King, with ſuch tales as his Embaſſador told even now; of Dahans, and Aradians, and Elimeans, and a many others: that were all but a company of Syrians, ſuch as were wont to be ſold about for bond-ſlaves, and good for little elſe. Theſe divers names of rascal People, were he said, like to the diversity of Venison, wherewith a friend of his at Chalcis, (no such Vaunter as were these Embassadors) had sometime feasted him. For all that variety, whereat he wondred, was none other, as his Host then merrily told him; than so many pieces of one tame Swine, drest after several fashions, with variety of sawces. Setting therefore aside this vanity of idle pomp: it were good to make judgement of the Great King by his present doing. He had notwithstanding all this great noise, no more than ten thousand men about him: for which little Army he was fain in a manner to beg Victuals of the Ætolians: and take up money at usury to defray his charges. And thus he ran up and down the Countrey; from Demetrias to Lamia; thence back to Chalcis; and being there shut out, to Demetrias again. These were the fruits of lies: wherewith, since both Antiochus and the Ætolians had each deluded other; meet it was that they should, as perhaps already they did, repent, whilest wiser men took heed by their example. To a favourable Auditory much perswasion is needless. The Achæans did not love so well the Ætolians, as to desire that they should become Princes of Greece: but rather wished to see them, of all other, made the veriest abjects. Wherefore they stood not to hearken after news, what Antiochus did, how he sped in Eubœa, or what other Cities were like to take his part: but readily proclaimed War against him, and against the Ætolians.

How the hatred between these two Nations grew inveterate; sufficiently appears in the story fore-going. Now have they gotten each their Patrons; the one, the Romans; the other King Antiochus. Herein did each of them unwitely: though far the greater blame ought to be laid on the turbulent spirits of the Ætolians. For when the Romans departed out of Greece, and left the Country at rest: there was nothing more greatly to have been desired, than that they might never find occasion to return with an Army thither again. And in this respect ought the Greeks to have sought, not how Smyrna and Lampsacus might recover their Liberty, (which had never been held a matter worth regarding, until now of late) but how the powers of the East and West, divided and kept asunder by their Countrey, as two Seas by an Isthmus, or neck of Land, might be kept from over-flowing the Bar that parted them. Neither had the Romans any better pretence for their seeking to make free those base Asiatiques, who originally were Greekish; than the general applause, wherewith all the Nation entertained this their loving offer. Yet were Lysimachia, and the Towns in Thrace, lately gotten by Antiochus, pretended as a very great cause of fear, that should move them to take arms even in their own defence. But if all Greece would have made intercession, and requested that things might continue as they were, promising joyntly to assist the Romans with their whole Forces both by Land and Sea, whensoever King Antiochus should make the least offer to stir against them: then had not only this quarrel been at an end; but the Roman Patronage over the Country, had been far from growing, as soon after it did, into a Lordly rule.

The Achæans were at this time, in a manner the only Nation of Greece, that freely and generously declared themselves altogether for the Romans, their friends and benefactors. All the rest gave doubtful answers of hope unto both sides: or if some few, as did the Thessalians, were firm against Antiochus; yet helped they not one another in the quarrel, nor shewed themselves his Enemies, till he pressed them with open force. The Bœotians willingly received him, as soon as he entred upon their borders, not so much for fear of his power, as in hatred of Titus and the Romans, by whom they had been somewhat hardly used. Aminander the Athamanian, besides his old friendship with the Ætolians, was caught with a bait, which it may be doubted whether he did more foolishly swallow, or Antiochus cast out. He had married the Daughter of an Arcadian, that was an idle-headed man, and vaunted himself to be descended from Alexander the Great: naming his two sons, in that regard, Philip and Alexander. Philip, the elder of these Brethren, accompanied his sister to the poor Court of Athamania: where having made his folly known, by talking of his Pedegree; He was judged by Antiochus and the Ætolians, a man fit for their turns. They made him believe, that in regard of his high Parentage, and the famous memory of Alexander his forefather; it was their purpose, to do their best for the conquest of Macedon to his behoof: since no man had thereto so good title as he. But for the enabling them hereunto; it behoved him to draw Aminander to their party, that so they might the sooner have done with the Romans. Philip was highly pleased herewith; and by perswasions of himself or of his Sister, effected as much as they desired. But the first piece of service done by this imaginary King (whether it proceeded from his own phrenzie in hope to get love of the Macedonians that should be his Subjects: or whether whether from ſome vanity in King Antiochus that employed him) wrought more harm to his friends, than he and Aminander were able to do good. There were two thouſand men committed to his leading: with which he marched unto Cynoſcephalæ, there to gather up the bones of the ſlaughtered Macedonians; whom their King had ſuffered all this while to lie unburied. The Macedons troubled not themſelves to think on this charitable act, as if it were to them any benefit at all: but King Philip took it in high indignation; as intended meerly unto his deſpight. Wherefore he preſently ſent unto the Romans; and gave them to underſtand, that he was ready with all his power to aid them wherein ſoever they ſhould be pleaſed to uſe him.

The Ætolians, Magnetians, Eubœans, Bœotians, and Athamanians, having now all joyned with him: Antiochus took counſel of them about the proſecution of the War in hand. The chief queſtion was, Whether it were meet for him to invade Theſſaly, that would not hearken to his perſwaſions: or whether to let all alone until the Spring: becauſe it was now mid-winter. Some thought one thing, and ſome another; confirming each his own ſentence, with the weighteſt reaſons which he could alledge: as in a matter of great importance. Hannibal was at this meeting: who had long been caſt aſide, as a veſſel of no uſe, but was now required to deliver his opinion. He freely told the King, That what he ſhould now utter, was even the ſame which he would have ſpoken, had his counſel at any time before been aſked ſince their coming into Greece. For the Magnetians, Bœotians, and other their good friends, which now ſo willingly took their parts: what were they elſe than ſo many poor eſtates, that wanting force of their own, did adjoyn themſelves for fear unto him, that was ſtrongeſt for the preſent: and would afterwards, when they ſaw it expedient, be as ready to fall to the contrary ſide, alledging the ſame fear for their excuſe? Wherefore he thought it moſt behooveful to win King Philip of Macedon unto their party: who (beſides that being once engaged, he ſhould not afterwards have power to recoyle and forſake them at his pleaſure) was a mighty Prince; and one that had means to ſuſtain the Roman War with his proper forces. Now that Philip might be eaſily perſwaded to join with them, the benefit likely to redound unto himſelf, by their ſociety, was a very ſtrong Argument: though indeed what need was there, of proving by inference the likelihood of this hope: For, ſaid He, Theſe Ætolians here preſent; and namely, this Thoas being lately Embaſſadour from them into Aſia, among other motives which he then uſed to excite the King unto this Expedition, inſiſted mainly on the ſame point. He told us that Philip was moved beyond all patience, with the Lordly inſolence of the Romans: likened that King to ſome wild beaſt, that was chained or lockt up within ſome grate, and would fain break looſe. If this be ſo: let us break his chain, and pull down the grate, that he may regain his liberty, and ſatisfie his angry ſtomack, upon thoſe that are common enemies to us and him. But if it prove otherwiſe, and that his fear be greater than his indignation: then ſhall it behoove us to look unto him; that he may not ſeek to pleaſe his good maſters the Romans, by offending us. Your ſon Seleucus is now at Lyſimachia, with part of your Army: if Philip will not hearken to your Embaſſage; let Seleucus be in readineſs to fall upon Macedon, and find him work to defend his own on the other ſide, without putting us here to trouble. Thus much concerning Philip, and the preſent war in Greece. But more generally for the managing of this great enterpriſe, wherein you are now embarked againſt the Romans, I told you my opinion at the beginning: whereto had you then given ear, the Romans by this time ſhould have heard other news, than that Chalcis in Eubœa was become ours. Italy and Gaul ſhould have been on fire with war; and little to their comfort, they ſhould have underſtood, that Hannibal was again come into Italy. Neither do I ſee what ſhould hinder us even now from taking the ſame courſe. Send for all your Fleet and Army hither (but in any caſe let ſhips of burden come along with them, loaden with ſtore of victuals: For, as the caſe now ſtands, we have here too few hands and too many mouths) Wherefore let the one half be imployed againſt Italy; whileſt you in perſon with the other half, tarrying on this ſide the Ionian Sea, may both take order for the affairs of Greece, and therewithal make countenance; as if you were even ready to follow us into Italy: yea, and be ready to follow us indeed, if it ſhall be requiſite This is my advice; who though perhaps I am not very skilful in all ſorts of war; yet how to war with the Romans, I have been inſtructed by long experience, both to their coſt and mine own. Of this Counſel which I give, I promiſe you my faithfull and diligent ſervice for the execution: but what Counſel ſoever you pleaſe to follow, I wiſh it may be proſperous. Many were pleaſed with the great ſpirit of the man, and ſaid, he had ſpoken bravely: but of all this was nothing done; ſave only that one was ſent into Aſia; to make all things ready there. In the mean while they went in hand with Thessaly; about which they had before disputed. There when they had won one Town by force, many other places, doubting their own strength, were glad to make submission. But Larissa that was chief of the Country, stood out: not regarding any terrible threats of the King, that lay before the wals with his whole Army. This their faith and courage was rewarded by good fortune. For M. Fabius, a Roman Proprator, did send help thither. Likewise Philip of Macedon professed himself enemy unto Antiochus, whereby the fame of the succour coming to Larissa, grew such, as wrought more than the succour could have done, had it arrived. For Antiochus perceiving many fires on the Mountain tops afar off; thought that a great Army of Romans and Macedonians had been coming upon him. Therefore excusing himself by the time of the year; He brake up his siege, and marched away to Chalcis. At Chalcis he fell in love with a young Maiden, daughter unto a Citizen of the Town; whom, without regard of the much disproportion that was between them, both in years and fortune, He shortly married; and so spent the winter following as delightfully as he could, without thinking upon the war in hand. His great men and Captains followed his example; & the souldiers as readily imitated their Captains: in such wise, that when he took the field, he might evidently perceive in what loose manner of discipline his army had passed the winter. But M. Acilius Glabrio, the Roman Consul, shall meet him very shortly, and help him to reclaim them from this looseness of nuptial Revels, by setting them to harder exercise. M. Acilius was chosen Consul with P. Cornelius Scipio Nasica. The war against Antiochus fell to him by lot; whereas otherwise, He was no way so honourable, as Nasica, his Colleague: unto whom fell a charge, of far less credit and importance. Nasica, besides the great Nobility of his Family, had been long since, in time of the Punick War, Crowned with the title of The best man in Rome: when the Senate for very fear and superstition, durst not have so pronounced him, had they not so thought him, as being commanded by Oracle, that none other man than the very best, should entertain on old stone, which the Devil then taught them to call The Mother of the Gods. But no prerogative of Birth, Vertue or good opinion, gave such advantage to the better man, as to make choice of his own Province: or arrogate more unto himself; than his lot should afford him. This unpartial distribution of employments, helped well to maintain peace and concord.

P. Scipio was therefore appointed to make war against the Bojians; wherein he purchased the honour of a Triumph, nothing so glorious as was that of his Colleague; though purchased with harder service, requiring the more ability in matter of War. But M. Acilius went over into Greece, with ten thousand foot, two thousand horse, and fifteen Elephants. Ptolomy King of Egypt, notwithstanding his late Alliance with King Antiochus; and Philip King of Macedon; had lately sent Embassadors to Rome, making offer to come each of them in person with all his forces into Ætolia, there to assist the Consul in this War. Ptolomy sent also gold and silver, toward the defraying of charges; as one that meant none other than good earnest. But he was two young and dwelt too far off. So his money was returned unto him with thanks; and his loving offer as lovingly refused. Unto Philips Embassadors, answer was made, that this his friendly offer was gratefully accepted: and that the Senate and People of Rome would think themselves beholding to him, for the assistance that he should give to Acilius the Consul. Masanissa likewise, and the Carthaginians, did strive, which of them should be most forward in gratifying the Romans. Each of them promised a great quantity of grain; which they would send partly to Rome, partly to the Army in Greece. And herein Masanissa far out-went the poor City of Carthage; as also in that he offered to lend the Consul five hundred horse, and twenty Elephants. On the other side, the Carthaginians undertook to set out a Fleet at their own charges: and to bring in at one payment, all the Tribute-mony which was behind, and ought to be discharged by many yearly pensions. But the Romans did neither think it good, to let them arm a Fleet: nor would let them redeem themselves out of Tribute, by paying all at once. As for the Corn, it was accepted, with condition that they should be contented to receive the price of it.

The hasty and ridiculous issue of this War, that began with such noise and preparations, were hardly credible: were not the difference exceeding great between the Roman and the Asiatique Souldier. Antiochus had gotten this Spring a few Towns of Acarnania, after the same manner as he had prevailed in other parts of Greece; partly by fair words, and treason of the rulers: partly by terrour, that was like to prove their excuse when they should again forsake him. But King Philip and Bæbius having recovered many places; & the Roman Consul being arrived, against whom none made resistance; he was glad to withdraw himself. Aminander fled out of his Athamania: which the Macedonian took and enjoyed; as in recompence of his good service to the Romans. Philip the brother of Aminanders wife, was taken by the Consul; made a mocking-stock, and sent away prisoner to Rome. The Thessalians used much more diligence in returning to their old friends, than they had done in yielding to the King. All their Cities one after another, gave up themselves: the Garrisons of Antiochus, compounding only for their own lives, and departing unarmed: yet so, that a thousand of them stayed behind, and took pay of the Romans. This did wonderfully perplex Antiochus; who having withdrawn himself to Chalcis, and hearing how things went, cryed out upon his friends: and said, That they had betrayed him. He had taken a great deal of toyl during one half of a winter, and spent the other half in such Nuptials, as were little to his honour: after which, in time of need, he found all the promises of the Ætolians meerly verbal: and himself reduced into terms of great extremity. He therefore admired Hannibal as a wise man, yea, a very Prophet, that had foreseen all this long before. Nevertheless, he sent word to the Ætolians, that they should now make ready all their forces: as considering their own need to be no less than his. But the Ætolians had cause to think, that they themselves were shamefull disappointed by Antiochus; who having promised to do great wonders, was in all this while seconded by no greater numbers out of Asia, than so many as would fill up the same ten thousand which he first brought over. Yet came there some of them, though fewer than at any time before, which joyned with him. Hereat the King was angry: and could get no better satisfaction, than that Thoas and his fellows had done their best in vain, to have made all the Nation take Arms. Since therefore neither his own men came over to him out of Asia, nor his friends of Greece would appear in this time of danger: He seized upon the Straights of Thermopylæ; as meaning to defend them against the Romans, until more help should come. Of the Straights of Thermopylæ, there hath been spoken enough * before, upon many occasions: and then chiefly, when they were defended by Leonidas against the huge Army of Xerxes. Wherefore it may easily be conceived, how the Romans, that landed about Apollonia, and so came onwards into Thessaly, were unable to pass that Ledge of Mountains, dividing the one half of Greece; unless they could win this difficult entrance. But there was great difference between Leonidas and Antiochus. The former of these, with an handfull of men, defended this passage two or three daies together, against a world of men coming to invade the Country. The latter, having taken upon him to do great miracles, and effect what he listed himself in person, could commit himself unto the safety of his place, when he was charged by no more than he had in his own Army. There whilest he lay, He sent earnest messengers one after another to the Ætolians, entreating them not to forsake him thus: but at least wise now to help, and keep the tops of the mountains, lest the Romans, finding any by-path, should come down upon him. By this opportunity, he got of them two thousand, that undertook to make good the few passages: by which only, and not without extreme difficulty, it was possible for the Enemy to ascend. The Roman Consul in like sort prepared to force the Straights; without staying to expect King Philip: that was hindred by sickness from accompanying him. He had with him M. Porcius Cato, and L. Valerius Flaccus, that had both of them been Consuls. These he sent forth by night with two thousand men, to try whether by any means they could get up to the Ætolians. He himself encouraged his Army; not only by telling them with what base conditioned enemies they had to deal: but what rich Kingdoms Antiochus held, that should bountifully reward them if they were victors. This was on the day before the battel. All that night Cato had a sore journey (for what happened unto L. Valerius it is uncertain, save only that he failed in his intent) and so much the worse, for that he had no skilful guide. Seeing therefore his men exceedingly tyred, with climbing up steepy Rocks, and crooked waies: He commanded them to repose themselves; whilst he, being a very able man of body, took in hand the discovery, accompanied with no more than one of like metal to himself. After a great deal of trouble, he found at length a path: which he took to be, as indeed it was, the best way leading unto the Enemies. So thither he brought his men; and held on the same path till toward break of day. It was a place not haunted, because in time of peace, there was a fair way thorow the Straights below, that required no such trouble of climbing; neither had this entrance of the Thermopylæ been so often the Seat of War, as might cause any travellers to search out the passages of those desolate Mountains. Wherefore the way that Cato followed, though it were the best; yet did it lead

him to a bog at the end, which would suffer him to pass no further. So he stayd there until day-light: by which he discovered both the Camp of the Greeks underneath him; and some of the Ætolians very near unto him, that were keeping watch. He therefore sent forth a party of men, whom he thought fit for the service; and willed them to bring him some prisoner. This was effected: and he thereby understood, that these Ætolians were no more than six hundred; as also that King Antiochus lay beneath in the Valley. So he presently set upon the Ætolians, overthrew them, slew a great part of them, and chased the rest, that by flying to their Camp, guided him unto it. The fight was already begun between the Armies below: and the Romans, that had easily repelled the Kings men, and driven them into their Camp, found it, in a manner, a desperate piece of work to assault the Camp it self, which occupied the whole breadth of the Straights, was notably fortified; and not only defended by Antiochus his long Pikes, which were best at that kind of service; but by Archers and Slingers that were placed over them on the Hill-side, and powred down a showr of weapons on their heads. But Cato his approach determined the matter. It was thought, at first, that the Ætolians had been coming to help the Kings men: but when the Roman Arms and Ensigns were discovered, such was the terrour, that none made offer of resistance; but all of them forsook the Camp, and fled. The slaughter was not great: for that the badness of the way did hinder the Roman Army from making pursuit. Yet this daies loss drave Antiochus out of Greece, who directly fled to Chalcis; and from thence with the first opportunity, got him back into Asia.

All the Cities that had imbraced the friendship of Antiochus, prepared forthwith to entertain the Romans, and entreat for pardon: setting open their gates; and presenting themselves unto the Consul, in manner of suppliants. Briefly, in few daies all was recovered that Antiochus had gained: the Ætolians only standing out, because they knew not what else to do. Neither did the Consul give them any respite. At his return from Chalcis, he met with King Philip, that having recovered health, came to joyn with him against Antiochus: over whom, since the victory was already gotten, He did gratulate unto the Romans their good success; and offered to take part with them in the Ætolian War. So it was agreed, That the Consul should besiege Heraclea; and Philip Lamia; at the same time. Each of them plied his work hard; especially Philip, who fain would have taken Lamia before the Consul should come to help him. But it could not be. For his Macedonians that used to work by Myne, were over-much hindered by the stony ground. Yet was Lamia even ready to be taken, when the Consul, having won Heraclea, came thither, and told Philip, that the spoil of these Towns was a reward unto those that had fought at Thermopylæ. Herewith Philip must be contented; and therefore went his way quietly. But Acilius, that could so ill endure to see Philip in likelihood of thriving by the Romans victory, got not Lamia himself: until such time as another Consul was ready to ease him of his charge.

The loss of Heraclea did so affright the Ætolians, that they thought no way safer than to desire peace. Yet had they sent unto King Antiochus presently after his flight: intreating him not to forsake them utterly, but either to return with all those forces which he had purposed to bring into Greece; or if any thing with held him from coming in person, at leastwise to help them with mony and other aid. They prayed him to consider, that this did not only concern him in honour; but appertained unto his own safty: since it would be much to his hurt, if the Ætolians being wholly subdued, the Romans, without any enemies at their backs, might set upon him in Asia. He considered well of this, and found their words true. Therefore he delivered unto Nicander, one of their Embassadors, a summ of mony, that might serve to defray the charges of the War: promising that ere long he would send them strong aid, both by Land and Sea. Thoas, another of their Embassadors, He retained with him; who willingly stayed, that he might urge the King to make his word good. But when Heraclea was taken from them; then did the Ætolians lay aside all hope of amending their fortune by the help of Antiochus; and made suit unto the Consul to obtain peace, upon any reasonable condition. The Consul would scarce vouchsafe to give them audience, but said, He had other business in hand; only he granted them ten daies of Truce, and sent L. Valerius Flaccus with them to Hypata, willing them to make him acquainted with as much as they would have delivered unto himself. At their coming to Hypata, they began, as men favouring their own cause, to alledge how well they had deserved of the Romans. Whereto Flaccus would not hearken. He told them plainly, That the memory of such good offices past, was quite obliterated by the the malice which they had ſhewed of late. Wherefore he willed them to acknowledge their fault, and to entreat pardon. Better they thought to do ſo even betimes, than to ſtay till they were reduced unto terms of more extremity. Hereupon they agreed to commit themſelves unto the faith of the Romans; and to that effect ſent Embaſſadors to the Conſul. This phraſe of committing unto the faith, ſignified, in their uſe of it, little elſe than the acknowledgement of a fault done, and the craving of pardon. But the Romans uſed thoſe words in another ſenſe; and counted them all one, as * yielding to diſcretion. Wherefore when the Conſul heard them ſpeak in this manner: He aſked them whether their meaning were agreeable to their words. They anſwered that it was: and ſhewed him the decree of their Nation, lately made to this purpoſe. Then, ſaid he, I command you firſt of all, That none of you preſume to go into Aſia, upon any buſineſs, private or publick: then, That ye deliver up unto me Dicæarchus the Ætolian, Meneſtratus the Epirot, Aminander the Athamanian, and ſuch of his Countrimen as have followed him in revolting from us. Whileſt he was yet ſpeaking; Phameas the Embaſſadour interrupted him; and prayed him not to miſtake the cuſtome of the Greeks, who had yielded themſelves unto his faith; not unto ſlavery. What? (ſaid the Conſul) Do ye ſtand to plead Cuſtome with me, being now at my diſcretion? Bring hither a chain. With that, chains were brought; and an Iron collar, by his appointment, fitted unto every one of their necks. This did ſo affright them, that they ſtood dumb, and knew not what to ſay. But Valerius and ſome others entreated the Conſul, not to deal thus hardly with them, ſince they came as Embaſſadors; though ſince, their condition was altered. Phameas alſo ſpake for himſelf; and ſaid, That neither he, nor yet the Apocleti or ordinary Councel for the Nation, were able to fulfill theſe Injunctions; without approbatiou of the general Aſſembly. For which cauſe he entreated yet further ten daies reſpite; and had granted unto him Truce for ſo long.

This ſurceaſance of War, during ten, and other ten daies together, began preſently after the taking of Heraclea; when Philip had been commanded away from Lamia, that elſe he might have won. Now becauſe of the indignity herein offered unto that King, and to the end that he might not return home with his Army, like one that could not be truſted in employment: eſpecially the Romans being like hereafter to have further need of him in the continuance of this War; He was deſired to ſet upon the Athamanians, and ſome other petty Nations their borderers, whilſt the Conſul was buſie with the Ætolians: taking for his reward, all that he could get. And he got in that ſpace all Athamania, Perrhæbia, Aperantia, and Dolopia. For the Ætolians hearing what had betallen their Embaſſadors, were ſo enraged, That although they were very ill provided for War, yet they could not endure to hear more talk of Peace. And it happened, that Nicander about the ſame time was come back from Antiochus, with mony and hopeful promiſes: the Romans abiding ſtill about Heraclea, and Philip having lately riſen from before Lamia, yet not being far gone thence. His mony Nicander conveighed into Lamia, by very unuſual dexterity. But he himſelf being to paſs further to the Aſſembly of the Ætolians, there to make report of his Embaſſage; was very much perplexed about this his journey, which lay between the Roman and Macedonian Camps. Yet he made the adventure: and keeping as far as he could from the Roman ſide, fell upon a Station of Macedonians; by whom he was taken, and led unto their King. He expected no good: but either to be delivered unto the Romans, or uſed ill enough by Philip. But it ſeems, that the King had not hitherto concocted well the indignity of his being ſent away from Lamia. For he commanded his ſervants to entreat Nicander friendly: and he himſelf being then at ſupper, did viſit him as ſoon as he roſe up: giving him to underſtand, That the Ætolians did now reap the fruits of their own madneſs; foraſmuch as they could never hold themſelves contented, but would needs be calling ſtrangers into Greece. They had pleaſed themſelves well, in their acquaintance firſt with the Romans, and then with King Antiochus: but himſelf, being their neighbour, they could never well endure. It was now therefore, he ſaid, high time for them to have regard unto his friendſhip, whereof hitherto they never made any tryal: for ſurely their good affection, one unto the other, would be much more available unto each of them, than their mutual catching of advantages; whereby they had wrought themſelves much diſpleaſure. Thus much the King willed Nicander to ſignifie unto his Countrimen; and privately to hold in mind the courteſie which he then did him, in ſending him ſafe home. So giving him a Convoy to guard him to Hypata, he lovingly diſmiſſed him. For this benefit, Nicander was alwaies after dutifully affected to the Crown of Macedon: ſo as in the war of Perseus he made himself suspected unto the Romans, and therefore was had away to Rome, where he ended his life.

When the Consul understood, that the Ætolians refused to make their submission, in such wise as he required it: he forthwith meant to prosecute the war against them, without any longer forbearance. They were preparing to make head against him at Naupactus: whither he therefore directly marched, to try what they could or durst. The siege of Naupactus was of greater length, than the Romans had preconceived it: for it was a strong City, and well manned. But Acilius stood upon point of honour; wherein he thought that he should have been a loser by rising from before it without Victory. So he stayd there well-near all the following time of his Consulship; whilest the Macedonian King and the Achæans, made far better use of the Roman Victory. Philip, as is said before, being allowed to take in such places as had revolted unto Antiochus, and were not hitherto reclaimed, won the strong City of Demetrius, and with an hasty course of Victory, subdued the Athamanians and others. The Achæans called to account the Eleans and Messenians: which had long been addicted to the Ætolian side; and followed it, in taking part with Antiochus. The Eleans gave good words; whereby they saved themselves from trouble a while. The Messenians being more stout, before they were invaded, had none other help when the Achæan Prætor wasted their Country, than to offer themselves unto the Romans. Titus was then at Corinth: to whom they sent word, That at his Commandment their gates should be opened; but that unto the Achæans it was not their meaning to yield. A message from Titus to the Achæan Prætor, did suffice to call home the Army, and finish the War: as also the peremptory Command of the same Titus, caused the Messenians to annex themselves unto the Achæans, and become part of their Common-weal. Such was now the Majesty of a Roman Embassador. Titus did favour the Achæans; yet could not like it well, that either they or any other should take too much upon them. He thought it enough, that they had their liberty, and were strong enough to defend it against any of their neighbours. That they should make themselves great Lords, and able to dispute with the Romans upon even terms, it was no part of his desire. They had lately bought the Isle of Zacynthus; which had once been Philips, and was afterward given by him to Aminander, who sent a Govenour thither. But when Aminander in this present war, was driven out of his own Kingdom by Philip; then did the Governour of Zacynthus offer to sell the Island to the Achæans; whom he found ready Chapman. Titus liked not of this: but plainly told them, That the Romans would be their own Carvers, and take what they thought good, of the Lands belonging to their Enemies; as a reward of the victory which they had obtained. It was bootless to dispute. Wherefore the Achæans refered themselves unto his discretion. So he told them, that their Commonwealth was like a Tortoise, whereof Peloponesus was the shell: and that, holding themselves within that compass, they were out of danger; but if they would needs be looking abroad, they should lie open to blows, which might greatly hurt them. Having settled things thus in Peloponesus, he went over to Naupactus: where Glabrio the Consul had lain two months, that might have been far better spent. There, whether out of compassion which he had upon the Ætolians, or out of dislike of King Philips thriving so fast: he perswaded the Consul to grant unto the besieged, and to the whole Nation, so long truce, that they might send Embassadors to Rome; and submitted themselves, crave pardon of the Senate. Most like it is, that Naupactus was in great danger: else would not the Ætolians have made such earnest suit as they did unto Titus, for procuring of this favour. But if Glabrio had been sure to carry it in any short space, it may well be thought he would not have gone away without it; since the winning of that Town, wherein was then the whole flower of the Nation, would have made the promised submission much more humble and sincere. When they came unto Rome, no entreaty could help them to better Condition, than one of these two; That either they should wholly submit themselves to the good pleasure of the Senate; Or else pay a thousand talents, and make neither peace nor war with any; further than as the Romans should give approbation. They had not so much mony: neither could they well hope to be gently dealt withall, if they should give themselves away unto discretion; which, what it signified, they now understood. Wherefore they desired to have it set down, in what points, and how far forth they should yield unto the good pleasure of the Senate. But hereof they could get no certain answer: so that they were dismissed as enemies, after long and vain attendance.

Whilest the Ætolians were pursuing thier hopes of peace, the Consul had little to do in Greece, and therefore took upon him gravely to set things in order among the tractable

Achæans.

Achæans. He would have had them to reſtore the baniſhed Lacedæmonians home into their Country; and to take the Eleans into the fellowſhip of their Commonwealth. This the Achæans liked well enough: but they did not like it, that the Romans ſhould be meddling in all occurrences. Wherefore they deferred the reſtitution of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians: intending to make it an Act of their own meer grace. As for the Eleans, they were loth to be beholding to the Romans, and thereby to diſparage the Achæans: into whoſe Corporation they were deſirous to be admitted, and ſaw that they ſhould have their deſire, without ſuch compulſive mediation.

The Roman Admiral C. Livius, much about the ſame time, fought a battel at Sea with Polyxenidas, Admiral to the King Antiochus. King Eumenes brought help to the Romans, though it was not great: and five and twenty ſail of Rhodians came after the battel, when they were following the Chaſe. The Kings Fleet was the better of ſail, but that of the Romans the better manned. Wherefore Polyxenidas being vanquiſhed in fight, was yet out of danger; as ſoon as he betook himſelf to a ſpeedy retrait.

And ſuch end had the firſt years war between King Antiochus and the Romans. After this, as many of the Greeks as had followed the vain hopes of the Ætolians were glad to excuſe themſelves by fear; thinking themſelves happy when by Embaſſadours they had obtained pardon. On the contrary ſide, Philip of Macedon, Arch-enemy of late unto the Romans, did now ſend to gratulate this their victory: and, in recompence of his good affection, had reſtored unto him Demetrius his younger Son; whom ſome few years they had kept as an hoſtage. Alſo King Ptolomy of Egypt, gratulating the Roman Victory, ſent word how greatly all Aſia and Syria were thereby terrified. In which regard he deſired the Senate not to foreſlow time; but to ſend an Army, as ſoon as might be, into Aſia: promiſing, that his aſſiſtance, wherein ſoever it pleaſed them to uſe it, ſhould not be wanting. This Ptolomy was the Son-in-law of King Antiochus: but he was the friend of fortune. He underſtand long before, as did all that were indifferent beholders of the contention, that the Romans were like to have the upper hand. The ſame did Antiochus now begin to ſuſpect, who had thought himſelf a while as fate at Epheſus, as if he had been in another world: bnt was told by Hannibal, That it was not ſo far out of Greece into Aſia, as out of Italy into Greece, and that there was no doubt but the Romans would ſoon be there, and make him try the chance of a battel for his Kingdom.

§. VIII.

Lucius Scipio, having with him Publius the African his elder brother, for his Lieutenant, is ſent into Greece. He grants long truce to the Ætolians, that ſo he might at leiſure paſs into Aſia. Much troubleſome buſineſs by Sea, and divers fights. An invaſion upon Eumenes his kingdom; with the ſiege of Pergamus, raiſed by an handfull of the Achæans. L. Scipio the Conſul comes into Aſia: where Antiochus moſt earneſtly deſireth peace, and is denyed it. The battel of Magneſia: wherein Antiochus being vanquiſhed, yieldeth to the Romans good pleaſure. The conditions of the peace. In what ſort the Romans uſed their victory. L. Cornelius Scipio, after a moſt ſumptuous triumph over Antiochus, is ſurnamed The Aſiatique, as his brother was ſtiled The African.

Lucius Cornelius Scipio, the brother of P. Scipio the African, was choſen Conſul at Rome with C. Lælius. Lælius was very gracious in the Senate: and therefore being deſirous (as generally all Conſuls were) of the more honourable employment, offered to refer to the arbitrement of the Senate, if L. Cornelius would be ſo pleaſed, the diſpoſition of their Provinces; without putting it to the hazzard of a Lottery. Lucius having talked with his brother Publius, approved well of the motion. Such a queſtion had not of long time been put unto the Fathers: who therefore were the more deſirous to make an unblameable Decree. But the matter being otherwiſe ſomewhat indifferent, P. Scipio the African ſaid openly thus much, That if the Senate would appoint his brother to the war againſt Antiochus, He himſelf would follow his brother in that war, as his Lieutenant. Theſe words were heard with ſuch approbation, that the Controverſie was forthwith at an end. For if Antiochus relyed upon Hannibal, and ſhould happen to be directed wholly by that great Captain, what better man could they oppoſe than Scipio: that had been victorious againſt that ſame great Worthy? But indeed a worſer man might have ſerved well enough the turn. For Hannibal had no abſolute command, nor ſcarce any truſt of great importance: excepting now and then in conſultation; where his wiſdome was much approved, but his liberty and high ſpirit as much diſliked. It is worthy thy of remembrance, as a ſign of the freedom that he uſed in his cenſures, even whileſt he lived in ſuch a Court. Antiochus muſtered his Army in preſence of this famous Captain: thinking, as may ſeem, to have made him wiſh, that he had been ſerved by ſuch brave men in Italy. For they were gallantly decked, Both Men, Horſes, and Elephants, with ſuch coſtly furniture of gold, ſilver, and purple, as glittered with a terrible bravery on a Sunſhine day. Whereupon the King, well pleaſing himſelf with that goodly ſpectacle, aſked Hannibal what he thought; and whether all this were not enough for the Romans. Enough (ſaid Hannibal) were the Romans the moſt covetous men in all the world: meaning that all this coſt upon the backs of cowardly Aſiatiques, was no better than a ſpoil to animate good Souldiers. How little this anſwer pleaſed the King, it is eaſie to gueſs. The little uſe that he made of this Carthaginian, teſtifies that his diſlike of the man, cauſed him to loſe the uſe of his ſervice, when he ſtood in greateſt neceſſity thereof.

The Scipio's made all haſte away from Rome as ſoon as they could. They carried with them, beſides other Souldiers newly preſt to the war, about five thouſand Voluntaries, that had ſerved under P. Africanus. There was alſo a Fleet of thirty Quinquereme Gallies, and twenty Triremes newly built, appointed unto L. Æmilius Regillus, that was choſen Admiral the ſame year for that voyage. At their coming into Greece, they found the old Conſul Glabrio beſieging Amphyſſa a City of the Ætolians. The Ætolians after that they were denyed peace, had expected him once again at Nanpactus. Wherefore they not only fortified that Town, but kept all the paſſages thereto leading; which heedleſly, as in a time of confuſion, they had left unregarded the laſt year. Glabrio knowing this, deceived their expectation, and fell upon Lamia: which being not long ſince much weakened by Philip, and now by him attempted on the ſudden; was carried at the ſecond aſſault. Thence went he to Amphyſſa: which he had almoſt gotten, when L. Scipio, his ſucceſſor, came with thirteen thouſand Foot, and five hundred Horſe, and took charge of the Army. The Town of Amphyſſa was preſently forſaken by the Inhabitants: but they had a Caſtle, or higher Town, that was impregnable; whereinto they all retired. The Athenian Embaſſadors had dealt with P. Scipio, in behalf of the Ætolians: entreating him to ſtand their friend, and help them in obtaining ſome tolerable condition of peace. He gave them gentle words, and willed them to perſwade the Ætolians, that they ſhould faithfully, and with true meaning deſire it. This was gladly taken. But many meſſages paſſing to and fro: though Publius continued to put them in good hope; yet the Conſul made ſtill the ſame anſwer, with which they had been chaſed from Rome. The Concluſion was, That they ſhould ſue for a longer time of reſpite from war: whereby at more leiſure they might attend ſome better diſpoſition of the Senate; or any helpful commodity which time ſhould afford. So they obtained halfe a years truce: after which, the winter was like to afford them another half years leiſure of breathing. Hereof were they not more glad, than was P. Scipio: who thought all time loſt, which with-held the War from paſſing over into Aſia.

The buſineſs of Ætolia being thus laid aſide, and the old Conſul Glabrio ſent home into Italy, the Scipio's marched into Theſſaly; intending thence to take their way by Land, through Macedon and Thrace unto the Helleſpont. Yet they conſidered, that hereby they muſt commit themſelves unto the loyalty of King Philip: who might either do them ſome miſchief by the way, if he were diſpoſed to watch a notable advantage: or at the leaſt, would he be unfaithful; though he were not ſo couragious, yet might he take ſuch order with the Thracians, that even for want of victuals, if by no greater inconvenience, they ſhould be diſgracefully forced to return. He had promiſed them the utmoſt of his furtherance: wherein, whether he meant ſincerely, they thought to make ſome tryal; by cauſing a Gentleman to ride Poſt unto him, and obſerve his doings as he ſhould take him on the ſudden. The King was merry at a feaſt, and drinking when the Meſſenger came: whom he lovingly bade welcome; and ſhewed him the next day, not only what proviſion of victuals he had made for the Army, but how he had made bridges over the Rivers, and mended the bad wayes by which they were to paſs. With theſe good news Gracchus returned back in haſte unto the Scipio's: who entring into Macedon, found all things in a readineſs, that might help to advance their journey. The King entertained them royally, and brought them on their way, even to the Helleſpont: where they ſtayed a good while, until their Navy was in readineſs to tranſport them into Aſia.

Much was done at Sea in the beginning of this year; though, for the moſt part, little of importance. Polyxenidas, the Admiral of Antiochus, was a baniſhed Rhodian: true to the King, and deſirous of revenge upon his Country-

Country men, that had expelled him. He, hearing that the Rhodian Fleet was at Samos, the Romans and Eumenes having not as yet put to Sea, thought to do ſomewhat upon thoſe that were ſo early in their diligence, before their fellows ſhould arrive to help them. Yet went he craftily to work, and ſent word, as in great ſecrecy, to the Rhodian Admiral, That if the ſentence of his baniſhment might be repealed, He would, in requital thereof, betray all the Kings Fleet. After many paſſages to and fro, this was believed: and the Rhodian Admiral grew ſo careleſs, expecting ſtill when he ſhould receive a watch-word from Polixenidas that he himſelf was taken by Polixenidas in his own Haven. The Kings Fleet ſetting forth from Epheſus by night; and for fear of being diſcovered, reſting one day in harbour by the way, came the ſecond night to Samos: where, by morning it was ready to enter the Haven. Pauſiſtratus the Rhodian Admiral ſeeing this, thought it his beſt way of reſiſtance to beſtow his men on the two headlands or points of the Haven; ſo to guard the mouth of it: for that he ſaw no likelihood of defending himſelf by Sea. But Polyxenidas had already landed ſome Companies in another part of the Iſland: which falling upon the back of Pauſiſtratus, compelled him to alter his directions, and command his men aboord. This could not be without great confuſion: ſo as the enemies took him out of all order, and ſunk or boorded all his Navy, five excepted, that by a ſudden device made ſhift to eſcape. Each of them hung out a burning Creſcent upon two poles, at the Beak-head; and then rowed forwards directly upon the enemy: who having not bethought himſelf what ſhift to make againſt ſuch unexpected danger of firing, was content to give way unto theſe deſperate Gallies; for fear leſt they ſhould burn, together with themſelves, a part of the Kings Fleet.

Not long after this, the Romans had ſome loſs by tempeſt: whereof Polyxenidas could not take ſuch advantage as he had hoped; becauſe, putting to Sea for that purpoſe, he was driven back again by the like foul weather. But the Rhodians, to ſhew that they were not diſcouraged, ſet forth twenty other Gallies: the Romans alſo with King Eumenes, repaired their fleet; and all of them together, in great bravery preſented battel to Polyxenidas before the Haven of Epheſus. When he durſt not accept it: they went from place to place, attempting many things, as either they were entreated by the Rhodians, or perſwaded by ſome appearing hopes of doing good. Yet performed they little or nothing: for that one while they were hindred by ſtorms at Sea; and another while by ſtrong reſiſtance made againſt them at Land.

Eumenes with his Fleet was compelled to forſake them; and return home to the defence of his own Kingdom. For Antiochus waſted all the grounds about Elæa and Pergamus: and leaving his Son Seleucus to beſiege the royal City of Pergamus, did with the reſt of his Army ſpoil the whole Country thereabout. Attalus the brother of King Eumenes, was then in Pergamus; having with him no better men to defend the City, than were they that lay againſt it. Wherefore he had reaſon to ſtand in fear; being too much inferior in number. There came to his aid a thouſand foot, and an hundred horſe of the Achæans: old ſouldiers all, and trained up under Philopœmen, whoſe Scholar, in the art of war, Diophanes their commander was. This Diophanes beholding from the walls of Pergamus, which was an high Town, the demeanour of the enemy; began to diſdain that ſuch men as they ſhould hold them beſieged. For Seleucus his Army which was encamped at the hill-foot, ſeeing that none durſt ſally forth upon them, grew ſo careleſs: as otherwiſe than by ſpoiling all behind their backs, they ſeemed to forget that they were in an enemies Country. Diophanes therefore ſpake with Attalus: and told him that he would go forth to viſit them. Attalus had no liking to this adventure; for he ſaid, that the match was nothing equal. But the Achæan would needs have his will: & iſſuing forth, encamped not far from the enemy. They of Pergamus thought him little better than mad. As for the beſiegers; they wondred at firſt what his meaning was: but when they ſaw that he held himſelf quiet, they made a jeſt of his boldneſs; and laughed to ſee with what an handfull of men he looked ſo ſtoutly. So they returned unto their former negligence and diſorders. Which Diophanes perceiving, He commanded all his men to follow him, even as faſt as they well might: and he himſelf, with the hundred horſe, brake out on the ſudden upon the ſtation that was next at hand. Very few of the enemies had their horſes ready ſadled, but more few, or none had the hearts to make reſiſtance: ſo as he drave them all out of their Camp; & chaſed them as far as he might ſafely adventure with great ſlaughter of them, and no loſs to his own. Hereat all the Citizens of Pergamus (who had covered the walls of the Town, men and women, to behold this ſpectacle) were very joyfull; and highly magnified the vertue of theſe Achæans. Yet would they not therefore issue forth of their gates, to help the Achæans in doing what remained to be done. The next day Seleucus encamped half a mile further from the Town, than he had done before: and against him went forth Diophanes the second time; who quietly rested a while in his old Station. When they had stayed many hours, looking who should begin: Seleucus in fair order as he came, withdrew himself toward his lodging that was further off. Diophanes moved not whilest the enemy was in sight: but as soon as the ground between them hindred the prospect, he followed them in all haste, and soon overtaking them with his Horse, charged them in the Rere; so as he brake them, and with all his forces pursued them at the heels, to their very Trenches. This boldness of the Achæans, and the baseness of his own men, caused Seleucus to quit the siege, little to his honour. Such being the quality of these Asiatiques, Philopœmen had cause to tell the Romans, That he envied their victory. For when Antiochus lay feasting at Chalcis after his marriage, and his souldiers betook themselves to Riot, as it had been in a time of great security: a good man of war might have cut all their throats, even as they were tipling in their victualling houses; which Philopœmen said that he would have done, had he been General of the Achæans, and not as he then was, a private man.

Antiochus was full of business: and turning his care from one thing to another, with a great deal of travel, brought almost nothing to pass. He had been at Pergamus: into which Eumenes, leaving the Romans, did put himself with a few of his Horse and light armature. Before Pergamus he left his son, as before hath been shewed, and went to Elæa: whither he heard that Æmylius the Roman Admiral was come to bring succour to Eumenes. There he made an Overture of peace: about which to consult, Eumenes was sent for by Æmylius, and came from Pergamus. But when it was considered, that no conclusion could be made without the Consul: this Treaty brake off. Then followed the overthrow newly mentioned, which caused Seleucus to give over the siege of Pergamus. Afterwards, four or five Towns of scarce any worth or note were taken by the King: and the Syrian Fleet, being of seven and thirty Sail, was beaten by the Rhodian which was of like number. But of this victory the Rhodians had no great cause to rejoyce: for that Hannibal the Carthaginian, who, together with Apollonius a Courtier of Antiochus, was Admiral of the Syrians, did them in a maner as great hurt as they could do to Apollonius; and having the victory taken out of his hands by Apollonius his flight, yet made such a retreat, that the Rhodians durst not far adventure upon him. Now of these Actions which were but as Prefaces unto the war, the last and greatest was a victory of the Romans by Sea, against Polixenidas the Kings Admiral. The battel was fought by Myonnesus a Promontory in Asia: where Polixenidas had with him fourscore and nine Gallies; and five of them greater than any of the Romans. This being all the strength which he could make by Sea: we may note the vanity of those brags, wherewith Antiochus vaunted the last year, That his Armada should cover all the shores of Greece. The Romans had eight and fifty Gallies; the Rhodians two and twenty: the Roman being the stronger built, and more stoutly manned; the Rhodians more light-timbred and thin planckt, having all advantage of speed, and good Sea-men. Neither forgot they to help themselves by the same device, with which five of their Gallies had lately escaped from Samos. For with fire in their Prows they ran upon the enemy: who declining them for fear, laid open his side: and was thereby in greater danger of being stemmed. After no long fight, the Kings Navy hoysted sail: and, having a fair wind, bore away toward Ephesus as fast as they could. Yet forty of their Gallies they left behind them: whereof thirteen were taken, all the rest burnt or sunk. The Romans and their fellows lost only two or three ships: but got hereby the absolute Mastery of the Sea.

The report of this misadventure, may seem to have taken from Antiochus all use of reason. For as if no hope had been remaining to defend those places that he held in Europe, he presently with-drew his Garrisons from Lysimachia: which might easily have been kept even till the end of Winter following, & having reduced the besiegers (if the siege had been continued obstinately) unto terms of great extremity, He also gave over the siege of Colophon: and laying aside all thought save only of defence, drew together all his Army; and sent for help to his Father-in-law, King Ariarathes the Cappadocian.

Thus the Roman Consul, without impediment, not only came to the Hellespont, but had yieled unto him all places there, belonging to Anticohus on Europe side. The Fleet was also then in a readiness to transport him over into Asia: where Eumenes had taken such care before, that he landed quietly at his own good ease; even as if the Country had had been his already. The firſt news that he heard of the Enemy, was by an Embaſſador that came to ſue for peace. This Embaſſador declared in his Maſters name, That the ſame things which had hindered him from obtaining peace of the Romans heretofore, did now perſwade him, that he ſhould eaſily come to good agreement with them. For in all diſputations heretofore, Smyrna, Lampſacus, and Lyſimachia, had been the places about which they varied. Seeing therefore the King had now already given over Lyſimachia, and was further purpoſed not to ſtrive with the Romans about Lampſacus and Smyrna: what reaſon was there, why they ſhould need to trouble him with War? If it was their deſire that any other Towns upon the Coaſt of Aſia, not mentioned by them in any former Treaties, ſhould be alſo ſet at liberty, or otherwiſe delivered into their hands: the King would not refuſe to gratifie them therein. Briefly, let them take ſome part of Aſia, ſo as the bounds dividing them from the King, might not be uncertain, and it ſhould be quietly put into their hands. If all this were not enough, the King would likewiſe bear half the Charges whereat they had been in this War. So praying the Romans to hold themſelves contented with theſe good offers, and not to be too inſolent upon confidence of their fortune, he expected their anſwer. Theſe offers which to the Embaſſador ſeemed ſo great, were judged by the Romans to be very little. For they thought it reaſonable, that the King ſhould bear all the Charges of the War, ſince it began through his own fault: and that He ſhould not only depart out of thoſe few Towns which he held in Æolis and Ionia; but quite out of Aſia the leſs, and keep himſelf on the other ſide of Mount Taurus. When the Embaſſador therefore ſaw that no better bargain could be made, He dealt with P. Scipio in private: and to him he promiſed a great quantity of Gold, together with the free reſtitution of his Son, who (it is uncertain by what miſchance) was taken priſoner, and moſt honourably entertained by the King. Scipio would not hearken to the offer of Gold: nor otherwiſe to the Reſtitution of his Son, than upon condition, That it might be with making ſuch amends for the benefit, as became a private man. As for the publick buſineſs: He only ſaid thus much, That ſince Antiochus had already forſaken Lyſimachia, and ſuffered the War to take hold on his own Kingdom; there was now none other way for him, than either to fight, or yield to that which was required at his hands. Wherefore, ſaid he, tell your King in my name, That I would adviſe him to refuſe no Condition whereby he may have Peace.

The King was not any whit moved with his advice. For ſeeing that the Conſul demanded of him no leſs than if he had been already ſubdued: little reaſon there was, that he ſhould fear to come to battel; wherein he could loſe, as he thought, no more, than by ſeeking to avoid it he muſt give away. He had with him threeſcore and ten thouſand Foot, and twelve thouſand Horſe; beſides two and fifty Indian Elephants; and many Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, according to the manner of the Eaſtern Countrys. Yet was he nothing pleaſed to hear that the Conſul drew near him apace, as one haſtening to fight. But howſoever he was affected: He made ſo little ſhew of fear, that hearing P. Scipio to lie ſick at Elæa, He ſent thither unto him his Son without ranſome: as one both deſirous to comfort this noble Warriour in his ſickneſs, and withall not deſirous to retain the young Gentleman for a pledge of his own ſafety. Thus ought his bounty to be conſtant. Otherwiſe it might be ſuſpected that herein he dealt craftily. For ſince he could have none other ranſome of Scipio, than ſuch as an honourable man, that had no great ſtore of wealth, might pay: better it was to do ſuch a courteſie before the battel, as would afterwards have been little worth; than to ſtay until the Romans, perhaps victorious, ſhould exact it at his hands. P. Scipio was greatly comforted with the Recovery of his Son; ſo as the joy thereof was thought to have been much available unto his health. In recompence of the Kings humanity, He ſaid only thus much unto thoſe that brought him this acceptable Preſent, I am now able to make your King none other amends, than by adviſing him not to fight until he ſhall hear that I am in the Camp. What he meant by this, it is hard to conjecture. Antiochus reſolved to follow his Counſel: and therefore withdrew himſelf from about Thyatira, beyond the River of Phrygius or Hyllus, unto Magneſia by Sypilus: where encamping, he fortified himſelf as ſtrongly as he could. Thither followed him L. Scipio the Conſul, and ſat down within four miles of him. About a thouſand of the Kings Horſe, moſt of them Gallo-Greeks, came to bid the Romans welcome: of whom at firſt they ſlew ſome; and were anon, with ſome loſs, driven back over the River: Two dayes were quietly ſpent, whileſt neither the King nor the Romans would paſs the water. The third day the Romans made the adventure: wherein they found no disturbance; nor were at all opposed, until they came within two miles and an half of Antiochus his Camp. There as they were taking up their lodging, they were charged by three thousand Horse and Foot: whom the ordinary Corps de guarde repelled. Four dayes together after this, each of them brought forth their Armies; and set them in order before the Trenches, without advancing any further. The fifth day the Romans came half way forward, and presented battel; which the King would not accept. Thereupon the Consul took advice what was to be done. For either they must fight upon whatsoever disadvantage, or else resolve to abide by it all Winter, far from any Country of their friends, and therefore subject unto many difficulties: unless they would stain their honour by returning far back, to Winter in a more convenient place; and so defer the War until the next Spring. The Roman Souldier was throughly perswaded of that Enemies base temper. Wherefore it was the general Cry, That this great Army should be assailed, even in the Camp where it lay: as if rather there were so many Beasts to be slaughtered, than men to be fought with. Yet a day or two passed, in discovering the Fortifications of Antiochus, and the safest way to set upon him. All this while P. Scipio came not. Wherefore the King, being loth to dishearten his men, by seeming to stand in fear of the Enemy, resolved to put the matter to trial. So when the Romans took the field again, and ordered their Battels: He also did the like; and advanced so far, that they might understand his meaning to fight.

The Roman Army consisted of four Legions, two Roman and two Latine: in each of which were five thousand and four hundred men. The Latines, as usually, were in the points; the Roman, in the mean battel. All of them, according to their wonted form, were divided into Maniples. The Hastati had the leading: after them followed the Principes, at such distance as was usual; and last of all, the Triarii. Now beside these, there were about three thousand Auxiliaries; partly Achæans, and partly such as belonged to Eumenes: which were placed in an equal Front beyond the Latines in the right wing. Utmost of all (save some five hundred Cretians, and of the Trallians) were almost three thousand Horse: of which, Eumenes had brought thither eight hundred; the rest being Roman. The left wing was fenced by the bank of the River: yet four troops of Horse were placed there, though such help seemed in a manner needless. Two thousand Voluntaries, Macedonians and Thracians, were left to guard the Camp. The Consul had with him sixteen African Elephants, which he bestowed in his Rere: forasmuch as had they come to fight with those of Antiochus, they only would have served to discourage his men; as being sure to be beaten: the Indian being far the greater and more couragious Beasts: whereof Antiochus had likewise much advantage in number.

The Kings Army being compounded of many Nations, diversly appointed, and not all accustomed to one manner of fight, was ordered according to the several kinds, in such wise as each might be of most use. The main strength of his Foot consisted in sixteen thousand, armed all Macedonian-like, and called Phalangiers. These he placed in the midst, and divided into ten Battalions: every one having two and thirty in File, and fifty in Front. Between every Battalion were two Elephants, goodly Beasts, and such as being adorned with Frontals, high Crests, Towers on their Backs, and besides him that governed the Elephant, four men in every Tower, made a gallant and terrible shew. On the right hand of these were fifteen hundred Horse of the Gallo-Greeks: then three thousand Barb'd Horse, and a Regiment of almost a thousand Horse, called the Agema, that were all Medians, the choice of the Country, and accompanied by some others. All which Troops of Horse divided in their several kinds, do seem to have followed one another in depth, rather then to have been stretched out in Front. Adjoyning unto these, were sixteen Elephants together in one flock. A little further to the right hand, was the Kings own Regiment; called the Argyraspides, or Silvershields, by a name borrowed from their furniture, but nothing like so valiant as those of the same name, that had served under Great Alexander: then, twelve hundred Archers on Horse-back, three thousand light-armed Foot, two thousand & five hundred Archers of Mysia; with four thousand Slingers and Archers of the Cirtæans, and Elymæans. On the left hand of the Phalangiers, were placed the like numbers of Gallo-Greeks, and Barb'd Horse: as also two thousand Horse that were sent from Ariarathes, with two thousand and seven hundred of divers Nations: and a Regiment of a thousand Horse more lightly armed, that were called The Kings Troop; being Syrians, Phrygians, and Lydians. In Front of all these Horse were the the Chariots armed with Hooks or Sythes, and the Dromedaries, whereon ſate Arabians with long Rapiers, that would ſerve to reach from thoſe high Camels. Beyond theſe were, as in the right wing, a rabble of many Nations, Carians, Cicilians, Pamphilians, Piſidians, Cyrtæans, Elymæans, and many others, having alſo with them ſixteen Elephants. Antiochus himſelf commanded in the right wing: Seleucus in the left: and three of his principal Captains commanded over the Phalangiers.

The firſt onſet was given by the Dromedaries and armed Chariots: of which the one, being like to terrifie the Horſe; the other, to break the Squadrons of the Foot; Eumenes with a few light-armed Cretians, Archers, Darters, and Slingers, eaſily made fruſtrate the danger threatned by them both. For with ſhoutings, and noiſes, and ſome wounds, they were driven out of the field; and running back upon their own men, did the ſame harm which they had intended to the Enemies. Wherefore the Roman Horſe following this advantage, charged upon the left Wing: Whereas they found no reſiſtance; ſome being out of order; others being without courage. It is ſhameful to rehearſe, and ſo ſtrange, that it may hardly ſeem credible: that the Phalangiers, with ſuch variety of Auxiliaris, made little or no reſiſtance; but all of them fled, in a manner as ſoon as they were charged. Only the King, Antiochus himſelf, being in the left wing of his own Battel: and ſeeing the Latines, that ſtood oppoſite unto him, weakly flanked with Horſe, gave upon them couragiouſly, and forced them to retire. But M. Æmilius, that had the Guard of the Roman Camp, iſſued forth with all his power to help his fellows: and what by perſwaſion, what by threats, made them renew the fight. Succour alſo came from the right Wing, where the Romans were already victorious: whereof when Antiochus diſcovered the approach; He not only turned his Horſe about, but ran away upon the ſpur without further tarriance. The Camp was defended a little while: and with no great valour; though by a great multitude that were fled into it. Antiochus is ſaid to have loſt in this Battel fifty thouſand Foot, and four thouſand Horſe; beſides thoſe that were taken. Of the Romans there were not ſlain above three hundred Foot, and four and twenty Horſe: of Eumenes his followers five and twenty.

Antiochus fled to Sardes, and from thence to Apamea, the ſame night; hearing that Seleucus was gone thither before. He left the cuſtody of Sardes, and the Caſtle there, to one whom he thought faithful. But the Towns-men and Souldiers were ſo diſmayed with the greatneſs of the Overthrow; that one mans faith was worth nothing. All the Towns in thoſe parts, without expecting ſummons yield ed up themſelves by Embaſſadours: whom they ſent to the Romans, whileſt they were on the way. Neither were many days ſpent, ere Antiochus his Embaſſadour was in the Camp: having none other Errand, than to know what it would pleaſe the Romans to impoſe upon the King his Maſter. P. Scipio was now come to his Brother, who obtained leave to make the anſwer, becauſe it ſhould be gentle. They required red no more than they had lately done: which was, That he ſhould quite abandon his Dominions on this ſide Taurus. For their Charges in that War, they required fifteen thouſand Talents: five hundred in hand; two thouſand and five hundred, when the Senate and People of Rome ſhould have confirmed the peace; and the other twelve thouſand in twelve years next enſuing, by even portions. Likewiſe they demanded four hundred Talents for Eumenes; and ſome ſtore of Corn that was due to him upon a reckoning. Now beſides twenty Hoſtages which they required, very earneſt they were to have Hannibal the Carthaginian, and Thoas the Ætolian, with ſome others, who had ſtirred up the King to this War, delivered into their hands. But any wiſe man might ſo eaſily have perceived that it would be their purpoſe to make this one of their principal demands; as no great Art was needful to beguile their malice. The Kings Embaſſador had full Commiſſion to refuſe nothing that ſhould be enjoyned. Wherefore there was no more to do, than to ſend immediately to Rome for the Ratification of the Peace.

There were new Conſuls choſen in the mean while at Rome, M. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius Volſo. The Ætolians defired peace, but could not obtain it: becauſe they would accept neither of the two Conditions to them before propounded. So it was decreed, That one of the Conſuls ſhould make War upon the Ætolians; the other, upon Antiochus in Aſia. Now, though ſhortly there came news that Antiochus was already vanquiſhed in Battel, and had ſubmitted himſelf unto all that could be required at his hands: yet ſince the State of Aſia was not like to be ſo throughly ſettled by one Victory, but that many things might fall out worthy of the Romans care, Cn. Manlius, to whom Aſia fell by lot, had not his Province changed.

Soon

Soon after this, came the Embaſſadors of King Antiochus to Rome, accompanied with the Rhodians and ſome others; yea, by King Eumenes in perſon; whoſe preſence added a goodly luſtre to the buſineſs in hand. Concerning the peace to be made with King Antiochus, there was no diſputation: it was generally approved. All the trouble was about the diſtribution of the purchaſe. King Eumenes reckoned up his own deſerts, and comparing himſelf with Maſaniſſa, hoped that the Romans would be more bountiful to him, than they had been to the Numidian, ſince they had found him a King indeed, whereas Maſaniſſa was only ſuch in title; and ſince, both he and his Father had alwayes been their friends, even in the worſt of the Roman fortune. Yet was there much ado to make him tell what he would have: He ſtill referring himſelf to their courteſie; and they deſiring him to ſpeak plain. At length he craved that they would beſtow upon him, as much of the Country by them taken from Antiochus, as they had no purpoſe to keep in their own hands. Neither thought he it needful, that they ſhould trouble themſelves with the care of giving Liberty to many of the Greek Towns that were on Aſia ſide. For ſince the moſt of thoſe Towns had been partakers with the King in his War; it was no reaſon that they ſhould be Gainers by his overthrow. The Rhodians did not like of this. They deſired the Senate to be truly Patrons of the Gracian Liberty; and to call to mind, that no ſmall part of Greece it ſelf had been ſubject unto Philip, and ſerved him in his War: which was not alledged againſt them as a cauſe why they ſhould not be made free, after that Philip was overcome. But the main point whereon they inſiſted, was this, That the Victory of the Romans againſt King Antiochus, was ſo great, as eaſily might ſatisfie the deſires of all their friends. The Senate was glad to hear of this; and very bountifully gave away ſo much, that every one had cauſe to be well-pleaſed.

Such end had the War againſt King Antiochus: after which, L. Cornelius Scipio, returning home, had granted unto him the honour of a Triumph: the Pomp whereof exceeded in Riches, not only that of Titus Quintus Flamminius, but of any ten that Rome had beheld until that day. Now foraſmuch as the ſurname of The African had been given unto P. Scipio, it was thought convenient by ſome to reward L. Scipio with the title of The Aſiatique: which the fortune of his Victory had no leſs deſerved; though the Vertue requiſit to the purchaſe thereof, was no way correſpondent.

The Ætolians, and the Gallo-Greeks, vanquiſhed by the Roman Conſuls, Fulvius and Manlius. Manlius hardly obtains a Triumph: being charged (among other objections) with attempting to have paſſed the bounds appointed as fatal to the Romans by Sibyl. Of Sibyls Prophecies; the Books of Hermes; and that Inſcription, Simoni Deo Sancto. The ingratitude of Rome to the two Scipio's: and that beginning and faction among the Roman Nobility.

Marc. Fulvius, and Cn. Manlius had the ſame charge divided between them, which L. Cornelius Scipio, now ſtiled Aſiaticus, had lately undergone. It was found more than one mans work, to look at once to Greice and to Aſia. And for this reaſon was it apparent, that L. Scipio had granted ſo long a Truce to the Ætolians. But ſince, in this long Interim of Truce, that haughty little Nation had not ſought to humble it ſelf to the Roman Majeſty, it was now to be brought unto more lowly terms than any other of the Greeks. The beſt was, that ſo great a ſtorm fell not unexpected upon the Ætolians. They had foreſeen the danger, when their Embaſſadors were utterly denied peace at Rome: and they had provided the laſt Remedy; which was to entreat the Rhodians and Athenians to become Interceſſors for them. Nether were they ſo dejected with any terrible apprehenſions, that they could not well deviſe, even upon helping themſelves by repurchaſe of Countries loſt, where they ſpied advantage.

Poor King Aminander lived in exile among them, whilſt Philip of Macedon kept, for him, poſſeſſion of his Lands and Caſtles. But the Athamanians (beſides that many of them bore a natural affection to their own Prince) having been long accuſtomed to ſerve a Mountain Lord, that converſed with them after an homely manner; could not endure the proud and inſolent manner of command, uſed by the Captains of Philip his Garriſons. They ſent therefore ſome few of them to their King, and offered their ſervice towards his reſtitution. At the firſt there were only four of them; neither grew they, at length, to more than two and fifty, which undertook the work. Yet aſſurance that all the reſt would follow, made Aminander willing to try his fortune. He was at the borders with a thouſand Ætolians, upon the day appointed: at what time his two and fifty Adventurers, having divided themſelves into four parts, occupied, by the ready dy aſſiſtance of the multitude, four of the chief Towns in the Country, to his uſe. The fame of this godd ſucceſs at the firſt; with divers Letters running from place to place, whereby men were exhorted to do their beſt in helping forward the Action, made the Lieutenants of Philip unable to think upon reſiſtance. One of them held the Town of Theium a few daies; giving thereby ſome leiſure unto his King to provide for the reſcue. But when he had done his beſt, he was forced thence, and could only tell Philip, whom he met on the way, that all was loſt. Philip had brought from home ſix thouſand men; of whom, when the greater part could not hold out, in ſuch a running march, he left all ſave two thouſand behind him, and ſo came to Athenæum, a little Athamanian Caſtle, that ſtill was his, as being on the frontier of Macedon. Thence he ſent Zeno, who had kept Theium a while, to take a place lying over Argithea, that was chief of the Country. Zeno did as he was appointed: yet neither he, nor the King had the boldneſs to deſcend upon Argithea; for that they might perceive the Athamanians, all along the hill ſides, ready to come down upon them, when they ſhould be buſie. Wherefore nothing was thought more honourable than a ſafe retrait: eſpecially when Aminander came in ſight with his thouſand Ætolians. The Macedonians were called back fromwards Argithea, and preſently withdrawn by their King towards his own borders. But they were not ſuffered to depart in quiet at their pleaſure. The Athamanians and Ætolians way-laid them, and purſued them ſo cloſely, that their retrait was in manner of a plain flight, with great loſs of men and arms, few of thoſe eſcaping, that were left behind, as to make a countenance of holding ſomewhat in the Country, until Philip his return.

The Ætolians having found the buſineſs of Athamania ſo eaſie, made an attempt in their own behalf, upon the Amphilochians and Aperantians. Theſe had belonged unto their Nation, and were lately taken by Philip; from whom they diligently revolted, and became Ætolians again. The Dolopians lay next; that had been ever belonging to the Macedonian, and ſo did ſtill purpoſe to continue. Theſe took Arms at firſt: but ſoon laid them away; ſeeing their neighbours ready to fight with them in the Ætolian quarrel, and ſeeing their own King ſo haſtily gone, as if he meant not to return.

Of theſe Victories the joy was the leſs; for that news came of Antiochus his laſt overthrow, and of M. Fulvius the new Conſul his haſting with an Army into Greece. Aminander ſent his excuſes to Rome, praying the Senate not to take it in deſpight, that he had recovered his own from Philip with ſuch help as he could get. Neither ſeems it that the Romans were much offended to hear of Philip his loſſes: for of this fault they neither were ſharp correctors, nor earneſt reprovers. Fulvius went in hand with the buſineſs about which he came, and layed ſiege to Ambracia, a goodly City, that had been the chief ſeat of Pyrrhus his Kingdom. With this he began, for that it was of too great importance to be abandoned by the Ætolians: yet could not by them be relieved, unleſs they would adventure to fight upon equal ground. To help the Ambracians, it was not in the Ætolians power: for they were, at the ſame time, vexed by the Illyrians at Sea, and ready to be driven from their new Conqueſt, by Perſeus the Son of Philip, who invaded the Countries of the Amphilochians and Dolopians. They were unable to deal with ſo many at once; and therefore as earneſtly ſought peace with the Romans, as they ſtoutly made head againſt the reſt. In the mean while the Athenian and Rhodian Embaſſadors came, who beſought the Conſul to grant them peace. It helped well that Ambracia made ſtrong reſiſtance, and would not be terrified by any violence of the Aſſailants, or danger that might ſeem to threaten. The Conſul had no deſire to ſpend half his time about one City, and ſo be diven to leave unto his ſucceſſor the honour of finiſhing the War. Wherefore he gladly hearkened unto the Ætolians, and bade them ſeek peace with faithful intent, without thinking it over-dear, at a reaſonable price; coſidering with how great a part of his Kingdome their friend Antiochus had made the ſame purchaſe. He alſo gave leave to Aminander, offering his ſervice as a Mediatour, to put himſelf into Ambracia, and try what good his perſwaſions might do with the Citizens. So after many demands and excuſes, the concluſion was ſuch as was grievous to the weaker, but not unſufferable. The ſame Embaſſadours of the Athenians and Rhodians, accompanied thoſe of the Ætolians to Rome, for procuring the confirmation of Peace. Their eloquence and credit was the more needful in this interceſſion, for that Philip had made a very grieveous complaint about the loſs of thoſe Countries, which they had lately taken from him. Hereof the Senate could not but take notice; though it did not hinder the peace, which thoſe good Mediatours of Rhodes and Athens did earneſtly ſolicite. The Ætolians were bound to uphold the Majesty of the people of Rome, and to observe divers Articles, which made them the less free, and more obnoxious to the Romans, than any people of Greece; they having been the first that called these their Masters into the Country. The Isle of Cephalenia was taken from them by the Romans: who kept it for themselves (as not long since they had gotten Zacynthus from the Achæans, by stiffly pressing their own right) that so they might have possession along the Coast of Greece, whilest they seemed to forbear the Country. But concerning those places, whereto Philip, or others may lay claim, there was set down an order so perplexed, as would necessarily require to have the Romans Judges of their Controversies, when they should arise. And hereof good use will be shortly made: when want of employment elsewhere, shall cause a more Lordly Inquisition to be held, upon the affairs of Macedon and Greece.

Cn. Manlius, the other Consul, had at the same time War in Asia, with the Gallo-Greeks and others. His Army was the same that had followed L. Scipio; of whose victory, his acts were the consummation. He visited those Countries on the hither side of Taurus, that had scarce heard of the Romans; to whom they were abandoned by Antiochus. Among these there were some petty Lords or Tyrants, some free Cities, and some that were together at wars, without regard of the great alteration that happened in Asia. From every of these he got somewhat; and by their quarrels found occasion to visit those Provinces, into which he should else have wanted an errand. He was even loaden with booty, when, having fetcht a compass about Asia, he came at length upon the Gallo-Greeks. These had long domineered over the Country: though of late times, it was rather the fame and terrour of their fore-posted acts, than any present vertue of theirs, which held them up in reputation. Of the Romans they had lately such trial, when they served under King Antiochus, as made them to acknowledge themselves far the worse men. Wherefore they thought it no small part of their safety, that they dwelt upon the River Halys, in an In-land Country, where those enemies were not very like to search them out. But when such hopes failed; and when some Princes of their own Nation, that had been friends of Eumenes, exhorted the rest to yield: then was no counsel thought so good, as to forsake their houses and Country, and with all that they could carry or drive, to betake themselves unto the high Mountains of Olympus and Margana. These Mountains were exceeding hard of ascent, though none should undertake the custody. Being therefore well manned and victualled for a long time; as also the natural strength being helpt by such fortification as promised greatest assurance: it was thought, that the Consul would either forbear the attempt of forcing them, or easily be repelled; and that finally, when he had stayed there a while, winter, and much want, should force him to dislodge. Yet all this availed not. For whereas the Gallo-Greeks had been careless of furnishing themselves with casting weapons, as if stones would have served well enough for that purpose: the Romans, who came far otherwise appointed, found greater advantage in the difference of arms, than impediment in the disadvantage of ground. Archers and Slingers did easily prevail against casters of stones; especially being such as were these Gallo-Greeks, neither exercised in that manner of fight, nor having prepared their stones before-hand, but catching up what lay next, the too great, and the too little, oftner than those of a fit size. Finally the Barbarians, wanting defensive Arms, could not hold out against the Arrows and weapons of the Roman light armature: but were driven from a piece of ground, which they had undertaken to make good, up into their Camp on the top of the Mountain; and being forced out of their Camp, had none other way left, than to cast themselves headlong down the steep Rocks. Few of the men escaped alive: all their Wives, Children, and goods, became a prey unto the Romans. In the very like manner were the rest of that Nation overcome soon after, at the other Mountain: only more of them saved themselves by flight, as having fairer way at their backs.

These wars being ended: Fulvius and Manlius were apointed by the Senate, each of them to retain as Proconsul, his Province for another year. Fulvius, in his second year, did little or nothing. Manlius gave peace to those whom he had vanquished; as likewise to Ariarathes the Cappadocian, and some others, not by him vanquished, but submitting themselves for fear of the Roman Arms. He drew from them all, what profit he could: and laid upon them such conditions, as he thought expedient. He also did finish the League of peace with Antiochus; whereto he swore, and received the Kings oath by Embassadours, whom he sent for that purpose. Finally, having set in order the matters of Asia, he took his way toward the Hellespont, loaden with spoil, as carrying with him (besides other treasures) all that the Gallo-Greeks had in so many years extorted from the wealthy Provinces that lay round about them. Neither did this Army of Manlius return home rich in money alone, or cattel, or things of needful use, which the Roman Souldier had been wont to take as the only good purchase; but furnished with sumptuous Houshold-stuff, and slaves of price, excellent Cooks, and Musicians, for banquets; and in a word, with the seeds of that Luxury which finally over-grew and choaked the Roman vertue.

The Country of Thrace lay between Hellespont and the Kingdom of Macedon, which way Manlius was to take his journey homeward. L. Scipio had found no impediment among the Thracians: either for that he passed through them, without any such booty as might provoke them; or perhaps rather, because Philip of Macedon had taken order, that the Barbarians should not stir. But when
An. 189. Manlius came along with a huge train of baggage, the Thracians could not so well contain themselves. Neither was it thought, that Philip took it otherwise than very pleasantly, to have this Roman Army robbed, and well beaten on the way. He had cause to be angry, seeing how little himself was regarded, and what great rewards were given to Eumenes. For he understood, and afterwards gave the Romans to understand, that Eumenes could not have abidden in his own Kingdome, if the people of Rome had not made war in Asia: whereas contrariwise, Antiochus had offered unto himself three thousand Talents, and fifty Ships of War, to take part with him and the Ætolians; promising moreover to restore unto him all the Greek Cities, that had been taken from him by the Romans. Such being the difference between him and Eumenes, when the War began: He thought it no even dealing of the Romans, after their victory, to give away not only the half of Asia, but Chersonesus, and Lysimachia in Europe, to Eumenes; whereas upon himself they bestowed not any one Town. It agreed not indeed with his Nobility to go to Rome, and beg Provinces in the Senate, as Eumenes and the Rhodians had lately done. He had entertained lovingly the two Scipio's, whom he thought the most honourable men in Rome; and was grown into near acquaintance with Publius, holding correspondence with him by Letters, whereby he made himself acquainted with the Wars in Spain and Africk. This perhaps he deemed sufficient, to breed in the Romans a due respect of him. But Eumenes took a surer way. For the Scipio's had not the disposing of that which they won from Antiochus: as neither indeed had Manlius, nor the ten Delegates assisting him; but the Senate of Rome, by which those Delegates were chosen, and instructed how to proceed. When Philip therefore saw these upstart Kings of Pergamus, whom he accounted as base companions, advanced so highly, and made greater than himself: yea, himself unregarded, contemned, and exposed to many wrongs: then found he great cause to wish, that he had not so hastily declared himself against Antiochus, or rather that he had joyned with Antiochus and the Ætolians, by whom he might have been freed from his insolent Masters. But what great argument of such discontentedness, the Macedonian had, we shall very shortly be urged to discourse more at large. At the present it was believed, that the Thracians were by him set on to assail the Romans passing through their Country. They knew all advantages, and they fell, unexpected, upon the carriages that were bestowed in the midst of the Army; whereof part had already passed a dangerous wood through which the baggage followed; part was not yet so far advanced. There was enough to get, and enough to leave behind: though both the getting and the saving, did cost many lives, as well of the Barbarians, as of the Romans. They fought until it grew night: and then the Thracians withdrew themselves; not without as much of the booty as was to their full content. And of such trouble there was more, though less dangerous, before the Army could get out of Thrace into Macedon. Through the Kingdom they had a fair march into Epirus; and so to Apollonia, which was their handle of Greece.

To Manlius, and to Fulvius, when each of them returned to the City, was granted the honour of Triumph. Yet not without contradiction: especially to Manlius, whom some of the ten Delegates appointed to assist him, did very bitterly tax as an unworthy Commander. Touching the rest of their accusation, it sufficeth that he made good answer, and was approved by the chief of the Senate. One Clause is worthy of more particular consideration. Reprehending his desire to have hindered the peace with Antiochus; They said, That with much ado he was kept from leading his Army over Taurus, and adventuring upon the Calamity threatned by Sibyl's Verses, unto those that should pass the Fatal Bounds. What calamity or overthrow this was, wherewith Sibyls Prophecy threatned the Roman Captain or Army, that should pass over Taurus, I do not conceive. Pompey was the first that marched with an Army beyond those limits: though the Victories of Lucullus had opened unto him the way, and had before-hand won, in a sort, the Countries on the other side of the Mount; which Lucullus gave to one of Antiochus his Race, though Pompey occupied them for the Romans. But we find not, that either Lucullus or Pompey suffered any loss, in presuming to neglect the bounds appointed by Sibyl. Indeed the accomplishment of this Prophecy, fell out near about one time, with the restitution of Ptolomy King of Egypt, that was forbidden unto the Romans by the same Sybil. It may therefore seem to have had reference unto the same things that were denounced as like to happen upon the reduction of the Egyptian King. Whether the Oracles of Sibyl had in them any truth, and were not, as Tully noteth, sowed at randome in the large field of Time, there to take root, and get credit by event; I will not here dispute. But I hold this more probable, than that the restitution of Ptolomy to his Kingdom by Gabinius the Roman, should have any way betokened the coming of our Saviour: as some both ancient and modern Christian Writers have been well pleased to interpret Sibyl in that Prophecy. Of the Sibylline Predictions, I have sometimes thought reverently: though not knowing what they were (as I think few men know) yet following the common belief and good authority. But observation of the shameful Idolatry, that upon all occasions was advanced in Rome by the Books of Sibyl, had well prevailed upon my credulity, and made me suspect, though not the faith and pious meaning, yet the judgement of Eusebius: when that learned and excellent work of Master Casaubon upon the Annals of Cardinal Baronius, did altogether free me from mine error; making it apparent; That not only those Prophecies of Sibyl, wherein Christ so plainly was shewed, but even the Books of Hermes, which have born such reputation, were no better than counterfeited pieces, and at first entertained (whosoever devised them) by the indiscreet zeal of such as delighted in seeing the Christian Religion strengthened with forreign proofs. And in the same Rank I think, we ought to place that notable History, reported by Eusebius from no mean Authors, Of the honour which was done to Simon Magus in Rome; namely, of an Altar to him erected, with an inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, that is, To Simon the holy God. For what can be more strange, than that a thing so memorable, and so publick, should have been quite omitted by Tacitus, by Suetonius, by Dion, and by all which wrote of those times? Philosophers and Poets would not have suffered the matter to escape in silence, had it been true; neither can it be thought that Seneca, who then lived and flourished, would have abstained from speaking any word of an argument so famous. Wherefore I am perswaded, that this Inscription, Simoni Deo Sancto, was, by some bad Criticisme, taken amiss in place of Semoni Sango: a title four hundred years older than the time of Simon Magus. For the Goods of one Vitruvius a Rebel, had many Ages before been consecrated Semoni Sango, that is, To the Spirit or Demi-god Sangus, in whose Chappel they were bestowed. So as either by the ill shape of the old Roman letters, or by some spoil that time had wrought upon them; it might easily come to pass, that the words should be mis-read, Simoni Sancto, and that some Christian who had heard of Simon Magus, but not of Sangus, thereupon should frame the conjecture, which now passeth for a true History. Such conjectures, being entertained without examination, find credit by Tradition, whereby also, many times, their fashion is amended, and made more Historical, than was conceived by the Author. But it cannot be safe, to let our faith (which ought to stand firm upon a sure foundation) lean over-hardly on a well-painted, yet rotten post.

Now concerning the Triumph of Cn. Manlius, it may be numbered among a few of the richest, which ever the City beheld. Out of that which he brought into the Treasury, was made the last payment of those moneys which the Commonwealth had borrowed from private men in the second Punick War. So long was it, that Rome had still some feeling of Hannibal: which being past, there was remaining neither care, nor memory, of any danger. This Triumph of Manlius was deferred by him, even so long as he well could: for that he thought it not safe, to make his entrance into the City, until the heat of an inquisition, then raging therein, should be allayed. The two Scipio's were called one after another, into judgement, by two Tribunes of the People; men, only by this accusation, known to Posterity. P. Scipio the African, with whom they began, could not endure that such unworthy men should question him, of purloining from the Common Treasury, or of being hired with Bribes by Antiochus, to make an ill bargain for his Country. When therefore his day of answer came; he appeared before the Tribunes, Tribunes, not humbly as one accuſed, but followed by a great Train of his Friends and Clients, with which he paſſed through the midſt of the Aſſembly, and offered himſelf to ſpeak. Having audience, he told the People, That upon the ſame day of the year he had fought a great Battel with Hannibal, and finiſhed the Punick War by a ſignal Victory. In memory whereof, he thought it no fit ſeaſon to brabble at the Law; but intended to viſit the Capitol, and there give thanks to Jupiter, and the reſt of the gods, by whoſe grace, both on that day and at other times, he had well and happily diſcharged the moſt weighty buſineſs of the Common weal. And hereto he invited with him all the Citizens: requeſting them, That if ever ſince the ſeventeenth year of his life, until he now grew old, the honourable places by them conferred upon him, had prevented the capacity of his age, and yet his deſerts had exceeded the greatneſs of thoſe honourable places: then would they pray, that the Princes and great ones of their City might ſtill be like to him. Theſe words were heard with great approbation: ſo as all the people, even the Officers of the court followed Scipio leaving the Tribunes alone, with none about them excepting their own ſlaves and a Cryer, by whom ridiculouſly they cited him to judgement, until for very ſhame, as not knowing what elſe to do, they granted him, unrequeſted, a further day. After this, when the African perceived that the Tribunes would not let fall their ſuit, but enforce him to ſubmit himſelf to a diſgraceful trial: he willingy relinquiſhed the City and his unthankful Romans, that could ſuffer him to undergo ſo much indignity. The reſt of his time he ſpent at Liternum: quietly with a few of his inward friends, and without any deſire of ſeeing Rome again. How many years he lived, or whether he lived one whole year, in this voluntary baniſhment; it is uncertain. The report of his dying in the ſame year, with Hannibal and Philopœmen, as alſo of his private behaviour at Liternum, render it probable, that he outlived the Tribune-ſhip of his Accuſers; who meant to have drawn him back to his anſwer, if one of their Colleagues (as one of them had power to hinder all the reſt from proceeding) had not cauſed them to deſiſt. Howſoever it was; the ſame Tribunes went more ſharply to work with L. Scipio the Aſiatique. They propounded a Decree unto the People, touching money received of Antiochus, and not brought into the common Treaſury; that the Senate ſhould give charge unto one of the Prætors, to inquire, and judicially determine thereof. In favour of this Decree, an Oration was made by Cato, the ſuppoſed Author of theſe contentions, and inſtigator of the Tribunes. He was a man of great, but not perfect Vertue, temperate, valiant, and of ſingular induſtry; frugal alſo, both of the publick, and of his own; ſo as in this kind he was even faulty: for though he would not be corrupted with Bribes, yet was he unmerciful and unconſcionable, in ſeeking to increaſe his own wealth, by ſuch means as the Law did warrant. Ambition was his vice; which being poyſoned with envy, troubled both himſelf and the whole City; whilſt he lived. His mean birth cauſed him to hate the Nobility, eſpecially thoſe that were in chief eſtimation. Neither did he ſpare to bite at ſuch as were of his own rank, men raiſed by deſert, if their advancement were like to hinder his: but lately before this, when Glabrio, whoſe Lieutenant he had been at Thermopylæ, was his Competitor for the Cenſorſhip, and likely to carry it, he took an Oath againſt him, which was counted as no better than malicious perjury, That he had not brought into the common Treaſury ſome Veſſels of gold and ſilver, gotten in the Camp of Antiochus. Now the hatred which he bare unto the Scipio's, grew partly, (beſides his general ſpight at the Nobility) from his own firſt riſing, wherein he was countenanced by Fabius Maximus, who brooked not the African; partly from ſome check that was given unto himſelf, in the African Voyage by P. Scipio, whoſe Treaſurer he then was. For when Cato did utter his diſlike of the Conſuls bad Husbandry (judging Magnificence to be no better) in ſome peremptory manner; Scipio plainly told him, That he had no need of ſuch double diligence in his Treaſurer. Wherefore, either not caring what lies he publiſhed, or for want of judgement, thinking unworthily of the vertue that was far above him, Cato filled Rome with untrue Reports againſt his General; whoſe noble deeds confuted ſufficiently the author of ſuch falſe Tales. And thus began the hatred: which being not regarded nor thought upon by the Scipio's, whilſt it was nouriſhed by their enemy, brake out upon advantage, eſpecially againſt L. Scipio: his brother being dead, or out of the way. A ſevere inquiry and judgment being appointed of purpoſe againſt Scipio, matters were ſo carried, that he was ſoon condemned in a ſum of money, far exceeding his ability to pay. For non payment his body ſhould have been laid up in priſon: but from this rigor of the Law, he was freed by Tiberius Gracchus, the ſame Tribune who had cauſed the ſuit againſt the African to be let fall. In his eſtate, which was confiſcated to the uſe of the City, when there neither appeared any ſign of his having been beholding to Antiochus, nor was found ſo much as what he had been condemned to pay; than fell his Accuſers, and all whoſe hands had been againſt him, into the indignation of the People. But for this was L. Scipio no whit the better. His kindred, friends, and Clients, made ſuch a Collection for him, as would have ſet him in better Eſtate than before, if he had accepted it. He took no more than ſuch of his own goods, as were of neceſſary uſe, being redeemed for him by his neareſt friends.

And thus began the Civil War of the Tongue in the Roman pleadings: which had either not been, or not been much regardable until now, ſince the Punick War. Security of danger from abroad, and ſome want of ſufficient Employment, were eſpecial helps to the kindling of this fire; which firſt caught hold upon that Great Worthy, to whoſe Vertue Rome was indebted, for changing into ſo great ſecurity her extream danger. But theſe factious contentions did no long while contain themſelves within heat of words, and cunning practice. For when the Art of leading the multitude in ſuch quarrelſome buſineſs, grew to perfection, they that found themſelves overmatched by their Adverſaries at this kind of weapon, began to make oppoſition firſt with Clubs and Stones, afterward with Swords; and finally, proceeded from frayes and murders in the ſtreets, unto battel in the open field. Cornelia, Daughter of Scipio the African, a Lady of rare Vertue, that in honour of her two Sons was more commonly named, Mother of the Gracchi, ſaw thoſe her two Sons, whileſt they were but young, ſlaughtered in Rome, together with ſome of their friends: by thoſe whom they oppoſed, and their death not revenged by order of Law, but rather approved by the Senate. At theſe times the Senators began to take upon them Authority, more than was to them belonging. They conferred upon the Conſuls all the whole power of the City, under this form, Let the Conſuls provide, that the Commonweal receive no detriment. By this Decree of theirs, and by their proclaiming any Citizen enemy to the State, they thought to have won a great advantage over the multitude. But after the death of C. Gracchus, and of Saturnius, a popular man; whom by ſuch authority they did put out of the way; it was not long ere Marius a famous Captain of theirs, was ſo condemned, who by force of arms returned into the City, and murdered all the Principal Senators: whereupon began the Civil Wars; which giving unto Sylla, who prevailed therein, means to make himſelf abſolute Lord of Rome, taught Cæſar, a man of higher Spirit, to affect and obtain the like Soveraign Power, when by the like Decree of the Senate, he was provoked. It is true, that never any Conſul had finally cauſe to rejoyce, of his having put in execution ſuch Authority to him committed by the Senate. But as the fury of the multitude, in paſſing their Laws, by hurling of ſtones, and other violence, made the City ſtand in need of a Soveraign Lord: ſo the vehemency of the Senate, in condemning as Enemies, thoſe that would not ſubmit themſelves, when they were over-topped by Voices in the Houſe, did compel Cæſar, or give him at leaſt pretence, to right himſelf by Arms: wherewith prevailing againſt his Adverſaries, he took ſuch order, that neither Senate nor People, ſhould thenceforth be able to do him wrong. So by inteſtine diſcord, the Romans conſuming all or moſt of their principal Citizens, loſt their own freedom, and became ſubjects unto the arbitrary government of One: ſuffering this change in three Generations, after this beginning of their inſolent Rule, wherein they took upon them as the higheſt Lords on earth, to do even what they liſted. Yet had not Rome indeed attained hitherto unto compleat Greatneſs, nor believed of her ſelf, as if ſhe had, whilſt a King ſate crowned on the Throne of Alexander, continuing and upholding the Reputation of a former Empire. Wherefore this conſummation of her honour was thought upon betimes. How it was effected, the ſequel will diſcover.

CHAP. VI.

The Second Macedonian War.

§. I.

The Condition wherein thoſe Princes and Eſtates remained, which were Aſſociates of the Romans, when the War with Antiochus was finiſhed. The Romans quarrel with Philip. They deal inſolently with the Achæans, The Macedonian, being unready for War, obtains Peace at Rome, by his Son Demetrius: of whom thenceforth he becomes jealous.

AFter the overthrow of Antiochus, although Philip of Macedon, Eumenes King of Pergamus, the Commonweal of the Achæans, and all other the States of Greece, were governed by the ſame Laws and Magiſtrates as formerly had been, before the arrival of the Romans in thoſe parts: yet in very truth (the publick Declaration excepted) they were none other than abſolute Vaſſals to the People of Rome. For of thoſe five Prerogatives belonging to a Monarch, or unto Soveraign Power, in whomſoever it reſt; namely, To make Laws, To create Magiſtrates, To arbitrate Peace and War, to beat Money, and, To reſerve (as the French call it) le dernier Reſſort, or the laſt Appeals, the Romans had aſſumed four; and the greateſt of them ſo abſolutely, that is, The Appeal, or laſt reſort, as every petty injury offered to each other by the forenamed Kings or States, was heard and determined either by the Roman Embaſſadours, or Commiſſioners, in thoſe places whence the Complaint came, or otherwiſe by the Senators themſelves within Rome; from whoſe arbitriment, or direction, if either King or Commonweals declined, He or they were beaten, and inforced to obedience; or had their Eſtates and Regalities utterly diſſolved. Nevertheleſs it is true, that they had their own Laws, and Officers of their own ordaining: yet ſo, as neither the Laws were of force, when the Romans interpoſed their will to the contrary, neither was their election of Magiſtrates ſo free, as that they had not therein eſpecial regard unto the good pleaſure of theſe their Maſters.

And to ſuch degree of ſervitude the ſeveral Eſtates of Greece did bow very gently: either as being thankful for their deliverance from a Yoke more ſenſibly grievous; or, as being skilful in the Art of flattery, and therein taking delight, ſince therein conſiſted their chief hope of thriving; or, as being more fearful of diſpleaſing the ſtrongeſt, than mindful of their own honour. But Eumenes living further off, and being moſt obſequious unto the Romans, was not of long time queſtioned about any of his doings: his conformity unto them in matter of War and Peace, together with the diverſion of their thoughts another way, giving him leave to hold his own even as he liſted, until they ſhould otherwiſe diſpoſe of him. Neither was it a little available to him, that his Kingdom bordered upon the Nations by them not throughly ſubdued. For upon the ſame reaſon (as well as upon his own high deſerts) were they very loving unto Maſaniſſa, and to his Houſe, until Carthage was ruined, and their Dominion ſettled in Africk: as likewiſe afterwards to the Kings of Mauritania, Cappadocia, and others, holding people in ſubjection unto themſelves, by the Miniſtry of Kings; eſpecially of ſuch Kings, as were uſeful and obſequious unto them.

Now the Macedonian was of a more noble temper, and ſhewed himſelf not forgetful of his own former greatneſs, the honour of his Race, or the high reputation of his Kingdom. But ſuch Magnanimity was none otherwiſe conſtrued by the Romans, than as want of due reverence to their eſtate, and a valuation of himſelf againſt them: which in the pride of their fortune, they could not endure. Wherefore notwithſtanding that he had lately given paſſage to their Armies thorow his Country, prepared the wayes for them, and furniſhed them both with Victuals and other things needful, to tranſport them over the Helleſpont into Aſia, againſt Antiochus: yet upon the complaint of Eumenes and the States of Theſſaly and Thrace, he was commanded to abandon the Cities of Ænus and Maronea, with all Pieces and places demanded by any of his Neighbours; whereof many of them he had lately conquered, by direction or licence, even from the Romans themſelves.

Theſe

These Towns of Ænus and Maronea had been part of Lysimachus his Kingdom: who from Thrace Northwards, and to the North-west, extended his Dominion very far. He is thought to have made himself Lord of Transylvania: In which Province it is said, That innumerable Medals of Gold have been found in the age of our Grand-fathers, each of them weighing two or three Crowns, and stamped with his Image on the one side, on the other side with Victory. Of all these Lordships, the possession, or rather the title (for he lived not to settle his Estate in Europe) fell to Seleucus Nicanor by right of War, wherein he vanquished and slew Lysimachus: as also, by the like right Ptolomy Ceraunus thought them his own, when he had murdered Seleucus. But the inundation of the Gaules, which the Kingdom of Macedon could not sustain, did shortly and easily wash away from that Crown, together with the more part of Thrace, all those heaps of Land newly thereto annexed. Somewhat of this was afterwards regained by Antigonus the Son of Demetrius and his Successors: though not much; for they were otherwise busied. The fury of the Gauls being over-past, those Countries which lately had been oppressed by them, recovered their Liberty; and not only held it, but learned, some of them, especially the Dardanians and wild Thracians, to find their advantages, and make use of them, even upon Macedon. Against the mischiefs commonly done by these, King Philip did provide the most convenient remedies: by shutting up the ways, whereby the Dardanians might enter into his Kingdom; and by occupying Lysimachia, with some other Towns in Thrace, which he fortified, as Bulwarks of his own Country, against the Barbarians. Now, although it behoved him thus to do, for the defence of his own estate: yet forasmuch as these Towns were, in a manner, at absolute liberty, his possession of them was thought to partake more of violence than of justice. And in this respect he was formerly accused by the Ætolians, of wrongful usurpation and oppression, in his having occupied Lysimachia. Hereto he made a good answer. That his Garrison did only save it from the Thracians: who, as soon as he thence withdrew his men, did seize upon the Town, and ruine it. The like perhaps he might have said, touching Ænus and Maronea; That they were places unable to defend themselves, and Gates, by which the Barbarians might have entrance into his Kingdom. But this Plea had not availed him, in the disputation about Lysimachia: and in the present question, the Romans were not without their own title; since Antiochus had gotten all the Country thereabout, whilst Philip was busied in his former war: and since they, by their Victory, had gotten unto themselves all the title, which Antiochus thereto could pretend. Wherefore he only submitted his right unto the good pleasure of the Senate: referring it unto their disposition, Whether Ænus and Maronea should be set at liberty: whether left in his hand, or whether bestowed upon Eumenes; who begged them as an appendix to Lysimachia and Chersonesus, that were already his by their gift. What they would determine, he might easily perceive by the demeanour of their Embassadours towards him: who sitting as Judges between him and all that made complaint upon him, gave sentence against him in every controversie. Nevertheless he sent Embassadours to Rome, there to maintain his Right unto these Towns; wherein he thought, that equity (if it might prevail) was wholly on his side. For he had holpen their Consuls in the War against Antiochus and the Ætolians: wherein whatsoever he had gotten for himself, was now taken from him by their Embassadors: and would they now deprive him of those two Towns, lying so fitly for the guard of his Kingdom, which he had gotten to himself out of the ruines of Antiochus, like as out of his own ruines, Antiochus had gotten in those quarters a great deal more? By such allegations either he was likely to prevail, or at least to gain time, wherein he might bethink himself what he had to do. It was not long ere he had word from Rome, That the Senate were no more equal to him, than had been their Embassadors. Wherefore, considering how insolently the Maronites had behaved themselves, in pleading against him for their Liberty, he took counsel of his own passion; and (as by nature he was very cruel) gave order to Onomastus, that was Warden of the Sea-coasts, to handle these Maronites in such sort, as they might have little joy of the liberty by them so earnestly desired. Onomastus employed Cassander, one of the Kings men dwelling in Maronea, and willed him to let in the Thracians by night, that they might sack the Town, and use all cruelties of War. This was done: but so ill taken by the Roman Embassadors who had better notice than could have been feared, of these proceedings; that the King was by them directly charged with the crime, and called more strictly, than became his Majesty, to an accompt. He would have removed the blame from himself, and laid it even upon the Maronites: affirming, that that they, in heat of their Factions, being ſome inclinable to him, otherſome to Eumenes, had fallen into ſuch outrage, that they had cut one anothers throats. And hereof he willed the Embaſſadors to enquire among the Maronites themſelves: as well knowing, that they who ſurvived, were either his own friends; or ſo terrified and amazed by the late execution of his vengeance among them, that they durſt not utter an offenſive word. But he found the Romans more ſevere, and more thorowly informed in the buſineſs, than to reſt contented with ſuch an anſwer. He was plainly told, That if he would diſcharge himſelf of the Crime objected, he muſt ſend Onomaſtus and Caſſander to Rome, there to be examined as the Senate ſhould think fit. This did not a little trouble him. Yet he collected his ſpirits, and ſaid, That Caſſander ſhould be at their diſpoſition: but concerning Onomaſtus, who had not been at Maronea, nor near to it, he requeſted them not to preſs him, ſince it ſtood not with his honour ſo lightly to give away his friends. As for Caſſander, becauſe he ſhould tell no tales; He took order to have him poyſoned by the way. By this we ſee, that the Doctrine which Machiavel taught unto Cæſar Borgia, to imploy men in miſchievous actions, and afterwards to deſtroy them when they have performed the miſchief, was not of his own invention. All Ages have given us examples of this goodly policy, the latter having been apt Scholars in this Leſſon to the more ancient: as the Reign of Henry the Eighth, here in England can bear good witneſs; and therein eſpecially the Lord Cromwel, who periſhed by the ſame unjuſt Law that himſelf had deviſed, for the taking away of another mans life.

Such actions of Philip made an unpleaſant noiſe at Rome, and were like to have brought upon him the war which he feared, before he was ready to entertain it. Wherefore he employed his younger Son Demetrius as Embaſſadour unto the Senate: giving him Inſtructions how to make anſwer to all Complaints, and withall to deliver his own Grievances in ſuch wiſe, that if ought were amiſs, yet might it appear that he had been ſtrongly urged to take ſuch courſes. The ſum of his Embaſſage was, To pacifie the Romans, and make all even for the preſent. Demetrius himſelf was known to be very acceptable unto the Senate, as having been well approved by them, when he was Hoſtage in Rome: and therefore ſeemed the more likely to prevail ſomewhat; were it only, in that regard would be born unto his perſon.

Whileſt this buſineſs with the Macedonian hung in ſuſpence, and whileſt he, by his readineſs to make ſubmiſſion, ſeemed likely to divert from himſelf ſome other way the Roman Arms: the ſame Embaſſadors, that had been Judges between him and his Neighbours, made their progreſs thorow the reſt of Greece; and took notice of the Controverſies, which they found between ſome Eſtates in the Country. The greateſt cauſe that was heard before them, was the complaint of the baniſhed Lacedæmonians againſt the Achæans. It was objected unto the Achæans, That they had committed a grievous ſlaughter upon many Citizens of Lacedæmon: That unto this cruelty they had added a greater, in throwing down the Walls of the City: as alſo further, in changing the Laws, and abrogating the famous Inſtitutions of Lycurgus. Hereto Lycortas the Prætor of the Achæans, made anſwer, That theſe baniſhed Lacedæmonians, who now took upon them to accuſe the Nation that had once protected them, were notoriouſly known to be the men, who had themſelves committed that murder, whereof ſhameleſly they laid the blame upon others: the Achæans having not only called thoſe unto judgment, that were ſuppoſed to be chief Authors of a Rebellion againſt both them and the Romans: and theſe Plaintiffs having ſlain them, upon private, though juſt hatred, as they were coming to make anſwer for themſelves. Concerning their throwing down the walls of Lacedæmon, he ſaid it was moſt agreeable to Lycurgus his Ordinance: who, having perſwaded his Citizens to defend their Town and liberty by their proper vertue, did inhibit unto them all kind of fortifications: as the Retraits and Neſts either of Cowards, or (whereof Lacedæmon had woful experience) of Tyrants and Uſurpers. Further he ſhewed, how the ſame Tyrants that had built theſe walls, and hemmed in the Spartans, had alſo quite aboliſhed Lycurgus his Ordinances; and governed the City by their own lawleſs Will. As for the Achæans; they communicated their own Laws, which they held for the beſt, or elſe would ſoon change them, and take better, unto the Lacedæmonians; whom they found without Laws, or any tolerable form of policy. For concluſion, Lycortas plainly told App. Claudius, the chief of the Embaſſadours, That he and his Countrymen held it ſtrange, being friends and faithful Allies of the Romans, to ſee themſelves thus conſtrained, to anſwer and give account of their actions, as vaſſals and ſlaves unto the People of Rome. For if they were indeed at Liberty: why might not the

Achæans as well require to be ſatisfied about that which the Romans had done at Capua, as the Romans did buſie themſelves, to take account how things went at Lacedæmon? For if the Romans would ſtand upon their Greatneſs; and intimate, as they begun, that the Liberty of their Friends was nothing worth, longer than ſhould pleaſe themſelves to ratifie it: then muſt the Achæans have recourſe unto thoſe Agreements that were confirmed by Oath, and which, without perjury could not be violated; as reverencing, and indeed fearing the Romans, but much more, the immortal gods. To this bold anſwer of Lycortas, Appius found little to reply. Yet taking ſtate upon him; he pronounced, more like a Maſter than a Judge, that if the Achæans would not be ruled by fair means, and earn thanks whileſt they might; they ſhould be compelled with a miſchief, to do what was required at their hands, whether they would or no. This altercation was in the Parliament of the Achæans, which groaned to hear the Lordly words of Appius. Yet fear prevailed above indignation: and it was permitted unto the Romans to do as they liſted. Hereupon the Embaſſadours reſtored ſome baniſhed and condemned men: but the Roman Senate, very ſoon after, did make void all judgements of death or baniſhment, that had been laid by the Achæans upon any Citizen of Lacedæmon; as likewiſe they made it a matter of diſputation, whether or no the City and Territory of Lacedæmon ſhould be ſuffered to continue a member of the Achæan Common-wealth: or, taken from them, and made as it had been an Eſtate by it ſelf. By bringing ſuch a matter into queſtion, the Romans well declared, that they held it to depend upon their own will, how much or how little any of their Confederates ſhould be ſuffered to enjoy: though by contributing Sparta to the Councel of Achaia, they diſcovered no leſs, as to them ſeemed, the love which they bare unto the Achaians, than the power which they had over them.

Into ſuch ſlavery had the Greeks, and all Kings and Commonweals whatſoever, bordering upon any part of the Mediterranean Seas, reduced themſelves, by calling in the Romans to their ſuccour. They wanted not the good counſel and perſwaſions of many wiſe and temperate men among them; they had alſo the examples of the Italians, Spaniards, Gauls, and Africans, all ſubdued by the Romans; and, by ſeeking Patronage, made meer Vaſſals; to inſtruct them, what in the like caſe they ſhould expect: yet could not the true reaſons of Eſtate and Policy ſo prevail with them, but their private paſſions, and neighbouring hatred, which hath evermore bought Revenge at the price of ſelf-ruine, brought them from the honour which they enjoyed, of being free Princes and Cities, into moſt baſe and fearful ſervility.

All this made well for Philip of Macedon: who, though he ſaw the Greeks very far from daring to ſtir againſt thoſe, by whom both he and they were kept in awe; yet was he not without hope, that (few of them excepted, whom the Romans, by freeing from his ſubjection, had made his implacable enemies) in hearty affection all the Country would be his, whenſoever he ſhould take Arms, as ſhortly he was like to do. Young Demetrius, coming home from Rome, brought with him the deſired Ratification of Peace; though qualified with much indignity ſoon following. He had been lovingly uſed at Rome, and heard with great favour in the Senate. There, being counfounded with the multitude of objections, whereto his youth, unſkilful in the Art of wrangling, could not readily make anſwer: it was permitted unto him, to read ſuch brief notes as he had received from his Father, and out of thoſe the Senate were contented to gather ſatisfaction; more for Demetrius his own ſake, as they then ſaid, and wrote into Macedon, than for any goodneſs in the Defence. Such pride of theirs, in remitting his faults at the intreaty of his Son, together with ſome inſolence of his Son, growing (as appeared) from this favour of the Romans; did increaſe in Philip his hatred unto Rome, and bred in him a jealouſie of his too forward Son. To ſet him forward in theſe paſſions, there came dayly new Embaſſadors from Rome; ſome bringing one Commandment, ſome another; and ſome requiring him to fulfill thoſe things which had been impoſed upon him by their fore-goers. Neither were there wanting that obſerved his countenance: and when he had fulfilled all that was required at his hands; yet laid it to his charge, that he had done things unwillingly, and would be obedient no longer than he needs muſt. With theſe Embaſſadours young Demetrius was converſant: rather perhaps out of ſimplicity, and for that they made much of him, than for any ambitious reſpect; yet a great deal more than was pleaſing to his Father. So the rumour grew current through all Macedon, That Perſeus, the Elder Son of the King, ſhould not ſucceed unto his Father, but that the Diadem ſhould be conferred upon Demetrius, if not by ſome other pretence, yet by meer favour of the Romans. This offended not only Perſeus, but Philip himſelf: who ſuſpected ſuſpected his younger Son, as more Roman than his own; and accordingly miſconſtrued all his doings. But ere we proceed unto the bitter fruits of this jealouſie, it will not be amiſs to ſpeak of ſome memorable accidents that were in the mean time.

§. II.

The death of Philopœmen, Hannibal, and Scipio. That the Military profeſſion is of all other the moſt unhappy: notwithſtanding ſome examples, which may ſeem to prove the contrary.

THE Romans wanting other matter of quarrel in the Continent of Greece, had of late been ſo peremptory with the Achæans; that they ſeemed not unlikely to take part againſt them in any controverſie that ſhould be moved. Hereupon the Meſſenians, who againſt their will were annexed unto the Achæan Common-wealth, having long been of a contrary Faction thereto; grew bold to withdraw themſelves from that Society, with purpoſe to ſet up again the Eſtate of their own, ſevered from communion with any other. This was the device of ſome that were powerful in their City; who finding the multitude only inclinable to their purpoſe, and not over-ſtrongly affected in the buſineſs, were careful to ſeek occaſion of reducing things to ſuch paſs, that all their Citizens might be entangled in a neceſſity of ſtanding out, and of not returning to the Achæan League. And hereupon they began to do ſome acts of hoſtility, whereby it was probable that blood ſhould be drawn, and either ſide ſo far exaſperated, that little hope of agreement would be left. Upon the fame of their commotion and proceedings; Philopœmen, then Prætor of the Achæans, levied ſuch forces as he could in haſte, and went againſt them. Many principal Gentlemen of the Achæans, eſpecially of the Megalopolitans, were ſoon in a readineſs to wait upon him. Beſides theſe, which were all, or for the moſt part, horſe; he had ſome Auxiliaries out of Thrace and Crete, that uſually were kept in pay. Thus accompanied, he met with Dinocrates, Captain of the Meſſenians; whom he charged, and forced to run. But whileſt his horſe-men were too earneſt in following the chaſe; there arrived by chance a ſupply of five hundred from Meſſene, which gave new courage unto thoſe that fled. So the Enemies began to make head again: and with the help of thoſe, who very ſeaſonably came to their aid, compelled Philopœmens horſe-men to turn back, Philopœmen himſelf had long been ſick of an Ague, and was then very weak: yet the greatneſs of his courage would not ſuffer him to be negligent of their ſafety, which had ſo willingly adventured themſelves under his conduct. He took upon him to make the Retrait: and ſuffering his horſe-men to paſs along by him in a narrow lane, he often turned about againſt the Meſſenians; whom, the reputation and the knowledge of his great worth, did terrifie from approaching over near to him. But it fell out unhappily, that being caſt to ground by a fall off his horſe, and being withall in very weak plight of body, he was unable to get up again. So the Enemies came upon him, and took him; yet ſcarce believed their fortune to be ſo good, although their eyes were witneſſes. The firſt meſſenger that brought theſe news to Meſſene; was ſo far from being believed, that he was hardly thought to be in his right wits. But when the truth was affirmed by many reports, all the City ran forth to meet him, and behold the ſpectacle ſeeming ſo incredible! They cauſed him to be brought into the Theatre, that there they might ſatisfie themſelves with beholding him. The greateſt part of them had compaſſion on his miſ-fortune: and in commemoration both of his virtue, and of the ſingular benefits by him done unto them, eſpecially in delivering them from Nabis the Tyrant; began to manifeſt their good will for his delivery. Contrariwiſe, Dinocrates and his Faction were deſirous haſtily to take away his life: becauſe they held him a man implacable, and one that would never leave any diſgarce, or injury done to him, unrevenged. They durſt not one truſt another with the keeping of him: but committed him into a ſtrong vault under ground, that had been made for the cuſtody of their Treaſure. So thither they let him down faſt bound, and with an Engine laid an heavy ſtone upon the mouth of the Vault. There he had not ſtayed long, ere his enemies had concluded his preſent death. The Hangman of the City was let down unto him with a cup of poyſon, which Philopœmen took in his hand: and aſking no more than whether the Horſe-men were eſcaped, and particularly whether Lycortas was ſafe; when he heard an anſwer to his mind, he ſaid it was well: and ſo with a chearful countenance, drank his laſt draught. He was ſeventy years old, and weakned with long ſickneſs. whereby the poyſon wrought the ſooner, and eaſily took away his life. The Achæans, when they miſſed him in their flight, were marvellously offended with themselves, for that they had been more mindful to preserve their own lives, than to look unto the safety of so excellent a Commander. Whilest they were devising what to do in such a case: they got advertisement of his being taken. All Achaia was by this report vehemently afflicted: so as Embassadours were forthwith dispatched unto Messene, craving his enlargement: and yet preparation made withall, to obtain it by force, in case that fair means would not serve. Lycortas was chosen General of the Army against Messene: who coming thither, and laying siege to the Town, enforced it in short space to yield. Then Dinocrates knowing what he was to expect, laid hands upon himself, and made an end of his own life. The rest of those that had been partakers in the murder: were compelled to wait in bonds upon the ashes of Philopœmen that were carryed home in solemn pomp to Megalopolis; where they were all of them slain at his funeral, as sacrifices to his Ghost whom they had offended. Q. Martius, a Roman Embassadour, was then in Greece; whence, upon one occasion or other, the Roman Embassadours were seldome absent. He would have intermedled in this business of Messene, had not Lycortas made short work, and left him nothing to do.

About the same time was T. Quintius Flaminius sent Embassadour to Prusias King of Bithinia: not so much to withdraw him from prosecuting the war against Eumenes, as to entreat him that he would deliver Hannibal, the most spightful enemy in all the world unto the Senate and People of Rome, into his hands. Prusias (therein unworthy of the Crown he wore) did readily condescend: or rather (as Livie thinks) to gratifie the Romans, he determined either to kill Hannibal, or to deliver him alive to Flaminius. For upon the first conference between the King and Flaminius, a troop of souldiers were directed to guard and environ the lodging where Hannibal lay. That famous Captain having found cause before this to suspect the faith of Prusius, had devised some secret sallies under ground to save himself from any treasonable and sudden assault. But finding now that all parts about him were fore-closed, he had recourse to his last remedy: which he then was constrained to practise, as well to frustrate his enemies of their triumphing over him, as to save himself from their torture and mercilesse hands; who, as he well knew, would neither respect his famous enterprizes, his honour, nor his age. When therefore he saw no way to escape, nor counsel to resort unto, he took the poison into his hand, which he alwaies preserved for a sure Antidote against the sharpest diseases of adverse fortune; which being ready to swallow down, he uttered these words: I will now (said he) deliver the Romans of that fear which hath so many years possest them; that fear, which makes them impatient to attend the death of an old man. This victory of Flaminius, over me, which am disarmed, and betrayed into his hands, shall never be numbered among the rest of his heroical deeds: No, it shall make it manifest to all the Nations of the world, how far the ancient Roman virtue is degenerate and corruped. For such was the nobleness of their forefathers, as when Pyrrhus invaded them in Italy, and was ready to give them battel at their own door, they gave him knowledge of the treason intended against him by poyson; whereas these of a latter race, have employed Flaminius, a man who hath heretofore been one of their Consuls, to practise with Prusias, contrary to the honour of a King, contrary to his Faith given, and contrary to the Laws of Hospitality, to slaughter or deliver up his own Guest. He then cursing the person of Prusias, and all his, and desiring the immortal gods to revenge his fidelity, drank off the poyson and dyed.

In this year also (as good Authors have reported) to accompany Philopœmen and Hannibal, died Scipio the African; these being all of them, as great Captains as ever the world had; but not more famous than unfortunate. Certainly, for Hannibal, whose Tragedy we have now finished, had he been Prince of the Carthaginians, and one who by his authority might have commanded such supplies, as the War which he undertook, required; it is probable, that he had torn up the Roman Empire by the roots. But he was so strongly crost by a cowardly and envious Faction at home, as his proper virtue, wanting publick force to sustain it, did lastly dissolve it self in his own, and in the common misery of his Country and Common-weal.

Hence it comes, to wit, from the envy of our equals, and jealousie of our Masters, be they Kings or Common-weals, that there is no profession more unprosperous than that of men of war, and great Captains, being no Kings. For besides the envy and jealousie of men, the spoils, rapes, famine, slaughter of the innocent, vastation and burnings, with a world of miseries laid on the labouring man, are so hateful to God, as with good reason did Monluc the Marshal of France confess, That, were not the mercies of God infinite, and without restriction, it were

were in vain for those of his profession to hope for any portion of them: seeing the cruelties, by them permitted and committed, were also infinite. Howsoever, this is true, That the victories which are obtained by many of the greatest Commanders, are commonly either ascribed to those that serve under them, to Fortune, or the cowardise of the Nation against whom them serve. For the most of others, whose virtues have raised them above the level of their inferiours, and have surmounted their envy: yet have they been rewarded in the end, either with disgrace, banishment, or death. Among the Romans we find many examples hereof; as Coriolanus, M. Livius, L. Æmylius, and this our Scipio, whom we have lately buried. Among the Greeks we read of not many that escaped these rewards. Yea long before these times, it was a Legacy that David bequeathed unto his victorious Captain Joab. With this fear Alexander feasted Fermenio, Philotas, and others; and prepared it for Antipater and Cassander. Hereunto Valentinian the Emperour invited Ætius: who, after many other victories, overthrew Attelia of the Hunnes, in the greatest battel for the well fighting and resolution of both Armies, that ever was struken in the world, for there fell of those that fought, beside run-awaies, an hundred and fourscore thousand. Hereupon it was well and boldly told unto the Emperour by Proximus, That in killing of Ætius, he had cut off his own right hand with his left: for it was not long after, that Maximus (by whose perswasion Valentinian slew Ætius) murdered the Emperour; which he never durst attempt, Ætius living. And, besides the loss of that Emperour, it is true, That with Ætius, the glory of the Western Empire was rather dissolved, than obscured. The same unworthy destiny, or a far worse had Belisarius; whose undertakings and victories were so difficult and glorious, as after-ages suspected them for fabulous. For he had his eyes torn out of his head by Justinian: and he died a blind begger. Narses also, to the great prejudice of Christian Religion, was disgraced by Justin. That rule of Cato against Scipio, hath been well observed in every age since then, to wit, That the Common-weal cannot be accounted free, which standeth in awe of any one man. And hence have the Turks drawn another Principle, and indeed, a Turkish one, That every warlike Prince should rather destroy his greatest men of war, than suffer his own glory to be obscured by them. For this cause did Bajazet the second dispatch Bassa Acomat; Selim strangle Bassa Mustapha; and most of those Princes bring to ruine the most of their Visiers. Of the Spanish Nation, the great Gonsalvo, who drave the French out of Naples: and Ferdinando Cortese, who conquered Mexico; were crowned with Nettles, not with Lawrel. The Earls of Egmond and Horn had no heads left them to wear Garlands on. And that the great Captains of all Nations have been paid with this Copper Coin; there are examples more than too many. On the contrary, it may be said, That many have acquired the State of Princes, Kings, and Emperours, by their great ability in matter of War. This I confess. Yet must it be had withall in consideration, that these high places have been given or offered unto very few, as rewards of their military virtue; though many have usurped them, by the help and favour of those Armies which they commanded. Neither is it unregardable, That the Tyrants, which have oppressed the liberty of free Cities: and the Lieutenants of Kings or Emperours, which have traiterously cast down their Masters, and stepped up into their seats; were not all of them good men of war: but have used the advantage of some commotion, or many of them by base and cowardly practices, have obtained those dignities, which undeservedly were ascribed to their personal worth. So that the number of those that have purchased absolute greatness by the greatness of their warlike virtue; is far more in seeming than in deed. Phocas was a Souldier, and by the help of the Souldiers he got the Empire from his Lord Mauritius: but he was a coward; and, with a barbarous cruelty, seldom found in any other than cowards, he slew first the children of Mauritius, a Prince that never had done him wrong, before his face; and after them Mauritius himself. This his bloody aspiring was but as a debt, which was paid unto him again by Heraclius: who took from him the Imperial Crown, unjustly gotten; and set it on his own head. Leontius laid hold upon the Emperour Justine, cut off his Nose and Ears, and sent him into banishment: but Gods vengeance rewarded him with the same punishment, by the hands of Tiberius; to whose charge he had left his own men of war. Justine having recovered forces, lighted on Tiberius, and barbed him after the same fashion. Philippicus commanding the forces of Justine, murdered both the Emperour and his Son. Anastasius, the vassal of this new Tyrant, surprised his Master Philippicus, and thrust out both his eyes. But with Anastasius, Theodosius dealt more gently: for having wrested the Scepter out of his hands, he enforced him to become a Prieſt. It were an endleſs and a needleſs work to tell, how Leo rewarded this Theodoſius, how many others have been repaid with their own cruelty, by men alike ambitious and cruel; or how many hundreds, or rather thouſands, hoping of Captains to make themſelves Kings, have by Gods juſtice miſerably periſhed in the attempt. The ordinary, and perhaps the beſt way of thriving by the practice of Arms, is to take what may be gotten by the ſpoil of Enemies, and the liberality of thoſe Princes and Cities, in whoſe ſervice one hath well deſerved. But ſcarce one of a thouſand have proſpered by this courſe. For that obſervation, made by Solomon, of unthankfulneſs in this kind, hath been found belonging to all Countries and Ages: A little City, and a few men in it, and a great King came againſt it, and compaſſed it about, and builded Forts againſt it: And there was found a poor and wiſe man therein, and he delivered the City by his wiſdom: but none remembred this poor man. Great Monarchs are unwilling to pay great thanks, leſt thereby they ſhould acknowledge themſelves to have been indebted for great benefits: which the unwiſer ſort of them think to ſavour of ſome impotency in themſelves. But in this reſpect they are often times couzened and abuſed; which proves that weakneſs to be in them indeed, whereof they ſo gladly ſhun the opinion. Contrariwiſe, free Eſtates are bountiful in giving thanks, yet ſo, as thoſe thanks are not of long endurance. But concerning other profit which their Captains have made, by enriching themſelves with the ſpoil of the Enemy, they are very inquiſitive to ſearch into it; and to ſtrip the well-deſervers out of their gettings: yea moſt injuriouſly to rob them of their own, upon a falſe ſuppoſition; that even they whoſe hands are moſt clean from ſuch offences, have purloyned ſomewhat from the common Treaſury. Hereof I need not to produce examples: that of the two Scipio's being ſo lately recited.

In my late Soveraigns time, although for the wars, which, for her own ſafety, ſhe was conſtrained to undertake, her Majeſty had no leſs cauſe to uſe the ſervice of Martial men both by Sea and Land, than any of her Predeceſſors for many years had: yet according to the deſtiny of that profeſſion, I do not remember that any of hers, the Lord Admiral excepted, her eldeſt, and moſt proſperous Commander, were either enriched, or otherwiſe honoured, for any ſervice by them performed. And, that her Majeſty had many adviſed, valiant, and faithful men, the proſperity of her affairs did well witneſs, who in all her dayes never received diſhonour by the cowardiſe or infidelity of any Commander, by her ſelf choſen and imployed.

For as all her old Captains by Land died poor men, as Malbey, Randol, Drewry, Reade, Wilford, Layton, Pellam, Gilbert, Conſtable, Bourchier, Barkeley, Bingham, and others: ſo thoſe of a later and more dangerous imployment, whereof Norrice and Vere were the moſt famous, and who have done as great honour to our Nation (for the means they had) as ever any did; thoſe (I ſay) with many other brave Colonels, have left behind them (beſides the reputation which they purchaſed with many travels and wounds) nor title nor eſtate to their poſterity. As for the L. Thomas Burrough, and Peregrine Bertie L. Willowghby of Eresby, two very worthy and exceeding valiant Commanders, they brought with them into the world their Titles and Eſtates.

That her Majeſty in the advancement of her men of War did ſooner believe other men than her ſelf, a diſeaſe unto which many wiſe Princes, beſides her ſelf, have been ſubject; I ſay, that ſuch a confidence, although it may ſeem altogether to excuſe her Noble Nature, yet can it not but in ſome ſort accuſe her of weakneſs. And exceeding ſtrange it were, were not the cauſe manifeſt enough, that where the proſperous actions are ſo exceedingly prized, the Actors are ſo unproſperous and ſo generally neglected. The cauſe, I ſay which hath wrought one and the ſame effect in all times, and among all Nations, is this, that thoſe which are neareſt the perſon of Princes (which Martial-men ſeldom are) can with no good grace commend, or at leaſt magnifie a profeſſion far more Noble than their own, ſeeing therein they ſhould only mind their Maſters of the wrong they did unto others, in giving leſs honour and reward to men of far greater deſerving, and of far greater uſe than themſelves.

But his Majeſty hath already paid the greateſt part of that debt. For beſides the relieving by Penſions all the poorer ſort, he hath honoured more Martial men than all the Kings of England have done for this hundred years.

He hath given a Coronet to the L. Thomas Howard for his chargeable and remarkable ſervice, as well in the year 1588. as at Caliz, the Iſlands, and in our own Sea; having firſt commanded as a Captain, twice Admiral of a Squadron, and twice Admiral in Chief. His Majeſty hath changed the Baronies of Montjoy & Burley into Earldoms; and created Sidney ney Vicount, Knolles, Ruſſel, Carew, Danvers, Arundel of Warder, Gerald, and Chicheſter, Barons, for their governments and ſervices in the Netherlands, France, Ireland, and elſewhere.

§. III.

Philip, making proviſion for war againſt the Romans, deals hardly with many of his own ſubjects. His negotiation with the Baſtarnæ. His cruelty. He ſuſpecteth his Son Demetrius. Demetrius accuſed by his brother Perſeus; and ſhortly after ſlain by his fathers appointment. Philip repenteth him of his ſons death, whom he findeth to have been innocent: and intending to revenge it on Perſeus, he dieth.

QVintius Martius the Roman Embaſſador, who travelled up and down, ſeeking what work might be found about Greece, had received inſtruction from the Senate, to uſe the utmoſt of his diligence in looking into the Eſtate of Macedon. At his return home, that he might not ſeem to have diſcovered nothing, he told the Fathers, That Philip had done whatſoever they enjoyned him: yet ſo, as it might appear, that ſuch his obedience would laſt no longer, than meer neceſſity ſhould enforce him thereunto. He added further, That all the doings and ſayings of that King, did wholly tend unto Rebellion, about which he was deviſing. Now it was ſo indeed, that Philip much repented him of his faithful obſequiouſneſs to the Romans, and foreſaw their intent, which was, to get his Kingdom into their own hands; which ſafety of their honour, if they could find convenient means; or otherwiſe (as to him ſeemed apparent) by what means ſoever. He was in an ill caſe: as having been already vanquiſhed by them; having loſt exceedingly both in ſtrength and reputation; having ſubjects that abhorred to hear of War with Rome; and having neither neighbour nor friend, that, if he were thereto urged, would adventure to take his part: yet he provided as well as he could deviſe, againſt the neceſſity which he daily feared. Such of his own people as dwelt in the maritime Towns, and gave him cauſe to ſuſpect that they would do but bad ſervice againſt the Romans, he compelled to forſake their dwelling, and removed them all into Emathia. The Cities and Country, whence theſe were tranſplanted, he filled with a multitude of Thracians, whoſe faith he thought a great deal more aſſured againſt thoſe enemies that were terrible to the Macedonians. Further, he deviſed upon alluring the Baſtarnæ, a ſtrong and hardy Nation, that dwelt beyond the River of Danubius, to abandon their ſeat, and come to him with all their multitude: who, beſides other great rewards, would help them to root out the Dardanians, and take poſſeſſion of their Country. Theſe were like to do him notable ſervice againſt the Romans; being not only ſtout fighting men, but ſuch, as being planted in thoſe quarters by him, would bear reſpect unto him alone, The leaſt benefit that could be hoped by their arrival, muſt be the utter extirpation of the Dardanians; a people alwayes troubleſome to the Kingdom of Macedon, whenſoever they found advantage. Neither was it judged any hard matter, to perſwade thoſe Baſtarnæ, by hope of ſpoil, and other incitements, unto a more deſperate Expedition, through Illyria, and the Countries upon the Adriatick Sea, into Italy it ſelf. It was not known who ſhould withſtand them upon the way: rather it was thought, that the Scordiſci, and peradventure ſome others through whoſe Country they were to paſs, would accompany them againſt the Romans, were it only in hope of ſpoil. Now to facilitate the remove of theſe Baſtarnæ from their own habitations, into the Land of the Dardanians, upon the border of Macedon; a long and tedious journey unto them, that carried with them their wives and children: Philip with gifts did purchaſe the good will of ſome Thracian Princes, Lords of the Countries through which they were to paſs. And thus he ſought means to ſtrengthen himſelf with the help of the wild Nations, which neither knew the Romans, nor were known unto them; ſince he was not like to find aſſiſtance from any civil Nation, about the whole compaſs of the Mediterranean Seas. But theſe deviſes were long ere they took effect: ſo as the Baſtarnæ came not before ſuch time as he was dead; his death being the overthrow of that purpoſe. In the mean time he neglected not the training of his men to war, and the exerciſe of them in ſome ſmall Expedition againſt thoſe wild people that bordered upon him, and ſtood worſt effected toward him.

But theſe his counſels and proceedings were miſerably diſturbed by the calamities that fell upon him, both in his Kingdom, and in his own houſe. The Families and whole Townſhips, which he had cauſed much againſt their wills to forſake their ancient dwellings, and betake themſelves to ſuch new habitations, as he in his diſcretion thought meeter for them, were vehemently offended at the change. Yet their anger at firſt contained it ſelf within words: he having ving done them no great wrong in that alteration, otherwise than by neglecting their affection to the places wherein they had long lived: which also he did unwillingly, being himself over-ruled by necessity, that seemed apparent. This evil therefore would soon have been determined, had not his cruel and vindicative nature made it worse. He could not pardon words proceeding from just sorrow: but imputed all to traiterous malice; and accordingly sought revenge where it was needless. In his rage he caused many to dye: among whom were some eminent men; and few or none of them deservedly. This increased the hatred of the people, and turned their former exclamations into bitter curses. Which grew the more general, when the King in a barbarous and base fury, mistrusting all alike whom he had injured, thought himself unlike to be safe, until he should have massacred all the children of those Parents, whom tyrannically he had put to death. In the execution of this his unmanly pleasure, some accidents, more tragical then perhaps he could have desired, gave men cause to think (as they could not in reason think otherwise) that, not without vengeance poured on him from Heaven, he felt the like misery in his own children. It is hard to say what the Romans intended, in the extraordinary favour which they shewed unto Demetrius, the Kings younger Son. It may well be (though it may be also suspected) that they had no purpose to make and nourish dissention between the brethren, but only to cherish the vertue and towardliness of Demetrius; like as we find it in their Histories. But their notable favour towards this young Prince, and his mutual respect of them, bred extream jealousie in the Fathers head. If any custom of the Romans, the manner of their life, the fashion of their apparel, or the unsightly contriving and building (as then it was) of the Town of Rome, were jested at in ordinary discourse and table-talk; Demetrius was sure to be presently on fire, defending and praising them, even in such points as rather needed excuse. This, and his daily conversation with their Embassadours as often as they came, gave his Father cause to think, that he was no fit partaker of any Counsel held against them. Wherefore he communicated all his devices with his elder Son Perseus: who fearing so much lest his brother should step between him and the succession, converted wholly unto his destruction, that grace which he had with his Father. Perseus was then thirty years old; of a stirring spirit, though much defective in valour. Demetrius was younger by five years, more open and unwary in his actions, yet thought old and crafty enough, to entertain more dangerous practices than his free speeches discovered. The jealous head of the King having entertained such suspitions, that were much increased by the cunning practice of his elder Son, a slight occasion made the fire break out, that had long lain smothered. A Muster and ceremonious lustration of the Army, was wont to be made at certain times with great solemnity. The manner of it at the present was thus. They cleft in twain a Bitch; and threw the head and forepart, with the entrails, on the right hand, and the hinder part on the left hand of the way which the Army was to pass: This done, the Arms of all the Kings of Macedon, from the very first original, were born before the Army. Then followed the King between his two Sons: after him came his own band, and they of his Guard; whom all the rest of the Macedonians followed. Having performed other ceremonies, that Army was divided into two parts: which under the Kings two Sons, charged each other in manner of a true fight; using poles, and the like, in stead of their pikes and accustomed weapons. But in this present skirmish there appeared some extraordinary contention for the victory: whether happening by chance, or whether the two Captains did overearnestly seek each to get the upper hand, as a betokening of their good success in a greater trial. Some small hurt there was done, and wounds given, even with those stakes, until Perseus his side at length recoyled. Perseus himself was sorry for this, as it had been some bad presage: but his friends were glad, and thought, that hereof might be made good use. They were of the craftier sort: who, perceiving which way the Kings favour bent, and how all the courses of Demetrius led unto his own ruine, addressed their services to the more malicious and crafty head. And now they said, that this victory of Demetrius would afford matter of complaint against him; as if the heat of his ambition had carryed him beyond the rules of that solemn pastime. Each of the brethren was that day to feast his own companions, and each of them had spies in the others lodging, to observe what was said and done. One of Perseus his Intelligencers behaved himself so indiscreetly, that he was taken and well beaten by three or four of Demetrius his men, who turned him out of doors. After some store of wine, Demetrius told his companions, that he would go visit his brother, and see what chear he kept.

kept. They agreed to his motion, excepting ſuch of them as had ill handled his brothers man: yet he would leave none of his train behind, but forced them all to bear him company. They, fearing to be ill rewarded for their late diligence, armed themſelves ſecretly to prevent all danger. Yet was there ſuch good eſpial kept, that this their coming armed was forthwith made known to Perſeus: who thereupon tumultuouſly locked up his doors, as if he ſtood in fear to be aſſaulted in his houſe. Demetrius wondred to ſee himſelf excluded, and fared very angerly with his brother. But Perſeus bidding him be gone as an enemy, and one whoſe murdrous purpoſe was detected, ſent him away with an entertainment no better than defiance. The next day the matter was brought before the King. The elder brother accuſed the younger unto the Father of them both. Much there was alledged, and, in effect, the ſame that hath been here recited, ſave that by miſconſtruction all was made worſe. But the main point of the accuſation, and which did aggravate all the reſt, was, That Demetrius had undertaken this murder, and would perhaps alſo dare to undertake a greater, upon confidence of the Romans; by whom he knew that he ſhould be defended and born out. For Perſeus made ſhew, as if the Romans did hate him; becauſe he bore a due reſpect unto his Father, and was ſorry to ſee him ſpoiled, and daily robbed of ſomewhat by them. And for this cauſe he ſaid it was, that they did animate his brother againſt him: as alſo that they ſought how to win unto Demetrius the love of the Macedonians. For proof hereof he cited a Letter, ſent of late from Titus Quintius to the King himſelf: whereof the contents were, That he had done wiſely in ſending Demetrius to Rome; and that he ſhould yet further do well to ſend him thither again, accompanied with a greater and more honourable train of Macedonian Lords. Hence he enforced, That this counſel was given by Titus, of purpoſe to ſhake the allegiance of thoſe, that ſhould wait upon his brother to Rome; and make them, forgetting their duties to their old King, become ſervants to this young Traitor Demetrius. Hereto Demetrius made anſwer, by rehearſing all paſſages of the day and night foregoing, in ſuch manner as he remembred them, and had conceived of them: bitterly reprehending Perſeus, that converted matters of paſtime, and what was done or ſpoken in wine, to ſuch an accuſation, whereby he ſought his innocent brothers death. As for the love which the Romans did bear him, he ſaid that it grew, if not by his own virtue, at leaſt wiſe from their opinion thereof: ſo as by any impious practice, he were more like to loſe it wholly, than to increaſe it. In this wretched pleading there wanted no ſuch paſſions, as are incident to fathers, children, and brethren, beſides thoſe that are common to all Plaintiffs and Defendants, before ordinary Judges. The King pronounced like a Father, though a jealous Father, That he would conclude nothing upon the exceſs or errour, whatſoever it were, of one day and night, nor upon one hours audience of the matter, but upon better obſervation of their lives, manners, and whole carriage of themſelves both in word and deed. And herein he may ſeem to have dealt both juſtly and compaſſionately. But from this time forward he gave himſelf over wholly to Perſeus: uſing ſo little conference with his younger Son, that when he had matters of weight in hand, ſuch eſpecially as concerned the Romans, he liked neither to have him preſent, nor near unto him. Above all, he had eſpecial care to learn out what had paſſed between Demetrius and T. Quintius, or any other of the Roman great ones. And to this purpoſe he ſent Embaſſadours to Rome, Philocles and Apelles; men whom he thought no way intereſſed in the quarrels between the brethren, though indeed they altogether depended on the elder, whom they ſaw the more in grace. Theſe brought home with them a Letter, ſaid to be written by Titus (whoſe ſeal they had counterfeited) unto the King. The contents whereof were, A deprecation for the young Prince; with an intimation, as by way of granting it, That his youthful and ambitious deſires had cauſed him to enter into practices unjuſtifiable, againſt his elder brother, which yet ſhould never take effect: for that Titus himſelf would not be author, or abettor of any impious device. This manner of excuſe did forcibly perſwade the King to think his Son a dangerous Traitor. To ſtrengthen him in this opinion, one Didas, to whom he gave Demetrius in cuſtody, made ſhew as if he had pitied the eſtate of the unhappy Prince, and ſo wrung out of him his ſecret intentions, which he ſhortly diſcovered unto Philip. It was the purpoſe of Demetrius to fly ſecretly to Rome; where he might hope not only to live in ſafety, from his father and brother, but in greater likelihood, than he could find at home, of bettering ſuch claim as he had in reverſion unto the Crown of Macedon. Whatſoever his hopes and meanings were, all came to nought through the falſhood of Didas; who, playing on both hands, offered unto the Prince his help for making the eſcape, and in the mean while while revealed the whole matter to the King. So Philip resolved to put his Son to death, without further expence of time. It was thought behoveful to make him away privily, for fear lest the Romans should take the matter to heart, and hold it as a proof sufficient, at least, of the Kings despight against them, if not of his meaning to renew the war. Didas therefore was commanded to rid the unhappy Prince out of his life. This accursed minister of his Kings unadvised sentence, first gave poyson to Demetrius: which wrought neither so hastily, nor so secretly, as was desired. Hereupon he sent a couple of Ruffians, to finish the tragedy: who villainously accomplished their work, by smothering that Prince, in whose life consisted the greatest hope of Macedon.

In all the race of Antigonus there had not been found a King, that had thus cruelly dealt with any Prince of his own blood. The houses of Lysimachus and Cassander fell either with themselves, or even upon their heels; by intestine discord and jealousies, grounded on desire of soveraign rule, or fear of losing it. By the like unnatural hatred, had almost been cut off the lines of Ptolomy and of Seleucus: which, though narrowly they escaped the danger, yet were their Kingdoms thereby grievously distempered. Contrariwise, it was worthy of extraordinary note, how that upstart-family of the Kings of Pergamus had raised it self to marvellous greatness, in very short space, from the condition of meer slavery: whereof a principal cause was, the brotherly love maintained by them, with singular commendation of their piety. Neither was Philip ignorant of these examples, but is said to have propounded the last of them to his own children, as a pattern for them to imitate. Certainly he had reason so to do: not more in regard of the benefit which his enemies reaped by their concord, than in remembrance of the tender fosterage, wherewith King Antigonus his Tutor had faithfully cherished him in his minority. But he was himself of an unmerciful nature; and therefore unmeet to be a good perswader unto kindly affection. The murders by him done upon many of his friends, together with the barbarous outrages, which for the satiating of his blood-thirsty appetite, he delightfully had committed upon many innocents, both strangers and subjects of his own; did now procure vengeance down from Heaven, that rewarded him with a draught of his own poyson. After the death of his Son, he too late began to examine the crimes that had been objected; and to weigh them in a more equal ballance. Then found he nothing that could give him satisfaction, or by good probability induce him to think, that malice had not been contriver of the whole process. His only remaining Son Perseus could so ill dissemble the pleasure which he took in being freed from all danger of competition: as there might easily be perceived in him a notable change, proceeding from some other cause, than the remove of those dangers which he had lately pretended. The Romans were now no less to be feared than at other times; when he, as having accomplished the most of his desires, left off his usual trouble of mind, and carefulness of making provision against them. He was more diligently courted, than in former times, by those that well understood the difference between a rising and a setting Sun. As for old Philip, he was left in a manner desolate, some expecting his death, and some scarce enduring the tediousness of such expectation. This bred in the King a deep melancholy; and filled his head with suspitious imagination; the like whereof he had never been slow to apprehend. He was much vexed: and so much the more, for that he knew neither well to whom, nor perfectly whereof to complain. One honourable man, a Couzen of his, named Antigonus, continued so true to Philip, that he grew thereby hateful to Perseus: and thus becoming subject unto the same jealous impressions which troubled the King, became also partaker of his secrets. This Counsellor, when he found that the anger conceived against Perseus would not vent it self, and give ease to the King, until the truth were known whether Demetrius were guilty or no of the treason objected; as also that Philocles and Apelles (the Embassadours which had brought from Rome that Epistle of Flaminius, that served as the greatest evidence against Demetrius) were suspected of forgery in the business: made diligent enquiry after the truth. In thus doing he found one Xychus, a man most likely to have understood what false dealing was used by those Embassadors. Him he apprehended, brought to the Court, and presented unto the King: saying, that this fellow knew all, and must therefore be made to utter what he knew. Xychus for fear of torture, uttered as much as was before suspected: confessing against himself, that he had been employed by the Embassadours in that wicked piece of business. No marvel if the Fathers passions were extreme, when he understood that by the unnatural practice of one Son, he had so wretchedly cast away another, far more virtuous and innocent.

innocent. He raged exceedingly againſt himſelf, and withall againſt the Authors of the miſchief. Upon the firſt news of this diſcovery, Apelles fled away, and got into Italy; Philocles was taken: and either foraſmuch as he could not deny it when Xythus confronted him, yielded himſelf guilty; or elſe was put to torture. Perſeus was now grown ſtronger, than that he ſhould need to fly the Country: yet not ſo ſtout as to adventure himſelf into his fathers preſence. He kept on the borders of the Kingdom towards Thrace, whilſt his father wintred at Demetrias. Philip therefore, not hoping to get into his power this his ungracious Son, took a reſolution, to aliene the Kingdom from him, and confer it upon Antigonus. But his weak body, and exceſſive grief of mind, ſo diſabled him in the travel thereto belonging, that ere he could bring his purpoſe to effect, he was conſtrained to yield to nature. He had reigned about two and forty years: alwaies full of trouble; as vexed by others, and vexing himſelf with continual wars; of which that with the Romans was moſt unhappy, and few or none of the reſt found the concluſion, which a wiſe Prince would have deſired, of bringing forth together both honour and profit. But for all the evil that befell him, he might thank his own perverſe condition: ſince his Uncle, King Antigonus, had left unto him an eſtate, ſo great, and ſo well ſettled, as made it eaſie for him, to accompliſh any moderate deſires, if he had not abhored all good counſel. Wherefore he was juſtly puniſhed by feeling the difference between the imaginary happineſs of a Tyrant, which he affected, and the life of a King, whereof he little cared to perform the duty. His death, even whilſt yet it was only drawing near, was fore-ſignified unto Perſeus, by Caligenes the Phyſitian, who alſo concealed it a while from thoſe that were about the Court. So Perſeus came thither on the ſudden, and took poſſeſſion of the Kingdom: which in fine he no leſs improvidently loſt, than he had wickedly gotten.

§. IV.

How the Baſtarnæ fell upon Dardania. The behaviour of Perſeus in the beginning of his reign. Some wars of the Romans: and how they ſuffered Maſaniſſa cruelly to oppreſs the Carthaginians. They quarrelled with Perſeus. They allow not their Confederates to make war without their leave obtained. The Treaſon of Callicrates, whereby all Greece became more obnoxious to Rome, than in former times. Further quarrels to Perſeus. He ſeeks friendſhip of the Achæans, and is withſtood by Callicrates. The Romans diſcover their intent of warring upon him.

IMmediately upon the death of Philip, came the Baſtarnæ into Thrace; where order had been taken, long before, both for the free paſſage, and for the indempnity of the Country. This Compact was friendly obſerved, as long as no other was known than that Philip did live to recompence all that ſhould be done, or ſuſtained, for his ſervice. But when it was heard, that a new King reigned in Macedon; and not heard withal, that he took any care what became of the enterprize: then was all daſht and confounded. The Thracians would no longer afford ſo good markets unto theſe ſtrangers, as formerly they had done. On the other ſide, the Baſtarnæ would not be contented with reaſon, but became their own carvers. Thus each part having loſt their rich hopes repoſed in Philip, grew careful of thriving in the preſent; with little regard of right or wrong. Within a while they fell to blows; and the Baſtarnæ had the upper hand, ſo as they chaſed the Thracians out of the plain Countrys. But the victors made little uſe of their good fortune. For whether by reaſon of ſome overthrow, received by them in aſſaulting a place of ſtrength; or whether becauſe of extream bad weather, which is ſaid to have afflicted them as it were miraculouſly: all of them returned home, ſave thirty thouſand, which pierced on into Dardania. How theſe thirty thouſand ſped in their voyage, I do not find. It ſeems that by the careleſs uſing of ſome victories, they drew loſs upon themſelves: and finally took that occaſion, to follow their companions back into their own Country.

As for Perſeus, he thought it not expedient, in the novelty of his reign, to embroil himſelf in a war ſo dangerous, as that with the Romans was likely to prove. Wherefore he wholly gave his mind to the ſettling of his Eſtate, which well done, he might afterwards accommodate himſelf, as the condition of his affairs ſhould require, either for war or peace. To prevent all danger of rebellion, he quickly took away the life of Antigonus. To win love of his people, he ſate perſonally to hear their cauſes in judgement, (though herein he was ſo over-diligent and curious, that one might have perceived this his vertue of juſtice to be no better than fained) as alſo he gratified them with many delightful ſpectacles, magnificently by him ſet forth. Above all, he had care to avoid all neceſſity of war with Rome: and therefore made it his firſt work, to ſend Embaſſadors thither, to renew the league; which he obtained, and was by the Senate ſaluted King, and friend unto the State. Neither was he negligent in ſeeking to purchaſe good will of the Greeks, and other his neighbours: but was rather herein ſo exceſſively bountiful, that it may ſeem a wonder how in few years, to his utter ruine, he became ſo griping and tenacious. His fear was indeed the maſtring paſſion, which over-ruled him, and changed him into ſo many ſhapes, as made it hard to diſcern which of his other qualities were naturally his own. For proof of this, there is requiſite no more, than the relation of his actions paſt and following.

The Romans continued, as they had long, buſie in wars againſt the Spaniards and Ligurians; people often vanquiſhed, and as often breaking forth into new rebellion. They alſo conquered Iſtria; ſubdued the rebelling Sardinians; and had ſome quarrels, though to little effect, with the Illyrians and others. Over the Carthaginians they bore (as ever ſince the victory) a heavy hand: and ſuffered Maſaniſſa to take from them what he liſted. The Carthaginians, like obedient Vaſſals to Rome, were affraid, though in defence of their own, to take arms: from which they were bound by an Article of peace, except it were with leave of the Romans. Maſaniſſa therefore had great advantage over them, and was not ignorant how to uſe it. He could get poſſeſſion by force, of whatſoever he deſired, ere their complaining Embaſſadors could be at Rome: and then were the Romans not hardly entreated to leave things as they found them.

So had he once dealt before, in taking from them the Country of Emporia: and ſo did he uſe them again and again: with pretence of title, where he had any; otherwiſe, without it. Gala the Father of Maſaniſſa had won ſome land from the Carthaginians; which afterward Syphax wan from Gala, and within a while, reſtored to the right owners, for love of his wife Sophonisba, and of Aſdrubal his father-in-law. This did Maſaniſſa take from them by force: and by the Romans (to whoſe judgement the caſe was referred) was permitted quietly to hold it. The Carthaginians had now good experience, how beneficial it was for their Eſtate, to uſe all manner of ſubmiſſive obedience to Rome. They had ſcarcely digeſted this injury, when Maſaniſſa came upon them again, and took from them above ſeventy Towns and Caſtles, without any colour of right. Hereof by their Embaſſadors, they made lamentable complaint unto the Roman Senate. They ſhewed how grievouſly they were oppreſſed by reaſon of two Articles in their League: That they ſhould not make war out of their own Lands; nor with any Confederates of the Romans. Now although it were ſo that they might lawfully withſtand the violence of Maſaniſſa, invading their Country, howſoever he was pleaſed to call it his: yet ſince he was Confederate with the Romans, they durſt not preſume to bear defenſive arms againſt him, but ſuffered themſelves to be eaten up, for fear of incurring the Romans indignation. Wherefore they intreated, that they might have fairer juſtice; or be ſuffered to defend their own by ſtrong hand; or at leaſt, if right muſt wholly give place to favour, That the Romans yet would be pleaſed to determine, how far forth Maſaniſſa ſhould be allowed to proceed in theſe outrages. If none of theſe petitions could be obtained, then deſired they, that the Romans would let them underſtand, wherein they had offended ſince the time that Scipio gave them peace; and vouchſafe to inflict on them ſuch puniſhment as they themſelves in honour ſhould think meet: for that better and more to their comfort it were, to ſuffer at once what ſhould be appointed by ſuch Judges; than continually to live in fear, and none otherwiſe draw breath, than at the mercy of this Numidian Hangman. And herewithal the Embaſſadors threw themſelves proſtrate on the ground, weeping; in hope to move compaſſion.

Here may we behold the fruits of their envy to that valiant houſe of the Barchines; of their irreſolution in proſecuting a war ſo important, as Hannibal made for them in Italy; and of their half-penny-worthing in matter of expence when they had adventured their whole eſtate in the purchaſe of a great Empire. Now are they ſervants, even to the ſervants of thoſe men, whoſe fathers they have often chaſed, ſlain, taken and ſold as bond-ſlaves in the ſtreets of Carthage, and in all Cities of Africk and Greece. Now have they enough of that Roman peace, which Hanno ſo often and ſo earneſtly deſired. Only they want peace with Maſaniſſa, once their mercenary, and now their maſter or rather their tormentor, out of whoſe cruel hands, they beſeech their maſters to take the office of correcting them. In ſuch caſe are they, and adore the Romans, whom they ſee flouriſhing in ſuch proſperity as might have been their own. But the Romans had far better entreated Varro, who loſt the battel at Cannæ; than Hannibal that wan it was used by the Carthaginians: they had freely bestowed, every man of them, all his private riches upon the Common-wealth; and employed their labours for the publick, without craving recompence: as also they had not thought it much, though being in extream want, to set out an Army into Spain, at what time the enemy lay under their own walls. These were no Carthaginian vertues: and therefore the Carthaginians, having fought against their betters, must patiently endure the miseries belonging to the vanquished. Their pitiful behaviour bred peradventure some commiseration; yet their tears may seem to have been mistrusted, as proceeding no less from envy to the Romans, than from any feeling of their own calamity. They thought themselves able to fight with Masanissa: which estimation of their forces was able to make them, after a little while, enter into comparisons with Rome. Wherefore they obtained not such leave as they sought, of defending their own right by arms: but contrariwise, when without leave obtained, they presumed so far, the destruction of Carthage was thought an easie punishment of that offence. At the present, they received a gentle answer; though they had otherwise little amends. Gulussa the Son of Masanissa was then in Rome, and had not as yet craved audience. He therefore was called before the Senate; where he was demanded the reason of his coming; and had related unto him the complaint made by the Carthaginians against his Father. He answered, That his Father not being throughly aware of any Embassadors thither sent from Carthage, had therefore not given him instructions, how to deal in that business. Only it was known, that the Carthaginians had held Councel divers nights, in the Temple of Æsculapius: whereupon he himself was dispatched away to Rome, there to intreat the Senate, that these common enemies of the Romans, and of his Father, might not be overmuch trusted; especially against his Father, whom they hated most maliciously, for his constant faith to the people of Rome. This answer gave little satisfaction. Wherefore the Senate replyed, that for Masanissa his sake, they had done, and would do, whatsoever was reasonable, but that it stood not with their justice, to allow of this his violence, in taking from the Carthaginians, those Lands, which by the covenants of the League were granted unto them freely to enjoy. With this mild rebuke they dismissed Gulussa; bestowing on him friendly presents (as also they did on the Carthaginians) and willed him to tell his Father, that he should do well to send Embassadors, more fully instructed in this matter. This happened when the Macedonian war was even ready to begin: at which time the Romans were not willing too much to offend, either the Carthaginians (for feat of urging them unseasonably to rebellion) or Masanissa, at whose hands they expected no little help. So were they aided both by the Carthaginians, and Masanissa: by the Carthaginians, partly for fear, partly for hope of better usage in the future; by Masanissa, in way of thankfulness; though if it had happned (which was unlikely) that they should be vanquished; he made none other account, than that all Africk round about him, and Carthage therewithall, should be his own.

In the midst of all these cares, the Romans had not been unmindful of Perseus. They visited him daily with Embassadors; that is, with honourable spies to observe his behaviour. These he entertained kindly at first, until (which fell out ere long) he perceived whereto their diligence tended. First they quarrelled with him about the troubles in Dardania: neither would they take any satisfaction, until the Bastarnæ were thence gone; though he protested, that he had not sent for them. Afterward they pried narrowly into his doings; and were no less ill contented with good offices, by him done, to sundry of his neighbours, than with those wrongs, which (they said) he did unto other some. Where he did harm to any; they called it making war upon their friends. Where he did good; they called such his bounty, seeking friends to take his part against them. The Dolopians, his subjects, (upon what occasion it is uncertain) rebelled, and with exquisite torments slew Euphranor, whom he had appointed their Governour. It seems that Euphranor had played the Tyrant among them. For they were a people without strength to resist the Macedonian: and therefore unlikely to have presumed far, unless either they had been extreamly provoked; or else were secretly animated by the Romans. Whatsoever it was that bred this courage in them, Perseus did soon allay it, and reclaim them by strong hand. But the Romans took very angerly this presumption of the King: even as if he had invaded some Country of their Italian Confederates, and not corrected his own rebels at home. Fain they would have had him to draw in the same yoke with the Carthaginians; whereunto had he humbled once his neck, they could themselves have done the part of Masanissa; though Enmenes, or some other fit for that purpose, had been wanting. And to this effect, they told him, That the Conditions of the League between them were ſuch as made it unlawful both to his Father heretofore, and now to him, to take arms without their licence firſt obtained.

To the ſame paſs they would alſo fain have reduced the Greeks, and generally all their adherents, even ſuch as had entred into league with them upon equal terms: whom uſually they rewarded with a frown, whenſoever they preſumed to right themſelves by force of Arms, without ſeeking firſt the Oracle at Rome. Hereof the Achæans had good experience: whoſe confidence in their proper ſtrength, made them otherwhiles bold to be their own carvers; and whoſe hope of extraordinary favour at Rome cauſed them the more willingly to refer their cauſes to arbitrement. For when they went about to have chaſtiſed the Meſſenian by War; T. Quintius rebuked them, as too arrogant, in taking ſuch a work in hand, without his authority: yet by his authority he ended the matter, wholly to their good liking. Semblably at other times were they reprehended, even with Lordly threats, when they took upon them to carry any buſineſs of importance, by their own power, without ſtanding unto the good grace of the Romans. Who nevertheleſs upon ſubmiſſion, were apt enough to do them right. Thus were they tamed by little and little, and taught to forget their abſolute liberty, as by which they were not like to thrive; eſpecially in uſurping the practice of arms, which belonged only to the Imperial City. In learning this hard leſſon, they were ſuch untoward Schollers, that they needed, and not long after felt, very ſharp correction. Yet was there no ſmall part of blame to be imputed unto their Maſters. For the Roman Senate, being deſirous to humble the Achæans, refuſed not only to give them ſuch aid as they requeſted, and as they challenged by the tenor of the League between them; but further, with a careleſs inſolency, rejected this honeſt and reaſonable petition, That the Enemy might not be ſupplied from Italy, with victuals or arms. Herewith not content, the Fathers, as wearied with dealing in the affairs of Greece, pronounced openly, That if the Argives, Lacedæmonians, or Corinthians would revolt from the Achæans; they themſelves would think it a buſineſs no way concerning them.

Polyb. lib. 31. & 33.

This was preſently after the death of Philopœmen: at what time it was believed, that the Common-wealth of Achaia was like to fall into much diſtreſs: were it not upheld by countenance of the Romans. All this notwithſtanding; when Lycortas Prætor of the Achæans had utterly ſubdued the Meſſenians far ſooner than was expected; and when as not only no Town rebelled from the Achæans, but many entered into their Corporation; then did the Romans with an ill-favoured grace, tell the ſame Embaſſadors, to whoſe petition they had made ſuch bad anſwer (and who as yet were not gone out of the City,) That they had ſtraightly forbidden all manner of ſuccour to be carried to Meſſene. Thus thinking, by a fained gravity, to have ſerved their own turns, they manifeſted their condition; both to ſet on the weaker againſt the ſtronger and more ſuſpected, and alſo to aſſume unto themſelves a Soveraign power, in directing all matters of war, which diſſemblingly they would have ſeemed to neglect. In like manner dealt they with all their Confederates: not permitting any of them to make war; whether offenſive or defenſive; though it were againſt meer ſtrangers; without interpoſing the authority of the Senate and people of Rome: unleſs peradventure, ſometimes they winked at ſuch violence, as did help towards the accompliſhment of their own ſecret malice. Now theſe Roman Arts, howſoever many (for gainful or timerous reſpects) would ſeem to underſtand them; yet were generally diſpleaſing unto all men endued with free ſpirits. Only the Athenians, once the moſt turbulent City in Greece, having neither ſubjects of their own that might rebell, nor power wherewith to bring any into ſubjection; for want of more noble argument wherein to practiſe their eloquence that was become the whole remainder of their ancient commendations, were much delighted in flattering the moſt mighty. So they kept themſelves in grace with the Romans, remaining free from all trouble, until the war of Mithridates: being men unfit for action, and thereby innocent; yet bearing a part in many great actions, as Gratulators of the Roman victories, and Pardon-cravers for the vanquiſhed. Such were the Athenians become. As for thoſe other Common-weals and Kingdoms, that with over-nice diligence, ſtrove to preſerve their Liberties and Lands from conſuming by piece-meal: they were to be devoured whole, and ſwallowed up at once. Eſpecially the Macedonian, as the moſt unpliant, and wherein many of the Greeks began to have affiance, was neceſſarily to be made an example, how much better it were to bow, than to break.

Neither Perſeus, nor the Romans were ignorant, norant, how the Greeks at this time ſtood affected. Perſeus, by reaſon of his neer neighbourhood, and of the daily commerce between them and his ſubjects, could not want good information of all that might concern him, in their affairs. He well knew, that all of them now apprehended the danger which Philopœmen had long ſince foretold, of the miſerable ſubjection, whereinto Greece was likely to be reduced, by the Roman Patronage. Indeed they not only perceived the approaching danger, but as being tenderly ſenſible of their liberty, felt themſelves grieved with the preſent ſubjection, whereto already they were become obnoxious. Wherefore though none of them had the courage, in matters of the publick to fall out with the Romans; yet all of them had the care to chooſe among themſelves none other Magiſtrates, than ſuch as affected the good of their Country, and would for no ambition, or other ſervile reſpect, be flatterers of the greatneſs which kept all in fear. Thus it ſeemed likely, that all domeſtical conſpiracies would ſoon be at an end; when honeſty, and love of the Common-weal, became the faireſt way to preferment. Of this careful proviſion for the ſafety of Greece, the Romans were not throughly advertiſed: either becauſe things were diligently concealed from their Embaſſadors; whom all men knew to be litle better than ſpies; or becauſe little account was made of that intelligence, which was brought in by ſuch Traitors (of whom every City in Greece had too many) as were men unregarded among their own people, and therefore more like to ſpeak maliciouſly than truly; or perhaps becauſe the Embaſſadors themſelves, being all Senators, and capable of the greateſt Office or charge, had no will to find out other matter of trouble, than was fitting to their own deſires of employment. But it is hard to conceal that which many know, from thoſe that are feared or flattered by many. The Achæans being to ſend Embaſſadors to Rome, that ſhould both excuſe them, as touching ſome point wherein they refuſed to obey the Senate; and inform the Senate better in the ſame buſineſs: choſe one Callicrates, among others, to go in that Embaſſage. By their making choice of ſuch a man, one may perceive the advantage, which miſchievous wretches, who commonly are forward in purſuing their vile deſires, have againſt the plain ſort of honeſt men, that leaſt earneſtly thruſt themſelves into the troubleſome buſineſs of the weal-publick. For this Callicrates was in ſuch wiſe tranſported with ambition, that he choſe much rather to betray his Country, than to let any other be of more authority than himſelf therein. Wherefore inſtead of well diſcharging his credence, and alledging what was meeteſt in juſtification of his people, he uttered a quite contrary tale; and ſtrongly encouraged the Romans, to oppreſs both the Achæans, and all the reſt of Greece, with a far more heavy hand. He told the Senate, that it was high time for them, to look unto the ſetling of their authority, among his froward Countrimen: if they meant not wholly to forego it. For now there was taken up a cuſtome, to ſtand upon points of confederacy, and laws: as if theſe were principally to be had in regard, any injunction from Rome notwithſtanding.

Hence grew it, that the Achæans, both now, and at other times, did what beſt pleaſed themſelves, and anſwered the Romans with excuſes: as if it were enough to ſay, That by ſome condition of League, or by force of ſome Law, they were diſcharged or hindred from obeying the Decrees of the Senate. This would not be ſo, if he, and ſome other of his opipion might have their wills: who ceaſed not to affirm, That no Columns, or Monuments, erected, nor no ſolemn oath of the whole Nation, to ratifie the obſervance of Confederacy or Statute, ought to be of force, when the Romans willed the contrary. But it was even the fault of the Romans themſelves, that the multitude refuſed to give ear unto ſuch perſwaſions. For howſoever in popular Eſtates, the ſound of liberty uſed to be more plauſible, than any diſcourſe tending againſt it: yet if they which undertook the maintenance of an argument, ſeeming never ſo bad, were ſure by their ſo doing, to procure their own good; the number of them would increaſe apace, and they become the prevalent faction. It was therefore, ſtrange how the Fathers could ſo neglect the advancement of thoſe, that ſought wholly to enlarge the amplitude of the Roman Majeſty. More wiſely, though with ſeditious and rebellious purpoſe, did the Greeks; who many times, yea and ordinarily, conferred great honours, upon men otherwiſe of little account or deſert, only for having uttered ſome brave words againſt the Romans. The Fathers hearing theſe and the like reaſons, wherewith he exhorted them to handle roughly thoſe that were obſtinate, and by cheriſhing their friends, to make their party ſtrong; reſolved to follow this good counſel, in every point; yea to depreſs all thoſe that held with the right, and to ſet up their own followers, were it by right or by wrong. And to this end, they not only dealt thenceforth

more peremptorily with the Achæans, than had been their manner in former times; but wrote at the present unto all Cities of Greece, requiring them to see that their mandate (which was concerning the restitution of those that were banished out of Lacedæmon) should be fulfilled. Particularly in behalf of Callicrates, they advised all men to be such, and so affected, as he was, in their several common-weals. With this dispatch, Callicrates returned home a joyful man: having brought his Country into the way of ruine, but himself into the way of preferment. Nevertheless he forbore to vaunt himself of his eloquence used in the Senate. Only he so reported his Embassage, that all men became fearful of the danger, wherewith he threatned those that should presume to oppose the Romans. By such Arts he obtained to be made Prætor of the Achæans: in which Magistracy, as in all his courses following, he omitted nothing, that might serve to manifest his ready obsequiousness unto those whom he had made his Patrons.

Now, as the Romans by threatning-terms won many flatterers, and lost as many true friends: so Perseus on the other side, thinking by liberal gifts, and hopeful promises, to assure unto himself those that ill could brook his enemies; got indeed a multitude of partakers, though little honester than his enemies had. Thus were all the Cities of Greece distracted with factions: some holding with the Romans, some with the Macedonian, and some few, respecting only the good of the Estates wherein they lived. Hereat the Lords of the Senate were highly offended; and thought it an indignity not sufferable, That a King, no better than their Vassal, should dare to become head of a faction against them. This therefore must be reckoned in the number of the trespasses: whereof if not any one alone, yet all of them together, shall afford them just occasion to make War upon him. Perseus having finished his business among the Dolopians, made a journey to Apollo his Temple at Delphi. He took his Army along with him: yet went, and returned in such peaceable and friendly wise, that no place was the worse for his journey, but the good affection towards him generally increased thereby. With those that were in his way, he dealt himself; to such as lay further off, he sent Embassadours or Letters: praying them, That the memory of all wrongs whatsoever, done by his Father, might be buried with his Father; since his own meaning was to hold friendship sincerely with all his neighbours. The Romans perhaps could have been pleased better, if he had behaved himself after a contrary fashion, and done some acts of hostility in his passage. Yet, as if he ought not to have taken such a journey, without their licence; this also was made a valuable matter, and cast into the heap of his faults. He laboured greatly to recover the love of the Achæans: which his Father had so lost, that by a solemn decree, they forbade any Macedonians to enter their territories. It was jealousie perhaps, no less than hatred, which caused them, at the first, to make such a decree. For howsoever Philip had by many vile acts, especially by the death of the two Arati, given them cause to abhor him, yet in the publick administration of their estate, he had, for the more part, been to them so beneficial, that not without much ado, and at length, without any general consent, they resolve to forsake him. Wherefore it was needful, even for preservation of concord among them, to use all circumspection, that he might not, by his agents, negotiate, and hold intelligence with any, in a Country towards him so doubtfully affected: especially when by hearkening to his messages, they might make themselves suspected by their new friends, but the continuance of this decree, beyond the time of War, and when all danger of inovation was past, was uncivil, if not inhumane; as nourishing deadly hatred, without leaving means of reconciliation. And hereof the Achæans reaped no good fruit. For, although they were not, in like sort, forbidden the Kingdom of Macedon: yet understanding what would be due to them, if they should adventure thither, none of them durst set foot therein. Hence it came to pass, that their bond-men, knowing a safe harbour, out of which their Masters could not fetch them, ran daily away in great numbers: exceedingly to the loss of such, as made of their slaves very profitable use. But Perseus took hold upon this occasion: as fitly serving to pacifie those, whose enmity fain he would have changed into love. He therefore apprehended all these fugitives, to send them home again: and wrote unto the Achæans, That as for good will unto them, he had taken pains to restore back their servants, so should they do very well to take order for keeping them, that hereafter they might not run away again. His meaning was readily understood, and his Letters kindly accepted by the greater part; being openly rehearsed by the Prætor, before the Councel. But Callicrates took the matter very angerly; and bade them be advised what they did: for that this was none other, than a plain device, to make them depart from the friendship of the Romans.

Herewithall

Herewithall he took upon him, ſomewhat liberally, to make the Achæans beforehand acquainted with the War, that was coming upon Perſeus from Rome. He told them how Philip had made preparations for the ſame War; how Demetrius had been made away, becauſe of his good affection to the Romans; and how Perſeus had, ſince his being King, done many things, tending to the breach of peace. Briefly, He rehearſed all thoſe matters, which were afterwards alledged by the Romans; the invaſion of the Baſtarnæ, upon the Dardanians; the Kings journey againſt the Dolopians; his voyage to Delphi; and finally, his peaceable behaviour, which was (he ſaid) a dangerous temptation of men to his party. Wherefore he adviſed them to expect the event of things, and not over-haſtily to enter into any degree of friendſhip with the Macedonians. Hereto good anſwer was made by the Prætors brother: That Callicrates was too earneſt in ſo light a matter; and that, being neither one of the Kings Cabinet, nor of the Roman Senate, he made himſelf too well acquainted with all that had paſſed, or was like to follow. For it was well known, that Perſeus had renewed his League with the Romans; that he was by them ſaluted King, and friend to the eſtate: and that he had lovingly entertained their Embaſſadours: This being ſo; why might not the Achæans, as well as the Ætolians, Theſſalians, Epirots, and all the Greeks, hold with him ſuch correſpondence, as common humanity required? Nevertheleſs Callicrates was grown a man ſo terrible, by his Roman acquaintance, that they durſt not over-ſtiffly gainſay him. Therefore the matter was referred unto further deliberation: and anſwer made the whilſt, That ſince the King had only ſent a Letter without an Embaſſadour, they knew not how to reſolve. Better it was to ſay thus, than, that they were afraid to do as they thought moſt reaſonable and convenient. But when Perſeus herewith not contented, would needs urge them further, and ſend Embaſſadours: then were they fain, without any good pretence, to put on a countenance of anger, and deny to give audience: which was proof ſufficient (to one that could underſtand) of the condition wherein they lived. For hearkening to this advice of Callicrates; they were ſoon after highly commended by a Roman Embaſſadour: whereby it became
Liv. 42. apparent, that the Romans intended War upon the Macedonian; though hitherto no cauſe of War was given.

§. V.

How Eumenes King of Pergamus was buſied with Pharnaces, the Rhodians, and others. His hatred to the Macedonian: whom he accuſeth to the Roman Senate. The Senate honours him greatly, and contemns his enemies the Rhodians; with the cauſes thereof. The unuſual ſtoutneſs of the Macedonian Embaſſadours. Perſeus his attempt upon Eumenes. The brotherly love between Eumenes and Attalus. Perſeus his device to poyſon ſome of the Roman Senators: whereupon they decree War againſt him, and ſend him defiance. Other things concerning the juſtice of this War.

EUmenes King of Pergamus had been troubled about theſe times, by the Kings Pharnaces and Mithridates, his neighbours. He had taken the right courſe, in making firſt his complaint to the Romans: by whom he was animated with comfortable words, and promiſe, That they, by their authority, would end the buſineſs to his content. But in concluſion, by the help of the Kings, Pruſias and Ariarathes, he ended the War himſelf; and brought his Enemies to ſeek and accept peace, on ſuch conditions as pleaſed him to give them. After this, being at good leiſure; he began to conſider how the affairs of Macedon ſtood under Perſeus. His hatred to Perſeus was very great: and therefore he was glad to underſtand, that the hatred of the Romans, to the ſame his Enemy was as great, and withall notorious. Now, beſides his ancient and hereditary quarrel with the Macedonian; it vexed him exceedingly, That his own honours (whereof the Greeks, prodigal in that kind, had heaped immoderate ſtore on his Father and him) began to wax every where ſtale; whileſt Perſeus, either by his currying favour, or by the envy born to the Romans, had gotten their beſt liking and wiſhes. For deſpight of this indignity, He ſtirred up the Lycians againſt the Rhodians his old friends: and in helping theſe rebels, was ſo violent, that he proceeded, in a manner, in open War. But ſmall pleaſure found he in theſe poor and indirect courſes of revenge. Pol. Leg. 56. & 59.

The Lycians could not be ſaved by his Patronage from ſevere and cruel chaſtiſement, given to them by the Rhodians. This rendered him contemptible: as likewiſe, his acts of hoſtility, little different from robberies, made him hateful to thoſe which loved him before. As for his honours in the Cities of Greece; they not only continued falling into neglect; but were abrogated by a Polyb. Leg. 74.

decree of the Achæans, as too unmeasured, misbeseeming them to give, and affected by him beyond the proportion of his deservings. All this (which he needed not to have regarded, had he not been too vainly ambitious) befell him; especially for his being over-serviceable to the Romans, and for his malice to that noble Kingdom; which if it fell, the liberty of Greece was not like to stand. Now for the redress hereof, he thought it vain to strive any longer with bounty, against such an Adversary, as by hopeful promises alone, without any great performance, had over-topped him in the general favour. And therefore he resolved even to overturn the foundations of this popularity, by inducing the Romans utterly to take away from the eyes of men this Idol, the Macedonian Kingdom, which all so vainly worshipped. Neither would it prove a difficult matter, to perswade those that were already desirous: rather he was like to be highly thanked, for setting forward their wishes; and perhaps to be recompenced with some piece of the Kingdom, as he had been rewarded, for the like service, when Antiochus was vanquished.

To this end he made a second voyage to Rome: where, though he had little to say, which they knew not before, yet his words were heard with such attention, as if they had contained some strange novelty; and so pondered by the Fathers, as if the weight of them were to turn the ballance, that before was equal. The death of Demetrius, the expedition of the Bastarnæ into Dardania, that of Perseus himself against the Dolopian, and to Delphi, the great estimation of the Macedonian in Greece, his intermedling in business of his neighbours, his riches and his great provisions, were all the material points of Eumenes his discourse. Only he descended unto particulars, having searched into all (as he professed) like unto a Spy. He said, that Perseus had thirty thousand foot and five thousand horse of his own, mony in a readiness to entertain ten thousand Mercenaries for ten years, Arms to furnish a number thrice as great: The Thracians his friends at hand, ready, at a call, to bring him Souldiers as many as he should require; and that he prepared victuals for ten years, because he would not be driven, either to live upon spoil, or to take from his own Subjects. Herewithall he prayed them to consider, that King Seleucus. the Son and successor of Antiochus the Great, had given his Daughter Laodice in marriage to Perseus; Perseus not wooing, but Seleucus offering the match; That King Prusias of Bythinia, by earnest suit, had gotten to wife the Sister of Perseus, and that these marriages were solemnized with great concourse of Embassages from all quarters. Neither spared he to tell them, (though seeming loth to utter it plainly) That even the envy to their Estate was the cause, why many that could not endure to hear of amity with Philip, were now grown marvellously well affected to his Son. All this, and some facts of Perseus, which might either be denyed or justified, (as that he had procured the death of some which were friends to the Romans, and that he had expelled Abrypolis the Illyrian, who invaded Macedon, out of his Kingdom, or Lordship) Eumenes failed not to amplifie unto the most; saying, That he thought it his duty to forewarn them: since it would be to himself a great shame, if Perseus got the start of him, and were in Italy making War upon the Romans, ere Eumenes could come thither to tell them of the danger.

It were too great folly, to believe that the Romans stood in fear of Perseus, lest he should set upon them in Italy. Nevertheless, forasmuch as they loved not to make War without fair pretence, not only of wrong done to them or their associates, but of further hurt intended: great thanks were given to Eumenes, who had every way furnished them with such goodly colour, to beautifie their intendment. Now though it were so, that he told them little else than what they knew before: yet his person, and the manner of his coming, made all seem greater. For if upon any relation made by their own Embassadours, or upon tales devised by their flatterers and spyes, they had warred against Perseus, ere he had committed any open act of hostility against them; their injustice and oppression would have been most manifest. But when the wrongs to them done, were so notorious, and the danger threatning them so terrible, that such a Prince as Eumenes came out of his own Kingdom, as far as from Asia, to bid them look to themselves; who could blame them, if they took the speediest order to obtain their own right and security? Toward this justification of the war, and magnifying the necessity that enforced them thereto, their more than usual curiosity, in concealing what Eumenes had uttered in the Senate, when they could not but understand that his errand was well known; helped not a little. The Macedonian and Rhodian Embassadours were at Rome, provided of answers to the words, which they knew before-hand that he would speak; and with matter of recrimination. The vanity, either of him, of some about him, seems to have disclosed all: when the weariness of the Fathers, in hiding that which all men knew, made a notable shew of some fearful apprehension; against which it behoved their wisdom to neglect no possible remedy. Wherefore careless audience was given to the Rhodian Embassadors; who accused Eumenes, as one more troublesome to Asia, than Antiochus had ever been, and a provoker of the Lycians to rebellion. The Rhodians had with great pomp conveighed by Sea unto Perseus, his Bride Laodice; which friendly Office, as the Macedonian bountifully requited, so the Romans despightfully accepted. Hence it grew, that when the Lycians, as already vanquished, Liv. An. 61. were setling themselves in their obedience to the people of Rhodes, Embassadors came from Rome with strange news, which gave new life to the rebellion. For the Senate pronounced That it stood not with the manner of the Ca. An. 41. Romans, to alien quite from their own protection any People or Nation by them vanquished: and that the Lycians were by them assigned unto those of Rhodes, not as meer Vassals, but as Dependants and Associates. For proof hereof, they referred themselves unto the Commentaries of the ten Embassadors; whom they had sent to dispose of things in Asia, after the Victory against King Antiochus. Hereat Eumenes, Masanissa, the Ætolians, and all other Kings or Estates that were beholding to Rome, for increasing the number of their subjects, had cause to find themselves agrieved, if they well considered the matter: since by force of this or the like decree, those their Subjects might easily be made their Fellows, whensoever it should please the Senate: though it were so that all men knew the present meaning of the Senate: which was only to plague the Rhodians for their good will to Perseus, by setting them and the Lycians together by the ears. The Fathers could therefore see no reason to dislike Eumenes, upon this complaint made by the Rhodian Embassadors, which indeed more nearly touched themselves. Rather they honoured the King so much the more: for that others (as they would needs take it) conspired against him, because of his love to Rome.

But the Macedonian Embassage they heard not so carelessly as angrily: though peradventure it well contented them to find cause of anger: for whereas at other times all care had been taken, to pacifie them with gentle words and excuses: now heard they plainer language, and were told, That King Perseus desired much to give them satisfaction, concerning any deed or word of his, that might savour of hostility; but that, if his travel in this kind proved vain, then would he be ready to defend himself by arms, and stand to the chance of War, which often falls out contrary to expectation. These big words may seem to have proceeded from the vehemency of Harpalus, that was chief of the Embassadors; rather than from instruction given by the King, with whose faint heart they agreed not. Yet was there good reason, why Perseus himself might, at this time, think to speed better by a shew of daring, than he was like to do by any submission. For the eyes of all Greece being now cast upon him, as on the greatest hope of deliverance from the Roman servitude; it was not expedient that he should lessen, or perhaps utterly cut off, the general expectation, and the good affection born to him, which thereon depended, by discovering his too much weakness of spirit, unanswerable to a work of such importance. Wherefore he, or his Embassadour for him, was bold to set a good countenance on a game not very bad, but subject (in appearance) to fortune, which might have been his, had he known how to use it.

Now that this bravery (as better it may be termed than courage) proceeded from the Kings own heat; it appears by his daring to adventure soon after, on a practice that more justly might anger the Romans, and give them fairer shew of reason to make War upon him. It was known that Eumenes, in returning home, would take Delphi in his way and there do sacrifice to Apollo. Perseus deadly hating him, and thirsting after his blood, resolved to way-lay him, and by making there of him a sacrifice, to rid his own hands of a most mischievous Enemy. So there were appointed three or four stout Ruffians to do the murder: who placing themselves behind a broken mud-wall, on the side of a very narrow path leading up from the Sea to the Temple, did thence assault the King; whom they sorely bruised with great stones, and left for dead. They might have finished their work, such was the opportunity of the place which they had chosen; but fear of being apprehended, made them, without staying to see all sure, flee in such haste, that they killed one of their own Companions, who could not hold pace with them; because he should not discover them. Eumenes was conveighed away to the little Isle of Ægina, where he was cured: being all the while kept so secretly, that the fame of his Death was current in Asia. Hence it came, that his brother Attalus took upon him as King, and either took, or would have taken to wife (supposing it be like a matter of State) Stratonica the daughter of King Ariarathes, whom he then thought the Widow of Eumenes. It may well be numbred among the rare Examples of brotherly love, That when the King turned alive home, Attalus going forth to meet him and do his duty, as in former times, received none other check, than, That he should forbear to marry with the Queen, until he were well assured of the Kings death. More than this, Eumenes never spake of these matters; but bequeathed at his death, unto the same Brother, both his Wife and Kingdom. As likewise Attalus forbore to attempt any thing to the prejudice of the King his Brother: though the Romans (with whom he continued and grew in special favour, when Eumenes fell into their hatred) were in good readiness to have transferred the Kingdom from his Brother to him. By such concord of Brethren was the Kingdom of Pergamus raised and upheld; as might also that of Macedon have been, if Demetrius had lived, and employed his grace with the Romans, to the benefit of Perseus.

It is likely that Perseus was very glad, when he understood that his Ministers had both accomplished his will, and had saved all from discovery. But as he was deceived in the main point, and heard shortly after, that Eumenes lived, so was he beguiled in that other hope, of the concealment; which he vainly esteemed the less material. For he had written to one Praxo, a Gentlewoman of Delphi, to entertain the men whom he sent about this business: and she, being apprehended by C. Valerius, a Roman Embassador, then attending upon the matters of Greece, was carried to Rome. Thus all came to light. Valerius also brought with him to Rome, out of Greece, one Rammius a Citizen of Brundusium; who coming newly from the Court of Macedon, loaden with a dangerous secret, had presently sought out the Embassadour, and thereof discharged himself. Brundusium was the ordinary Port for Ships passing between Italy and Greece. There had Rammius a fair house; wherein he gave entertainment, being a wealthy man, to Embassadors, and other honourable personages, both Romans and Macedonians, journying to and fro. By occasion of such his Hospitality, he was commended to Perseus, and invited into Macedon with friendly letters; as one, whose many courtesies to his Embassadors, the King was studious to requite. At his coming, he was much made of; and shortly, with more familiarity than he expected or desired, made partaker of the Kings Secret. The sum of all was, That he must needs do a turn, in giving to such of the Romans as the King should hereafter name, a poyson of rare quality; sure in operation, yet not to be perceived either in the taking or afterward. He durst not refuse to accept this Employment: for fear lest the vertue of this Medicine should be tried upon himself. But being once at liberty, he discovered all. Rammius was but one man, and one whom the King had never seen before, nor was like to see again: and therefore, besides that the Kings denial ought to be as good as such a fellows affirmation, the accusation was improbable. Thus did Perseus, in time shortly following, answer for himself; and in like sort concerning the attempt upon Eumenes: denying to have had any hand, either in the one or other: yet withall professing, That such objections were not to be made unto a King, to prove the Rightfulness of making War upon him, but rather unto a subject pleading for his life in judgement. But howsoever the Romans neglected the getting of stronger proof (which might have been easie) than any that we find by them produced: yet the base and cowardly temper of Perseus was very suitable to these practices. Neither did the Senate greatly stand to dispute the matter with him: these his treacheries being held inexcusable. And as for his Royal Estate, wherein he supposed that they ought not to touch him for such private Offences, it gave him no priviledge: they judging him to have offended in the nature of a King. Herein surely they wanted not good reason. For if he might not lawfully make War upon Eumenes their Confederate; that is, if he might not send men to waste the Kingdom of Pergamus, or to besiege the Towns: might he send Ruffians to murder the King? If it were no less breach of the League to destroy the Senators by fire or famine, than by violence of the Sword, was it lawful for him to do it by poyson? Wherefore they presently decreed War against him; and sent Embassadours to denounce it unto him, unless he would yield to make such amends as they should require. He seemed at this time to have been so confident in the general favour of Greece, and other comfortable appearances, that if he desired not War, yet he did not fear it: or at least he thought by shew of courage, to make his Enemies more calm. He caused the Embassadors to dance attendance, till being weary, they departed without audience. Then called he them back, and bade them do their Errand. They made a tedious rehearsal of all matters, which they had long been collecting against him, and wherewith Eumenes had charged him: adding thereto, that he had entertained long and secret conference in the Isle of Samothrace, with Embassadors sent to him out of Asia, about some ill purpose. In regard of all which, they peremptorily required satisfaction; as was their manner when they intended to give defiance. Better they might have stood upon the evidence, brought against him by Rammius and Praxo. For if those accusations could be verified, then wanted they not good ground whereon to build: of which otherwise they were destitute; it being no fault in a King, to be strong, well-beloved, & well-befriended. Perseus answered, for the present, in a rage; calling the Romans greedy, proud, insolent, and underminers of him by their daily Embassadors, that were no better than meer spies. Finally, he promised to give them in writing their full answer: which was to this effect; That he would no longer stand to the League made between them and his Father; and renewed by himself indeed only for fear; but wished them to descend to more equal conditions; whereupon he, for his part, would advise, as they might also do for theirs.

In the form of the League between Philip and the Romans, as is set down by Polybius, we
l. 23. find no condition, binding the Macedonian to
c. 33 any inconvenience in the future; excepting those which he immediately performed. But Livy inserts a clause, whereby he was expressly forbidden to make any War abroad, without leave of the Romans. It is most likely, that all the Roman Confederates were included in this peace: whereby every one of the neighbours round about Macedon, entring shortly into league with Rome, did so bind the Kings hands, that he could no more make war abroad, than if he had been restrained by plain covenant. And thus might that seem an Article of the Peace, which never was agreed upon, but only was inferred by consequence. Now if the Romans would urge this point further, and say, that the Macedonian might not bear Defensive Arms, without their permission; then had Perseus very just reason to find himself agrieved. For since they had allowed his father, without controll, to make war in Thrace, (whilest they themselves were unacquainted with the Thracians) elsewhere abroad, though he asked not their licence: why should they now interpret the bargain after another fashion? Was it now become unlawful for him to chastise his own Rebels? or to repay an Illyrian that invaded Macedon? By such allegations he maintained the right of his cause in very mild sort; when it was too late. At the present, by disclaiming the League as unjust, he ministred occasion unto the Embassadors, to give him defiance. Having heard the worst of their message, he commanded them to be gone out of his Kingdom in three days. But either he should have been less vehement, or more constant in his resolution. For if his heart could serve him to undertake the War, he should couragiously have managed it, and have fain to work immediately, whilst the Enemy was unprepared; not have lost the opportunity, as now and often he did, in hope of obtaining a worse peace than the former.

The Romans solicite the Greeks, to joyn with them in the war against Perseus. How the Greeks stood affected in that war. The timerousness of Perseus. Martius a Roman Embassador deludes him with hope of peace. His forces. He takes the field, and wins part of Thessaly. The forces of Licinius the Roman Consul: and what Assistants the Romans had in this War. Of Tempe in Thessaly; & what advantages the Macedonian had, or might have had; but lost by his fear. Perseus braves the Romans, fights with them, knows not how to use his Victory, sues for peace, and is denied it by the Conquered. Perseus having the worse in a Skirmish, forsakes all the Country lying about Tempe. The Bœotians rebel against the Romans, and are rigorously punished. The Roman Commanders unfortunate in the War against Perseus. They vex the Greeks their friends: for whose ease the Senate makes Provision, having heard their Complaints. The flattering Alabanders.

SO long had the Romans been seeking occasion to take in hand this Macedonian War, that well they might have been ready for it, when it came; and not (as they were) behind hand in Provisions. But it was on a sudden that they met with a confluence of good pretences to make the Warr: whereof, if no one alone had weight enough, yet all of them together seemed more than sufficient. This opportunity of making their Cause honest in common opinion, was not to be neglected: though otherwise they were unprepared for the Action. Wherefore knowing, or having reason to believe, that their own strengths were such as would prevail in the end; they hastily embraced the fair occasion of beginning, and referred other cares to the diligence of time. Neither was this their unreadiness a small help, towards examining the disposition of the Greeks and others; who must afterwards dearly pay for any backwardness found in their good will. There was not indeed any cause to fear, that all of the Greeks, or other Eaſtern People ſhould conſpire together, and take part with the Macedonian: ſuch was the diſſention between the ſeveral Eſtates; howſoever the generality of them were inclin'd the ſame way. Nevertheleſs Embaſſadors were ſent to deal with them all; and to crave their help againſt Perſeus, or rather to demand it, in no leſs ample manner, than heretofore they had yielded it againſt Philip and Antiochus, in Wars pretending the Liberty of Greece. The Embaſſadors uſed as gentle words for faſhion ſake, as if they had ſtood in doubt that their requeſt might happen to be denied. But the Greeks were now grown well acquainted with ſuch Roman courteſie: and underſtood that not only ſuch as made refuſal, but even they who might ſeem to have granted half unwillingly, were like to hear other manner of words, when once this buſineſs was ended. Wherefore none of them were ſcrupulous in promiſing the beſt of their help to the Romans: the * Achæans and Rhodians, which were chief among them, being rather doubtful, even when they had done their beſt, leſt it ſhould be ill taken, as if they had halted in ſome part of their duty. It is ſtrange that men could be ſo earneſt to ſet up the ſide, whereof they gladly would have ſeen the ruine. The vulgar ſort was everywhere addicted to Perſeus; of the Nobles and Rulers, if ſome were vehemently Roman, they wanted not oppoſers, that were wholly Macedonian; yea, the wiſeſt and moſt honeſt, who regarded only the benefit of their Country, wiſhed better to Perſeus than to the Romans. And of this number Polybius the chief of Hiſtorians was one: who though He * judged the victory of Perſeus, like to prove hurtful unto Greece, yet wiſhed he the Romans ill to thrive, that ſo the Greeks might recover perfect Liberty: for his endeavours in which courſe, he was at length tyrannically handled, as ſhall be ſhewed hereafter. This conſidered, it appears that an extraordinary fear, and not only reverence of the Imperial City, made the Achæans, and other Eſtates of Greece, thus conformable to the Romans. The occaſion of this their fear may be juſtly imputed unto the timorous demeanor of Perſeus himſelf. He had undertaken a War, whereof the benefit ſhould redound, not only to his own Kingdom, but unto all that were oppreſſed by the Romans. Yet no ſooner were ſome few Companies brought over-ſea, to make a countenance of meaning ſomewhat againſt him, than he began to ſpeak the enemy fair, and ſue for peace at Rome. Since therefore it was known, that every ſmall thing would ſerve to terrifie him: and conſequently, that it ſhould at all times be in the Romans Power, by giving him any tolerable conditions of peace, to take revenge at leiſure upon thoſe which had aſſiſted him: little cauſe was there why any ſhould adventure to partake with him. He made indeed a great noiſe; leading about his army; taking by force or compoſition ſome few Towns, and ſoliciting all to joyn with him. But wiſe men could not be ſo beguiled. For at the ſame time, he ſought all means of pacification: and to that end, made humble ſuit unto the Roman Embaſſadors. Q. Martius, the chief of thoſe Embaſſadors, and a man of more fineneſs in cunning than was uſual among the Romans, made ſhew of inclination to the Kings deſire; and gave out ſuch comfortable words, that the King entreated and obtained a meeting at the River Peneus. There did Martius very gently rebuke the King, and charge him with thoſe crimes that are before mentioned. Whereto though Perſeus made none other anſwer, than the ſame which they could have made for him; yet the Embaſſadors, and eſpecially Martius, took it in good part, as therewith ſatisfied: and adviſed him to give the like ſatisfaction to the Senate. That this might conveniently be done, a truce was agreed upon. Thus had Martius his deſire; which was to make the King loſe time. For Perſeus had all things then in a readineſs, and might have done much, ere the Roman Army could have been in Greece. But by the interpoſition of this truce, he no way increaſed his forces; he ſuffered a moſt convenient ſeaſon of winning upon the Enemy, to ſlip away; and obtained in recompence nothing elſe, than leiſure and vain hope. Yet was he pleaſed herewith, as it had been with ſome victory: publiſhing a copy of the Diſputation between him and the Romans, whereby he gave men to underſtand how much he had the better, and what great hope there was of peace. He ſent Embaſſadors alſo to the Rhodians, of whoſe good will to him he was beſt perſwaded; not only to let them know how much he was ſuperiour in cauſe; but to intreat them, that they would take upon them, as Moderators, to compound the differences between him and the Romans, if perhaps notwithſtanding the goodneſs of his cauſe, he ſhould be denied peace. Theſe were poor helps. For hereby it appeared, that his late ſtanding upon point of Honour, was no better than meer vanity; his own ſafety being the utmoſt of his ambition. This his fearfulneſs might ſeem excuſable, and the blame thereof to appertain unto the Greeks; who deceived ceived his expectation, by being wanting to him in a time of neceſſity, that was partly their own: had it not been his Office, who took upon him as their Champion, to give ſuch a manly beginning to the War, as might encourage all others to follow him. But his timorous quality being found, men grew daily more and more averſe from him; and were careful not to put their ſhoulders to a falling wall. The Rhodians, among whom he had many ſtout Partizans, deſired him not to crave any thing at their hands, in which they might ſeem to do againſt the good liking of the Romans. The Bœotians alſo, who had entered of late into a ſtrict ſociety with the Macedonian; renounced it now, and made the like with the Romans: to whom further, in a ſort, they yeelded themſelves as vaſſals. Neither was Martius contented to accept their ſubmiſſion under a general form; but cauſed their ſeveral Towns to make covenant apart, each for it ſelf; to the end, that being thus diſtracted into many little Commonweals, they might not (were they never ſo deſirous to rebel) have ſuch force to do hurt, as when they agreed, and were incorporated into one, under the City of Thebes. This work, of ſeparating the Bœotians from Thebes their Head, was more than Ageſilaus could effect, or Epaminondas would ſuffer, then when all Greece followed the Lacedæmonians. So far more available to Thebes, being deſtitute of help from abroad, was the virtue of Epaminondas, and a few brave Citizens, than was the ſociety with King Perſeus, againſt a number not ſo great as followed the Lacedæmonians.

Martius brought this to effect, whileſt the King ſat ſtill, as being bound by the truce: and having done this, he turned to the City; where, vaunting what he had wrought by his craft, he was commended, and (though ſome reproved it as diſhoneſt) employed again by the Senate, with commiſſion to deal as he ſhould think expedient. Touching the Embaſſadours which Perſeus had ſent; audience was given to them, for that they ſhould not plainly ſee how their Maſter was deluded: but neither excuſe nor intreaty would ſerve their turn: the Senate being reſolved before-hand what to do. It was enough that they were admitted into the City, and had thirty days reſpite allowed them to depart out of Italy: whereas they, who came laſt on the ſame errand, did their meſſage without the Walls, in the Temple of Bellona (the uſual place of giving audience to open Enemies, or to ſuch Commanders as might not, by reaſon of ſome cuſtom enter the City) and had only the ſhort warning of eleven days, to be gone out of Italy. Neither did this poor courteſie ſerve alone to hide the craft of Martius, as if he had meant none other than good earneſt: but it was a likely mean both to keep a long while from Perſeus the knowledge of his buſineſs, and to ſtagger his reſolution, when he ſhould need it moſt firm.

And accordingly it fell out. For Licinius the Roman Conſul was at Apollonia, in a manner as ſoon as the Macedonian Embaſſadours were with their King at Pella. Which though it were enough to have rouzed Perſeus, and have made him lay aſide all cowardly hope of getting Pardon, yet was he content to deliberate a while, Whether it were not better to offer himſelf tributary to the Romans, and to redeem their good will with ſome part of his Kingdom, that ſo he might enjoy the reſt; than to put all at once to hazard. But finally, the ſtouteſt counſel prevailed; which alſo was the wiſeſt, and ſo would have proved, had it been ſtoutly and wiſely followed. He now began, as if the War had not begun until now, to do what ſhould have been done long afore. He cauſed all his Forces to be drawn together; and appointed their Randezvouz at Citium, a Town in Macedon. All being in readineſs, he did Royal Sacrifice, with an hundred Beaſts, to I know not what Minerva, that was peculiarly honoured in his Country: and then with all his Courtiers, and thoſe of his Guard, ſet forward to Citium. His Army he found conſiſting of nine and thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe, whereof about twelve thouſand foot, and a thouſand horſe were ſtrangers, of ſundry Nations, moſt part Thracians; the reſt of his own Macedonians. Theſe he animated with lively ſpeeches; laying before them the glory of their Anceſtors, the inſolency of the Romans, the goodneſs of his Cauſe, the greatneſs of his Proviſions, and the many advantages which they had of the Enemy, eſpecially in numbers. They anſwered him chearfully, with loud acclamations, and bade him be of good courage. From all Cities of Macedon there came likewiſe Meſſengers, offering to help him with money and victuals, according to their ſeveral Abilities. He gave them thanks: but anſwered, That his own proviſions would abundantly ſuffice, willing them only to furniſh him with Carts, for his Engines and Munition.

Out of his own Kingdom he iſſued forth into Theſſaly: knowing that the Romans were to paſs thorow that Country, in their Journey towards him. Some Towns of Theſſaly opened their Gates unto him, without out making offer to defend themselves; some he balked, thinking them too strong or well-manned; and some he wan by force. Of these last was Pyle; a Town thought impregnable, and therefore, not more stoutly than proudly defended by the Inhabitants, who gave contumelious language to the Assailants. It was taken by reason of a sally; which the Towns-men rashly made, and being driven back, received the Macedonians, that entered pell mell with them at the gate. All cruelty of War was practised here: to the greater terrour of the obstinate. So Pellana and Connus (Towns of much importance, especially Connus, which stood in the straights of Ossa, leading into Tempe) yielded at the first. Having well fortified this passage, the King marched onwards to Sicurium, a Town seated on the foot of Mount Ossa; where he rested a while, expecting news of the Enemy.

Licinius the Consul brought with him only two Roman Legions: being promised other strength of Auxiliaries, which was thought sufficient. Eumenes and Attalus his brother came to him in Thessaly, with four thousand foot, and a thousand Horse. Thither also came, from every part of Greece, such aid as the several Estates could afford, or thought expedient to send: which from the most of them was very little. Of the Kings abroad; Masanissa sent thither his Son Misagenes, with a thousand Foot, as many Horse, and two and twenty Elephants. Ariarathes the Cappadocian, by reason of his Affinity with Eumenes, was friend to the Romans, and had sent to Rome his young Son, there to be brought up: yet he did little or nothing in this war; perhaps because Eumenes himself began within a while, but when it was too late, to be otherwise advised than he had been in the beginning. Prusias was content to be a looker on: as being allied to Perseus, and yet fearing the Romans. Antiochus and Ptolomy (though Ptolomy was then young, and under Tutors) had business of their own; the Syrian meaning to invade the Egyptian: yet each of them promised help to the Romans, which they cared not to perform. Gentius the Illyrians was inclinable to the Macedonian, yet made good countenance to the Romans, for fear. It was a pretty trick wherewith M. Lucretius, the Roman Admirals Brother, served him, for this his counterfeit good will. This King had four and fifty Ships, riding in the Haven of Dyrrachium, uncertain to what purpose: all which Lucretius took away, after a very kind sort; making shew to believe That for none other end than to serve the Romans, their good friend Gentius had sent thither this Fleet. But whatsoever Gentius thought in the beginning; he foolishly lost both his Kingdom and himself, in the end of this War; by offering, rather than giving his help to Perseus.

With none other company than what he brought over the Sea, Licinius came into Thessaly: so tyred with a painful journey, through the Mountainous Country of Athamania, which stood in his way from Epirus; that if Perseus had been ready, attending his descent into the Plains, the Romans must needs have taken a great overthrow. He refreshed himself and his wearied Army, by the River Peneus; where he encamped, attending his Auxiliaries, that came in as fast as they could. It was not any slender help, that could enable him to deal with Perseus. Therefore he resolved to abide where he then was, and keep his trenches, until his numbers were sufficiently increased: contenting himself in the mean while, to have gotten quiet entrance into the Country. The Land of Thessaly, in which these two Armies lay, was better affected to the Romans, than any part of Greece besides: as having been freed by them from a more heavy yoke of bondage to the Macedonian, when there was little hope of expectation of such a benefit. It was generally rich, fruitful, and abounding in all things needful to mans life. In the midst of it, but somewhat more to the East, was that beautiful Valley of Tempe, so exceedingly full of all delights, that the name was often used at large to signifie the most pleasant and goodly places. This Valley of it self was not great; but adding to it those huge Mountains Ossa and Olympus (famous in Poesie) with their Spurs or Branches, by which it was on all sides enclosed; it occupied the better part of Thessaly. And this way were the Romans to enter into Macedon; unless they would make an hungry journey thorow the Country of the Dassaretians, as in the former war with Philip, they had long, in vain, attempted to do. Perseus therefore had no small advantage, by being Master of the Straights leading unto Tempe: though far greater he might have had, if by mis-spending of time he had not lost it. For if in defending the ragged passages of these Mountains, he were able to put the Romans often to the worse; yea, to win upon them (for a while) every year more than other, both in strength and reputation: questionless he might have done far greater things, had he seized upon the Straights of Aous, which his Father once kept, and defended all the Country behind the Mountains of Pindus.

Surely

Surely, not without extreme difficulty, muſt the Romans have either travelled by Land, with all their Carriages and Impediments, through places wherein was no relief to be found; or elſe have committed their Armies, and all things thereto needful, unto the mercy of Seas that were very dangerous; if they would have ſought other way into Macedon, than through the heart of Greece: upon neither of which courſes they once deviſed, notwithſtanding any trouble which they found in this preſent War. It may perhaps be ſaid, that the Greeks, and others, whom the King muſt have left on his back, would have made him unable to defend any places too far from his own home. But they were all, excepting the Theſſalians, better affected now to him, than they had been to his Father in the former War. The Ætolians, upon whom the Athamanians depended, grew into ſuſpicion with the Romans (as we ſhall find anon) even as ſoon as they met with Perſeus. The Bœotians, how politickly ſoever Martius had wrought with them, adventured themſelves deſperately in the Macedonian quarrel: what would they have done, if he at firſt had done his beſt? The Rhodians, Illyrians, yea, and Eumenes himſelf, after a while began to waver, when they ſaw things go better with Perſeus, than they had expected. So that if inſtead of diſcouraging his Friends, by ſuing baſely for peace; he had raiſed their hopes, by any brave performance in the beginning; and increaſed the number of his well-willers; yea, and bought down with money (as he might have done) ſome of his enemies, and among them Eumenes, who offered for good recompence, to forget his broken head: then might the Romans perhaps have been compelled to forſake their imperious patronage over Greece; and to render the Liberty by them given, entire; which otherwiſe was but imaginary. Such benefit of this War, ſince it was hoped for afterwards, might with greater reaſon have been expected at firſt, from greater advantages. But as a fearful company running from their Enemies, till ſome River ſtay their flight; are there compelled by meer deſperation to do ſuch acts, as done, while the battel laſted, would have won the Victory: ſo fell it out with Perſeus. In ſeeking to avoid the danger of that War, whereof he ſhould have ſought the honour; he left his friends that would have ſtood by him, and gave them cauſe to provide for their own ſafety: yet being overtaken by neceſſity, he choſe rather to ſet his back to the Mountains of Tempe, and defend himſelf with his proper forces; than to be driven into ſuch miſery, as was inevitable, if he gave a little further ground. What was performed by him or the Romans, all the while that he kept his footing in Theſſaly, it is hard to ſhew particularly, for that the Hiſtory of thoſe things is much periſhed. Wherefore we muſt be contented with the ſumm.

The Conſul having no deſire to fight, until ſuch time as all his forces were arrived; kept within his Trenches, and lay ſtill encamped by the River of Pencus, about three miles from Lariſſa. That which perſwaded the Conſul to protract the time, did contrawiſe incite the King, to put the matter unto a haſty trial. Wherefore he invited the Romans into the field; by waſting the Land of the Pheræans their Confederates. Finding them patient of this indignity; he grew bold to adventure even unto their Trenches: out of which, if they iſſued, it was likely that his advantage in Horſe would make the Victory his own. At his coming they were troubled; for that it was ſudden: yet no way terrified; as knowing themſelves to be ſafely lodged. They ſent out a few of King Eumenes his Horſe, and with them ſome light-armed foot, to entertain ſkirmiſh. The Captain, and ſome other of theſe were ſlain: but no matter of importance done; for that neither Licinius nor Eumenes, found it reaſonable to hazard battel. Thus, day after day, a while together, Perſeus continued offering battel: which they ſtill refuſed. Hereby his boldneſs much increaſed; and much more his reputation: to the grief of thoſe, who being ſo far come to make a Conqueſt, could ill digeſt the ſhame that fell upon them by their enduring theſe bravadoes. The Town of Sycurium, where Perſeus then lay, was twelve miles from the Romans: neither was there any convenient watering in that long march, which uſed to take up four hours of the morning, but he was fain to bring water along with him in Carts, that his men might not be both weary and thirſty when they came to fight. For remedy of theſe inconveniencies, he found out a lodging ſeven miles nearer to the enemy: whom he viſited the next day by the Sun-riſing. His coming at ſuch an unuſual hour, filled the Camp with Tumult: inſomuch as though he brought with him only his Horſe and light Armature, that were unfit to aſſail the Trenches, yet the Conſul thought it neceſſary, and reſolved to give check to his pride. Wherefore he ſent forth his Brother C. Licinius, King Eumenes, Attalus, and many brave Captains, with all his power of Horſe, his Velites, and all the reſt of his light Armature to try their fortune: he himſelf remaining in the Camp, with with his Legions in readineſs. The honour of this morning, was the Macedonian Kings; for he obtained the Victory in a manner intire (though the Theſſalians made a good retrait) with little loſs of his own. But he diſcovered his weakneſs ere night, by hearkening, as Princes commonly do, to counſel given by one of his own temper. For whereas the Romans were in great fear, leſt he ſhould aſſault their Camp; and to that purpoſe, upon the firſt news of his ſucceſs, his Phalanx was brought unto him by the Captains, though unſent for: he nevertheleſs took it for ſound advice, which indeed was timorous and baſe, To work warily, and moderate his victory; by which means it was ſaid, That either he ſhould get honeſt conditions of Peace, or at leaſtwiſe many Companions of his fortune. Certainly it was like that his good fortune would exalt the Hope and Courage of his Friends. Yet, had it been greater, and had he won the Roman Camp, his friends would have been the more, and the bolder. But over-great was his folly, in hoping then for peace: And in ſuing for it, even when he had the victory; what leſs did he, than proclaim unto all which would become his partakers, That neither good nor bad fortune ſhould keep him from yielding to the Romans, whenſoever they would be pleaſed to accept him? At this time the joy of his victory would admit none of the Conſiderations. He had ſlain of the Roman Horſe two hundred, and taken of them priſoners the like number. Of their foot he had ſlain about two thouſand: loſing of his own no more than twenty Horſe, and forty foot. The Roman Camp, after this diſaſter, was full of heavineſs and fear: it being much doubted that the enemy would ſet upon it. Eumenes gave counſel to diſlodge by night, and remove to a ſurer place beyond the River Peneus. The Conſul, though aſhamed to profeſs, by ſo doing, in what fear he ſtood; yet thought it better to acknowledge the Loſs paſt, than by ſtanding on proud terms, to draw upon himſelf a greater Calamity. So he paſſed the River in the dead of the night, and encamped more ſtrongly on the further ſide. The Aetolians were ſorely blamed for this loſs: as if rather a traiterous meaning, than any true fear, had occaſioned their flight, wherein the reſt of the Greeks followed them. Five of them that were men of eſpecial mark, had been obſerved to be the firſt which turned their backs: an obſervation likely to coſt them dear, at a time of better leiſure. As for the Theſſalians, their virtue was honoured with reward: ſo as the Greeks might learn by Examples of either kind, that if they would ſhun indignation, or incur favour, then muſt they adventure no leſs for their Lords the Romans, than gladly they would do for their own Liberty. Thus fared it with the Conſul and his Army. Perſeus came the next day to correct the former days errour; which how great it was, he not until then found. The Romans were gotten into a place of ſafety; whither they could never have attained, if the King had either preſſed his Victory, or given better heed to them that night: his light Armature alone being ſufficient to have routed them whileſt they were conveying themſelves to the other ſide of Peneus. But it was vain to tell what might have been done, ſince there was no remedy. The Romans were beaten, even the flower of their City, The Gentlemen of Rome; out of whom were choſen their Senators, and conſequently the Generals themſelves, Prætors, Conſuls, and all that bore Office or Command among them; yea, they were beaten ſo ſhamefully, that they ſtole away by night, and ſuffered him to gather up the ſpoils of them without reſiſtance, as yielding themſelves overcome. With ſuch brave words did the King ſet out the Glory of his Action; dividing the ſpoils among his Followers. But there was much wanting within him, to have made his honour round. He came nearer to the Romans, and encamped at Mopſelus, a place in a mid-way between Tempe and Lariſſa: as if it were his meaning to preſs them ſomewhat harder. Nevertheleſs he was eaſily perſwaded to uſe the occaſion, which he ſeemed to have, of obtaining peace. Therefore he ſent unto the Conſul, and offered to yield unto the ſame Conditions, wherein his Father had been bound to the Romans; if the War might ſo take end. It were needleſs here again to ſhew the folly of this his courſe. Towards the accompliſhment of this deſired Peace, there was in the Conſul no greater power than to grant a Truce, whileſt Embaſſadours might go to Rome: it reſting in the Senate and People to approve the conditions, & ratifie the League. And of ſuch a truce granted by Martius, he had lately found no ſmall diſcommodity redounding. But Licinius dealt plainly, and returned anſwer, That other hope of peace there was none; ſave that Perſeus would yield both his Kingdom and Perſon, ſimply and abſolutely, to diſcretion of the Senate. A manly part it was of Licinius to be ſo reſolute in Adverſity. On the other ſide, it argued a very faint heart in Perſeus, that having receiv'd an anſwer ſo peremptory

he ſtill perſiſted, making vain offers of greater tribute. Finding that the peace which he ſo much deſired, could not be purchaſed with mony, the King withdrew himſelf back to Sycurium. There he lay hearkening what the Enemy did; whoſe forces were well repaired by the coming of Miſagenes the Son of Maſaniſſa, with the aid before mentioned. This diſtance between the King and them, cauſed the Romans to wax the more bold in making their harveſt: about which buſineſs they ranged over all the fields. Their careleſs demeanour gave him hope to do ſome notable exploit: which he attempted, both upon their Camp, and upon thoſe that were abroad. The Camp he thought to have fired on the ſudden: but the alarm being taken in good ſeaſon, he failed in the enterpriſe. As for the forragers; he had a good hand upon them, if he could have withdrawn it, and given over in time. But whilſt he ſtrove to force a guard, he was viſited by the Conſul; by whom either in a ſkirmiſh of horſe, or (for the report is divers) in a great battel, he was overcome. This miſadventure, whether great or ſmall, cauſed Perſeus, after a few daies, to fall back into Macedon; as being naturally given to fear danger, even where none was; whereby what loſs he felt, will appear hereafter. He left all behind him, ſave only Tempe, weakly guarded: and conſequently an eaſie prey to the Romans.

After the Kings departure, Licinius went ſtraight unto Connus; hoping to have taken it, and ſo to have gotten entrance into Tempe. But finding the work too hard, he returned back unto the Perræbians and others; from whom he won ſome Towns, and among the reſt, Lariſſa. There were ſundry Towns thereabout, bearing the ſame name of Lariſſa: ſo that this which the Conſul took, may ſeem not to have belonged unto the Theſſalians; unleſs, perhaps, after his victory, Perſeus did greater acts than we find recorded, and got ſome part of Theſſaly.

Of matters happening in Greece at this time, it is hard to give a preciſe account; for that the Hiſtories of them are greatly defective. One may think it ſtrange, that the Bœotians, whom a Roman Embaſſador could terrifie, and bring altogether to his own will, ſhould not be afraid of a Roman Army, then on foot in Greece, and a Navy on their coaſt. But more ſtrange it is, that the Thebans, from whom their dependants were taken by the Art of Martius, were more true to Rome, than other petty Towns, which by that ſame diſtraction of the Bœotians, became within themſelves more abſolute, than formerly they had been. The cauſes hereof were to have been ſought among the changes happening in their variable factions: whereof the knowledge is now loſt. Some of them rebelled, and were throughly puniſhed by Lucretius the Roman Admiral: who got ſo much by ſpoiling them, that he would have brought others to rebell in like ſort, if by extream oppreſſion he could have driven them ſo far. Neither was Licinius the Conſul undiligent in the ſame kind. What his doings were, after ſuch time as he was at leiſure from Perſeus, I find no where mentioned. Only this is ſaid in general; That in the War which he made, he cruelly and covetuouſly demeaned himſelf.

After the ſame faſhion dealt they, that commanded in the year following; Hoſtilius the Conſul, and Hortenſius the Admiral, or Prætor of the Fleet. Hoſtilius ſhewed more of his induſtry, in picking quarrels with the Confederates of Rome, than in proſecuting the War againſt the Macedonian. For concerning the Roman War upon his Kingdom, after that the Conſul had ſought paſſage in vain over certain mountains, Perſeus ſeemed, in a manner, free from it. He was troubled indeed on that ſide which looked towards Illyria, by Ap. Claudius, whom the Conſul ſent thither with an Army of four thouſand, and who, by levies made upon the Confederates, doubled this his Army. But Claudius thinking to have taken Uſcana, a border town of Illyria, by Treaſon; came thither in ſuch careleſs order, that the inhabitants which had made ſhew of Treaſon, with purpoſe only to train him into danger; ſallied forth upon him, overthrew him, and chaſed him ſo far, that hardly he eſcaped with the fourth part of his company. Yet this Town of Uſcana, ſhortly after became Roman: which howſoever it happened, Perſeus very ſoon recovered it, and many other places therewithall: Cotys a Thracian King, ſecuring him on the one ſide of Macedon; and Cephalus an Epirot, revolted from the Romans, on the other. Perſeus likewiſe made a painful journey into Ætolia; where he was promiſed to be admitted into Stratus, that was the ſtrongeſt City in that Region. Of this hope though he were diſappointed by thoſe of the Romans faction, yet in his retnrn home, he took in Aperantia; and ſhortly heard good news, that Ap. Claudius was again throughly beaten by Clevas, one of his Lieutenants. Such ſucceſs had the Macedonian War under Hoſtilius. The ſame Conſul offended much the Greeks, by the ſtrict inquiſition which his Embaſſadors made into mens affection towards Rome. For theſe Embaſſadors travelling thorow all the Citis of Peloponneſeus, gave out ſpeeches tending to ſhew, That they liked no better of thoſe who ſought not by might and main to advance their buſineſs, than of thoſe which were of the Macedonian faction. Their meaning was, to have accuſed by name, in the Parliament of Achaia, Lycortas that worthy Commander, who nobly followed the ſteps of Philopœmen; and together with him, his ſon Polibius, who ſoon after was General of the Achæan Horſe; but more notable by that excellent Hiſtory which he wrote, than by his great employments, which he well and honourably diſcharged. The ſumm of the accuſation ſhould have been; That theſe were not hearty friends unto the Romans, but ſuch as abſtained from raiſing troubles, more for lack of opqortunity, than for any love to the common quiet. But ſince no colour of truth could be found, that might give countenance to ſuch a tale; it was thought better, for the preſent, to let it alone, and give gentle words, as if all were well. In like manner dealt they among the Ætolians: They demanded hoſtages; and found ſome in the Councel that approved the motion: as alſo among the Acarnanians, there were that intreated to have Roman Garriſons beſtowed in their Towns. But neither the one nor the other of theſe propoſitions took effect. They of the Roman faction, accuſed not only ſuch as were inclinable to the Macedonian, but alſo the good Patriots; making it no leſs than a matter of treaſon, to be a Grecian in Greece. On the contrary ſide, there wanted not ſome, who roundly told theſe pick-thanks of their baſe flattery, rating them openly, in ſuch ſort, that one of them hardly eſcaped being ſtoned, even in the preſence of the Embaſſadors. Thus was all full of acuſations, and excuſes: among which the Embaſſadors carried themſelves, as men that could believe none ill: though it were well enough known what they thought. The beſt was, that an order from the Senate was brought into Greece, and publiſhed to this effect: That it ſhould be free for all men, to refuſe obedience to any Roman Magiſtrate, impoſing any burden for the preſent war, unleſs it were ſuch, as the Senate had likewiſe thought meet. Of this Decree the whole Country was glad: for it was, or ſeemed, a good remedy of many inconveniences. But they that ſtanding on priviledges hereof, refuſed to fulfill every commandment, were numbred among the Patriots; which in the end of this war proved little better, if not worſe, than to have been Traitors. The Senate was driven to ſet down this order, by reaſon of many and vehement complaints brought to Rome, concerning the wrongs done by Roman Magiſtrates, and eſpecially by the Admirals, Lucretius and Hortenſius. Lucretius was condemned in a great ſumm of mony, for the wrongs by him done: highly to the commendation of the Romans, in that they loved not to have their ſubjects oppreſſed. Hortenſius being ſtill in office, had warning to amend.

Among the great number of Embaſſages that came to Rome about this time, either to ſeek redreſs of injuries, or to offer their ſervices: it is note-worthy, that from Alabanda, a Town of the leſſer Aſia, there was preſented unto the Senate, and well accepted, a moſt baſe piece of flattery. Theſe Alabanders brought three hundred horſemens targets, and a crown of gold, to beſtow upon Jupiter in the Capitol. But having a deſire to gratifie the Romans with ſome exquiſite token of their dutiful obedience, wherein they would be ſingular, and being not able to reach unto any great performance: they built a Temple, unto the Town Rome, and appointed anniverſary games to be celebrated among them, in honour of that goddeſs. Now who can wonder at the arrogant folly of Alexander, Antigonus, Ptolomy, and the like vain men, that would be thought gods; or at the ſhamefull flattery of ſuch as beſtowed upon men, and not the moſt vertuous of men, divine honours; when he ſees a Town of houſes, wherein powerfull men dwell, worſhipped as a Goddeſs; and receiving (without ſcorn of the Givers, or ſhame of the Preſent) the title of Deity, at the gift of ſuch a raſcal City as Alabanda?

AFter two years of the Macedonian war, things were further out of tune in Greece, than when the war began; which had been thought likely to reform all thoſe Countreys, and bring them to what paſs the Romans deſired; as it did in the end. Perſeus had hitherto the better, and was ſtronger now, than when he lived in peace. He had enlarged his borders on the Illyrian ſide; his friends, in all parts of Greece, took courage daily; and his reputation grew ſuch, as cauſed thoſe that were before wholly Roman, to ſuſpect what the iſſue of the war might prove, and thereupon to become wiſe for themſelves. Contrariwiſe, Licinius and Hoſtilius the Conſuls, had one after the other ſpent their time in vain, ſeeking way into Macedon; and defaced the glorious enterprize of conqueſt, by many loſſes received. The Roman Admirals had ſo demeaned themſelves, that many Towns even of the beſt effected to Rome, kept them out by force. Generally, the fear was great on the Roman ſide; and the Army much leſſened, not only by caſualties of war, but by the facility of the Tribunes or Colonels, or elſe of the Conſul himſelf (for they laid the blame one upon the other) in licenſing the Souldiers to depart. Quintius Martius the new Conſul, who ſucceeded unto Hoſtilius, was to amend all this: which nevertheleſs was more than he knew how to do; though he brought with him a ſtrong ſupply of men. He began hotly to ſet the war on foot, which along time had ſlept. And he began the right way: not ſeeking to force the ſtraights that were ſurely guarded, but taking pains to climb the mountains which were thought able to forbid all paſſage over them, without help or need of any cuſtody. The King heard of his approach; and being uncertain what way he meant to take, diſtributed his own forces, to the defence of all places which might give entrance, or permit aſcent. But the Conſul proceeded in his journey: with hope, either not to be diſcovered by the Enemy, or to break through all oppoſition, or at leaſtwiſe, to fight on as convenient ground, as they ſhould have that lay to ſtop him, and at length, if all failed, to make a ſafe retreat. He ſent before him four thouſand of his moſt expedite foot, to diſcover the wayes. Two daies was this company troubled, in overcoming the difficulty of no more than fifteen miles: after which they had ſight of the Enemy, that lay to deny their paſſage. They occupied therefore a ſafe piece of ground; and ſent back word to the Conſul, where they were; intreating him to haſten unto them: which he did. The Macedonians were not a whit diſmaved at his arrival; but met him, and fought with him, two or three daies together; each returning to their own Camp at night, with little loſs on either ſide. This bickering was on the narrow ridge of a mountain, which gave ſcarcely room unto three to march in front. So that very few hands came to be employed: all the reſt were beholders. In this caſe it was impoſſible to get forwards: yet a ſhame to return. Wherefore Martius took the only courſe remaining; and indeed the beſt: Part of his men he left with Popilius, to attend upon the Macedonians; whilſt he, with the reſt, fetcht a compaſs about, and ſought out waies that never had been trodden. Herein he found extream difficulty: which notwithſtanding he overcame. Beſides the troubles commonly incident to ſuch journeys, through places unfit for habitation: he was compelled by labour of hand; to make paths where none were; yea, where Nature might ſeem to have intended, that none ſhould be. So ſteep he found the deſcent of the mountains, in this way which he took: that of ſeven miles, which they travelled the firſt day, his men were compelled, for the more part to row themſelves down; as not daring to truſt their feet. Neither was this the worſt. For they met with rocks, that ſtood one over another, ſo upright: and cumberſome to get down: that their Elephants were affraid of that giddy project, and caſting their governours, made a terrible noiſe, which affrighted the horſes, and bred great confuſion. Having therefore gone, or wallowed, four miles of this grievous journey; there was nothing more deſired by the ſouldiers, than that they might be ſuffered to creep back again, the ſame way which they had come. But ſhift was made to let down the Elephants, by a kind of bridges, like unto falling draw-bridges: whereof the one end was joyned to the edge of the cliff; the other ſuſtained by two long poſts, faſtened in the ground below. Upon theſe two poſts, or poles, (which indeed, not being very ſtrong, ſince it was intended that they ſhould be either cut or broken) were faſtened two rafters, anſwerable in length to the diſtance, between the higher and the lower fall: ſo as the end of one bridge might reach to the beginning of another. Theſe were covered with planks and turfe; that they might ſeem continent with the ground: ſo to make the beaſts adventurous to go upon them. If there were a plain of any good extent from the foot of a rock, to the next downfall; then might the bridge be ſhorter. When an Elephant was gone a pretty way, upon one of theſe; the poſts upholding the frame were cut aſunder; thereby cauſing him to ſink down unto the next bridge; whence he was conveyed in like manner, to the third, and onward ſtill to the very bottom. Thus went they down ſliding, ſome on their feet, others on their buttocks, till they came to an even valley. By this it appears, how throughly provided the Romans uſed to be in their journeys, of things needful in all occaſions: as alſo what ineſtimable pains they took in this deſcent, about the conveyance of themſelves and all their carriages down the mountains. The next day they reſted; ſtaying for Popilius and his company, who hardly, or perhapes never, ſhould have overtaken them, if the Enemy had followed, and ſet upon him from aloft. The third and fourth daies journeys were like unto the firſt: ſave that cuſtome, and the nearneſs to their waies end without meeting enemy, cauſed them the better to endure the labour.

Perſeus could not be ignorant of the Romans coming towards him: ſince they fought with his men upon the paſſage, three daies together; he lying ſo nigh, that he might wel near have heard the noiſe. Yet was he ſo poſſeſſed with fear; that he neither ſtirred to help his own men, or to hinder the Conſul, nor made any proviſion for that which might fall out; but as one void of councel, ſate hearkening after the event. Four only paſſages there were, leading into Tempe: the firſt by Connus; which the Romans were unable to force: the ſecond and third were the ſame which Martius had attempted in vain, and another like unto it; the laſt, by the City of Dium out of Macedon. All theſe were ſufficiently guarded: and whoſoever would ſeek any other way, muſt be fain to take ſuch pains as Martius had undergone. The entrance by Dium was fairer than any of the reſt: whereof only the King had benefit: for that his enemies could not get thither, ſave through the valley it ſelf, into which they muſt firſt pierce another way. Dium ſtood upon the foot of the huge mounrain Olympus, about a mile from the Sea: of which mile, the River Helicon becoming there a lake, and called Baphyras, took up the one half, the reſt being ſuch as might eaſily have been fortified. Beſides all theſe, there was in the midſt of Tempe, a paſſage which ten men might eaſily keep: where the ſpurs of the mountains, reaching far into the valley; drew near to the very banks of Peneus, a goodly and deep River which ran through it. Wherefore nothing had been more eaſie, than to make the Conſul repent him of his troubleſome journey: if Perſeus could have ſeen his own advantages. For the Roman Army was not only in ill caſe to fight, after the vexation of that miſerable travel: but muſt needs have either periſhed for want of victuals, or been inforced to return the ſame way that he came, if the King hade made good the ſtraight of Dium. To have returned, and climbed up with their Elephants and carriages, againſt thoſe rocks, from which, with extreem labour, they could hardly get down, it ſeems a matter of impoſſibility: eſpecially conſidering how the enemy from above their heads, would have beaten upon them; being now aware of the path which they had taken, though he knew it not when they ſtole away from him. It may therefore be thought ſtrange that the Romans did not rather take their journey into Macedon, from the ſide of Illyria, whence that Kingdom had often been invaded, as lying open on that part: than put themſelves to the trouble of breaking into Tempe, whence, after that they were arrived, there was no means to eſcape, without forcing one of thoſe paſſages, which they deſpaired to win. But the cowardize of Perſeus did commend the counſel by them followed, as wiſe. For he no ſooner heard that the Enemy was come over the Mountains into Tempe, than he fared like one out of his wits; ſaying, That he was vanquiſhed, and had loſt all, without battel. Herewithall he began to take out of Dium, what he could carry away away in haſte; and ſtraightwaies abandoned the Town. In the ſame vehemency of amazement, he ſent a ſtraight commandment to Theſſalonica, that the Arſenal there ſhould be ſet on fire; and to Pella, that his treaſures there ſhould be caſt into the Sea: as if the Romans were like preſently to be Maſters of theſe two Cities. Niceas, who was appointed to drown the treaſure, performed it as haſtily as well he could: though ſoon after, his Maſter grew ſorry for the loſs; and itwas all, in a manner, recovered by Divers from under the water. But Andronicus, who had charge to ſet fire on the Kings Arſenal, deferred the execution, foreſeeing that repentance might follow: and ſo he prevented the damage. Whether Niceas, for his abſolute and blind obedience, or Andronicus, for his careful providence, merited the greater commendation, or more eaſie pardon; it reſted in the King to interpret. The reward of his ſervice, was this, Perſeus growing aſhamed of his mad cowardize, that appeared in this haſty direction: cauſed them both to be ſlain. Alſo thoſe poor men, which had fetcht his treaſure out of the Sea by their diving, were payed their wages after the ſame ſort: that ſo there might be no witneſs of the Kings baſe folly. Such end muſt they fear, who are privy to diſhonourable actions of great Princes. If Perſeus would have gone ſurely to work, for the hiding of his fault; then muſt he ſo royally have behaved himſelf, that no man might believe him to be the Author of any unworthy act or councel. But his vertue was of no ſuch capacity. He thought it enough to lay the blame upon others. And therefore, having called Hippias away (the Captain which had ſtopped the Conſul on the top of the Mountain) and Aſclepiodatus, from defence of the paſſages, whereto they were by him appointed: he rated them openly; ſaying, That they had betrayed unto the Enemy the gates and bars of Macedon. Of this reproach, if they would diſcharge themſelves, by laying it upon him, to whom of right it belonged, then might they have ſped as did Niceas and Andronicus.

The Conſul Martius had great cauſe to rejoyce, for that the King had ſo haſtily relinquiſhed his poſſeſſion of Tempe, and all the paſſages leading thereinto: ſince the Roman Army, this notwithſtanding, was hardly able to ſubſiſt for want of victuals. He took Dium without reſiſtance, and thence went forward into Macedon: wherein having travelled about a daies journey, and gotten one Town that yielded, he was compelled by meer lack of food for his men, to return back towards Theſſaly. His Fleet came to him, in this time of neceſſity, well appointed to have holpen him in the war: but having left behind, at Magneſia, the ſhips of burthen, which carryed the proviſions. Wherefore it fell out happily, that one of his Lieutenants had been careful to occupy the Caſtles about Tempe, which were forſaken by the Macedonians: for by thoſe waies only might Corn be brought into the Army. To meet the ſooner with this Corn, which was moſt deſirouſly expected, he forſook Dium, and went to Phila; by which fooliſh journey (if not worſe than fooliſh) he loſt more, than a little the longer faſting had been worth. It is probable that his Carts, with all, or the moſt of his ſtore, were loſt among the Mountains: for otherwiſe it had been madneſs to put himſelf on ſuch an enterprize, ſo ſlenderly provided, as that without enforcement, or ſight of the Enemy, he ſhould be fain to quit it. Howſoever it was: men thought him a coward, or at leaſt a bad man of war; ſince he thus recoyled and gave off, when it moſt behoved him to have proſecuted the action.

By underſtanding the folly, or cowardize of Martius; the King recollected himſelf, underſtood his own errour; ſought to hide it by ſuch poor means as have been ſhewed, and laboured to make what amends he could. He quickly repoſſeſſed the Town of Dium, which he haſtily repaired, finding it diſ-mantled by the Romans. This done, he encamped ſtrongly by the River of Enipeus: meaning there to ſtop the Enemies proceeding all that Summer. Leſs diligence, more timely uſed, would have been enough, not only to have delivered Martius into his hand, who had beguiled him with an idle hope of peace, but to have given him ſuch a noble victory, as might cauſe the Romans to ſeek a good end of the war upon fair conditions, and not to begin again in haſte. Yet this recovery and fortification of Dium, was to the Conſul an exceeding hinderance. For little or nothing could afterward be done toward the Conqueſt in hand, in all the continuance of his office. Only the Town of Heraclea, ſtanding on the River of Pencus, five mile from Dium, was taken by force, or rather by a trick of climbing upon mens heads, ſomewhat after the manner of our tumblers. But it made ſuch defence as it could, and was not given up for fear. After this, Martius did ſet a bold face towards Dium; as if he would have taken it again, and have driven the King further off: though his intent or hope was nothing like ſo great: his chief care, care, being to provide for his wintering. He sent the Admiral to make attempt upon the Sea-Towns, Thessalonica, Cassandrea, Demetrias, and others. All these were assayed: but in vain. The fields about Thessalonica were wasted; and some companies, that sundry times adventured forth of the Town, were still put to the worse. As for the Town it self; there was danger in coming near it, either by Land or Sea; by reason of the engines, which shot from the walls, and reached unto the Fleet. Wherefore the Admiral setting sail from thence, ran along by Anea, and Antigonea, (landing near to each of them; and both doing and receiving hurt) until he came to Pallene in the territory of Cassandrea. There King Eumenes joyned with him, bringing twenty ships of War: and five other were sent thither from King Prusias. With this access of strength, the Admiral was bold to try his fortune at Cassandrea: which was bad. There was a new ditch lately cast by Perseus, before the Town: which, while the Romans were filling up, question was made, What became of the earth taken thence, for that it lay not upon the bank? By this occasion, it was learned, that there were Arches in the Town-wall filled up with that earth, and covered with one single row of brick. Hence the Admiral gathered hope of making way into the Town, by sapping the walls. To this work he appointed such as he thought meetest: giving an alarm to the other side of the Town, thereby to shadow his attempt. The breach was soon made. But whilest the Romans were shouting for joy, and ordering themselves for the assault: the Captains within the Town perceived what was done; and sallying forth unexpected, gave a fierce charge on the companies that were between the ditch and the wall; of whom they slew about six hundred, and suffered few to escape unwounded. This disaster, and the want of good success on that part of the Town which King Eumenes assailed (a supply in the mean while entring the Town by Sea) caused the siege to break up. Torone was the next place which the Admiral thought meet to attempt: and thence likewise he was repelled. Finding this too well manned; he made way towards Demetrias: whereinto Euphranor, a Macedonian Captain, was gotten before his coming, with such forces, as were not only sufficient to have defended the Town, if the Admiral had laid siege to it, but to keep the Land about it from spoil; or, at least (as they did) to make the enemy pay dear for all that he there got. This Euphranor had taken his journey to Demetrias, by Melibœa; whither the Consul (that he might not be quite without work) had sent his Lieutenant to besiege it: and by the terrour of his appearing suddenly over their heads, caused the besiegers to dislodge in all haste, setting their Camp on fire.

Such fortune attended on the Romans; or rather, so far was their ability short of their Enterprises; ever since their Consul (whether dastardly, or carelessly) most unlike a good Commander, had let go his hold of Macedon, by forsaking Dium: yea, it is to be suspected, that some greater harm befell them, or, at least, that they were in some greater danger, than is expressed in the broken remaining History of this war. For Martius perswaded the Rhodians by Agesipolis their Embassadour, who came to him at Heraclea about other business of less importance, That they should do well to interpose themselves as Mediators, and seek to finish the War. Now, although Polybius do most probably conjecture, that this was rather a malicious device of Martius, craftily seeking to bring the Rhodians in danger (as anon it fell out) by their opposing the resolution of the Senate; than that it proceeded from any true fear in him, either of Perseus, or of Antiochus, who had then an Army on foot: yet since he made shew of fear, it is like withall, that somewhat had happened, which might make his fear seem not counterfeit. And so were the Rhodians moved to think of him; not only for that the extraordinary courtesie, both of him and of the Admiral, towards their Embassadour, coming from proud natures, did argue diffidence, where there was no ambition to cause it; but much more, for that shortly after the Embassadours of Perseus, and of Gentius the Illyrian, did set out their business at Rhodes, not more with the strength of a good Fleet, which the Macedonians had gotten, than with the honour of some victory, wherein he had lately slain great numbers of the Roman horse. Thus much we find intimated; though the time, place, or other circumstances of the fight, be not specified. And hereto may be referred, the report of those that were sent from Rome to view the estate of Martius his Army. For they found the Consul wanting meat; the Admiral wanting men; and, for those few that he had, wanting both money and clothes: and App. Claudius the Prætor, who lay on the frontier of Illyria, so unable to invade Macedon, that contrariwise, he was in extream danger; so as either he must quickly be sent for thence, or a new Army be sent thither to him. Wherefore it may seem, that some blow had been taken on the Illyrian side, which made all to halt; or at leaſt that the Romans, with greater loſs than is before ſpoken of, had been driven from ſome of the Towns which they beſieged.

Now, although it were ſo, that Martius, in very few of his actions, behaved himſelf like a man of war: yet in exerciſe of Cunning, which one hath moſt aptly termed, A crooked or ſiniſter kind of wiſdom, he dealt as a crafts-maſter, with a reſtleſs working diligence. This indeed neither proved his ſufficiency, nor commended his honeſty; ſince thereby he effected nothing to his own benefit; and nevertheleſs out of envy, vain-glory, or ſuch delight as weak and buſie-headed men take, in creating inexplicable troubles, he directly made oppoſition to the good of his Country. At ſuch time as Perſeus, by the ſucceſs of his doings againſt Hoſtilius, had gotten much reputation, and was thought likely to invade Theſſaly. Archo, Lycortas, and other good Patriots among the Achæans, judged it expedient for their Nations to help the Romans, as in a time of adverſity, whom in proſperity they loved not to flatter. Wherefore Archo propoſed a decree, which paſſed: That the Achæans ſhould ſend their whole power into Theſſaly, and participate with the Romans in all dangers. So the Army was levied: and Polibius, Li. with others, ſent Embaſſadors unto Martius, to certifie him thereof, and know his pleaſure. Polibius found the Conſul buſie in finding paſſage thorow Tempe into Macedon. He went along with the Army, and awaited the Conſuls leiſure, till they came to Heraclea; where, finding the time convenient, he preſented the Decree, and offered the ſervice of his Nation, wherein ſoever it ſhould be commanded. Martius took this very kindly; but ſaid, That he needed now no manner of help. Forthwith Polibius diſpatched home his companions, to ſignifie thus much: tarrying himſelf behind in the Camp. After a while, word was brought to Martius, that Ap. Claudius deſired, or rather imperiouſly required, of the Achæans, five thouſand men, to be ſent him into Epirus. It was manifeſt, that Appius had need of theſe men; and that if he were ſtrong in field, he might do notable ſervice, by diſtracting the forces of Perſeus. But the Labirinthian head of Martius, could not allow of ſuch plain reaſon. He called unto him Polibius, to whom he declared, That Appius had no need of ſuch aid, and therefore willed him to return home, and in any wiſe take order that the men might not be ſent, nor the Achæans be put to ſuch needleſs charges. Away went Polibius; muſing, and unable to reſolve, whether it were for love to the Achæans, that the Conſul was ſo earneſt in this buſineſs; or rather for envy, and to hinder Ap. Claudius from doing any thing, ſince himſelf could do nothing. But when Polibius was to deliver his opinion in the Councel touching this matter; then found he a new doubt, that more nearly concerned his own ſelf, and thoſe of his party. For as he was ſure to incurr the great indignation of the Conſul, if he ſhould neglect what was given him in charge; ſo was it manifeſt on the other ſide, that the words by Martius uttered to him in private, would prove no good warrant for him and his friends, if openly they ſhould refuſe to help Claudius, alledging that he had no need: In this caſe therefore, he had recourſe unto the Decree of the Senate: which exempted men from neceſſity of doing what the Roman Commanders ſhould require, unleſs, by ſpecial order from the Senate, the ſame were likewiſe appointed. So for lack of warrant from the Senate, this demand of Appius was referred unto the advice of the Conſul: by whom it was ſure to be made fruſtrate. Hereby the Achæans were ſavers, of more than an hundred and twenty Talents: though Polibius himſelf ran into danger of Appius his diſpleaſure; and for ſuch honeſt dealing in his Countries behalf, was afterwards rewarded by the Romans with many a long years impriſonment.

Whether it were by the like policy of Martius, that King Eumenes grew cold in his affection to the Romans; or whether this King began when it was too late, to ſtand in fear leſt the fire, which he himſelf had helped to kindle, would ſhortly take hold on his own lodging; or whether the regard of mony were able to overſway all other paſſions; it is hard to determine: ſince they that had better means to know the truth, have not preciſely affirmed any certainty. One report is, That Eumenes did not ſo much as give any help to Martius: but coming to have joyned with him, in ſuch friendly manner as he did with the former Conſuls, was not entertained according to his liking; and thereupon returned home in ſuch anger, that he refuſed to leave behind him certain horſe of the Gallo-Greeks, being requeſted to have done it. If this were true, and that his brother Attalus tarrying behind with the Conſul, did the Romans good ſervice: then is the reaſon apparent, of the hatred, born afterward by the Senate to Eumenes, and the love to Attalus. But it is more generally received; that Eumenes gave a willing ear to Perſeus his deſire of accord, for meer deſire of gain.

And

And it might well be, that covetousnes drew him on, in the course, whereinto indignation first led him. Howsoever it befell; Perseus caused Eumenes to be sounded, and found him so tractable, that he was bold to solicite him by an Embassage. The tenour of his advertisements, both to Eumenes and Antiochus, was: That there could be no perfect love between a King and a free City: that the Romans had quarrel alike to all Kings, though they dealt with no more than one at a time, and used the help of one against another; that Philip was oppressed by them, with the help of Attalus; Antiochus, with the help of Philip and Eumenes; and now Perseus assailed with help of Eumenes and Prusias. Herewith he willed Eumenes to consider, that when Macedon was taken out of their way, they would be doing with him in Asia which lay next at hand; yea, that already they began to think better of Prusias, than of him. In like sort he admonished Antiochus, not to look for any good conclusion of his war with the Egyptian, so long as the Romans could make him give over, by denouncing their will and pleasure. Finally, he requested both of them, either to compell the Romans to surcease from their War upon Macedon; or else to hold them as common enemies unto all Kings. Antiochus lay far out of the Romans way: and therefore was little troubled with such remonstrances. Eumenes was more nearly toucht; and as he felt part of this to be true, so had he reason to stand in doubt of the rest. Yet when he should give answer, he began to offer a bargain of peace for mony. He thought the Romans to be no less weary, than Perseus was affraid. Wherefore he promised for his own part, That if he might have fifteen hundred Talents for withdrawing his hand from this war, then would he remain a Neuter therein: and that for some greater quantity of mony (how much I find not) he would also bring the Romans to condescend unto peace: and for assurance of his true meaning herein, he offered to give hostages. Perseus liked well to receive the hostages, but not to lay out the mony; especially before-hand, as was required. He would fain have peace with Rome, and not with Eumenes only. For procuring of this, he promised to be at any reasonable cost; but he would lay down the mony in the Temple at Samothrace: whence it should be delivered unto Eumenes, after that the peace was fully concluded and ratified. The Isle of Samothrace was Perseus his own: and therefore Eumenes thought the money no nearer to him, being there, than if it remained in Pella. Besides, his labour deserved somewhat, howsoever the business might happen to succeed: so that needs he would have part of his wages in prest. Thus the two Kings did no more, than lose time; and Eumenes grew suspected of the Romans, as a Traitor.

After the same manner dealt Perseus with King Gentius the Illyrian. He had attempted this Illyrian before; who dealt plainly, and said, That without mony he could not stir. Hereunto Perseus loved not to hearken; thinking, that his Treasures would serve at the last cast, to deliver him from all his fears. But when the Romans had gotten within Tempe, then did his fear urge him to prodigality; so as he agreed to pay three hundred Talents which Gentius demanded for a recompence. So the bargain was soon made, and pledges on both sides delivered for performance. This was openly done by Perseus, to the end that all his Army might have comfort, by such access of strength to their party. Presently upon the bargain made, Embassadours were sent to Rhodes, from both Perseus and Gentius: who desired the Rhodians, to take upon them, as Arbitrators, between Perseus and the Romans, and to bring the war to an end. The Rhodians thinking that Martius the Consul was no less desirous of peace than the Macedonian, arrogantly promised, that they, by their authority, would make peace; wishing the Kings to shew themselves conformable. But the Roman Senate, hearing proud words to the same effect, from the Rhodian Embassadors; gave an answer as disdainful, angry, and menacing, as they could devise: so as this vain glory of the Rhodians was thoroughly chastised; and more thoroughly should have been, if their submission had not been as humble, as their folly was proud. Such use of Gentius his friendship, made Perseus, without laying out one ounce of silver. Now fain he would have hastened this young and rash Illyrian to enter with all speed into the War: but then must the mony be hastened away. Pantauchus the Macedonian Embassadour, who remained with Gentius, exhorted him daily to begin the War by Land and Sea, whilest the Romans were unprovided. But finding what it was that made all to stay; he sent word to Perseus. Hereupon ten Talents were sent to Pantauchus: who delivered it to the young King, as Earnest of that which followed. More followed indeed; and sealed up with the seal of the Illyrians, but carryed by Macedonians, and not too fast. Before this mony came into Illyria, Gentius had laid hands upon two Roman Embassadours, and cast them into prison.

Which

Which Perſeus no ſooner heard, than he recalled his Treaſure-bearers, and ſent them with their load to Pella; for that now the Illyrian was of neceſſity to make war with the Romans, whether he were hired thereto or not.

There came about the ſame time through Illyria, to the aid of Perſeus, under one Clondicus, a petty King, ten thouſand horſe, and ten thouſand foot of the Gauls, which were (as Plutarch hath it) the Baſtarnæ. Theſe had before-hand made their bargain, and were to receive preſent pay at the firſt. At their entry into the Kingdom, Perſeus ſent one to them; deſiring their Captains to come viſit him, whom he promiſed to gratifie with goodly rewards; hoping that the multitude would take good words for payment. But the firſt queſtion that their General aſked, was, Whether the King had ſent money to give their Souldiers their pay in hand, according to his bargain? Hereto the meſſenger had not what to anſwer. Why then (ſaid Clondicus) tell thy Maſter, that the Gauls will not ſtir one foot further, until they have gold, as was agreed, and hoſtages. Perſeus hereupon took counſel: if to utter his own opinion before men ſo wiſe that they would not contradict him, were to take counſel. He made an invective againſt the incivility and avarice of the Baſtarnæ: who came with ſuch numbers, as could not but be dangerous to him and to his Kingdom. Five thouſand horſe of them he ſaid would be as many as he ſhould need to uſe; and not ſo many, that he ſhould need to fear them. It had been well done, if any of his Counſellors would have told him, That there wanted not employment for the whole Army of them, ſince without any danger to the Kingdom, they might be let out, by the way of Perræbia, into Theſſaly: where, waſting the Country, and filling themſelves with ſpoil, they ſhould make the Romans glad to forſake Tempe, even for hunger and all manner of want; therein doing the King notable ſervice, whether they won any victory or not. This, and a great deal more, might have been alledged, if any man had dared to give advice freely. In concluſion, Antigonus, the ſame meſſenger that had been with them before, was ſent again, to let them know the Kings mind. He did his errand: upon which followed a great murmure of thoſe many thouſands that had been drawn ſo far to no purpoſe. But Clondicus aſked him now again, Whether he had brought the mony along with him to pay thoſe five thouſand, whom the King would entertain. Hereto when it was perceived that Antigonus could make no better anſwer, than ſhifting excuſes, the Baſtarnæ returned preſently towards Danubius, waſting the neighbour-parts of Thrace; yet ſuffering this crafty meſſenger to eſcape unhurt: which was more than he could have well expected.

Thus dealt Perſeus, like a careſull Treaſurer, and one that would preſerve his mony for the Romans, without diminiſhing the ſumm. But of this painful Office he was very ſoon diſcharged by L. Æmylius Paulus the new Conſul: who in fifteen daies after his ſetting forth from Italy, brought the Kingdom of Macedon to that end, for which God had appointed over it a King ſo fooliſh and ſo cowardly.

§. VIII.

Of L. Æmilius Paulus the Conſul. His journey. He forceth Perſeus to diſcamp. He will not hazard battel with any diſadvantage. Of an Eclipſe of the Moon. Æmylius his ſuperſtition. The battel of Pydna. Perſeus his flight. He forſakes his Kingdom: which haſtily yeelds to Æmylius. Perſeus at Samothrace. He yeelds himſelf to the Roman Admiral, and is ſent priſoner to Æmylius.

BY the War of Macedon, the Romans hitherto had gotten much diſhonour. Which, though it were not accompanied with any danger, yet the indignity ſo moved them, that either * they decreed that Province to L. Æmylius Paulus, without putting it, as was otherwiſe their manner, to the chance of lot, between him and his fellow-Conſul; or at leaſt were gladder that the lot had caſt it upon him, than that ſo worthy a man was advanced to the dignity of a ſecond Conſulſhip. He refuſed to propound unto the Senate any thing that concerned his Province; until by Embaſſdours, thither ſent to view the eſtate of the War, it was perfectly underſtood, in what condition both the Roman Forces, and the Macedonan, at the preſent remained. This being throughly known to be ſuch, as hath been already told, the Senate appointed a ſtrong ſupply, not only to the Conſul, but unto the Navy, and likewiſe to the Army that lay between Illyria and Epirus; from which App. Claudius was removed, and L. Anicius ſent thither in his place. Æmylius, before his departure from Rome, making an Oration to the people, as was the cuſtom, ſpake with much gravity and authority. He requeſted thoſe that thought themſelves wiſe enough to manage this War; either to accompany him into Macedon, and there assist him with their advice; or else to govern their tongues at home, and not take upon them to give directions by hear-say, and censure by idle reports: for he told them plainly, that he would frame his doings to occasion not to the expectation of the multitude. The like speech of his Father L. Æmylius, who died valiantly in the battel of Canna might well be living in some of their memories; which was enough to make them conform themselves the more gladly unto the instructions given by a wise and resolute Consul.

All his business within the City being dispatched, Æmylius was honourably attended at his setting forth on his journey, with an especial hope of men, that he should finish the war: though that he should finish it so soon and happily, was more than could have been hoped or imagined. He came to Brundusium: whence, when the wind came fair, he set sail at break of day, and arrived safely at the Isle of Corcyra before night. Thence passed he to Delphi: where having done sacrifice to Apollo, after the fifth day he set forwards to the Camp, and was there in five daies more. So are there but five of the fifteen daies remaining, in which he finished the War.

Perseus lay strongly encamped at Dium: having spared no labour of men and of women to fortifie the banks of Enipeus, where it was foordable in dry weather: so as there was little hope or room, to force him; and consequently, as little possibility to enter that way into Macedon. One great inconvenience troubling the Romans, and much disabling them to make attempt upon Dium, was lack of fresh water. For there were ten miles between Dium and Tempe; all the way lying between the Seashore and the foot of Olympus, without any Brook or Spring breaking forth on that side. But Æmylius found present remedy for this, by digging Wells on the shore; where he found sweet Springs: as commonly there is no shore that wants them, though they rise not above the ground. Want of this knowledge was enough to hinder Martius from taking up his lodging any nearer to the Enemy, than the Town of Heraclea, on the River of Peneus; where he had watering at pleasure, but could perform no service of any worth. Yet when the Roman Camp had such means to lye close to the Macedonian, as it presently did, the passage onward being defended as hath been shewed, seemed no less difficult than before. Wherefore it was necessary to search another way: which by enquiry was soon found out. There was a narrow passage over Olympus, leading into Perræbia; hard of ascent, but slenderly guarded, and therefore promising a fair journey. Martius either had not been informed hereof, or durst not attempt it; or perhaps could not get his Souldiers to make the adventure; they fearing lest it would prove such a piece of work as had been their march over Ossa into Tempe. But Paulus was a man of greater industry, courage, and ability to command. He had reformed, even at his first coming, many disorders in the Roman Camp: teaching the souldiers among other good lessons, to be obedient and ready in execution; without troubling themselves, as had been their manner, to examine the doings and purposes of their General. And now he appointed about five thousand men to this enterprise; whereof he committed the charge unto Scipio Æmylianus and Q. Fabius Maximus, his own Sons by nature; but adopted, the one of them, by a Son of Scipio the African; the other, by one of the Fabii. Scipio took with him some light-armed Thracians and Cretians; but his main strength was of Legionaries. For the Kings guard, upon the mountain, consisted in a manner, wholly of Archers and Slingers; who though, at some distance they might do notable service against those that should climb up unto them; yet when the darkness took away their aim, they were like to make a bad nights work, being to deal with those that were armed to fight at hand. To conceal the business about which they went, Scipio and Fabius took a wrong way towards the Fleet: where victuals were provided for their journey: it being noised, that they were to run along the coasts of Macedon by sea, and waste the Country. All the way they were passing the mountains (which was about three daies) the Consul made shew of a meaning to set upon Perseus where he lay, rather to divert the Kings attention from that which was his main Enterprise, than upon any hope to do good, in seeking to get over Enipeus. The channel of Enipeus, which received in Winter time a great fall of waters from the mountains, was exceeding deep and broad; and the ground of it was such, as though at the present it lay well-near all dry, yet it served not for those that were weightily armed to fight upon. Wherefore Emylius employed none save his Velites; of whom the Kings light armature had advantage at far distance, though the Romans were better appointed for the close. The Engines from off the Towers which Perseus had raised on his own bank, did also beat upon the Romans, and gave them to understand, that their labour was in vain.

Yet

Yet Æmylius perſiſted as he had begun: and recontinued his aſſault, ſuch as it could be, the ſecond day. This might have ſerved to teach the Macedonians, that ſome greater work was in hand: ſince otherwiſe a good Captain, as Æmylius was known to be, would not have troubled himſelf with making ſuch bravado's, that were ſomewhat coſtly. But Perſeus lookt only unto that which was before his eyes: until his men, that came running fearfully down the Mountain, brought word into the Camp, that the Romans were following at their backs. Then was all full of tumult, and the King himſelf no leſs (if not more) amazed than any of the reſt. Order was forthwith given to diſlodge: or rather without order, in all tumultuous haſte, the Camp was broken up, and a ſpeedy retreat made to Pydna. Whether it were ſo, that they which had the cuſtody of the paſſage were taken ſleeping, or whether they were beaten by plain force, Scipio and Fabius had very good ſucceſs in their journey. It may well be, that they ſlept until the Romans came ſomewhat near to them; and then taking alarm, when their arrows and ſlings could do little ſervice, were beaten at handy-ſtrokes: ſo as the different relations that are cited by Plutarch out of Polybius, and an Epiſtle of Scipio, may each of them have been true. Thus was an open way cleared into Macedon: which had been effected by Martius in the year foregoing; but was cloſed up again through his not proſecuting ſo rich opportunity.

Perſeus was in an extream doubt what courſe to take, after this unhappy beginning. Some gave advice to man his Towns, and ſo to linger out the War: having been taught by the laſt years example, how reſolute the people were in making defence. But far worſe counſel prevailed: as generally it doth in turbulent and fearful deliberations. The King reſolved to put all at once to hazzard of battel: fearing belike to put himſelf into any one Town, leſt that ſhould be firſt of all beſieged; and he therein (as cowardly natures alwaies are jealous) not over-carefully relieved. This was even that ſame that Æmilius, or any invader, ſhould have deſired. So a place was choſen near unto Pydna, that ſerved well for the Phalanx, and had likewiſe on the ſides of it ſome pieces of higher ground, fit for the Archers and light armature. There he abode the coming of the enemy; who ſtayed not long behind him. As ſoon as the Romans had ſight of the Kings Army; which with greater fear than diſcretion, had haſted away from them, forſaking the Camp that was ſo notably well fortified: they deſired nothing more, than to give battel immediately: doubting leſt otherwiſe the King ſhould change his mind, and get further off. And to this effect Scipio brake with the Conſul; praying him not to loſe occaſion by delay. But Æmylius told him, that he ſpake like a young man; and therefore willed him to have patience. The Romans were tyred with their journey; had no Camp wherein to reſt themſelves; nor any thing there, ſave only the bare ground whereon they trod. For theſe, and the like reſpects, the Conſul made a ſtand: and ſhewing himſelf unto the Macedonian, who did the like, in order of battel, gave charge to have the Camp meaſured out and entrenched behind the Army; whereinto, at good leiſure, he fell back, without any manner of trouble. After a nights reſt, it was hoped both by the Romans and the Macedonians, that the matter ſhould be determined; each part thinking their own General to blame, for that they had not fought the ſame day. As for the King, he excuſed himſelf by the backwardneſs of the enemy, who advanced no further; but kept upon ground ſerving ill for the Phalanx: as on the other ſide, the Conſul had the reaſons before ſhewed, which he communicated to thoſe about him the next day.

That evening (which followed the third of September, by the Roman account) C. Sulpitius Gallus, a Colonel, or Tribune of a Legion, who had the former year been Prætor, foretold unto the Conſul, and (with his good liking) unto the Army, an Eclipſe of the Moon, which was to be the ſame night: willing the Souldiers not to be troubled therewith, for that it was natural, and might be known long before it was ſeen. It was the manner of the Romans, in ſuch Eclipſes to beats Pans of Braſs, and Baſons, as we do in following a ſwarm of Bees; thinking that thereby they did the Moon great eaſe, and helped her in her labour. But this prognoſtication of Sulpitius converted their ſuperſtition into admiration of his deep ſkill, when they ſaw it verified. Contrariwiſe, the Macedonians howled and made a great noiſe, as long as the Eclipſe laſted: rather perhaps becauſe it was their faſhion, than for that they were terrified therewith, as with a prodegie betokening their loſs: ſince their deſire to fight was no whit leſſened by it. I will not here ſtand to diſpute, Whether ſuch Eclipſes do ſignifie, or cauſe any alteration in civil affairs, & matters that have ſmall dependance on natural complexion: for the argument is too large. More worthy of obſervation it is, how ſuperſtitio tivates the wisdome of the wisest, where the help of true religion is wanting. Æmylius, though he were sufficiently instructed concerning this defect of the Moon, that it was no supernatural thing, nor above the reach of humane understanding, so as he should need to trouble himself with any devout regard thereof: yet could he not refrain from doing his duty to this moon, & congratulating with sacrifice her delivery, as soon as she shone out bright again: for which he is commended even by Plutarch, a sage Philosopher, as a godly and religious man. If Sulpitius perhaps did not assist him in this foolish devotion, yet it is like, that he being a Senator, and one of the Councel for war, was partaker the next morning in a sacrifice done to Hercules; which was no less foolish. For a great part of the day was vainly consumed, ere Hercules could be pleased with any sacrifice, and vouchsafe to shew tokens of good luck in the entrails of the beasts. At length, in the belly of the one and twentieth sacrifice, was found a promise of victory to Æmylius: but with condition, That he should not give the onset. Hercules was a Greek, and partial, as nearer in alliance to the Macedonian than to the Roman. Wherefore it had been better to call upon the new goddess, lately canonized at Alabanda; or upon Romulus, founder of their City, on whom the Romans had bestowed his Deity; or (if a God of elder date were more authentical) upon Mars the Father of Romulus, to whom belonged the guidance of military affairs; and who therefore would have limited his favour, with no injunctions contrary to the rules of war.

Now concerning the battel; Æmilius was throughly perswaded, that the King meant to abide it: for that otherwise he would no have stayed at Pydna, when as, a little before, his leisure served to retire whither he listed, the Romans being further off. In regard of this, and perhaps of the tokens appearing in the Sacrifices, the Consul thought that he might wait upon advantage, without making any great haste. Neither was it to be neglected, that the morning Sun was full in the Romans faces: which would be much to their hinderance all the forenoon. Since therefore Perseus kept his ground, that was commodious for the Phalanx, and Æmilius sent forth part of his men to bring in Wood and Fodder, there was no likelihood of fighting that day. But about ten of the clock in the morning, a small occasion brought to pass that, which whereto neither of the Generals had over earnest desire.

A Horse brake loose at watering, which two or three of the Roman Souldiers followed into the River, wading after him up to the knees. The Kings men lay on the further bank: whence a couple of Thracians ran into the Water, to draw this horse over to their own side. These fell to blows, as in a private quarrel; and one of the Thracians was slain. His Countrimen seeing this, hasted to revenge their fellows death, and followed those that had slain him over the River. Hereupon company came in, to help on each part, until the number grew such, as made it past a fray, and caused both the Armies to be careful of the event. In fine, each of the Generals placed his men in order of battel, accordingly as the manner of his Country, and the arms wherewith they served, did repuire. The ground was a flat level, save that on the sides a few hillocks were raised here and there; whereof each part might take what advantage it could. The Macedonians were the greater number, the Romans the better souldiers, and better appointed. Both the King and the Consul encouraged their men with lively words: which the present condition could bountifully affoord. But the King, having finished his Oration, and sent on his men, withdrew himself into Pydna: there to do sacrifice, as he pretended, unto Hercules. It is the less marvel, that he durst adventure battel, since he had bethought himself of such a stratageme, whereby to save his own person. As for Hercules, he liked not the sacrifice of a Coward: whose unseasonable devotion could be no better then hypocrisie. For he that will pray for a good Harvest, ought also Plough, Sow, and Weed his Ground. When therefore the King returned to the battel, he found it no better than lost: and he in looking to his own safety, caused it to be lost altogether, by beginning the flight.

The acts of this day, such as we find recorded are, That the Roman Elephants, could do no manner of good: That the Macedonian Phalanx did so stoutly press onwards, and beat off all which came before it, as Æmylius was thereat much astonished, that the Peligni rushing desperately on the Phalanx, were over-born; many of them slain, and the squadrons following them so discouraged herewith, as they retired apace towards an hill. These were the things that fell out averse to the Romans; and which the Consul beholding, is said to have rent his Coat-armour for grief. If the King with all his power of horse, had in like manner done his devoyre, the victory might have been his own. That which turned the fortune of the battel, was the same which doubtless the Consul ſul expected, even from the beginning: the difficulty or almoſt the impoſſibility of holding the Phalanx long in order. For whileſt ſome of the Romans ſmall battalions preſſed hard upon one part of it, and other recoyled from it; it was neceſſary (if the Macedonians would follow upon thoſe which were put to the worſe) that ſome files having open way before them, ſhould advance themſelves beyond the reſt that were held at a ſtand. This coming ſo to paſs, admoniſhed the Conſul, what was to be done. The long Pikes of the Macedonians were of little uſe, when they were charged in flank by the Roman Targettires; according to the direction given by Æmylius, when he ſaw the front of the enemies great battel become unequal, and the ranks in ſome places open, by reaſon of the unequal reſiſtance which they found. Thus was the uſe of the Phalanx proved unavailable againſt many ſmall Squadrons, as it had been formerly in the battel of Cynoſcephalæ: yea this form of embattailing was found unſerviceable againſt the other, by reaſon, that being not every where alike diſtreſſed, it would break of it ſelf; though here were little ſuch inconvenience of ground, as had been at Cynoſcephalæ.

Perſeus, when he ſaw his battel begin to rout, turned his bridle preſently, and ran amain towards Pella. All his Horſe eſcaped, in a manner untouched, and a great number followed him; the little harm which they had taken, witneſſing the little good ſervice which they had done. As for the poor foot, they were left to the mercy of the Enemy: who ſlew above twenty thouſand of them; though having little cauſe to be furious, as having loſt in that battel, only ſome fourſcore, or ſixſcore men at the moſt. Some of the foot, eſcaping from the execution, overtook the King and his company in a Wood, where they fell to railing at the Horſemen, calling them cowards, traitors, and ſuch other names, till at length they fell to blows. The King was in doubt leſt they had ill meaning to himſelf: and therefore turned out of the common way being followed by ſuch as thought it good. The reſt of the company diſperſed themſelves: every one as his own occaſions guided him. Of thoſe that kept along with their King, the number began within a while to leſſen. For he fell to deviſing upon whom he might lay the blame of that daies misfortune, which was moſt due to himſelf: thereby cauſing thoſe that knew his nature, to ſhrink away from him, how they could. At his coming to Pella, he found his Pages and houſhold-ſervants, ready to attend him, as they had been wont. But of his great men that had eſcaped from the battel, there was none appearing in the Court. In this melancholy time, there were two of his Treaſurers that had the boldneſs to come to him, and tell him roundly of his faults. But in reward of their unſeaſonable admonitions, he ſtabbed them both to death. After this, none whom he ſent for would come at him. This boded no good. Wherefore ſtanding in fear, leſt they that refuſed to come at his call, would ſhortly dare ſome greater miſchief, he ſtole out of Pella by night. Of his friends he had with him only Evander (who had been employed to kill Eumenes at Delphi) and two other. There followed him likewiſe about 500. Cretians, more for love of his money than of him. To theſe he gave of his plate, as much as was worth about fifty talents, though ſhortly he couſened them of ſome part thereof; making ſhew as if he would have redeemed it, but never paying the money. The third day after the battel he came to Amphipolis, where he exhorted the Townſ-men to fidelity, with tears: and his own ſpeech being hindered by tears, he appointed Evander to ſpeak what himſelf would have uttered. But the Amphilopitans made it their chief care to look well to themſelves. Upon the firſt fame of the overthrow, they had emptied their Town of two thouſand Thracians that lay there in Garriſon: ſending them forth under colour of a gainful employment, and ſhutting the gates after them. And now to be rid of the King, they plainly bad Evander to be gone. The King hearing this, had no mind to tarry: but embarking himſelf and the treaſure which he had there, in certain veſſels that he found in the River Strymon; paſſed over the Iſle of Samothrace: where he hoped to live ſafe, by priviledges of the Religious Sanctuary therein.

Theſe miſerable ſhifts of the King make it the leſs doubtful, how all the Kingdom fell into the power of Æmilius, within ſo few daies after his victory. Pydna, which was neareſt at hand, was the laſt that yielded. About ſix thouſand of the ſouldiers, that were of ſundry Nations, fled out of the battel into that Town; and prepared for defence: the confuſed rabble of ſo many ſtrangers hindering all deliberation and conſent. Hippius, who had kept the paſſage over Oſſa againſt Martius, with Pantaucus, who had been ſent Embaſſador to Gentius the Illyrian, were the firſt that came in: yielding themſelves, and the Town of Beræa, whither they had retired out of the battel. With the like meſſage came others from Theſſalonica, from Pella, and from all the Towns of Macedon, within two daies: the loſs of the head bereaving the whole body of all ſenſe and ſtrength. Neither did they of Pydna, ſtand out any longer, when they knew that the King had forſaken his Country: but opened their gates upon ſuch terms, that the ſack of it was granted to the Roman Army. Æmylius ſent abroad into the Country, ſuch as he thought meeeteſt, to take charge of other Cities: he himſelf marching towards Pella. He found in Pella no more than three hundred Talents: the ſame, whereof Perſeus had lately defrauded the Illyrian. But within a very little while he ſhall have more.

It was ſoon underſtood, that Perſeus had taken Sanctuary in the Temple at Samothrace: his own Letters to the Conſul confirming the report. He ſent theſe Letters by perſons of ſuch mean condition, that his caſe was pitied, for that he wanted the ſervice of better men. The ſcope of this writing was to deſire favour: which, though he begged in terms ill beſeeming a King, yet ſince the inſcription of his Epiſtle was, King Perſeus to the Conſul Paulus; the Conſul, who had taken from him his Kingdom, and would not allow him to retain the Title, refuſed to make any anſwer thereunto. So there came other Letters, as humble as could be expected: whereby he craved and obtained, that ſome might be ſent to confer with him about matters of his preſent eſtate. Nevertheleſs, in this Conference, he was marvellouſly earneſt, that he might be allowed ſtill to retain the name of King. And to this end it was, perhaps, that he had ſo carefully preſerved his Treaſure, unto the very laſt: flattering himſelf with ſuch vain hopes as theſe: That the Romans would neither violate a Sanctuary, nor yet neglect thoſe great riches in his poſſeſſion; but compound with him for money, letting him have his deſire to live at eaſe, and to be called King. Yea, it ſeems that he had indeed, even from the beginning, a deſire to live in this Iſle of Samothrace: both for that in one of his conſultations about the War, he was dehorted by his friends, from ſeeking to exchange his Kingdom of Macedon, for *ſuch a paltry Iſland; and for that he offered to lay up the money which Eumenes demanded, in the holy Temple that was there. But he finds it otherwiſe. They urge him to give place unto neceſſity, and, without more adoe, to yield to the diſcretion and mercy of the people of Rome. This is ſo far againſt his mind, that the Conference breaks off without effect. Preſently there arrives at Samothrace Cn. Octavius the Roman Admiral with his Fleet: who aſſayes, as well by terrible threats, as by fair language, to draw the King out of his lurking hole; wherein, for fear of impriſonment, he had now already impriſoned himſelf. When all would not ſerve, a queſtion was moved to the Samothracians; How they durſt pollute their Temple, by receiving into it one that had violated the like holy priviledge of Sanctuary, by attempting the murder of King Eumenes at Delphi? This went to the quick. The Samothracians, being now in the power of the Romans, take this matter to heart; and ſend word to the King, that Evander, who lives with him in the Temple, is accuſed of an impious fact, committed at Delphi, whereof unleſs he can clear himſelf in judgement, he muſt not be ſuffered to prophane that holy place, by his abiding in it. The reverence born to his Majeſty, now paſt, makes them forbear to ſay, that Perſeus himſelf is charged with the ſame crime. But what will this avail, when the Miniſter of the fact being brought into judgement, ſhall (as is to be feared) appeach the Author? Perſeus therefore willeth Evander to have conſideration of the little favour that can be expected at the Romans hand; who are like to be preſidents and overſeers of this judgment: ſo as it were better to dye valiantly, ſince none other hope remains, than hope to make good an ill cauſe; where, though he had a good plea, yet it could not help him. Of this motion Evander ſeems to like well: and either kills himſelf, or hoping to eſcape thence, by deferring the time as it were to get poyſon wherewith to end his life, is killed by the Kings commandment. The death of this man, who had ſtuck to Perſeus in all times of need, makes all the Kings friends that remained hitherto, to forſake him: ſo as none are left with him, ſave his wife and children, with his Pages. It is much to be ſuſpected, that they which leave him upon this occaſion, will tell perillous tales, and ſay, That the King hath loſt the priviledge of this holy Sanctuary, by murdering Evander therein. Or if the Romans will affirm ſo much, who ſhall dare to gainſay them? Since therefore there is nothing but a point of formality, and even that alſo liable to diſpute, which preſerves him from captivity; he purpoſeth to make an eſcape, and fly, with his Treaſures, unto Coyts his good friend, into Thrace. Oroandes, a Cretian, lay at Samothrace with one ſhip; who eaſily was perſwaded to wait the King thence. With all secrecy the Kings money, as much as could be so conveyed, was carryed aboord by night; and the King himself; with his wife and * children (if rather it were not true, that he had with him only * Philip his elder Son, who was only by adoption his Son, being his * brother by nature) with much ado got out at a window by a Rope, and over a mud-wall. At his coming to the Sea-side, he found no Oroandes there: the Cretian had played a Cretian trick, and was gone with the money to his own home. So it began to wax clear day, whilest Perseus was searching all along the shore: who had stayed so long about this, that he might fear to be intercepted ere he could recover the Temple. He ran therefore amain towards his lodging: and thinking it not safe to enter it the common way, lest he should be taken, he hid himself in an obscure corner. His Pages missing him, ran up and down making inquiry; till Octavius made Proclamation, That all the Kings Pages, and Macedonians whatsoever, abiding with their Master in Samothrace, should have their lives and liberty, with all to them belonging, which they had either in that Isle, or at home in Macedon, conditionally, That they should presently yield themselves to the Romans. Hereupon they all came in. Likewise Ion, a Thessalonian, to whom the King had given the custody of his children, delivered them up to Octavius. Lastly, Perseus himself, with his Son Philip, accusing the gods of Samothrace, that had no better protected him, rendred himself, and made the Roman Victory compleat. If he had not trusted in those gods of Samothrace, but employed his whole care in the defence of Macedon, without other hope of living, than of reigning therein; he might well have brought this War to an happier end. Now, by dividing his cogitations, and pursuing at once, those contrary hopes of saving his Kingdom by Arms, and himself by flight, he is become a spectacle of misery, and one among the number of those Princes, that have been wretched by their own default. He was presently sent away to Æmylius; before whom he fell to the ground so basely, that he seemed thereby to dishonour the Victory over himself, as gotten upon one of abject quality, and therefore the less to be esteemed. Æmylius used to him the language of a gentle Victor: blaming him, though mildly, for having, with so hostile a mind, made war upon the Romans. Hereto good answer might have been returned by one of better spirit. As for Perseus, he answered all with a fearful silence. He was comforted with hope of life, or (as the Consul termed it) almost assurance; for that such was the mercy of the people at Rome. After these good words, being invited to the Consuls Table, and respectively entreated, he was committed prisoner to Q. Ælius.

King

Such end had this Macedonian War, after four years continuance: and such end therewithall had the Kingdom of Macedon; the glory whereof, that had sometime filled all parts of the world then known, was now translated unto Rome.

Gentius King of the Illyrians taken by the Romans.

ABout the same time, and with like celerity, Anicius the Romans Prætor, who succeeded unto App. Claudius, had the like success against King Gentius the Illyrian. Gentius had an Army of fifteen thousand; with which he was at Lissus, ready to assist King Perseus as soon as the money should come, whereof he had received only ten Talents. But Anicius arrested him on the way, fought with him, overcame him, and drave him into * Scorda. This Town was very defensible by nature, besides the help of fortification; and strongly manned with all the force of Illyria; which, assisted with the Kings presence, made it seem unpossible to be won, in any not a very long time. Yet Anicius was confident in his late Victory; and therefore presented his Army before the walls, making countenance to give an assault. The Illyrians, that might easie have defended themselves within the Town, would needs issue forth and fight. They were, it seems, rather passionate, than couragious: for they were beaten; and thereupon forthwith began amazed to treat about yielding. The King sent Embassadours; by whom, at first, he desired truce for three daies; that he might deliberate concerning his estate. It ill became him, who had laid violent hands on the Roman Embassadours, to have recourse to such mediation. But he thought his own fault pardonable, in as much as hitherto there was no greater harm done by him, than the casting of those Embassadours into prison, where they were all alive. Having obtained three daies respite, he passed up a River, within half a mile of the Roman Camp, into the Lake of Scorda, as it were to consult the more privately; though indeed deed, to hearken whether the report were true, the his brother Caravantius was coming to his rescue. Finding that no such help was toward, it is wonder, that he was so foolish as to return into Scorda. He sent messengers craving access unto the Prætor; before whom, having lamented his folly past (which, excepting the dishonesty, was not so great as his folly present) he fell down humbly, and yeilded himself to discretion. All the Towns of his Kingdom, together with his wife, children, brother, friends, were presently given up. So this War ended in thirty daies: the people of Rome not knowing that it was begun, until Perpenna, one of the Embassadours that had been imprisoned, brought word from Anicius how all had passed.

How the Romans behaved themselves in Greece and Macedon after their Victory over Perseus.

NOW began the Romans to swell with the pride of their fortune; and to look Tyrannically upon those that had been unmannerly toward them before, whilest the War with Perseus seemed full of danger. The Rhodian Embassadours were still at Rome, when the tydings of these Victories were brought thither. Wherefore it was thought good to call them into the Senate, and bid them do their errand again. This they performed with a bad grace; saying, That they were sent from Rhodes to make an overture of peace; forasmuch as it was thought, that this war was no less grievous to the Romans themselves, than to the Macedonians and many others: but that now they were very glad, and in behalf of the Romans did congratulate with the Senate and people of Rome, that it was ended much more happily than had been expected. Hereto the Senate made answer, That the Rhodians had sent this Embassage to Rome, not for love of Rome, but in favour of the Macedonian; whose partizans they were, and should so be taken. By these threats, and the desire of some (covetous of the charge) to have War proclaimed against Rhodes; the Embassadours were so affrighted, that in mourning Apparel, as humble Suppliants, they went about the City, beseeching all men, especially the great Ones, to pardon their indiscretion, and not to prosecute them with vengeance, for some foolish words. This danger of War from Rome being known at Rhodes, all that had been any whit averse from the Romans in the late War of Macedon, were either taken and condemned, or sent prisoners to Rome; excepting some that slew themselves for fear, whose goods also were confiscated. Yet this procured little grace; and less would have done, if old M. Cato, a man by nature vehement, had not uttered a milde sentence, and advertised the Senate, That in decreeing War against Rhodes, they should much dishonour themselves, and make it thought, that * rather the wealth of that City, which they were greedy to ransack, than any just cause, had moved them thereto. This consideration, together with their good deserts in the Wars of Philip and Antiochus, helped well the Rhodians: among whom, none of any mark remained alive, save those that had been of the Roman faction. All which notwithstanding, many years passed, ere by importunate suit, they could be admitted into the society of the Romans: a favour which till now they had not esteemed; but thought themselves better without it, as equal friends.

With the like, or greater severity, did the Romans make themselves terrible in all parts of Greece. Æmylius himself made progress thorow the Country; visiting all the famous places therein, as for his pleasure: yet not forgetting to make them understand what power he had over them. More than five hundred of the chief Citizens in Demetrias were slain at one time by those of the Roman faction, and with help of the Roman Souldiers. Others fled, or were banished, and their goods confiscated. Of which things, when complaint was made to the Consul, the redress was such, as requited not the pains of supplication. His friends, that is to say, those which betrayed unto the Romans the liberty of their Country, he feasted liked a King, with excessive chear; yet so, that he had all things very cheap in his Camp: an easie matter, since no man durst be backward in sending provisions, nor set on them the due price. Embassadours likewise were sent from Rome; some, to give order for settling the estate of Macedon, towards which they had more particular instruction from the Senate, than was usual in such case; and some, to visit the affairs of Greece. The Kingdom of Macedon was set at liberty by Æmylius, and the Embassadours, his assistants, who had order therefore from the Senate. But this liberty was such as the Romans used to bestow. The best part of it was, That the Tribute which had been payed unto the Kings, was lessened by

by half. As for the reſt, the Country was divided into four parts, and they forbidden commerce one with the othere. All the Nobility were ſent captive into Italy with their wives and children, as many as were above fifteen years old. The ancient Laws of the Country were abrogated: and new given by Æmilius. Such miſchief the Senate thought it better to do at the firſt alteration of things in this Province, and in the time of Conqueſt, than otherwiſe to leave any inconvenience that ſhould be worſe in the future. But concerning the Greeks, that were not ſubject to Rome, the things done to them could deſerve no beetter name than meer tyranny: yea, and ſhameleſs perjury; were it not ſo, that the familiar cuſtom, among Princes and great Eſtates, of violating Leagues, doth make the Oaths of confœderation ſeem of no validity. The Embaſſadours that were ſent to viſit the Greeks, called before them all ſuch men of note, from every quarter, as had any way diſcovered an unſerviceable diſpoſition towards the Romans. Theſe they ſent to Rome; where they were made ſure enough. Some of theſe had ſent Letters to Perſeus, which fell at length into the Romans hands: and in that reſpect, though they were no ſubjects; yet wanted there not colour, for uſing them as traitors, or at leaſt as enemies. But ſince only two men were beheaded, for having been openly on the Macedonian ſide; and ſince it is confeſſed, that the good Patriots were no leſs afflicted in this inquiſition, than they that had ſold themſelves to the King: this manner of proceeding was inexcuſable tyranny. With the Achæans theſe Embaſſadours were to deal more formally: not ſo much becauſe that Common-wealth was ſtrong; (though this were to be regarded by them, having no Commiſſion to make or denounce War) and like to prove untractable, if manifeſt wrong were offered; as for that there appeared no manner of ſign, by Letters, or otherwiſe, whereby any one of the Achæans could be ſuſpiciouſly charged to have held correſpondence with the Macedonian. It was alſo ſo, that neither Callicrates, nor any of his adherents, had been employed by the Nation, in doing or offering their ſervice to the Romans; but only ſuch as were the beſt Patriots. Yet would not therefore the Embaſſadours neglect to uſe the benefit of the time: wherein, ſince all men trembled for fear of Rome, the ſeaſon ſerved not to rank the Achæans with the reſt. And hereto Callicrates was very urgent: fearing, and procuring them to fear in behalf of him and his friends, that if ſome ſharp order were not now taken, he and his fellows ſhould be made to pay for their miſchievous devices, ere long time paſſed. So the Embaſſadours came among the Achæans: where one of them, in open aſſembly of the Nation, ſpake, as Callicrates had before inſtructed him. He ſaid, That ſome of the chief among them, had with mony and other means befriended Perſeus. This being ſo, he deſired that all ſuch men might be condemned; whom, after ſentence given, he would name unto them. After ſentence given (cryed out the whole aſſembly) what juſtice were this? Name them firſt, and let them anſwer; which if they cannot well do, we will ſoon condemn them: Then ſaid the Roman boldly, That all their Prætors, as many as had led their Armies, were guilty of this crime. If this were true, ſaid Xenon, a temperate man, and confident in his innocence, than ſhould I likewiſe have been friend to Perſeus: whereof, if any man can accuſe me, I ſhall throughly anſwer him, either here preſently, or before the Senate at Rome. Upon theſe words of Xenon the Embaſſadour laid hold, and ſaid, That even ſo it were the beſt way, for him and the reſt to purge themſelves before the Senate at Rome. Then began he to name others, and left not until he had cited above a thouſand; willing them to appear and anſwer before the Senate. This might even be termed the captivity of Greece; wherein ſo many of the honeſteſt and worthieſt men were carried from home, for none other cauſe, than their love unto their Country; to be puniſhed according to the will of thoſe, who could not endure, that virtue, and regard of the publick liberty, ſhould dwell together in any of the Greeks. At their coming to Rome, they were all caſt into priſon, as men already condemned by the Achæans. Many Embaſſages were ſent from Achaia (where it is to be wondred, that any ſuch honeſt care of theſe innocent men could be remaining: ſince honeſty had been thus puniſhed as a vice, in ſo many of the worthieſt among them) to inform the Senate, that theſe men were neither condemned by the Achæans, nor yet held to be offenders. But in ſtead of better anſwer, it was pronounced; That the Senate thought it not expedient for the Country, that theſe men ſhould return into Achaia. Neither could any ſolicitation ſolicitation of the Achæans, who never ceaſed to importune the Senate for their liberty, prevail at all; until after ſeventeen years, fewer than thirty of them were inlarged, of whom that wiſe and virtuous man Polybius the great Hiſtorian, was one. All the reſt were either dead in priſon, or, having made offer to eſcape, whether upon the way before they came to Rome, or whether out of Jayle, after that they were committed thereto, ſuffered death as malefactors.

This was a gentle correction, in regard of what was done upon the Epirots. For the Senate being deſirous to preſerve the Macedonian Treaſure whole; yet withall, to gratifie the Souldiers, gave order, that the whole Country of Epirus ſhould be put to ſack. This was a barbarous and horrible cruelty; as alſo it was performed by Æmylius with miſchievous ſubtilty. Having taken leave of the Greeks, and of the Macedonians, with bidding them well to uſe the liberty beſtowed upon them by the people of Rome; he ſent unto the Epirots for ten of the principal men out of every City. Theſe he commanded to deliver up all the Gold and Silver which they had; and ſent along with them, into every of their Towns, what companies of men he thought convenient, as it were to fetch the mony. But he gave ſecret inſtructions to the Captains, that upon a certain day by him appointed, they ſhould fall to ſack, every one the Town whereinto he was ſent. Thus in one day were threeſcore and ten Cities, all confederate with the Romans, ſpoiled by the Roman Souldiers; and beſides other acts of hoſtility in a time of peace, a hundred and fifty thouſand of that Nation made ſlaves. It may be granted, that ſome of the Epirots deſerved puniſhment, as having favoured Perſeus. But ſince they among this people, that were thought guilty of this offence; yea, or but coldly affected to the Romans, had been already ſent into Italy, there to receive their due; and ſince this Nation, in general, was not only at the preſent in good obedience, but had even in this War done good ſervice to the Romans: I hold this act ſo wicked, that I ſhould not believe it, had any one Writer delivered the contrary. But the truth being maniteſt by conſent of all, it is the leſs marvellous that God was pleaſed to make Æmylius childleſs, even in the glory of his triumph, how great ſoever otherwiſe his virtues were.

In ſuch manner dealt the Romans, after their victory, with the Greeks and Macedonians. How terrible they were to other Kingdoms abroad, it will appear by the efficacy of an Embaſſage ſent from them to Antiochus; whereof, before we ſpeak, we muſt ſay ſomewhat of Antiochus his foregoers, of himſelf, and of his affairs about which theſe Embaſſadours came.

§. XI.

The War of Antiochus upon Egypt brought to end by the Roman Embaſſadours.

ANtiochus the Great, after his peace with the Romans, did nothing that was memorable in the ſhort time following of his reign and life. He died the ſix and thirtieth year after he had worn a Crown, and in the ſeventeenth or eighteenth of Ptolomy Epiphanes; while he attempted to rob the Temple of Bel, or (according to Juſtine) of Jupiter. He left behind him three Sons, Seleucus, Philopator, Antiochus Epiphanes, Demetrius Soter; and one Daughter, Cleopatra, whom he had given in marriage to Ptolomy Epiphanes King of Egypt. Seleucus, the fourth of that name, and the eldeſt of Antiochus his Sons; reigned in Syria twelve years, according to Euſebius, Appian, and Sulpitius: though Joſephus give him but ſeven years. A Prince, who, as he was ſlothful by nature, ſo the great loſs which his Father Antiochus had received, took from him the means of managing any great affair. Of him, about three hundred years before his birth, Daniel gave this judgment, Et ſtabit in loco ejus viliſſimus & indignus decore regio. And in his place (ſpeaking of Antiochus, the Father of this man) ſhall ſtart up a vile perſon, unworthy the honour of a King. Under this Seleucus, thoſe things were done which are ſpoken of Onias the high Prieſt, in theſe words, and other to the ſame effect: What time as the holy City was inhabited with all peace, becauſe of the godlineſs of Onias the Prieſt, it came to paſs, that even the King did honour the place, and garniſhed the Temple with great gifts. And all that is written in the third Chapter of the ſecond of Maccabees, of Simon of Benjamin, who by Appollonius betrayed the Treaſure of the Temple: and of Heliodorus ſent by the King to ſeize them; of his miraculous ſtriking by God, and his recovery at the prayers of Onias; of the Kings death, and of his ſucceſſour Antiochus Epiphanes. It is therefore from the reign of this King, that the Books of the Maccabees take beginning.

ning. Which Books seem not to be delivered by one and the same hand. For the first Book, although it touch upon Alexander the Great, yet it hath nothing else of his story; nor of the acts of his successors, till the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, the brother and successor of this Seleucus, from whom downward to the death of Simon Maccabæus (who died in the hundred threescore and seventeen year of the Greeks in Syria) that first Book treateth. The Author of the second Book, although he take the story somewhat further off, by way of a Proœme, yet he endeth with the hundred and one and fiftieth year of the Grecian reign, and with the death of Nicanor, slain by Judas: remembring in the fourth Chapter the practice of Jason the brother of Onias; who, after the death of Seleucus, prevailed with Antiochus Epiphanes, his successor, for the Priesthood. It is also held by Jansenius, and other grave Writers, that it was in the time of this Onias, that Arius King of the Spartans sent Embassadours to the Jews, as to their brothers and kinsmen. Which intelligence between them and the Greeks, Jonathan the brother and successor of Judas, remembreth in the Preamble of that Epistle, which he himself directed to the people of Sparta by Numenius and Antipater his Embassadours, whom he employed at the same time to the Senate of Rome; repeating also the former Letters word by word, which Arius had sent to Onias the high Priest, whereto Josephus adds, that the name of the Lacedæmonian Embassadour was Demoteles, and that the Letters had a square Volume, and were sealed with an Eagle holding a Dragon in her claws.

1 Mac. 12. Sept. Evil. 26.

Now to this Seleucus, the fourth of that name, succeeded Antiochus Epiphanes, in the hundred and seven and thirtieth year of the Greeks in Syria. He was the second Son of the Great Antiochus: and he obtained his Kingdom by procuring the death of the King his brother; which also he usurped from his brothers Son.

Ptolomy Philometor, his Nepheww by his Sister Cleopatra, being then very young, had been about seven years King of Egypt.

Ptolomy Epiphanes, the Father of this King Philometor, had reigned in Egypt four and twenty year, in great quiet, but doing little or nothing that was memorable. Philip of Macedon, and the Great Antiochus, had agreed to divide his Kingdom between them, whilest he was a child. But they found such other business ere long with the Romans, as made them give over their unjust purpose; especially Antiochus, who gave with his Daughter in marriage, unto this Ptolomy, the Provinces of Celosyria, Phœnice, and Judæa, which he had won by his victory over Scopas, that was General of the Egyptian Forces in those parts. Nevertheless, Ptolomy adhered to the Romans: whereby he lived in the greater security. He left behind him two Sons, this Ptolomy Philometer, and Ptolomy Physcon; with a Daughter Cleopatra. Cleopatra was wife to the elder of her brethren, and after his death to the younger, by whom she was cast off, and her Daughter taken in her stead. Such were the marriages of these Egyptian Kings.

Ptolomy Philometer, so called (that is, the Lover of his Mother) by a bitter nickname, because he flew her, fell into hatred with his subjects, and was like to be chased out of his Kingdom, his younger brother being set up against him. Physcon having a strong party, got possession of Alexandria; and Philometer held himself in Memphis, craving succour of King Antiochus his Uncle. Hereof Antiochus was glad: who under colour to take upon him the protection of the young Prince, sought by all means possible to possess himself of that Kingdom. He sent Apollonius the Son of Mnestheus Embassadour into Egypt, and under colour to assist the Kings Coronation, he gave him instructions to perswade the Governours of the young King Philometor, to deliver the King his Nephew, with the principal places of that Kingdom, into his hands; petending an extraordinary care and desire of his Nephews safety and well doing. And the better to answer all arguments to the contrary, he prepared a forcible Army to attend him. Thus came he alongst the coast of Syria to Joppe, and from thence on the sudden he turned himself towards Jerusalem; where, by Jason the Priest, (a Chaplain fit for such a Patron) he was with all pomp and solemnity received into the City. For though lately, in the time of Seleucus, the brother and predecessor of Epiphanes, that impious Traitor Simon of the Tribe of Benjamin, Ruler of the Temple, when he would have delivered the Treasures thereof to Apollonius Governour of Cœlosyria and Phœnicia, was disappointed of his wicked purpose by miracle from Heaven; the said Apollonius being strucken by the Angel of God, and recovering again at the Prayer of Onias: yet sufficed not this example to terrifie terrifie others from the like ungodly practices. Presently upon the death of Seleucus, this Jason, the brother of Onias, seeking to supplant his brother, and to obtain 2 Mac. 4. the Priesthood for himself, offered unto the King three hundred and threescore Talents of silver, with other rents and summs of money. So he got his desire, though he not long enjoyed it.

This naughty dealing of Jason, and his being over-reached by another in the same kind, calls to mind a by-word taken up among the Achæans, when as that mischievous Callicrates, who had been too hard for all worthy and virtuous men, was beaten at his own weapon, by one of his own condition. It was thus:

One fire than other burns more forcibly,
One Wolf than other Wolves does bite more sore,
One Hawk than other Hawks more swift does fly:
So one most mischievous of men before,
Callicrates, false knave as knave might be,
Met with Menalcidas more false than he.

And even thus fell it out with Jason: who within three years after was betrayed, and over-bidden by Menelaus the brother of Simon, that for three hundred Talents more obtained the Priesthood for himself: Jason thereupon being forced to fly from Jerusalem, and to hide himself among the Ammonites.

From Jerusalem, Antiochus marched into Phœnicia, to augment the numbers of his men of war, and to prepare a Fleet for his expedition into Egypt; with which, and
1 Mac. 1. 17. with a mighty Army of Land-forces, He went about to reign over Egypt, that he might have the dominion of two Realms, and entred Egypt with a mighty company; with Chariots and Elephants, with Horsemen, and with a great Navy., and moved War against Ptolemæus King of Egypt; but Ptolemæus
V. 18, 19, 20, &c. was afraid of him, and fled, and many were wounded to death. He won many strong Cities, and took away the spoils of the Land of Egypt. Thus was fulfilled the Prophecy
Dan. 11. 24. of Daniel: He shall enter into the quiet and plentiful Provinces, and he shall do that which his fathers have not done, nor his Fathers Father. Never indeed had any of the Kings of Syria so great a victory over the Egyptians, nor took from them so great riches. For he gave a notable overthrow Hist. in Dan. to the Captains of Ptolomy, between Pelusium, and the Hill Cassius, after which he entred and sackt the greatest and richest of all the Cities of Egypt, Alexandria excepted, which he could not force. In conclusion, after that Antiochus had smitten Egypt, he turned again, and went up towards Israel and Jerusalem with a mighty people, and entred proudly into the Sanctuary, and took away the Golden Altar, and the Candlestick for the light, and all the instruments thereof, and the table of the Shewbread, and the pouring Vessels, and the Bolls, and the Golden Basons, and the Vail, and the Crowns, and the Golden Apparrel. He took also the Silver, and the Gold, and the precious Jewels, and the secret Treasures: and when he had taken away all, he departed into his own Land, after he had murdered many men. 1 Mac. 1. 1.

It was about the beginning of the Macedonian War, that Antiochus took in hand this Egyptian business. At what time he first laid claim to Cœlosyria, justifying his title by * the same allegations which his Father had made; and stiffly averting, that this Province had not been consigned over to the Egyptian, or given in dowry with Cleopatra. Easie it was to approve his right unto that which he had already gotten, when he was in a fair way to get all Egypt. The Achæans, Rhodians, Athenians, and other of the Greeks, pressed him, by several Embassages, to some good conclusion. But his answer was, that if the Alexandrians could be contented to receive their King his Nephew Philometor, the elder brother of the Ptolomies, then should the War be presently at an end; otherwise not. Yet when he saw that it was an hard piece of work to take Alexandria by force: he thought it better to let the two brothers consume themselves with intestine War, than by the terrour of his arms, threatning destruction unto both of them, to put into them any desire of coming to agreement. He therefore withdrew his Forces for the present; leaving the Ptolomies in very weak estate, the younger almost ruinated by his invasion; the elder hated and forsaken by his people. * Cap. 5. sect. 2. Polyb. l. 5. 81, 82, &c.

But how weak soever these Egyptians were, their hatred was thought to be so strong, that Antiochus might leave them to the prosecution thereof; and follow, at good leisure, his other business at Jerusalem, or elsewhere. So after the sack of Jerusalem, he rested him a while at Antioch, and then made a journey into Cilicia, to suppress the Rebellion of the Thracians and others in those parts, who had been given, as it were, by way of dowry to a Concubine of the Kings, called Antiochis. For Governour of Syria in his absence, he left one Andronichus, a man of great authority about him. In the mean while, Menelaus the brother of Simon, the ſame who had thruſt Jaſon out of the Prieſthood, and promiſed the King three hundred talents for an In-come; committing the charge of the Prieſthood to his brother Lyſimachus, ſtole certain Veſſels of Gold out of the Temple: whereof he preſented a part to Andronichus the Kings Lieutenant, and ſold the reſt at Tyre, and other Cities adjoyning. This he did, as it ſeemeth to advance the payment of the three hundred talents promiſed; the ſame being now by Soſtratus eagerly demanded. Hereof when Onias the Prieſt (formerly diſpoſſeſſed by Jaſon) had certain knowledge, being moved with zeal, and deteſting the ſacriledge of Menelaus, he reproved him for it; and fearing his revenge, he withdrew himſelf into a Sanctuary at Daphne.

Daphne was a place of delight adjoyning as a ſuburb to Antioch. In compaſs it had about ten miles: wherein were the Temples of Apollo and Diana, with a Grove, ſweet Springs, banquetting places, and the like; which were wholly, in a manner, abuſed to luſt, and other ſuch voluptuouſneſs. Whether it were well done of Onias to committ himſelf to the protection of Apollo and Diana, or to claim priviledge from the Holineſs of a ground conſecrated to any of the Heathen Gods, I will not ſtand to diſcourſe. Only I ſay for mine own opinion, that the inconvenience is far leſs, to hold this Book as Apocryphal, than to judge this fearful ſhift which Onias (though a vertuous man) made for his life, either commendable or allowable, as the Book ſeems to do. As for this refuge, it could not ſave the life of the poor old man: for Menelaus taking Andronicus apart, prayed him to ſlay Onias. So when he came to Onias, he counſelled him craftily, giving him his right hand with an oath, and perſwaded him to come out of the Sanctuary; ſo he ſlew him incontinently without any regard of righteouſneſs. Hereof when complaint was made to Antiochus after his return out of Cilicia, He took away Andronicus his garment of purple, and rent his clothes, and commanded him to be led throughout the City; and in the ſame place where he had committed the wickedneſs againſt Onias, he was ſlain as a murderer. In taking revenge of this innocent mans death, I ſhould have thought that this wicked King had once in his life time done Juſtice. But preſently after this, at the ſuit of one Ptolomy, a Traitor to Ptolomy Philometor, he condemned innocent men to death, who juſtly complained againſt Menelaus, and his brother Lyſimachus, for a ſecond robbing of the Temple, and carrying thence the Veſſels of Gold remaining. Hereby it is manifeſt, that he was guided by his own outragious will, and not by any regard of juſtice: ſince he revenged the death of Onias, he ſlew thoſe that were in the ſame cauſe with Onias; Who, had they told their cauſe, yea, before the Scythians, they ſhould have been heard as innocent. By reaſon of ſuch his unſteadineſs, this King was commonly termed Epimanes, that is, Mad, inſtead of Epiphanes, which ſignifieth Noble, or Illuſtrious. Joſeph. 12. Ant.

After this, Antiochus made preparation for a ſecond voyage into Egypt, and then were there ſeen throughout all the City of Jeruſalem, forty daies long, horſemen running in the air with robes of gold, and as bands of Spear-men, and as troops of Horſemen ſet in array, encountring and courſing one againſt another. Of theſe prodigious ſigns, or rather forewarnings of God, all Hiſtories have delivered us, ſome more, ſome leſs. Before the deſtruction of Jeruſalem by Veſpatian, a Star in the form of a ſword appeared in the Heavens directly over the City, after which there followed a ſlaughter like unto this of Epiphanes, though far greater. In the Cymbrian wars, Pliny tells us, that the Armies were ſeen fighting in the Air from the morning till the evening. 2 Mac. 5. 11 Plin. lib. 2. cap 57.

In the time of Pope John the eleventh, a fountain poured out blood in ſtead of water, in or near the City of Genoa; ſoon after which the City was taken by the Saracens, with great ſlaughter. Of theſe and the like prodigious ſigns, Vipera hath collected many, and very remarkable. But this one ſeemeth to me moſt memorable, becauſe the moſt notorious. All men know, that in the Emperour Nero, the off-ſpring of the Cæſars, as well natural as adopted, took end; whereof this notable ſign gave warning. Mercur. Vipere de Prodig. l. 8. Vipera de priſco & ſacro inſtituto.

When Livia was firſt married to Auguſtus, an Eagle let fall into her arms a white Hen, holding a Lawrel branch in her mouth. Livie cauſed this Hen to be carefully nouriſhed, and the Lawrel branch to be planted: of the Hen came a fair increaſe of white Poultry; and from the little branch there ſprang up in time a Grove of Lawrel; ſo that afterwards, in Suet. Galba.

all triumphs, the Conquerors did use to carry in their hands a branch of Bayes taken out of this Grove; and after the triumphs ended, to set it again in the same ground: which branches were observed, when they happened to wither, to foreshew the death of those persons who carried them in triumph. And in the last year of Nero, all the broods of the white Hens died, and the whole Grove of Bayes withered at once. Moreover, the heads of all the Cæsars Statues, and the Scepter placed in Augustus his hand, were stricken down with lightning. That the Jews did not think such strange signs to be unworthy of regard; it appears by their calling upon God, and praying, that these tokens might turn to good.

Now, as the first voyage of Antiochus into Egypt, was occasioned by discord of the two brethren therein reigning; so was this second Expedition caused by their good agreement. For the elder Ptolomy being left in Memphis, not strong enough to force his brother, who had defended Alexandria against all the power of their Uncle; thought it the best way to seek entrance into that royal City, rather by perswasion, than by arms. Physcon had not yet forgotten the terrour of the former siege: the Alexandrines, though they loved not Philometor, yet loved they worse to live in scarcity of victuals (which was already great among them, and like to grow extream) since nothing was brought in from the Country; and the friends of the younger brother saw no likelihood of good issue to be hoped for without reconciliation. These good helps, and above all these, the loving disposition of Cleopatra, who then was in Alexandria, encouraged Philometor, in his purpose. But that which made him earnestly desirous to accomplish it, was the fear wherein he stood of his Uncle. For though Antiochus was gone out of Egypt with his Army; yet had he left behind him a strong Garrison in Pelusium: retaining that City, which was the Key of Egypt to his own use. This consideration wrought also with Physcon, and with those that were about him; so as by the vehement mediation of Cleopatra their sister the two brethren made an end of all quarrels.

When the news of this accord was brought to Antiochus, he was greatly enraged: for notwithstanding that he had pretended no other thing than the establishment of the King Philometor his Nephew, and a meaning to subject his younger brother unto him, which he gave in answer to all Embassadours; yet he now prepared to make a sharp war upon them both. And to this end he presently furnished and sent out his Navy towards Cyprus, and drew his land Army into Cœlosyria, ready to enter Egypt the Spring following. When he was on his way as far as Rhinocorura, he met with Embassadors sent from Ptolomy. Their errand was partly to yield thanks to Antiochus for the establishing of Philometor in his Kingdom, partly to beseech him, That he would rather be pleased to signifie what he required to have done in Egypt, which should be performed, than to enter it as an enemy with so puissant an Army. But Antiochus returned this short answer, That he would neither call back his Fleet, nor withdraw his Army, upon any other condition; than that Ptolomy should surrender into his hands, together with the City of Pelusium, the whole Territory thereto belonging: and that he should also abandon and leave unto him the Isle of Cyprus, with all the right that he had unto either of them, for ever. For answer unto these demands, he set down a day certain, and a short one. Which being come and past, without any accord made, the Syrian Fleet entred Nilus, and recovered as well those places which appertained to Ptolomy in Arabia, as in Egypt it self; for Memphis, and all about it, received Antiochus, being unable to resist him. The King having now no stop in his way to Alexandria, passed on thitherwards by easie journeys.

Of all these troubles past, as well as of the present danger wherein Egypt stood, the Romans had notice long ago. But they found, or were contented to find, little reason for them to intermeddle therein. For it was a Civil war: and wherein Antiochus seemed to take part with the juster cause. Yet they gave signification, that it would be much displeasing unto them, to have the Kingdom of Egypt taken from the rightful owners. More they could not, or would not do; being troubled with Perseus; and therefore loth to provoke Antiochus too far. Nevertheless, the Egyptian Kings being reconciled, and standing joyntly in need of help against their Uncle, who prepared and made open war against them both: it was to be expected, that not only the Romans, but many of the Greeks, as being thereto obliged by notable benefits, should arm in defence fence of their Kingdom. Rome had been ſuſtained with food from Egypt, in the War of Hannibal; when Italy, lying waſte, had neither corn nor mony wherewith to buy ſufficient ſtore. By help of the Egyptians had Aratus laid the foundation of that greatneſs, whereto the Achæans attained. And by the like help had Rhodes been defended againſt Demetrius Poliorcets. Neither were theſe friendly turns, which that bountiful houſe of the Ptolomyes had done for ſundry people abroad; ill followed, or ſeconded, by others as bad in requital: but with continuance of ſuitable beneficence, from time to time encreaſed. Wherefore the two brothers ſent abroad confidently for aid; eſpecially to the Rhodians and Achæans, who ſeemed moſt able to give it effectually. To the Romans, Phyſcon and Cleopatra had ſent, a year ſince: but their Embaſſadours lay ſtill in Rome. Of the Achæans they deſired in particular, that Lycortas the brave Warriour might be ſent unto them, as General of all the Auxiliaries, and his Son Polybius, General of the Horſe. Hereunto the Achæans readily condeſcended: and would immediately have made performance, if Callicrates had not interpoſed his miſchievous Art. He, whether ſeeking occaſion to vaunt his obſequiouſneſs to the Romans, or much rather envying thoſe Noble Captains whoſe ſervice the Kings deſired; withſtood the common voice: which was, That their Nation ſhould, not with ſuch ſmall numbers as were requeſted, but with all their power, be aiding unto the Ptolomies. For it was not now (he ſaid) convenient time to entangle themſelves in any ſuch buſineſs, as might make them the leſs able to yield unto the Romans what help ſoever ſhould be required in the Macedonian War. And in this ſentence, he, with thoſe of his faction, obſtinately perſiſted; terrifying others with big words, as it were in behalf of the Romans. But Polybius affirmed, that Martius the late Conſul had ſignified unto him, that the Romans were paſt all need of help: adding further, that a thouſand foot, and two hundred horſe, might well be ſpared to the aid of their Benefactors, the Egyptian Kings, without diſabling their Nation to perform any ſervice to the Romans; foraſmuch as the Achæans could without trouble, raiſe thirty or forty thouſand Souldiers. All this notwithſtanding, the reſolution was deferred from one meeting to another; and finally broken by the violence of Callicrates. For when it was thought that the Decree ſhould have paſſed; he brought into the Theater where the Aſſembly was held, a Meſſenger with Letters from Martius: whereby the Achæans were deſired to conform themſelves to the Roman Senate; and to labour, as the Senate had done, by ſending Embaſſadours to ſet Egypt in peace. This was an advice againſt all reaſon. For the Senate had indeed ſent Embaſſadours to make peace; but as in a time of greater buſineſs elſewhere, with ſuch milde words, that nothing was effected. Wherefore it was not likely that the Achæans ſhould do any good in the ſame kind. Yet Polybius and his friends durſt not gain-ſay the Roman Counſel, which had the force of an Injunction. So the Kings were left in much diſtreſs; diſappointed of their expectation. But within a while was Perſeus overcome; and then might the Embaſſadours, ſent from the Roman Senate, perform as much as any Army could have done.

Audience had been lately given by the Senate, unto thoſe Embaſſadours of Phyſcon and Cleopatra: which having ſtayed more than a whole year in the City, brought nothing of their buſineſs to effect untill now. The Embaſſadours delivered their meſſege in the name of thoſe that had ſent them: though it concerned (which perhaps they knew not) Philometor, no leſs than his Brother and Siſter.

In this ambaſſage of Ptolomy, now requeſting help from Rome, appeared a notable change of his fortune, from ſuch as it had been before three or four years laſt paſt. For in the beginning of theſe his troubles, which began with the Macedonian War; either he, or Eulæus, or Lenæus (upon whom the blame was afterwards laid) which had the government of him, thought his affairs in ſuch good eſtate, that not only he determined to ſet upon Antiochus for Cœloſyria, but would have interpoſed himſelf between the Romans and Perſeus, as a competent Arbitrator; though it fell out well, that his Embaſſadour was by a friend perſwaded to forget that point of his errand. From theſe high thoughts he fell on the ſudden, by the rebellion of his brother and ſubjects, to live under protection of the ſame Antiochus. And now at ſuch time as by attonement with his brother and ſubjects, he might have ſeemed to ſtand in no need of ſuch protection, protection, he hath remaining none other help whereby to save both his Kingdom and life, than what can be obtained by their intercession which were employed against him. This miserable condition of him, his brother and sister shewed it self, even in the habit of those Embassadours. They were poorly clad; the hair of their heads and beards overgrown, as was their manner in time of affliction; and they carried in their hands branches of Olive. Thus they entred into the Senate, and there fell, groveling and prostrate, upon the floor, Their garments were not so mean and mournful, nor their looks and countenances so sad and dejected, but that their speech was than either of the other far more lamentable. For, having told in what danger their King and Country stood; they made a pitiful and grievous complaint unto the Senate, beseeching them to have compassion of their Estate, and of their Princes, who had alwayes remained friendly and faithful to the Romans. They said that the people of Rome had so much heretofore favoured this Antiochus in particular, and were of such account and authority, with all other Kings and Nations; as, if they pleased but to send their Embassadours, and let Antiochus know that the Senate was offended with his undertaking upon the King their Confederate; then would he presently raise his siege from before Alexandria, and withdraw his Army out of Egypt into Syria. But that if the Senate protracted any time, or used any delay; then should Ptolomy and Cleopatra be shortly driven out of their Realms, and make repair to Rome, with shameful dishonour to the Senate and people thereof, in that, in the extream dangers of all their fortunes, they had not vouchsafed to relieve them.

The Lords of the Senate moved with compassion, sent incontinently C. Popilius Lenus, C. Decimius, and A. Hostilius, as Embassadours to determine and end the War between those Kings. In commission they had first to find King Ptolomy, and then Antiochus, and to let them both understand, that, unless they surceased, and gave over Arms, they would take that King no more for a friend to the Senate and people of Rome, whom they found obstinate, or using delay. So these Romans, together with the Alexandrine Embassadours, took their leave, and went onward their way within three dayes after.

Whilest Popilius and his fellows were on their way toward Egypt, Antiochus had transported his Army over Lusine, some forty miles from Alexandria. So near was he to the end of his Journey, when the Roman Embassadours met him. After greetings and salutations at their first encounter, Antiochus offered his right hand to Popilius: but Popilius filled it with a Roll of Paper; willing him to read those Mandates of the Senate before he did any thing else. Antiochus did so; and having a little while considered of the business, he told Popilius, That he would advise with his friends, and then give the Embassadours their answer. But Popilius, according to his ordinary blunt manner of speech, which he had by nature, made a Circle about the King with a Rod which he held in his hand, willing him to make him such an answer as he might report to the Senate, before he moved out of that Circle. The King astonished at this so rude and violent a Commandment, after he had stayed and pawsed a while, I will be content (quoth he) to do whatsoever the Senate shall ordain. Then Popilius gave unto the King his hand, as to a Friend and Allie of the Romans.

Thus Antiochus departed out of Egypt, without any good issue of his costly Expedition; even in such manner as * Daniel had propheſied long before: yea, fulfilling every particular circumstance, both of returning, and of doing mischief to Jerusalem after his return; like as if these things had rather been historified than foretold by the Prophet. As for the Roman Embassadours, they stayed a while, and settled the Kingdom of Egypt, leaving it unto the elder brother, and appointed the younger to reign over Cyrene. This done, they departed towards Cyprus; which they left, as it had been, in the power of the Egyptian, having first sent away Antiochus Fleet, which had already given an overthrow to the Egyptian ships.

§. XII.

How the Romans were dreadful to all Kings. Their demeanour towards Eumenes, Prusias, Masanissa, and Coyts. The end of Perseus and his Children. The instability of Kingly Estates. The Triumphs of Paulus, Anicius, and Octavius. With the Conclusion of the Work.

BY this peremptory demeanour of Popilius, in doing his Message, and by the ready obedience of King Antiochus to the will of the Senate; we may perceive how terrible the Romans were grown, through their conquest of Macedon. The same Popilius had been well contented, a year before this, to lay aside the roughness of his natural condition, and to give good language to the Achæans and Ætolians, when he went Embassador to those people of Greece, that were of far less power than King Antiochus. Likewise, Antiochus had with good words, and no more than good words, dismissed other Embassadors which came from Rome, in such sort, as they complained not, much less used any menacing terms, though he performed nothing of their request. But now the case was altered. So found other Kings as well as Antiochus.

Eumenes sent to Rome his brother Attalus, to gratulate the victory over Perseus, and to crave help or countenance of the Senate against the Gallo Greeks, which molested him. Very welcome was Attalus, and lovingly entertained by most of the Senators: who bad him be confident, and request of the Senate his Brothers Kingdom for himself; for it should surely be given him. These hopeful promises tickled Attalus with such ambition, that he either approved, or seemed to approve the motion. But his honest nature was soon reclaimed by the faithful councel of Stratius a Physitian; whom Eumenes had sent to Rome of purpose to keep his Brother upright. So, when he came into the Senate, he delivered the errand about which he had been sent, recounting his own services done to the Romans in the late War, * where withall, he forgat not to make of his Brother as good mention as he could: and finally, requested, That the Towns of Ænus and Maronea might be bestowed upon himself. * By his omitting to sue for his Brothers Kingdom, the Senate conceived opinion, that he meant to crave another day of audience for that business alone. Wherefore to make him understand how gracious he was, they not only granted all his desire; but in the presents which they gave unto him (as was their custome to Embassadors that came with an acceptable message) they used singular magnificence. Nevertheless Attalus took no notice of their meaning, but went his way, contented with what they had already granted. This did so highly displease the Senate, that whilst he was yet in Italy, they gave order for the liberty of Ænus and Maronea: thereby making uneffectual their promise; which otherwise they could not, without shame, revoke. And as for the Gallo-Greeks, which were about to invade the Kingdom of Pergamus; they sent Embassadors to them, with such instructions, as rather encouraged than hindred them in their purpose. The displeasure of the Senate being so manifest; Eumenes thought it worthy of his labour to make another voyage to Rome. He might well blame the folly of his second voyage thither, for this necessity of the third: since, by his malice to Perseus, he had laid open unto these abitious Potentates the way to his own doors. No sooner was he come into Italy, than the Senate was ready to send him going. It was not thought expedient to use him as an enemy, that came to visit them in love: neither could they, in so doing, have avoided the note of singular inconstancy: and to entertain him as a friend, was more then their hatred to him, for his ingratitude, as they deemed it, would permit. Wherefore they made a Decree, That no King should be suffered to come to Rome; and by vertue thereof sent him home, without expence of much farther complement.

Prusias King of Bithynia had been at Rome somewhat before; where he was welcomed after a better fashion. He had learned to behave himself as humbly as the proud Romans could expect or desire. For, entring into the Senate, he lay down and kissed the threshold, calling the Fathers his gods and saviours; as also he used to wear a Cap, after the manner of slaves newly manumissed, professing himself an enfranchised bondman of the people of Rome. He was indeed naturally a slave, and one that by such abject flattery kept himself safe, though doing otherwise greater mischief than any wherewith Perseus had been charged. His errand was, besides matter of complement, to commend unto the Senate the care of his Son Nicomedes, whom he brought with him to Rome, there to receive education. Further petition he made, to have some Towns added to his Kingdom: whereto, because the grant would have been unjust, he received a cold answer. But concerning the Wardship of his Son, it was undertaken by the Senate: which, vaunting of the pleasure lately done to Egypt, in freeing it from Antiochus, willed him thereby to consider, what effectual protection the Romans gave unto the children of Kings, that were to their Patronage commended.

But above all other Kings, Massinissa held his credit with the Romans, good. His quarrels were endless with the Carthaginians: which made the friendship of the Romans to him the more assured. In all Controversies they gave judgement on his side: and whereas he had invaded the Country of Emporia, holding the Lands, but unable to win the Towns; the Romans (though at first they could find no pretext, whereby to countenance him in this oppression) compelled finally the Carthaginians both to let go all their hold, and to pay five hundred Talents to the Numidian, for having hindred him of his due so long. Now indeed had Rome good leisure to devise upon the ruine of Carthage: after which, the race of Massinissa himself was shortly by them rooted up. But hereof the old King never dreamed. He sent to Rome one of his Sons, to congratulate the Victory over Perseus; and offered to come thither himself, there to sacrifice for joy unto Jupiter in the Capitol. His good will was lovingly accepted; his Son rewarded, and he entreated to stay at home.

Coyts the Thracian sent Embassadours to excuse himself touching the aid by him given to Perseus, for that the Macedonian had him bound by hostages; and to intreat, That his Son, which was taken with the children of Perseus, might be set at liberty, for convenient ransome. His excuse was not taken; since he had voluntarily obliged himself to Perseus, by giving hostages without necessity: Yet was his Son given back to him ransome-free; with admonition, to carry himself better toward the Romans in time following. His Kingdome lay between Macedon, and some barbarous Nations; in which respect, it was good to hold him in fair terms.

As for those unhappy Kings, Perseus and Gentius, they were led thorow Rome, with their children and friends, in the Triumphs of Æmylius and Anicius. Perseus had often made suit to Æmylius, that he might not be put to such disgrace: but he still received one scornful answer, That it lay in his own power to prevent it; whereby was meant, that he might kill himself. And surely, had he not hoped for greater mercy than he found, he would rather have sought his death in Macedon, than to have been beholding to the courtesie of his insolent enemies for a wretched life. The issue of the Roman clemency, whereof Æmylius had given him hope, was no better than this: After that he, and his fellow-King, had been led in chains thorow the streets, before the Chariots of their Triumphing Victors, they were committed to prison, wherein they remained without hope of release. It was the manner, that when the Triumpher turned his Chariot up towards the Capitol, there to do sacrifice, he should command the Captives to be had away to prison, and there put to death: so as the honour of the Vanquisher, and misery of those that were overcome, might be both together at the utmost. This last sentence of death was remitted unto Perseus: yet so, that he had little joy of his life; but either famished himself, or (for it is diversly reported) was kept watching perforce by those that had him in custody; and so dyed for want of sleep. Of his Sons, two dyed; it is uncertain how. The youngest called Alexander (only in name like unto the Great, though destined sometimes perhaps by his Father, unto the fortunes of the Great) became a Joyner, or Turner; or, at his best preferment, a Scribe under the Roman Officers. In such poverty ended the Royal house of Macedon: and it ended on the sudden; though some eightscore years after the death of that Monarch, unto whose ambition this whole Earth seemed too narrow.

If Perseus had known it before, that his own Son should one day be compelled to earn his living by handy-work, in a painful Occupation; it is like, that he would not as in a wantonness of Soveraignty have commanded those poor men to be slain, which had recovered his treasures out of the Sea, by their skill in the feat of diving. He would rather have been very gentle, and would have considered, that the greatest oppressors, and the most under-trodden wretches, are all subject unto the One high Power, governing all alike with absolute command. But such is our unhappyness; in stead of that blessed Counsel, Do as you would be done unto, a sentence teaching all moderation, and pointing out the way to felicity; we entertain that arrogant thought, I will be like to the most High: that is, I will do what shall please my self. One hath said truly.

Posse volunt.——

Even they that have no murdrous will,
Would have it in their power to kill.

All, or the most, have a vain desire of ability to do evil without controll: which is a dangerous temptation unto the performance. God, who best can judge what is expedient, hath granted such power to very few: among whom also, very few there are, that use is not to their own hurt. For who sees not that a Prince, by racking his Soveraign Authority to the utmost extent, enableth (besides the danger to his own person) some one of his own Sons or Nephews to root up all his progeny? Shall not many excellent Princes, notwithstanding their brotherhood, or other nearness in blood, be driven to flatter the Wife, the Minion, or perhaps the Harlot that governs one, the most unworthy of his whole house, yet reigning over all? The untimely death of many Princes which could not humble themselves to such flattery; and the common practice of the Turkish Emperours to murder all their brethren, without expecting till they offend; are two good proofs hereof. Hereunto may be added, that the heir of the same Roger Mortimer, who murdered most traiterously, and barbarously King Edward the second; was, by reason of a marriage, proclaimed, in time not long after following, Heir apparent to the Crown of England: which, had he obtained, then had all the power of Edward fallen into the race of his mortal enemy, to exercise the same upon the Line of that unhappy King. Such examples of the instability whereto all mortal affairs are subject; as they teach moderation, and admonish the transitory gods of Kingdoms, not to authorize by wicked precedents, the evil that may fall on their own posterity: so do they necessarily make us understand, how happy that Country is, which hath obtained a King able to conceive and teach, That God is the surest and sharpest Schoolmaster that can be devised, for such Kings, as think this world ordained for them, without controulment to turn it upside-down at their pleasure.*

* The true Law of Moses.

Now concerning the Triumph of L. Æmylius Paulus, it was in all points like unto that of T. Quintius Flaminius; though far more glorious, in regard of the Kings own person, that was led along therein, as part of his own spoils; and in regard likewise both of the Conquest, and of the Booty. So great was the quantity of Gold and Silver carried by Paulus into the Roman Treasury, that from thenceforth, untill the Civil Wars which followed upon the death of Julius Cæsar, the Estate had no need to burthen it self with any Tribute. Yet was this noble Triumph likely to have been hindred by the Souldiers; who grudged at their General, for not having dealt more bountifully with them. But the Princes of the Senate over-ruled the people and Souldiers herein, and brought them to reason by severe exhortation. Thus Paulus enjoyed as much honour of this Victory as men could give. Nevertheless, it pleased God to take away from him his two remaining Sons, that were not given in Adoption: of which, the one dyed five dayes before the Triumph, the other three dayes after it. This loss he bore wisely: and told the people, That he hoped to see the Common-wealth flourish in a continuance of prosperity; since the joy of his Victory was requited with his own private calamity, in stead of the publick. Chap. 3. sect. 2.

About the same time, Octavius the Admiral, who had brought Perseus out of Samothrace: and Anicius the Prætor, who had conquered Illyria, and taken King Gentius prisoner; made their several Triumphs. The glory of which magnificent spectacles, together with the confluence of Embassages from all parts, and Kings, either visiting the Imperial City, or offering to visit her, and do their duties in person; were enow to say unto Rome, Sume Superbiam, Take upon thee the Majesty that thy deserts have purchased.

BY this which we have already ſet down, is ſeen the beginning and end of the three firſt Monarchies of the World; whereof the Founders and Erectors thought, that they could never have ended. That of Rome which made the fourth, was alſo at this time almoſt at the higheſt. We have left it flouriſhing in the middle of the field; having rooted up, or cut down, all that kept it from the eyes and admiration of the World. But after ſome continuance, it ſhall begin to loſe the beauty it had; the ſtorms of ambition ſhall beat her great boughs and branches one againſt another; her leaves ſhall fall off, her limbs wither, and a rabble of barbarous Nations enter the field, and cut her down.

Now theſe great Kings, and conquering Nations, have been the ſubject of thoſe ancient Hiſtories, which have been preſerved, and yet remain among us; and withall of ſo many tragical Poets, as in the perſons of powerful Princes, and other mighty men have complained againſt Infidelity, Time, Deſtiny, and moſt of all againſt the Variable ſucceſs of worldly things, and Inſtability of Fortune. To theſe undertakings, theſe great Lords of the World have been ſtirred up, rather by the deſire of Fame, which ploweth up the Air, and ſoweth in the wind; than by the affection of bearing rule which draweth after it ſo much vexation, and ſo many cares. And that this is true, the good advice of Cineas to Pyrrhus proves. And certainly, as Fame hath often been dangerous to the living, ſo it is to the dead of no uſe at all; becauſe ſeparate from knowledge. Which, were it otherwiſe, and the extreame ill bargain of buying this laſting diſcourſe, underſtood by them which are diſſolved; they themſelves would then rather have wiſhed, to have ſtoln out of the world without noiſe, than to be put in mind, that they have purchaſed the report of their actions in the World, by rapine, oppreſſion, and cruelty: by giving in ſpoil the innocent and labouring ſoul to the idle and inſolent, and by having emptied the Cities of the World of their ancient Inhabitants, and filled them again with ſo many and ſo variable ſorts of ſorrows.

Since the fall of the Roman Empire (omitting that of the Germanes, which had neither greatneſs nor continuance) there hath been no State fearful in the Eaſt, but that of the Turk: nor in the Weſt any Prince that hath ſpread his wings far over his Neſt, but the Spaniard; who ſince the time that Ferdinand expelled the Moors out of Granado, have made many attempts to make themſelves Maſters of all Europe. And it is true, that by the treaſures of both Indies, and by the many Kingdoms which they poſſeſs in Europe, they are at this day the moſt powerfull. But as the Turk is now counterpoiſed by the Perſian, ſo inſtead of ſo many Millions as have been ſpent by the Engliſh, French, and Netherlands in a defenſive War, and in diverſions againſt them, it is eaſie to demonſtrate, that with the charge of two hundred thouſand pound continued but for two years, or three at the moſt, they may not only be perſwaded to live in peace, but all their ſwelling and overflowing ſtreams may be brought back into their natural channels and old banks. Theſe two Nations, I ſay, are at this day the moſt eminent, and to be regarded; the one ſeeking to root out the Chriſtian Religion altogether, the other the Truth and ſincere Profeſſion thereof; the one to joyn all Europe to Aſia, the other the reſt of all Europe to Spain.

For the reſt, if we ſeek a reaſon of the ſucceſſion and continuance of this boundleſs ambition in mortal men, we may add to that which hath been already ſaid; That the Kings and Princes of the World have alwaies laid before them the actions, but not the ends of thoſe great Ones which preceded them. They are alwaies tranſported with the glory of the one, but they never mind the miſery of the other, till they find the experience in themſelves. They neglect the advice of God, while they enjoy life, or hope of it; but they follow the councel of death, upon his firſt approach. It is he that puts into man all the wiſdom of the World, without ſpeaking a word; which God, with all the words of his Law, promiſes, or threats, doth infuſe. Death, which hateth and deſtroyeth man, is believed; God, which hath made him, and loves him, is alwaies deferred. I have conſidered (ſaith Salomon) all the works that are under the Sun, and behold, all is vanity and vexation of ſpirit: but who believes it till Death tells it us? It was Death, which opening the conſcience of Charls the fifth, made him enjoyn his Son Philip to reſtore Navarre; and King Francis the firſt of France, to command mand that juſtice ſhould be done upon the Murderers of the Proteſtants in Merindol and Cabrieres, which till then he neglected. It is therefore death alone that can ſuddenly make man to know himſelf. He tells the proud and inſolent, That they are but abjects, and humbles them at the inſtant; makes them cry, complain, and repent; yea, even to hate their forepaſſed happineſs. He takes the account of the rich, and proves him a beggar; a naked beggar, which hath intereſt in nothing, but in the gravel that fills his mouth. He holds a Glaſs before the eyes of the moſt beautiful, and makes them ſee therein their deformity and rottenneſs; and they acknowledge it.

O eloquent, juſt, and mighty Death! whom none could adviſe, thou haſte perſwaded; what none have dared, thou haſt done; and whom all the world hath flattered, thou only haſt caſt out of the world and deſpiſed: thou haſt drawn together all the far ſtretched greatneſs, all the pride, cruelty, and ambition of man, and covered it all over with theſe two narrow words, Hic jacet.

Laſtly, whereas this Book, by the title it hath, calls it ſelf, The firſt part of the General Hiſtory of the World, implying a ſecond and third Volume; which I alſo intended, and have hewn out; beſides many other diſcouragements, perſwading my ſilence; it hath pleaſed God to take that glorious Prince out of the world, to whom they were directed, whoſe unſpeakable and never enough lamented loſs hath taught me to ſay with Job, Verſa eſt in luctum Cithara mea, & Organum meum in vocem flentium.

FINIS.

To The Reader.

THE uſe of Chronological Tables is needful to all Hiſtories, that reach to any length of time; and moſt of all, to thoſe that are moſt general: ſince they cannot, like Annalls, yearly ſet down all occurrences not cohærent. This here followeth, may ſerve as an Index to the preſent part of this work, pointing unto the ſeveral matters, that having fallen out at one time, are far diſ-joyned in the relation. Certainly it is not perfect, neither do I think that any can be. For howſoever the years of the firſt Patriarchs may ſeem to have been well-neer compleat, yet in the reigns of the Kings of Juda and Iſrael, we find many fractions, and the laſt year, or years of one King reckoned alſo as the foremoſt of another. The ſame is moſt likely to have fallen out in many other, though not ſo preciſely recorded. Hereto may be added the divers and imperfect forms of the year, which were in uſe among ſundry Nations, cauſing the* Summer months, in proceſs of ſome ages, to fall into the winter, and ſo breeding extream confuſion in the reckoning of their times. Neither is it a ſmall part of trouble, to chooſe out of ſo many, and ſo utterly diſagreeing computations, as have already gotten Authority, what may probably be held for truth. All this, and a great deal more, is to be alledged, in excuſe of ſuch erreurs, as a more intentive and perfect Calculator ſhall happen to find herein. It may ſerve to free the Book, and likewiſe the Reader (if but of mean judgement,) from any notorious Anachroniciſm; which ought to ſuffice. The book indeed will need it, even in that regard; not only from ſome errours of the Preſs, in the numbring of years, but for ſome haſtie miſ-reckonings of mine own, which I deſire to have hereby reformed, in hope that the Printing of this Table ſhall not want careful diligence. The Reader, of he be not offended with the reſt, ſhall find reaſon to be pleaſed with this, as tending wholly to his own eaſe.

The titles over the Columns, have reference to that which follows under them, as will readily be Conceived. Where two titles, or more, are over the head, as [Rome / Nabonaſſer] there do the numbers underneath proportionably anſwer, the higher to the higher, the lower to the lower. For example, The walls of Jeruſalem were finiſhed in the 319. Year from the building of Rome, and in the 314. from Nabonaſſer. In like manner it is to be underſtood, That Joſaphat began his reign in the 3774. of the Julian Æra, in the 3092. of the World, and in the 99. year of the Temple. This needs not more illuſtration, nor indeed ſo much, to thoſe that are acquainted with works of this kind. To avoid prolixity, I have forborn to inſert thoſe years, which I find not ſigned with ſome regardable accident, as with the birth or death of ſome Patriarch; the beginning of ſome Kings reign; ſome change of Government; ſome battel fought, or the like. So of the 13. years wherein Sylvius Capetus reigned over the Latines, I note only the firſt; that is, omitting all between the 4. of Jehoſaphat, wherein Capetus began, unto the 17. wherein Sylvius Aventinus ſucceeded, and wherein Jehoram firſt reigned with Jehoſaphat his father. For I thought it vain to have filled up a Page with 12. lines of idle ciphers, numbring forth, 2. 3. 4. 5. and ſo ſtill onwards, till I had come to the firſt of Aventinus, and the 17. of Jehoſaphat. In ſetting down the Kings, there is noted over the head of every one, what place he held in order of ſucceſſion: as whether he were the firſt, ſecond, fifth, ſeventh, or ſo forth in rank of thoſe that reigned in his Country, without notable interruption: Before the name, is the firſt year of his reign; at the end or foot of the name (as the ſpace gives leave) is the whole number of years in which he reigned; in the ſpaces following underneath, are thoſe years of his, which were concurrent with the beginning of ſome other King, or with the year of any remarkable accident. Where two numbers, or more, are found before one Kings name; there it is to be underſtood, that the ſame year belonged not only to the King then beginning, but unto ſome one or more of his foregoers: as the firſt year of Jehoram King of Iſrael, was the ſame with the ſecond of his brother Ahaziah, and the 22. of his father Ahab. So where two or three names are found in one ſpace, as in the 3077 year of the World, Zimri, Tibni, and Omri; it is meant, that every one of them reigned in ſome part of the ſame year, which is reckoned the ſecond of Ela, and the firſt of Omri. Particularly, under the reigns of the Egyptian Kings, are ſet down the years of thoſe Dynaſties, which it was thought meet to inſert; as likewiſe otherwhiles, the day, the moneth, upon which Nabonaſſar's year began

...ncerning the Æra, or account of years, ...lphitus, who began the Olympiads, from ... built, from Nabonassar, and the like; ...ch as was thought convenient hath been ..., where due place was, in the book it self: ... it remaineth only to note, that under the ...le of Olympiads, is set down, first the num... of the Olympiad, and beneath it, the year ...f that Olympiad: as that Cyrus began his ...eign in Persia, in the 55. Olympiad, and the first year thereof.

Now, for that the years of the world, of the Olympiads, of Rome, of Nabonassar, and other, had not beginning in one moneth, but some of them in March, some in April, some about Midsummer, and some at other times: the better to express their several beginnings, some painful Chronologers have divided them proportionably in their several Columns, opposing part of the one year to part of the other: not (as I have here done) cutting all overthwart with one straight line, as if all had begun and ended at one time. But this labour have I spared as more troublesome than useful, since the more part would not have apprehended the meaning, and since the learned might well be without it. It will only be needful to observe, that howsoever the Æra of the Olympiads be 24. years elder than that of Rome, and 29. than that of Nabonassar, yet the reign of some King may have begun at such a time of the year as did not suite with this difference. But hereof I take little regard. The more curious will easily find my meaning: the vulgar will not find the difficulty. One familiar example will explain all. Queen Elizabeth began her reign the 17. of November, in the year of our Lord 1558. She was crowned, held a Parliament, brake it up, threw down Images, and reformed many things in religion, all in her first year, yet not all in that year 1558. but the greater part in the year following, whether we begin with the first of January, or with the 25. of March. The like may be otherwhiles found in this Table, but so, as the difference is never of a whole year.

The Julian Period, which I have placed as the greater number, over the years of the World, was delivered by that honourable, and excellently learned Joseph Scaliger: being accommodated to the Julian years, now in use among us. It consisteth of 7980. years which result from the multiplication of 19. 28. and 15. that is, of the Cycle of the Moon, the Cycle of the Sun, and the years of an Indiction. Being divided by any of these, it leaves the number of the present year, or if no fraction remain, it shews the last year of that Cycle to be current. For example, in the 4498. of this Period, when was fought the great battel of Cannæ, the Prime or golden number was 14. the Cycle of the Sun. 18. and consequently the Dominical letter F. as may be found by dividing the same number of the Julian Period 4498. by 19. for the Prime, by 28. for the Cycle of the Sun. This Julian Period, after the present accompt, alwaies exceeds the year of the world by 682. Besides the former uses, and other thence redounding, it is a better Character of a year, than any other Æra (as, From the beginning of the World, From the Flood, From Troy taken, or the like) which are of more uncertain position. More I shall not need to write, as touching the use or explication of these Tables. Neither was thus much requisite to such as are conversant in works of this kind: it sufficeth if hereby all be made plain enough to the vulgar.
